Preface:
To the New and Enlarged Edition of
"Phrases and Tables" 1844

It is now about a quarter of a century since the first edition of "Phrases and Tables" was published, and the continuous sale of the book is a proof that it supplies a want very largely felt.

In the interval much new information has been unearthed in the subjects treated of in the Dictionary, many errors of philology have been exposed, and an epoch has been reached which was almost impossible when the book was first undertaken more than 30 years ago. During this length of period the book in its manuscript has been always at the author's elbow; that new matter might be laid in store, errors corrected, and suggestions utilized to render the work more generally useful, and more thoroughly to be depended on.

It has been thought by those concerned, that, as the author is now in the 75th year of his age, it would be desirable for him finally to overhaul the entire book, a revision not compatible with such clipping and verbal changes as can be made on stereotyped plates; this "New and Enlarged Edition" has accordingly been thoroughly revised, and every item has been printed in a fresh type: this has enabled the author to make additions and corrections, and to substitute new articles for less useful ones in old Edition; so that this "New and Enlarged Edition" is virtually a new work on the old lines.

The last ten years of this Nineteenth Century have been preeminently distinguished for researches in English philology. Many dictionaries on our gigantic and magnificent language have been published in this decade than in any preceding one, and thousands of noble scholars in Great Britain and America have contributed to improve their character, so that now, in addition of any other language can touch even the fringe of our best English exponents of a tongue spoken by more than a hundred millions of the civilized world's inhabitants. The research, the accuracy, the precision, now so demanded, are quite unprecedented, and the great public interest taken in the matter might justify our calling the period "The Era of English Philoogy".

In the present "New and Enlarged Edition" of his "Dictionary of Phrases and Folks" advantage has been taken of the great literary momentum from every available source. More than one-third of the book consists of entire new matter. Some 350 extra pages have been added, and all that has been retained of previous editions has been subjected to the severest scrutiny.

The thanks are most devoutly due, and are here most gratefully extended to the many hundreds of correspondents who have written to the author on the subjects contained in the book. Some have been specialists; some have suggested new articles; some have sent apt quotations; and others have gone diligently through the volume in their preference, from beginning to end, and have sent their observations to the author, with permission to use them according to his judgment.

Of these last, especial mention should be made of the Rev. Arthur H. Pendell, M.A., of Boston, Henry, Nelson, New York; Dr. Hawley of Bath, Mr. J. Charles Horace, Spain; and a most judicious and hand-taking critic, Mr. George Mathew Peggs, "Principal of Moral Academy Kirkwood, 2nd. Dresden, Eng." a well-known author, and of a Moralist-Loyal whose name I have not obtained permission to publish.

To set down the names of those whose correspondence fills a box of no considerable size, would serve no useful purpose, and would not interest the general reader; but it may, without vanity, be hoped, with all this help, and all the pains of the author, more than half a century, that this "Dictionary of Literary sine-a-bone" will become a standard book of reference, and a guide to be relied on.

Edinburgh, Nov. 24th,
Autumn 1874.
THE

PHRASE AND FABLE.

A. This letter is modified from the Hebrew א (aleph = an ox), which was meant to indicate the outline of an ox's head.

A among the Egyptians is denoted by the hieroglyphic which represents the ibis. Among the Greeks it was the symbol of a bad augury in the sacrifices.

A in logic is the symbol of a universal affirmative. B asserts, E denies. Thus, syllogism in $\exists A \exists A$ contain three universal affirmative propositions.

A1 means first-rate—the very best. In Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping, the character of the ship's hull is designated by letters, and that of the anchors, cables, and stores by figures. A1 means hull first-rate, and also anchors, cables, and stores. A2, hull first-rate, but furniture second-rate. Vessels of an inferior character are classified under the letters E, E, and I.

"She is a prime girl, she is, she is A1"—Sam Stuck.

A.B. (See Able.)

A.B.C. = Aerated Bread Company.

A B C Book. A primer, a book in which articles are set in alphabetical order, as the A B C Railway Guide. The old primers contained the Catechism, as is evident from the lines:

"That is question now
And then comes answer like an A B C book"—Shakespeare: King John, 1.1

A.B.C. Process (The) of making artificial manure. An acrostic of Alum, Blood, Clay, the three chief ingredients.

A.C.B. O. U. The device adopted by Frederick V., Archduke of Austria (the Emperor Frederick III. — 1440-1493).

Austria Est Imperare Orbis Universus. Alle Erfreut das Österreich Unterrich. Austria's Empire Is Overall Universal.

To which was added after the war of 1836, Austria's Emperor Is Ousted Utterly.

Frederick II. of Prussia is said to have translated the motto thus:

"Austria sult in orbis ultima" (Austria will one day be tossed in the world).

A.U.C. Anna ubi condita (Latin), "from the foundation of the city"—i.e., Rome.

Aaron. An Aaron's serpent. Something so powerful as to swallow up minor powers.—Exodus vii. 10-12.

Ab. Ab oro. From the very beginning. Statius, in the epic poem called the Little Iliad, does not rush in medias res, but begins with the eggs of Leda, from one of which Helen was born. If Leda had not laid this egg, Helen would never have been born. If Helen had not been born, Paris could not have eloped with her. If Paris had not eloped with Helen, there would have been no Trojan War, etc.

Ab oro usque ad mala. From the first dish to the last. A Roman cena (dinner) consisted of three parts. The first course was the appetiser, and consisted chiefly of eggs, with stimulants; the second was the "dinner proper;" and the third the dessert, at which stale (i.e., all sorts of apples, pears, quinces, pomegranates, and so on) formed the most conspicuous part. —Hor. Sat. i. iii. 5.
Aback. I was taken aback—I was greatly astonished—taken by surprise—startled. It is a sea term. A ship is “taken aback” when the sails are suddenly carried by the wind back against the mast, instantly staying the ship’s progress—very dangerous in a strong gale.

Abacca. A small frame with wires stretched across it. Each wire contains ten movable balls, which can be shifted backwards or forwards, so as to vary the number in two or more blocks. It is used to teach children addition and subtraction.

The ancient Greeks and Romans employed it for calculations, and so do the Chinese. The word is derived from the Phoen. abak (dust); the Orientals used tables covered with dust for ciphering and diagrams. In Turkish schools this method is still used for teaching writing. The multiplication table invented by Pythagoras is called Abacca Pythagorica. (Latin, abacca; Greek, ἀβάκα.)

Abaddon. The angel of the bottomless pit (Rev. ix. 11). The Hebrew abad means “he perished.”

Abambo. The evil spirit of the Camma tribes in Africa. A fire is kept always burning in his house. He is supposed to have the power of causing sickness and death.

Abandon means put at anyone’s orders; hence, to give up. (Latin, ad, to; hum-num, late Latin for “a decree.”)

Abandon fait larron. As opportunity makes the thief, the person who neglects to take proper care of his goods, leads into temptation, hence, the proverb. “Neglect leads to theft.”

Abaris. The dart of Abaris. Abaris, the Scythian, was a priest of Apollo; and the god gave him a golden arrow on which to ride through the air. This dart rendered him invisible; it also cured diseases, and gave oracles. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras.

“The dart of Abaris carried the philosopher wherever he desired it.”—Wilamow.

Abate (2 syl.) means properly to knock down, French, abattre, whence a batterie, i.e., wholesale destruction of game; O.E. a-badan.

Abate, in horsemanship, is to perform well the downward motion. A horse is said to abate when, working upon curvetas, he puts or beats down both his hind legs to the ground at once, and keeps exact time.

Abatement, in heraldry, is a mark of dishonour annexed to coat armour, whereby the honour of it is abated.

Abaton. (Greek a, not; batos, I go.) As inaccessible as Abaton. Artemisia, to commemorate her conquest of Rhodes, erected two statues in the island, one representing herself, and the other emblematical of Rhodes. When the Rhodians recovered their liberty they looked upon this monument as a kind of palladium, and to prevent its destruction surrounded it with a fortified enclosure which they called Abaton, or the inaccessible place. (Lucan speaks of an island difficult of access in the sea of Memphis, called Abaton.)

Ab'dassides (3 syl.). A dynasty of caliphs who reigned from 750-1258. The name is derived from Abbas, uncle of Mahomet. The most celebrated of them was Haroun-al-Raschid (born 765), reigning 786-808.

Abbey Laird (Ali). An insolvent debtor sheltered by the precincts of Holyrood Abbey.

“Abd, as diligence cannot, he proceeded with on Sunday, the Abbey Lairds (as they were jokingly called) were enabled to come forth on that day to mince in our society.”—R. Chambers.

Abbey-lubber (Ali). An idle, well-fed dependent or loafier.

“It came into a common proverb to call him an Abb'by-lubber, that was idle, well-fed, a lower level, a hanger-on, that might work and would not.”—The History of Paisley Church. 1863.

It is used also of religions in contempt; see Dryden’s Spanish Frair.

Abbot of Missrule, or Lord of Missrule. A person who used to superintend the Christmas diversions. In France the “Abbot of Missrule” was called L’abbé de Liessé (jollity). In Scotland the master of revels was called the “Master of Unreason.”

Abbotsford. A name given by Sir Walter Scott to Clarty Rile, on the south bank of the Tweed, after it became his residence. Sir Walter devised the name from a fancy he loved to indulge in, that the abbeys of Melrose Abbey, in ancient times, passed over the ford of the Tweed.

Abd in Arabic = slave or servant, as Abd-Allah (servant of God), Abd-el-Kader (servant of the Mighty One), Abd-Abdela (3 syl.). Abhor

Abdela, Duke of Albemarle.  “Brave Abdela o’er the prophets’ school was placed; Abdela, with all his father’s virtues grace.” — Byron: Bride of Abidos.

Abdallāh, the father of Mahomet, was so beautiful, that when he married Amīna, 200 virgins broke their hearts from disappointed love. — Washington Irving: Life of Mahomet.

Abdallāh. Brother and predecessor of Giafir, pacha of Abydos. He was murdered by Giafir (2 syl.) — Byron: Bride of Abydos.

Abdal. Persian fanatics, who think it a merit to kill anyone of a different religion; and if slain in the attempt, are accounted martyrs.

Abdeara. A maritime town of Thrace, said in fable to have been founded by Abderis, sister of Diomedes. It was so overrun with rats that it was abandoned, and the Abderitans migrated to Macedonia.

Abderitan. A native of Abderis, a maritime city of Thrace. The Abderitans were proverbial for stupidity, hence the phrase, “You have no more mind than an Abderite.” Yet the city gave birth to some of the wisest men of Greece: as Democritus (the laughing philosopher), Protagoras (the great sophist), Anaxarchus (the philosopher and friend of Alexander), Heracleas (the historian), etc.

Abderitan Laughter. Scoffing laughter, incessant laughter. So called from Abderis, the birthplace of Democritus, the laughing philosopher.

Abderite (3 syl.). A scoffer, so called from Democritus.

Abderus. One of Hercules’s friends, devoured by the horses of Diomedes. Diomedes gave him his horses to hold; and they devoured him.

Abdiel. The faithful seraph who withstood Satan when he urged the angels to revolt. (See Paradise Lost, Bk. v., lines 696, etc.)

“Let adhering with the faith of Abdiel, to the ancient form of adoration.” — Sir W. Scott.

Abodea’rian. One who teaches or is learning his A B C.

Abodea’rian hymns. Hymns which began with the letter A, and each verse or clause following took up the letters of the alphabet in regular succession. (See Acrostic Poetry.)

Abel and Cain. The Mahometan tradition of the death of Abel is this: Cain was born with a twin sister who was named Aclima, and Abel with a twin sister named Jumella. Adam wished Cain to marry Abel’s twin sister, and Abel to marry Cain’s. Cain would not consent to this arrangement, and Adam proposed to refer the question to God by means of a sacrifice. God rejected Cain’s sacrifice to signify his disapproval of his marriage with Aclima, his twin sister, and Cain slew his brother in a fit of jealousy.

Abel Keena. A village schoolmaster, afterwards a merchant’s clerk. He was led astray, lost his place, and hanged himself. — Crabb: Borough, Letter xxi.

Abelites (3 syl.), Abelians, or Abelian. A Christian sect of the fourth century, chiefly found in Hippo (N. Africa). They married, but lived in continence, as they affirm Abel did. The sect was maintained by adopting the children of others. No children of Abel being mentioned in Scripture, the Abelites assume that he had none.

Abes’sa. The impersonation of Abbeys and Convents, represented by Spencer as a damsel. When Una asked if she had seen the Red Cross Knight, Abessa, frightened at the lion, ran to the cottage of blind Superstition, and shut the door. Una arrived, and the lion burst the door open. The meaning is, that at the Reformation, when Truth came, the abbeys and convents got alarmed, and would not let Truth enter, but England (the lion) broke down the door. — Faire Queen, i. 3.

Abesta. A book said to have been written by Abraham as a commentary on the Zend and the Puzend. It is furthermore said that Abraham read these three books in the midst of the furnace into which he was cast by Ninrood. Perian Mythology.

Abeyance really means something gaped after (French, bayer, to gape). The allusion is to men standing with their mouths open, in expectation of some sight about to appear.

Abhig. The propitiatory sacrifice made by an Indian raja who has slain a priest without premeditation.

Abhor (Latin, ab, away from, and horro, to shrink; originally, to shudder, have the hair on end). To abhor is to have a natural antipathy, and to show it by shuddering with disgust.

Abiala. Wife of Makambi; African deity. She holds a pistol in her hand, and is greatly feared. Her aid is invoked in sickness.

Abida. A god of the Kalmucks, who receives the souls of the dead at the moment of decease, and gives them permission to enter a new body, either human or not, and have another spell of life on earth. If the spirit is spotless it may, if it likes, rise and live in the air.

Abidharma. The book of metaphysics in the Tripitaka (q.v.).

Abigail. A lady's maid, or lady-maid. Abigail, wife of Nabal, who introduced herself to David and afterwards married him, is a well-known Scripture heroine (1 Sam. xxv. 3). Abigail was a popular middle class Christian name in the seventeenth century. Beaumont and Fletcher, in The Seven Comely Ladies, call the "waiting gentlewoman" Abigail, a name employed by Swift, Fielding, and others, in their novels. Probably "Abigail Hill," the original name of Mrs. Musham, waiting-woman to Queen Anne, popularised the name.

Abimelech is no proper name, but a regal title of the Philistines, meaning Father-king.

Able. An able seaman is a skilled seaman. Such a man is termed an A.B. (Able-Bodied); unskilled seamen are called "boys" without regard to age.

Able-bodied Seaman. A sailor of the first class. A crew is divided into three classes: (1) able seamen, or skilled sailors, termed A.B.; (2) ordinary seamen; and (3) boys, which include green hands, or inexperienced men, without regard to age or size.

Aboard. He fell aboard of me—met me; abused me. A ship is said to fall aboard another when, being in motion, it runs against the other.

To go aboard is to embark, to go on the board or deck.

Aboard main tack is to draw one of the lower corners of the main-sail down to the chess-tree. Figuratively, it means "to keep to the point."

Abolla. An ancient military garment worn by the Greeks and Romans, opposed to the toga or robe of ponce. The abolla being worn by the lower orders, was affected by philosophers in the vanity of humility.

Abominable (abominior, I pray that the omen may be averted; used on mentioning anything unlucky). As ill-omened things are disliked, so, by a simple figure of speech, what we dislike we consider ill-omened.

Abomination of Desolation (The). The Roman standard is so called (Matt. xxiv. 15). As it was set up in the holy temple, it was an abomination; and, as it brought destruction, it was the "abomination of desolation."

Abou Hassan. A rich merchant, transferred during sleep to the bed and palace of the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid. Next morning he was treated as the caliph, and every effort was made to make him forget his identity. Arabian Nights ("The Sleeper Awakened"). The same trick was played on Christopher Sly, in the Induction of Shakespeare's comedy of The Taming of the Shrew; and, according to Burton (Anatomy of Melancholy, ii. 2, 4), by Philippe the Good, Duke of Burgundy, on his marriage with Eleanor.

"Were I caliph for a day, an honest Abou Hassan, I would scourge me these juparters out of the Commonwealth."—Sir Walter Scott.

Abono (Dame). The French Santa Claus, the good fairy who comes at night to bring toys to children while they sleep, especially on New Year's Day.

Abortive Flowers are those which have stamens but no pistils.

Abou oba Sina, commonly called Arcemen. A great Persian physician, born at Shiraz, whose canons of medicine were those adopted by Hippocrates and Aristotle. Died 1037.

Abou-Bekr, called Father of the Virgin, i.e., Mahomet's favourite wife. He was the first caliph, and was founder of the sect called the Sunnites. (571-634.)

Abou Jahi'a. The angel of death in Mohammedan mythology. Called Azrael by the Arabs, and Mordad by the Persians.

Abouloumir (in Mohammedan mythology). A fabulous bird of the vulture sort which lives 1,000 years. Called by the Persians Kerkés, and by the Turks Ak-Baba.---Herbelot.

Above properly applies only to matter on the same page, but has been extended to any previous part of the book, as See above, p. 9.

Above-board. In a straightforward manner. Conjurers place their hands under the table when they are preparing their tricks, but above when they show them. "Let all be above-board" means "let there be no under-hand work, but let us see everything."

Above par. A commercial term meaning that the article referred to is more than its nominal value. Thus, if you must give more than £100 for a £100 share in a bank company, a railway share, or other stock, we say the stock is "above par."

If, on the other hand, a nominal £100 worth can be bought for less than £100, we say the stock is "below par."

Figuratively, a person in low spirits or ill health says he is "below par."

Above your book—i.e., beyond your comprehension; beyond your mark. The allusion is to hat-pins placed in rows; the higher rows are above the reach of small statures.

Abracadabra. A charm. It is said that Abracadabra was the supreme deity of the Assyrians. Q. Severus Sammonicus recommended the use of the word as a powerful antidote against ague, flux, and toothache. The word was to be written on parchment, and suspended round the neck by a linen thread, in the form given below:

A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A B R A
A B R A C A D A

Abraxas, also written Abras or Abravas; in Persian mythology denotes the Supreme Being. In Greek notation it stands for 365. In Persian mythology Abraxas presides over 365 impersonated virtues, one of which is supposed to prevail on each day of the year. In the second century the word was employed by the Basilidians for the deity; it was also the principle of the Gnostic hierarchy, and that from which sprang their numerous Icons. (See Abraxas Stones.)

Abraham.
His parents. According to Mohammedan mythology, the parents of Abraham were Prince Azar and his wife, Adna.

His infancy. As King Nimrod had been told that one shortly to be born would disproporionate him, he commanded the death of all such; so Adna retired to a cave where Abraham was born. He was nourished by sucking two of her fingers, one of which supplied milk and the other honey.

His boyhood. At the age of fifteen months he was equal in size to a lad of fifteen, and very wise; so his father introduced him to the court of King Nimrod.—Herbelot: Bibliothèque Orientale.

His offering. According to Mohammedan tradition, the mountain on which Abraham offered up his son was Arfaday; but is more generally thought to have been Moriah.

His death. The Ghebers say that Abraham was thrown into the fire by Nimrod's order, but the flame turned into a bed of roses, on which the child Abraham went to sleep.—Tertullian.

"Sweet and welcome is the bed For their own infant prophet spread, When pitying Heavens to roses turned The death-blames that beneath him burn'd." T. Moore: The Worshipers.

To Show Abraham. To pretend illness or distress, in order to get off work. (See Abraham-Man.)

"I have heard people say Show Abraham you may, But must not show Abraham Newland." T. Dibdin or Upton.

Abraham Newland was cashier of the Bank of England, and signed the notes.

Abraham's Bosom. The repose of the happy in death (Luke xvi. 22). The figure is taken from the ancient custom of allowing a dear friend to recline at dinner on your bosom. Thus the beloved John reclined on the bosom of Jesus.

There is no leaping from Britiah's lap into Abraham's bosom—i.e., those who live and die in notorious sin must not expect to go to heaven at death.—Boston, Creed in the Lot.

Abraham Newland (As). A banknote. So called because, in the early part of the nineteenth century, none were genuine but those signed by this name.

Abrahamic Covenant. The covenant made by God with Abraham, that Messiah should spring from his seed. This promise was given to Abraham, because he left his country and father's house to live in a strange land, as God told him.

Abrahmites (4 syl.). Certain Bohemian deists, so called because they Abram-colour. Probably a corruption of Abram, meaningauburn. Halliwell quotes the following from Coriolanus, ii. 3: "Our heads are some brown, some black, some Abram, some bald." And again, "Where is the eldest son of Priam, the Abram-coloured Trojan?" "A goodly, long, thick Abram-coloured beard."—Shirl, Master Constable.

Abram-Man, or Abraham Gaye. A Tom o' Bedlam; a naked vagabond; a begging imposter.

The Abram Ward, in Bedlam, had for its inmates begging lunatics, who used to array themselves with party-coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox-tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers, and beg alms; but for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along. —Canting Academy.

See King Lear, ii. 3.

In Beaumont and Fletcher we have several synonyms:—
"And these, what name of little e'd, they call, Jackman or Pothead, Craker or Buip-a-dop, Frayer or Abram-man, I speak to all."—Boyar's Book, n. 1.

Abraxas Stones. Stones with the word Abraxas engraved on them, and used as talismans. They were cut into symbolic forms combining a fowls' head, a serpent's body, and human limbs. (See ABRAXAS.)

Abras. Side by side, the breasts being all in a line. The ships were all aobras; i.e. their heads were all equally advanced, as soldiers marching abreast.

Abridge is not formed from the word bridge; but comes from the Latin abbreviare, to shorten, from brevis (short), through the French abrèger (to shorten).

Abroach. To set much of abroach is to set it afoot. The figure is from a caak of liquor, which is broached that the liquor may be drawn from it. (Fr. brocher, to prick, abrocher.)

Abridged. You are all abroad. Wide of the mark; not at home with the subject. 'Abroad; in all directions.'

- An elm displays her dusky arms abroad."—Dryden.

Abrogate. When the Roman senate wanted a law to be passed, they asked the people to give their votes in its favour. The Latin for this is rogare legem (to solicit or propose a law). If they wanted a law repealed, they asked the people to vote against it; this was abrogare legem (to solicit against the law).

Absalom, James, Duke of Monmouth, the handsomest but rebellious son of Charles II. in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1689-1685).

Absalom and Achitophel. A political satire by Dryden (1649-1685). David is meant for Charles II.; Absalom for his natural son James, Duke of Monmouth, handsome like Absalom, and, like him, rebellious. Achitophel is meant for Lord Shaftesbury, Zimri for the Duke of Buckingham, and Abdael for Monk. The selections are so skilfully made that the history of David seems repeated. Of Absalom, Dryden says (Part i.):—

"Wit a' e'er he did was done with so much ease, In him alone 'twas natural to please: His motions all accompanied with gravity, And paradise was opened in his face.

Abscond means properly to hide; but we generally use the word in the sense of stealing off secretly from an employer. (Latin, abscondo.)

Absent. "Out of mind as soon as out of sight." Generally misquoted "Out of sight, out of mind."—Lord Brooke.

The absent are always wrong. The translation of the French proverb, Les absents ont toujours tort.

Absent Man (The). The character of Bruière's Absent Man, translated in the Spectator and exhibited on the stage, is a caricature of Comte de Brancas.

Absolute. A Captain Absolute, a bold, despotic man, determined to have his own way. The character is in Sheridan's play called The Rivals.

Sir Anthony Absolute, a warm-hearted, testy, overbearing country squire, in the same play. William Dometon (1764-1831) was nick-named "Sir Anthony Absolute."

Absquatulate. To run away or abscond. A comic American word, from ab and squat (to go away from your squatting). A squatting is a tenement taken in some unclaimed part, without purchase or permission. The persons who take up their squatting are termed squatters.
Abstract Numbers are numbers considered abstractly—1, 2, 3; but if we say 1 year, 2 feet, 3 men, etc., the numbers are no longer abstract, but concrete.

Taken in the abstract. Things are said to be taken in the abstract when they are considered absolutely, that is, without reference to other matters or persons. Thus, in the abstract, one man is as good as another, but not so socially and politically.

Abstraction. An empty Abstraction, a mere ideality, of no practical use. Every noun is an abstraction, but the narrower genera may be raised to higher ones, till the common thread is so fine that hardly anything is left. These high abstractions, from which everything but one common cord is taken, are called empty abstractions.

For example, man is a genus, but may be raised to the genus animal, thence to organized being, thence to created being, thence to matter in the abstract, and so on, till everything but one is emptied out.

Absurd means strictly, quite deaf. (Latin, ab, intensive, and surdus, deaf.)

Reductio ad absurdum. Proving a proposition to be right by showing that every supposable deviation from it would involve an absurdity.

Abudah. A merchant of Baghdad, haunted every night by an old bag; he finds at last that the way to rid himself of this torment is to "fear God, and keep his commandments."—Tales of the Genii.

Like Abudah, he is always looking out for the Furry, and knows that the night will come with the inevitable bag with it. —The Furry.

Abundant Number (A). A number such that the sum of all its divisors (except itself) is greater than the number itself. Thus 12 is an abundant number, because its divisors, 1, 2, 3, 4, 6 = 16, which is greater than 12.

A Deficient number is one of which the sum of all its divisors is less than itself, as 10, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 5 = 8, which is less than 10.

A Perfect number is one of which the sum of all its divisors exactly measures itself, as 6, the divisors of which are 1, 2, 3 = 6.

Abus, the river Humber.

"For by the river that whylome was right
The mere of Abus, I am from Their chieftain, Humber, named aright."

And Drayton, in his Polyolbion, 28, says:

"For my princely name,
From Humber, king of Huns, as anciently it came."

See Geoffrey's Chronicles, Bk. ii. 2.

Abys. A mountain in Africa, opposite Gibraltar. This, with Calpe in Spain, 10 m. distant, forms the pillars of Hercules.

"Heaves up huge Abys on Africa's sand, Crowns with such Calpe Europe's silent strand."

Derivation: Economy of Vegetation.

 Abyssinians. A sect of Christians in Abyssinia, who admit only one nature in Jesus Christ, and reject the Council of Chalcedon.

Acætus. One who does nothing badly. It was a name given to Mercury or Hermes for his eloquence. (Greek, a, not; kakos, bad.)

Academies. The followers of Plato were so called, because they attended his lectures in the Academy, a garden planted by Academus.

"See there the olive grove of Academus, Plato's retreat."—Milton: Paradise Lost, Book IV.

Academy. Divided into—Old, the philosophic teaching of Plato and his immediate followers; Middle, a modification of the Platonic system, taught by Arcesilaus; New, the half-sceptical school of Carneades.

Plato taught that matter is eternal and infinite, but without form or order; and that there is an intelligent cause, the author of everything. He maintained that we could grasp truth only so far as we had elevated our mind by thought to its divine essence.

Arcesilaus was the great antagonist of the Stoics, and wholly denied man's capacity for grasping truth.

Carneades maintained that neither our senses nor our understanding could supply us with a sure criterion of truth.

The talent of the Academy, so Plato called Aristotle (B.C. 384-322).

Academy Figures. Drawings in black and white chalk, on tinted paper, from living models, used by artists. So called from the Royal Academy of Artists.

Acadia—i.e., Nova Scotia, so called by the French from the river Schubenacadie. The name was changed in 1621.
In 1755 the old French inhabitants were driven into exile by order of George II.

"Thus dwelt together in love these simple Acadine farmers." Longfellow: Evangeline

Acadine. A fountain of Sicily which revealed if writings were authentic and genuine or not. The writings to be tested were thrown into the fountain, and if spurious they sank to the bottom. Oaths and promises were tried in the same way, after being written down. — Diondorus Siculius.

Accanthus. The leafy ornament used in the capitals of Corinthian and composite columns. It is said that Callimaches lost his daughter, and set a basket of flowers on her grave, with a tile to keep the wind from blowing it away. The next time he went to visit the grave an acanthus had sprung up around the basket, which so struck the fancy of the architect that he introduced the design in his buildings.

Acceptance. A bill or note accepted. This is done by the drawer writing on it "accepted," and signing his name. The person who accepts it is called the acceptor.

Accessory. Accessory before the fact is one who is aware that another intends to commit an offence, but is himself absent when the offence is perpetrated. Accessory after the fact is one who screens a felon, aids him in eluding justice, or helps him in any way to profit by his crime. Thus, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing or even suspecting them to be stolen, is an accessory ex post facto.

Accident. A fortuit accident is some property or quality which a thing possesses, but which does not essentially belong to it, as the tint of our skin, the height of our body, the redness of a brick, or the whiteness of paper. If any of these were changed, the substance would remain intact.

Accidental or Subjective Colours. Those which depend on the state of our eye, and not those which the object really possesses. Thus, after looking at the bright sun, all objects appear dark; that dark colour is the accidental colour of the bright sun. When, again, we come from a dark room, all objects at first have a yellow tinge. This is especially the case if we wear blue glasses, for a minute or two after we have taken them off.

The accidental colour of red is bluish green, of orange dark blue, of violet yellow, of black white; and the converse.

Accidentals in music are those sharps and flats, etc., which do not properly belong to the key in which the music is set, but which the composer arbitrarily introduces.

Accidents! (4 syl.) An Italian curse or oath: "Ce qui veut dire en bon françâise, 'Puisses-tu mourir d'accident, sans confession,' damné."—E. About: Tella.

Accidents, in theology. After consecration, say the Catholics, the substance of the bread and wine is changed into that of the body and blood of Christ, but their accidents (flavour, appearance, and so on) remain the same as before.

Accius Naevius. A Roman augur in the reign of Tarquin the Elder. Whey he forbade the king to increase the number of the tribes without consulting the augurs, Tarquin asked him if the thought then in his mind was feasible. "Undoubtedly," said Accius, "Then cut through this whetstone with the razor in your hand." The priest gave a bold cut, and the block fell in two. This story (from Livy, Bk. i., chap. 36) is humorously retold in Bon Gaultier's Ballads.

Accolade (3 syl.). The touch of a sword on the shoulder in the ceremony of conferring knighthood; originally an embrace or touch by the hand on the neck. (Latin, ad collum, on the neck.)

Accommodation. A loan of money, which accommodates us, or fits a want. Accommodation Note or Bill. An acceptance given on a Bill of Exchange for which value has not been received by the acceptor from the drawer, and which, not representing a commercial transaction, is so far fictitious.

Accommodation Ladder. The light ladder hung over the side of a ship at the gangway.

Accord means "heart to heart." (Latin, ad coram.) If two persons like and dislike the same things, they are heart to heart with each other.

Similarly, "com-ord" means heart with heart; "dis-ord," heart divided from heart; "re-ord" properly means to recollect — i.e., re-ordicar, to bring again to the mind or heart: then to set down in writing for the purpose of recollecting.

Accost means to "come to the side" of a person for the purpose of speaking to him. (Latin, ad contum, to the side.)
Account. To open an account, to enter a customer's name on your ledger for the first time. (Latin, comptare, to reckon with.)

To keep open account is when merchants agree to honour each other's bills of exchange.

A current account or "account current, aequ.", a commercial term, meaning that the customer is entered by name in the creditor's ledger for goods purchased but not paid for at the time. The account runs on for a month or more, according to agreement.

To cast accounts. To give the results of the debits and credits entered, balancing the two, and carrying over the surplus.

A sale for the account in the Stock Exchange means the sale of stock not for immediate payment, but for the fortnightly settlement. Generally this is speculative, and the broker or customer pays the difference of price between the time of purchase and time of settlement.

We will give a good account of them...i.e. we will give them a thorough good drubbing.

Accurate means well and carefully done. (Latin, aqua,-eris, accurare.

Accusative (The). Calvin was so called by his college companions. We speak of an "accusative age," meaning searching, one eliminating error by accusing it.

"This hath been a very accusative age."—Sir E. Dering.

Ace (1 syl.). The unit of cards or dice, from as, the Latin unit of weight. (Italian, asso; French and Spanish, as.

Within an ace. Within a shive. An ace is the lowest numeral, and he who wins within an ace, wins within a single mark. (See Amts-ab.)

To hate an ace is to make an abatement, or to give a competitor some start or other advantage, in order to render the combatants more equal. It is said that the expression originated in the reign of Henry VIII., when one of the courtiers named Bolton, in order to flatter the king, used to say at cards, "Your Majesty must hate me an ace, or I shall have no chance at all," Taylor, "The water poet" (1580-1651), speaking of certain women, says:

"Though bad they be, they will not hate an ace.
To be said: Prudence, Temperance, Faith, and Grace."

Acedama. A battle-field, a place where much blood has been shed. To the south of Jerusalem there was a field so called; it was purchased by the priests with the blood-money thrown down by Judas, and appropriated as a cemetery for strangers (Matt. xxvii. 5; Acts i. 19). (Aramaic, okel-damah.)

Acephallites (4 syl.) properly means men without a head. (1) A faction among the Eutychians in the fifth century after the submission of Mousicus their chief, by which they were "deprived of their head." (2) Certain bishops exempt from the jurisdiction and discipline of their patriarch. (3) A sect of levellers in the reign of Henry I., who acknowledged no leader. (4) The fabulous Blenmyes of Africa, who are described as having no head, their eyes and mouth being placed elsewhere. (Greek, a-kephale, without a head.)

Acestes (3 syl.). The Arrow of Acestes. In a trial of skill Acestes, the Sicilian, discharged his arrow with such force that it took fire. (Eur., E. 5, line 525.)

"Like Ac, ..." shall it fare...
The swift thought kindles as it flies."—Longfellow.

Achæan League. A confederacy of the twelve towns of Achaia. It was broken up by Alexander the Great, but was again reorganized B.C. 280, and dissolved by the Romans in 147 B.C.

Achar in Indian philosophy means the All-in-All. The world is spun out of Achar as a web from a spider, and will ultimately return to him, as a spider sometimes takes back into itself its own thread. Phenomena are not independent realities, but merely partial and individual manifestations of the All-in-All.

Achates (3 syl.). A fidus Achates. A faithful companion, a bosom friend. Achates in Virgil's Eneid is the chosen companion of the hero in adventures of all kinds.

"He has chosen this fellow for his fidus Achates."—Sir Walter Scott.

Achemon, or Achmon, and his brother Baculas were two Cereopes for ever quarrelling. One day they saw Hercules asleep under a tree and insulted him, but Hercules tied them by their feet to his club and walked off with them, heads downwards, like a brace of hares. Everyone laughed at the sight, and it became a proverbial cry among the Greeks, when two men were seen quarrelling—"Look out for Melampus' go!" (i.e. Hercules).

"Ne insulcit in Melampus cum."—

According to Greek fable, monkeys...
Acheron

The "River of Sorrows." (Greek, achos rois). One of the five rivers of the infernal regions.

"Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep." Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 578.

Pabulum Acheronis. Food for the churchyard; said of a dead body.

Acheronian Books. The most celebrated books of augury in the world. They are the books which the Etruscans received from Tages, grandson of Jupiter.

Acherusia. A cavern on the borders of Pontus, said to lead down to the infernal regions. It was through this cavern that Hercules dragged Cepheus to earth.

Achilles. The Yarrow, called by the French the herbe aux charpentiers — i.e., carpenter's root, because it was supposed to heal wounds made by carpenters' tools. Called Achillia from Achilles, who was taught the uses and virtues of plants by Chiron the centaur. The tale is, that when the Greeks invaded Troy, Telphes, a son-in-law of King Priam, attempted to stop their landing; but Bucephalus caused him to stumble over a vine, and, when he had fallen, Achilles wounded him with his spear. The young Trojan was told by an oracle that "Achilles (meaning milfoil or yarrow) would cure the wound;" but, instead of seeking the plant, he applied to the Grecian chief, and promised to conduct the host to Troy if he would cure the wound. Achilles consented to do so, scraped some rust from his spear, and from the filings rose the plant milfoil, which, being applied to the wound, had the desired effect.

Achilles (3 syll.). King of the Myrmidons (in Thessaly), the hero of Homer's epic poem called the Iliad. He is represented as brave and relentless. The poem begins with a quarrel between him and Agamemnon, the commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks; in consequence of which Achilles refused to go to battle. The Trojans prevail, and Achilles sends forth his friend Patroclus to oppose them. Patroclus fell; and Achilles, in anger, rushing into the battle, killed Hector, the commander of the Trojans. He himself, according to later poems, fell in battle a few days afterwards, before Troy was taken.

Achilles.

Army: The Myrmidons followed him to Troy.
Death: He had Paris who wounded Achilles in the heel with an arrow (a post-Homeric story).
Father: Peleus (2 syll.), King of Thessaly.
Friend: Patroclus.
Horses: Bucephalus (a swift-timed) and Xanthos (chestnut-coloured), endowed with human speech.
Mistress in Troy: Hippodandria, summamed Biceia (2 syll.).
Mother: Thetis, a sea goddess.
Son: Pyrrhus, summoned Neoptolemus (a new warrior).
Tomb: In Scyros, over which no bird ever flies.
Troy, x. 29.
Tutor: First, Phoenix, who taught him the elements; then Chiron the centaur.
Wife: Penthesila (2 syll.). De-i-da-my'-ah.

Achilles (pronounce A-kill'-leez). The English, John Talbot, first Earl of Shrewsbury (1373-1453).

Achilles of England, the Duke of Wellington (1769-1852).
Of Germany, Albert, Elector of Brandenburg (1414-1486).
Of Lombardy, brother of Sforza and Palamedes. All the three brothers were in the allied army of Godfrey (Jerusalem Delivered). Achilles of Lombardy was slain by Corinna. This was not a complimentary title, but a proper name.
Of Rome, Lucius Sicinnus Dentatus, the Roman tribune; also called the Second Achilles. Put to death B.C. 450.

Achilles of the West. Roland the Paladin; also called "The Christian Theseus." (2 syll.).

Achilles' Spear. (See Achilles.)

Achilles' Tendon. A strong sinew running along the heel to the calf of the leg. The tale is that Thetis took her son Achilles by the heel, and dipped him in the river Styx to make him invulnerable. The water washed every part, except the heel covered with his mother's hand. It was on this vulnerable point the hero was slain; and the sinew of the heel is called, in consequence, tendo Achilles. A post-Homeric story.

The Heel of Achilles. The vulnerable or weak point in a man's character or of a nation. (See above.)

Aching Void. (An). That desolation of heart which arises from the recollection of some cherished endearment no longer possessed.

"What peaceful hours I once enjoyed! How sweet their memory still. But they have left an aching void. The world can never fill."

Achitophel. (See Absalom and Achitophel.) Achitophel was David's traitor counsellor, who deserted to Achor; but his advice being disregarded, he hanged himself (2 Sam. xv.).
The Achitophel of Dryden's satire was the Earl of Shaftesbury:—

"Of these (the rebels) the false Achitophel was first;
A name to all succeeding ages curst;
For close designs and crooked counsels fit;
Sagacious, bold, and turbulent of wit;
Restless, unfix'd in principles and place;
In power unpleased, impatient in disgrace."

Part i. 158-5.

A'chor. God of flies, worshiped by the Cyrenians, that they might not be annoyed with these tiny tormentors. (See Flies, God of.)

A'cis. The son of Faunus, in love with Galatea. Polyphemus, his rival, crushed him under a huge rock.

A'coma. The crisis of a disease. Old medical writers used to divide the progress of a disease into four periods: the ar-che, or beginning; the ambabus, or increase; the acme, or term of its utmost violence; and the pu-rac-me, or decline. Figuratively, the highest point of anything.

A'conomian Wood (The). The trystplace of unlawful love. It was here that Mars had his assignation with Harmonia, who became the mother of the Amazons.

"C'est là que... Mars eut les fausses de la nymphé Harmonie, comme il eut les Amazones."—Blaeu. Geograph.

A'cometis. An order of monks in the fifth century who watched day and night. (Greek, watchers.)

A'colyte (3 syl.). A subordinate officer in the Catholic Church, whose duty is to light the lamps, prepare the sacred elements, attend the officiating priests, etc. (Greek, a follower.)

A'conite. The herb Monkshood or Wolfsbane. Classic fabulists ascribe its poisonous qualities to the foam which dropped from the mouths of the three-headed Cerberus, when Hercules, at the command of Eurystheus, dragged the monster from the infernal regions. (Greek, ākōnitos; Latin, acuminatus.)

"Landra terribiles inuentor Aconit a poëtis."

A'crasia (Self-indulgence). An enchantress who lived in the "Bower of Bliss," situate in "Wandering Island." She transformed her lovers into monstrous shapes, and kept them captives. Sir Guyon having crept up softly, threw a net over her, and bound her in chains of adamant; then broke down her bower and burnt it to ashes.—Spenser: Fairy Queen, ii. 12.

A'cra'tes (3 syl.), i.e., incontinence; called by Spenser the father of Cymoch-legal and Pyrochlear.—Fairy Queen, ii. 4.

A'cre. "God's acre," a cemetery or churchyard. The word "acre," Old English, æcre, is akin to the Latin ager and German acker (a field).

A'cre-fight. A duel in the open field. The combats of the Scotch and English Borderers were so called.

A'cre-shot. A land tax. "Acre" is Old English, æcre (land), and "shot" is scot or scot (a tax).

A'cres. A Rob. Acres—i.e., a coward. From Sheridan's comedy called The Rivals. His courage always "oozed out at his fingers' ends."

A'croamatic. Esotropical lectures; the lectures of Aristotle, which none but his chosen disciples were allowed to attend. Those given to the public generally were called crotene. (Acroamatic is a Greek word, meaning delivered to an audicier; àkraomatic, to attend lectures.)

A'crotie. Same as esoteric. (See ACOAMATIC.)

A'crobat means one who goes on his extremities, or uses only the tips of his fingers and toes in moving about. (It is from the two Greek words, akron boston, to go on the extremities of one's limbs.)

A'croplis. The citadel of ancient Athens.

"Of course it is composed of akr and palo = the right, r. the high."

A'crotie (Greek, akros stekeon). The term was first applied to the verses of the Erythreian sibyl, written on leaves. These prophecies were excessively obscure; but were so contrived that when the leaves were sorted and laid in order, their initial letters always made a word. —Biony, iv. 62.

A'crotic poetry among the Hebrews consisted of twenty-two lines or stanzas beginning with the letters of the alphabet in succession, as Psalm cix., etc.

A'crotics. Puzzles, generally in verse, consisting of two words of equal length. The initial letters of the several lines constitute one of the secret words, and the final letters constitute the other word.

Also words re-arranged so as to make other words of similar significance, as "Horatio Nelson" re-arranged into Honor est a Nilo. Another form of acrostic is to find a sentence which reads the same backwards and forwards, as E.T.L.N.L.T.E., the initial letters of "Est To Live, Never Live To Eat:" which in Latin would be, E.U.V.N.U.E. (Ede Ut Vivam, No Vivam Ut Edas).

Act and Opponency. An "Act," in our University language, consists of a thesis and "disputation" thereon, covering continuous parts of three hours. The person "disputing" with the "keeper of the Act" is called the "opponent," and his function is called an "opponency." In some degrees the student is required to keep his Act, and then to be the opponent of another disputant. Much altercation in these matters has been introduced of late, with other college reforms.

Act of Faith (acto du fôr), in Spain, is a day set apart by the Inquisition for the punishment of heretics, and the absolution of those who renounce their heretical doctrines. The sentence of the Inquisition is also so called; and so is the ceremony of burning, or otherwise torturing the condemned.

Act of God. (In.) "Dumnummum fatale," such as loss by lightning, shipwreck, fire, etc.; loss arising from fatality, and not from one's own fault, theft, and so on. A Devonshire jury once found a verdict—"That deceased died by the act of God, brought about by the flooded condition of the river.

Actaeon. A hunter, in Grecian mythology Acteon was a huntsman, who surprised Diana bathing, was changed by her into a stag, and torn to pieces by his own hounds. Hence, a man whose wife is unfaithful. (See Horse.)

Ad tacu tetigisti. You have hit the nail on the head. (Lit., you have touched it with a needle.) Plautus (Rudens, v. 2, 19) says, "Rem acu tetigisti;" and Cicero (Pro Milone, 24) has "Vulnus acu puncatum," evidently referring to a surgeon's probe.

Acutius. A person in the Middle Ages who attended armies and knights to sharpen their instruments of war. (Latin, acutus, to sharpen.)

Ad Groeas Calendae. (Deferre) to the Greek Calendae -i.e., for ever. (It shall be done) on the Greek Calendae -i.e., never. There were no Calends in the Greek notation of the months. (See New.)

Ad inquirendum. A judicial writ commanding an inquiry to be made into some complaint.

Ad libitum. Without restraint.

Ad rem. (Latin.) To the point in hand, to the purpose. (Actu rem tetigistis.) (See above, Acc.)

Ad unum omnes. All to a man (Latin).

Ad valorem. According to the price charged. Some customs duties vary according to the different values of the goods imported. Thus, at one time tea paid duty ad valorem, the high-priced tea paying more duty than that of a lower price.

Ad vitam atque aeternam. A Latin phrase, used in Scotch law, to indicate the legal permanency of an appointment, unless forfeited by misconduct.

Adam. The Talmudists say that Adam lived in Paradise only twelve hours, and account for the time thus:—

The first hour, God collected the dust and animated it.

The second hour, Adam stood on his feet.

The fourth hour, he named the animals.

The sixth hour, he slept and Eve was created.

The seventh hour, he married the woman.

The tenth hour, he fell.

The twelfth hour, he was thrust out of Paradise.

The Mohammedans tell us he fell on Mount Serendib, in Ceylon, where there is a curious impression in the granite resembling a human foot, above 5 feet long and 23 feet broad. They tell us it was made by Adam, who stood there on one foot for 200 years to expiate his crime; when Gabriel took him to Mount Ararat, where he found Eve. (See Adam’s Peak.)

Adam was buried, according to Arabian tradition, on Abouaia, a mountain of Arabia.

Adam. The old Adam: he beat the offending Adam out of thee; the first Adam, Adam, as the head of unregenerated man, stands for “original sin,” or “man without regenerating grace.”

The second Adam: the new Adam, etc.; I will give you the new Adam. Jesus Christ, as the covenant head, is so called; also the “new birth unto righteousness.”

When Adam delved and Eve span, “Au temps passé, Berthe fut.” This Bertha was the wife of King Pepin.

When Adam delved and Eve span, Who was then the gentleman?

Adam. A sergeant, bailiff, or any one clad in buff, or a skin-coat, like Adam.

“Not that Adam that kept Paradise, but that Adam that keeps the prison.” —Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, i. 3.

A faithful Adam. A faithful old servant. The character is taken from Shakespeare’s comedy of As You Like It, where a retainer of that name, who had served the family sixty-three years, offers to accompany Orlando in his flight, and to share with him his thrifty savings of 500 crowns.

Adam Bell. A northern outlaw, whose name has become a synonym for a good archer. (See Clym of the C lough.)

Adam Cupid. I. c., Archer Cupid, perhaps with allusion to Adam Bell, the celebrated archer. (See Percy’s Reliques, vol. i., p. 7.)

Adam’s Ale. Water as a beverage; from the supposition that Adam had nothing but water to drink. In Scotland, water for a beverage is called Adam’s Wine.

Adam’s Apple. The protuberance in the fore-part of a man’s throat; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit which Adam ate stuck in his throat, and occasioned the swelling.

Adam’s Needle. The yucca, so called because it is sharp-pointed like a needle.

Adam’s Peak, in Ceylon, is where the Arabs say Adam bewailed his expulsion from Paradise, and stood on one foot till God forgave him. It was the Portuguese who first called it “Pico de Adam.” (See Kaaba.)

In the granite is the mark of a human foot, above 3 feet long by 23 feet broad, and to have been made by Adam, who, we are told, stood there on one foot for 200 years, to expiate his crime. After his sentence he was restored to Eve. The Hindus assert that the footprint is that made by Buddha, when he ascended to heaven.

Adam’s Profession. Gardening, agriculture. Adam was appointed by God to dress the garden of Eden, and to keep it (Gen. ii. 15); and after the fall he was sent out of the garden “to till the ground” (Gen. iii. 23).

Adams. Parson Adams, the ideal of a benevolent, simple-minded, eccentric country clergyman: ignorant of the world, bold as a lion for the truth, and modest as a girl. The character is in Fielding’s novel of Joseph Andrews.

Adaman t is really the mineral corundum; but the word is indifferently used for rock crystal, diamond, or any hard substance, and also for the magnet or lodestone. It is often used by poets for no specific substance, but as hardness or firmness in the abstract. Thus, Virgil, in his Aeneid vi, 502, speaks of “adamantine pillars” merely to express solid and strong ones; and Milton frequently uses the word in the same way.
Thus, in Paradise Lost, ii. 436, he says the gates of hell were made of burning adamant:

"This huge convex of fire
Outrageous to devour, immovable round
Ninefold, and gates of burning adamant Barred over us prohibit all access."

Satan, he tells us, wore adamantine armour (Book vi. 110):

"Satan, with vast and haughty strides advanced, Came towering, armed in adamant and gold."

And a little further on he tells us his shield was made of adamant (vi. 253):

"He [Satan] hasted, and opposed the rocky orb
Of ten-fold adamant, his ample shield;
A vast circumference."

Tasso (canto vii. 82) speaks of senza di lucidissimo diamante (a shield of clearest diamond).

Other poets make adamant to mean the magnet. Thus, in Tristus and Cresilda, ii. 2:

"As true as steel, as pliant to the moon,
As sun to day, as nymph to her lover,
As iron to adamant."

("Pliant to the moon," from the notion that plants grew best with the increasing moon.)

And Green says:

"As true to thee as steel to adamant."

So, in the Arabian Nights, the "Third Calendar," we read:

"To-morrow about noon we shall be near the black mountain, or mine of adamant, which at this very moment draws all your feet towards it, by virtue of the iron in your shins."

Adamant is a (negative) and dannato (to conquer). Pliny tells us there are six unbreakable stones (xxxvii. 15), but the classical adamans (gen. adamantis) is generally supposed to mean the diamond. Diamond and adamant are originally the same word.

Adamastor. The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope), described by Campion in the Lament as a hideous phantom. According to Barreto, he was one of the giants who invaded heaven.

Adam's Covenant. The covenant made with God to Adam, that "the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head" (Gen. iii. 15).

Adamites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who spread themselves over Bohemia and Moravia in the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. One Picard, of Bohemia, was the founder in 1100, and styled himself "Adam, son of God." He professed to recall his followers to the state of primitive innocence. No clothes were worn, wives were in common, and there was no such thing as good and evil, but all actions were indifferent.

Ad'aran, according to the Parsee superstition, is a sacred fire less holy than that called Behram (g.r.).

Adays. Nowadays at the present time (or day). So in Latin, Nunc duxum and Nunc tempore. The prefix "a" = at, of, or on. Similarly, aughts, of late, on Sundays. All used adverbially.

Addison of the North—i.e., Henry Mackenzie, the author of the Man of Feeling (1745-1831).

Addix it, or Addix van't (Latin). All right. The word uttered by the augurs when the "birds" were favourable.

Addle is the Old English adela (filth), hence rotten, putrid, worthless. Addled eggs better "addle-egg," a worthless egg. An egg which has not the vital principle. Addle-headed, addle-pate, empty-headed. As an addle-egg produces no living bird, so an addle-pate lacks brains.

Addle Parliament (The)—5th April to 7th June, 1614. So called because it did not pass one single measure. (See Parliament.)

Adelantado. A big-wig, the great boss of the place. It is a Spanish word for "his excellency" (adelantar, to excel), and is given to the governor of a province.

"Open no door. If the adelantado of Spain were here he should not enter."—Ben Jonson: Every Man out of his Humour, v. 4.

Ademar, or Amon (in Jerusalem Believed), Archbishop of Poggio, an ecclesiastical warrior, who with William, Archbishop of Orange, besought Pope Urban on his knees that he might be sent on the crusade. He took 400 armed men from Poggio, but they sneaked off during a drought, and left the crusade (Book xiii.). Ademar was not alive at the time, he had been slain at the attack on Antioch by Clorinda (Book xi.); but in the final attack on Jerusalem, his spirit came with three squadrons of angels to aid the besiegers (Book xviii.).

Adopt properly means one who has attained (from the Latin, adoptus, participle of adopto). The alchemists applied the term verum adoptum to those persons who professed to have "attained to the knowledge of" the elixir of life or of the philosopher's stone.

Alchemists tell us there are always 11 adepts, neither more nor less. Like the sacred chicken...
Adessenarians, of which there are only 2 and always 2--i.e. cock and hen.

"In Rosicrucian lore as learned
As he that were adeptus mundi."

S. Butler: Budibras.

Adessenarians. A term applied to those who hold the real presence of Christ’s body in the eucharist, but do not maintain that the bread and wine lose any of their original properties. (The word is from the Latin adesse, to be present.)

Adolescentes. Composed by John Reading, who wrote “Dulce Domum.” It is called the “Portuguese Hymn,” from being heard at the Portuguese Chapel by the Duke of Leeds, who supposed it to be a part of the usual Portuguese service.

Adilus, Adilis. The ancient Goths adopted the children of a former marriage, and put them on the same footing as those of the new family. (Latin, ad-filius, equal to a real son.)

Adha, al (the slit-eyed). The swiftest of Mahomet’s camels.

Adhab-al-Cabr. The first purgatory of the Mahometans.

Adiaphorists. Followers of ‘Jesu-luncheon; moderate Lutherans, who hold that some of the dogmas of Luther are matters of indifference. (Greek, adiaphoros, indifferent.)

Macaulay: Essay, Bulvergh.

Adieu, good-bye. A Dieu, an elliptical form for I commend you to God. Good-b’ye is God be with ye.

Adisseonon. The serpent with a thousand heads which sustains the universe. (Indian mythology.)

Adjective Colours are those which require a mordant before they can be used as dyes.

Adjour: Once written ajourn, French, a-jouner, to put off to another day.

“Be ajourned than to rete in the North of Carlie.”—Longfellow: Chronicles, p. 590

Adjournment of the House. (See MOVING THE ADJOURNMENT.)

Admirable (The). Aben- Ezra, a Spanish rabbi, born at Toledo (1119-1174).

Admirable Crichton (The). James Crichton (kry-ton). (1551-1573.)

Admirable Doctor (Doctor admirabilis). Roger Bacon (1214-1292).

Admiral, corruption of Amir-al. Milton, speaking of Satan, says:—

“His spear (to equal which the tallest pine
Blew on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some tall animal, were but a wand)
He walked with.”—Paradise Lost, 1. 252.

The word was introduced by the Turks or Genoese in the twelfth century, and is the Arabic Amir with the article al (lord or commander); as Amir-al-ma (commander of the water), Amir-al-Onra (commander of the forces), Amir-al-Aminn (commander of the faithful).

English admirals used to be of three classes, according to the colour of their flag—

Admiral of the Red, used to hold the centre in an engagement.

Admiral of the Blue, used to hold the van.

Admiral of the White, used to hold the rear.

The distinction was abolished in 1864; now all admirals carry the white flag. Admirals are called Play Officers.

Admiral of the Blue. A butcher who dresses in blue to conceal blood-stains. A tapster also is so called, from his blue apron. A play on the near-admiral of the British navy, called “Admiral of the Blue (Flag).”

—As soon as custom bids begin to stir
The Admiral of the Blue
Poor John, III.

Admiral of the Red. A punning term applied to a wine-bibber whose face and nose are very red.

Admittance. Licence. Shakespeare says, “Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance”—i.e., to whom great freedom is allowed (Mercy Wives, ii. 2). The allusion is to an absolute custom called admission, by which a prince avowed another prince to be under his protection. Maximilian, Emperor of Mexico, was the “admittant” of the Emperor Napoleon III.

Admonitioners or Admonitioners. Certain Puritans who in 1571 sent an admonition to the Parliament condemning everything in the Church of England which was not in accordance with the doctrines and practices of Geneva.

Adobe [Etob.]

Adolpha. Daughter of General Klein, governor of Prague and wife of Idenstein. Her only fault was “excess of too sweet nature, which ever made another’s grief her own.”—Knowles: Maid of Mariendorf (1863).

Adonai. Son of the star-beam, and god of light among the Rosicrucians.
Adonis

One of the names given by the Jews to Jehovah, for fear of breaking the command, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord [Jehovah] thy God in vain."

Adonis (4 syl.). The song about Adonis; Shelley's elegy on Keats is so called. See Bion's Lament for Adonis.

Adonis. Feasts of Adonis, celebrated in Assyria, Alexandria, Egypt, Judea, Persia, Cyprus, and all Greece, for eight days. Lucian gives a long description of them. In these feasts wheat, flowers, herbs, fruits, and branches of trees were carried in procession, and thrown into the sea or some fountain.

Adonis. A beautiful boy. The allusion is to Adonis, who was beloved by Venus, and was killed by a boar while hunting.

"Rose-check'd Adonis bid him to the chase;
Hunting he loved; but love he laughed to scorn.
Sick with love, and pale from Venus' gaze,
And, like a bold-faced suitor, "kiss me, woman."
Shakespeare: Venus and Adonis.

Adonis of 50. Leigh Hunt was sent to prison for applying this term to George IV. when Regent.

Adonis Flower (Thc), according to Bion, is the rose; Pliny (i. 23) says it is the anemone; others say it is the field poppy, certainly the prince of weeds; but what we now generally mean by the Adonis flower is phœnix's eye, called in French goutte-de-sang, because in fable it sprung from the blood of the gored hunter.

"Aqua polea tacta, ut & ampullum apparet."
(Blond in me fort thou, true anemone.) — Bion: Elegy on Adonis. See also Ovid: Metamorphoses, Bk. 3, Paff. 15.

Adonis Garden, or A garden of Adonis (Greek). A worthless toy: it is very perishable good. The allusion is to the fennel and lettuce jars of the ancient Greeks, called "Adonis gardens," because these herbs were planted in them for the annual festival of the young huntsman, and thrown away the next morning. (1 Henry Vii., i. 63.)

Adonis River. A river in Phœnicia, which always runs red at the season of the year when the feast of Adonis is held. The legend ascribes this redness to sympathy with the young hunter; others ascribe it to a sort of mûnim, or red earth, which mixes with the water.

"Young Thamus came next beholding
Whose annual wound in Lebanon abhur'd
The Syrians came to lament his fate
In arms, all cities all a summer's day.
While swift Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thamus yearly wounded." — Milton: Paradise Lost, Book 1, line 445, etc.

Adonists. Those Jews who maintain that the proper vowels of the word Jehovah are unknown, and that the word is never to be pronounced Adonai. (Hebrew, adon, lord.)

Adoption. Adoption by arms. An ancient custom of giving arms to a person of merit, which laid him under the obligation of being your champion and defender.

Adoption by baptism. Being godfather or godmother to a child. The child by baptism is your god-child.

Adoption by hair. Cutting off your hair, and giving it to a person in proof that you receive him as your adopted father. Thus Bo'zon, King of Arles, cut off his hair and gave it to Pope John VIII., who adopted him.

Adoption Controversy. Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel, maintained that Jesus Christ in his human nature was the son of God by adoption only (Rom. viii. 29), though in his pre-existing state he was the "begotten Son of (God)" in the ordinary catholic acceptance. Duus Scotus, Durandus, Calixtus, and others supported this view.

Adoptionist. A disciple of Elipand, Archbishop of Toledo, and Felix, Bishop of Urgel (in Spain), is so called.

Adore (2 syl.) means to "carry to one's mouth," "to kiss." (ad-or, ad-ôr.) The Romans performed adoration by placing their right hand on their mouth and bowing. The Greeks paid adoration to kings by putting the royal robe to their lips. The Jews kissed in homage; thus God said to Elijah he had 7,000 in Israel who had not bowed unto Baal, "every mouth which hath not kissed him" (1 Kings xix. 18; see also Hos. xiii. 2). "Kiss the Son lest He be angry" (Psalm ii. 12), means worship, reverence the Son. Even in England we do homage by kissing the hand of the sovereign.

Adram meloch. God of the people of Sefharwaim, to whom infants were burnt in sacrifice (Kings xvii. 31). Probably the sun.

Adrastus. An Indian prince, from the banks of the Ganges, who aided the King of Egypt against the crusades. He wore a serpent's skin, and rode on an elephant. Adrastus was slain by Rinaldo.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, Book xx.
Adrian (St.), represented in Christian art, with an anvil, and a sword or axe close by. He had his limbs cut off on a smith's anvil, and was afterwards beheaded. St. Adrian is the patron saint of the Flemish brewers.

Adriau, in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for the Earl of Malagrua.

"Sharp-judging Adriue, the muse's friend,
- Himself a muse: in Sansedon's debate
True to his prince, but not a slave of state:
Whom David's love with honours did adorn,
That from his disobedient son were torn."

Part I.

Adrift. I am all adrift. He is quite adrift. To turn one adrift. Sea phrases. A ship is said to be adrift when it has broken from its moorings, and is driven at random by the wind. To be adrift is to be wide of the mark, or not in the right course. To turn one adrift is to turn him from house and home to go his own way.

Adroit: properly means "to the right" (French, à droite). The French call a person who is not adroit gauche (left-handed), meaning awkward, boorish.

Adsidelata. The table at which the flames sat during sacrifice.

Adulamites (4 syl.). The adherents of Lowe and Horman, seceders in 1666 from the Reform Party. John Bright said of these members that they retired to the cave of Adulam, and tried to gather round them all the discontented. The allusion is to David in his flight from Saul, who "escaped to the cave of Adulam; and every one that was in distress, and every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented, gathered themselves unto him" (1 Sam. xxii. 1, 2).

Advocatus. The second branch of a stag's horn.

"In a hart the main borne itself they call the bronce. The bow of the hart is called the hone or horn; the next, rodel, the next that arroon; and then the top.

"In a buck, they say lone, hone, hamuck, or hornes, pone, and spershe. - Natural Forest.

Advent. Four weeks to commemorate the first and second coming of Christ; the first to redeem, and the second to judge the world. The season begins on St. Andrew's Day, or the Sunday nearest to it. (Latin, adventus, the coming to.)

Advocacy (The). Satan. (1 Pet. v. 8.)

Advocate (Ad) means one called to assist clients in a court of law. (Latin, advocatus.)

The Devil's Advocate. One who brings forward malicious accusations. When any name is proposed for canonisation in the Roman Catholic Church, two advocates are appointed, one to oppose the motion and one to defend it. The former, called Advocatus Diabolicus (the Devil's Advocate), advances all he can against the person in question; the latter, called Advocatus Dei (God's Advocate), says all he can in support of the proposal.

Advocates' Library, in Edinburgh, founded 1682, is one of the five libraries to which copyright books are sent. (See Copyright.)

Advocatus means the right of appointing the incumbent of a church or ecclesiastical benefice. In mediæval times the "advocacy" or patronage of bishoprics and abbeys was frequently in the hands of powerful nobles, who often claimed the right to appoint in the event of a vacancy; hence the word (from Latin, advocatus, the office of a patron).

A pendant advowson is when the patron presents to the bishop a person to whom he is willing to give the place of prebendary.

A collative advowson is when the bishop himself is patron, and collates his client without any intermediate person.

A donative advowson is where the Crown gives a living to a clergyman without presentation, institution, or induction. This is done when a church or chapel has been founded by the Crown, and is not subject to the ordinary.

Advowson in gross is an advowson separated from the manor, and belonging wholly to the owner. While attached to the manor it is an advowson appendant. "Gross" (French) means absolute, entire; thus gross weight is the entire weight without deductions. A villain in gross was a villain in the entire property of his master, and not attached to the land. A common ... to one which is entirely your own, and which belongs to the manor.

Sale of Advsowns. When lords of manors built churches upon their own demesnes, and endowed them, they became private property, which the lord might give away or even sell, without limitation. These livings are called Advsowns appndant, being appended to the manor. After a time they became regular "commercial property," and we still see the sale of some of them in the public journals.

Adytum. The Holy of Holies in the Greek and Roman temples, into which the general public were not admitted. (Greek, a-dulon = not to be entered; doo, to go.

ESplash (2 syl.). Those who, in ancient Rome, had charge of the public buildings (edes), such as the temples, theatres, baths, aqueducts, sewers, including roads and streets also.

Egeus (2 syl.). A fabulous king of Athens who gave name to the Egean Sea. His son, Theseus, went to Crete to deliver Athens from the tribute exacted by Minos. Theseus said, if he succeeded he would hoist a white sail on his home-voyage, as a signal of his safety. This he neglected to do; and Egeus, who watched the ship from a rock, thinking his son had perished, threw himself into the sea.

This incident has been copied in the tale of Sir Tristram and Ysolda. Sir Tristram being severely wounded in Brittany, sent for Ysolda to come and see him before he died. He told his messenger, if Ysolda consented to come to hoist a white flag. Sir Tristram’s wife told him the ship was in sight with a black flag at the helm, whereupon Sir Tristram bowed his head and died. [Tristram.]

Eginean Sculptures. Sculptures excavated by a company of Germans, Danes, and English (1811), in the little island of Egina. They were purchased by Ludwig, Crown Prince of Bavaria, and are now the most remarkable ornaments of the Glyptothek, at Munich.

Egin. God of the ocean, whose wife is Rane. They had nine daughters, who wore white robes and veils (Scandinavian mythology). These daughters are the billows, etc. The word means “to flow.”

Egin. The shield of Jupiter made by Vulcan was so called, and symbolised “Divine protection.” The shield of Minerva was called an egis also. The shield of Jupiter was covered with the skin of the goat Amalthea, and the Greek for goat is, in the genitive case, aigei. The egis made by Vulcan was of irons.

I give my egis over you, I give you my protection.

Egregi. To sport an espirat. In university parlance, an espirat is a medical certificate of indisposition to exempt the bearer from attending chapel and college lectures.

Aeol (A-). A common motto on jewellery, means “for ever and for aye.” (Greek.)

Eumaeus. The cat. An Egyptian deity held in the greatest veneration. Herodotus (ii. 66) tells us that Diana, to avoid being molested by the giants, changed herself into a cat. The deity used to be represented with a cat’s head on a human body. (Greek, aiouron, a cat.

Emilian Law. Made by Emilius, Munificentus the praetor. It enjoined that the oldest priest should drive a nail every year into the capitol on the ides of September (September 5).

Emonia Emo’ian (Hemonia Hemonian).

Ensae. The hero of Virgil’s epic. He carried his father Anchises on his shoulders from the flames of Troy. After roaming about for many years, he came to Italy, where he founded a colony which the Romans claim as their origin. The epithet applied to him is pious = pious, dutiful.

Enaeid. The epic poem of Virgil, (in twelve books). So called from Enans and the suffix -is, plur. ides (belonging to).

“The story of Simon,” says Marcel, “and the taking of Troy is borrowed from Pindar. “The loves of Dido and Aeneas are taken from those of Medea and Jason, in Apollonius of Rhodes. “The story of the Wooden Horse and burning of Troy is from Archilochus of Miletus.”

Eolico Digamma. An ancient Greek letter (F), sounded like our v. Thus vivis with the digamma was sounded vivivis; whereas the Latin vivum, our vive, Gamma, or g, was shaped thus θ; hence digamma = double g.

Eolico Modo. In music, noted for its simplicity, fit for ballads and songs. The Phrygian Mode was for religious music, *as hymns and anthems.

Eolus. In Roman mythology, was “god of the wind.”

Eolus harp. The wind-harp. A box on which strings are stretched. Being placed where a draught gets to the strings, they utter musical sounds.

Eon (Greek, aios), eternity, an immeasurable length of time; any being that is eternal. Basiliades reckons there have been 365 such eons, or gods; but Valentinianus restricts the number to 30. Sometimes written "운."

In mythology each series of rocks covers an era, or an indefinite and immeasurable period of time.

Era. [Era.]

Æræd Bread. Bread made light by means of carbonic acid gas instead of yeast.

Æræd Water. Water impregnated with carbonic acid gas, called fixed air.

Æræns. Followers of Æræus, who maintained that there is no difference between bishops and priests.

Æræhylus (Greek, Αυξηλαος), the most sublime of the Greek tragic poets. He wrote 90 plays, only 7 of which are now extant. Æræhylus was killed by a tortoise thrown by an eagle (to break the shell) against his bald head, which it mistook for a stone (n.c. 535-436). See Horace, Ars Poetica, 278.

* Pronounce Æræ-ku-luus.

Æræhylus of France. Prosper Jolyot de Créchillon. (1674-1762)

Ærculaps. The Latin form of the Greek word Asklepios, the god of medicine and of healing. Now used for "a medical practitioner."

Æsrir, plural of Æsr or Asa, the celestial gods of Scandinavia, who lived in Asgard (god’s ward), situated on the heavenly hills between earth and the rainbow. The chief was Odin. We are told that there were twelve, but it would be hard to determine who the twelve are, for, like Arthur’s knights, the number seems variable. The following may be mentioned: (1) Odin; (2) Thor (his eldest son, the god of thunder); (3) Tyr (another son, the god of wisdom); (1) Baldur (another son, the Scandinavian Apollo); (5) Bragi (the god of eloquence); (6) Vider (god of silence); (7) Hödur the blind (Baldur’s twin brother); (8) Hermot (Odin’s son and messenger); (9) Hemir (divine intelligence); (10) Odur (husband of Freyja, the Scandinavian Venus); (11) Loki (the god of mischief, though not an asa, lived in Asgard); (12) Vali (Odin’s youngest son); another of Odin’s sons was Kvasir the keen-sighted. Then there were the Vanir, or gods of air, ocean, and water: the gods of fire; the gods of the Lower World: and the Mysterious Three, who sat on three thrones above the rainbow. Their names were Har (the perfect), the Like-perfect, and the Third person.

Wives of the Æsrir: Odin’s wife was Frigga; Thor’s wife was Sif (beauty); Baldur’s wife was Nanna (daring); Bragi’s wife was Iduna; Odur’s wife was Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); Loki’s wife was Sighna.

The Æsrir built Asgard themselves, but each god had his own private mansion. That of Odin was Gladsheim; but his wife Frigga had also her private abode, named Fensalir; the mansion of Thor was Bilskirnir; that of Baldur was Broadblink; that of Odur’s wife was Folknir; of Vidar was Landvdi (wide land); the private abode of the goddesses generally was Vingolf.

The refectory or banquet hall of the Æsrir was called Valhalla.

Njord, the water-god, was not one of the Æsrir, but chief of the Vanir; his son was Frey; his daughter, Freyja (the Scandinavian Venus); his wife was Skadi; and his home, Noatun.

Æson’s Bath. Sir Thomas Browne (Religio Medici, p. 67) rationalizes this into "hair-dye." The reference is to Medea renovating Æson, father of Jason, with the juices of a concoction made of sundry articles. After Æson had imbibed these juices, Ovid says:—

"Barba communque, Cantice posita, inhumas manuere, colorem."
Metamorphoses, viii. 304.

Æsonian Hero (The). Jason, who was the son of Æson.

Æsop’s Fables were compiled by Babrius, a Greek, who lived in the Alexandrian age.

Æsop, a Phrygian slave, very deformed, and the writer of fables. He was contemporaneous with Pythagoras, about B.C. 570.

Almost all Greek and Latin fables are ascribed to Æsop, as all our Psalms are ascribed to David. The Latin fables of Phaedrus are supposed to be translations of Æsopian fables.

Æsop of Arabia. Lokman (?). Nasser, who lived in the fifth century, is generally called the "Arabian Æsop."

Æsop of England. John Gay. (1688-1732.)

Æsop of France. Jean de la Fontaine. (1621-1695.)

Æsop of Germany. Gotthold Ephraim Lessing. (1729-1781.)

Æsop of India. Bidpay or Pilpay. (About three centuries before the Christian era.)

Ætites (3 syl.). Eagle - stones. (Greek, αετος, an eagle.) Hollow stones composed of several crusts, one within another. Supposed at one time to form part of an eagle’s nest. Pliny mentions them. Kirwan applies the name to clay-bronzenes having a globular crust of oxide investing an ochreous kernel. Mythologically, they are supposed to have the property of detecting theft.

Aetolian Hero (The). Diomede, who was king of Aetolia. Ovid.

Able means "one easy to be spoken to." (Latin, ad feri, to speak to.)

Affect. To love, to desire. (Latin, affecto.)

"Some affect the light, and some the shade." Blair: Grave.

L'Affection aveugle raison (French). Cassius says to Brutus, "A friendly eye could never see such faults." "L'esprit est presque toujours la dupé du cœur." (La Rochefoucauld: Maximes.)

Again, "a mother thinks all her geese are swans."

Italian: A ogni gliola paion belli i suoi ghiottifati. Ad ogni moccio, suo mietico bello.

French: A chaque osseau son nid paraît beau.

Latin: Asinus asino, sus su, pulcher. Suo cunque res est carissima.

Afront properly means to stand front to front. In savage nations opposing armies draw up front to front before they begin hostilities, and by grimaces, sounds, words, and all conceivable means, try to provoke and terrify their res-a-vis. When this "afronting" is over, the adversaries rush against each other, and the fight begins in earnest.

Afront. A salute; a coming in front of another to salute.

"Only, sir, this must caution you of, in your afront, or salute, never to move your hat." Trench: Exc. Quer., vi. 62.

Afraid. He who trembles to hear a leaf fall should keep out of the wood. This is a French proverb: "Qui a peur de feuilles, ne doit aller au bois." Our corresponding English proverb is, "He who fears scars shouldn't go the wars." The timid should not voluntarily expose themselves to danger.

"Little birds should keep near their nest, larger ones may venture more."

Africa. Terra in Africa (I take possession of thee, O Africa). When Caesar landed at Adrumetum, in Africa, he tripped and fell - a bad omen; but, with wonderful presence of mind, he pretended that he had done so intentionally, and kissing the soil, exclaimed, "Thus do I take possession of thee, O Africa." Told also of Scipio. (See Don Quixote, Pt. II. Bk. vi. ch. 6.)

Africa: never abject nor affli. "Africa is always producing some novelty." A Greek proverb quoted (in Latin) by Pliny, in allusion to the ancient belief that Africa abounded in strange monsters.

African Sisters (The). The Hesperides (4 syl.) who lived in Africa. They were the daughters of Atlas.

Afric. or "Afric." The beau ideal of what is terrible and monstrous in Arabian superstition. A sort of ghoul or demon. Solomon, we are told, once tuned an Afric, and made it submissive to his will.

Aft. The hinder part of a ship.

Fore and Aft. The entire length (of a ship), from stem to stern.

After-cast. A throw of dice after the game is ended; anything done too late.

"Ever be playest an after-cast.
Of all that he shall say or do," Gower.

After-clap. Beware of after-claps. An after-clap is a catastrophe or threat after an affair is supposed to be over. It is very common in thunderstorms to hear a "clap" after the rain subsides, and the clouds break.

"What plaintext mischief and mischief
Do dot him still with after-claps."

After Mont, Mustard. In Latin, "Post bellum, auxilium." We have also, "After death, the doctor," which is the German, "Wann der kranke ist tott, so kommt der arztnei" (when the patient's dead, comes the physic). To the same effect is "When the steed is stilled, lock the stable door." Meaning, doing a thing, or offering service when it is too late, or when there is no longer need thereof.

After us, the Deluge. "I care not what happens when I am dead and gone." So said Mdm. de Pompadour, the mistress of Louis XV. (1722-1764). Metternich, the Austrian statesman (1773-1859), is credited with the same; but probably he simply quoted the words of the French marchioness.

Aft-meal. An extra meal: a meal taken after and in addition to the ordinary meals.

"At aft-meal who shall pry for the wine?" Thyman: D. Debite.

A'gag, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Sir Edmondbury Godfrey, the magistrate before whom Titus Oates made his declaration, and was afterwards found barbarously murdered in a ditch near Primrose Hill. Agag was hewed to pieces by Samuel (1 Sam. xv.).

"And Corah (Titus Oates) meant for Agag's murder call.
In terms as coarse as Samuel used to Saul." L. 65-6.

Agamarshana. A passage of the Veda, the repetition of which will purify the soul like absolution after confession.

Agamemnon. King of Argos, in Greece, and commander-in-chief of the allied Greeks who went to the siege of Troy. The fleet being delayed by adverse winds at Aulis, Agamemnon sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to Diana, and the winds became at once favourable.

- Homer's Iliad.

"Fell Agamemnon's daughter's blood
Appeased the gods that then with blood
Hasten'd their aid.

- Earl of Surrey.

His brother was Menelaus,
His daughters were Iphigenia, Electra, Iphianias, and Chrysothemis (Sophoenous).
He was general of the fleet. He was killed in a battle by his wife Clytemnestra, after his return from Troy.
His son was Orestes, who slew his mother for murdering his father, and was called Agamemnopolis.
His wife was Clytemnestra, who lived in adultery with Aigisthus. At Troy he fell in love with Cassandra, a daughter of King Priam.

- Virgil, Aeneid.

Agamemnon ("there are hills beyond Pentland, and fields beyond Forth"), I.e., we are not to suppose that our own age or locality monopolises all that is good. - Hor. Od. iv. 9, 25. We might add, et post Agamemnona virent.

"Great men there lived ere Agamemnon came,
And after him will others rise to fame." - K. F. N.

Agamé (4 syl.), or Agamanë, the Thessalian, being able to calculate eclipses, she pretended to have the moon under her command, and to be able when she chose to draw it from heaven. Her secret being found out, her vaunting became a laughing-stock, and gave birth to the Greek proverb cast at braggarts: "Yes, as the moon obeys Agamé." - L. 11.

Aganippe (4 syl.). A fountain of Boeotia at the foot of Mount Helicon, dedicated to the Muses, because it had the virtue of imparting poetic inspiration. From this fountain the Muses are called Aganippides (5 syl.) or Aganippides (5 syl.).

Agape (3 syl.). A love-feast. The early Christians held a love-feast before or after communion, when contributions were made for the poor. These feasts became a scandal, and were condemned at the Council of Carthage, 397. (Greek, ἀγάπη, love.)

Agapemone (5 syl.). A somewhat disreputable association of men and women living promiscuously on a common fund, which existed for a time at Charlynch, near Bridgewater, in Somersetshire. (Greek, ἀγάπη, love.)

Agapete. Women under vows of virginity, who undertook to attend the monks. (The word is Greek, and means beloved.)

Agate (2 syl.). So called, says Pliny (xxxvi. 10), from Achaites or Gagaites, a river in Sicily, near which it is found in abundance.

"These, these are they, if we consider well,
That sapphir and the diamond are but dust.
The pearl is, the emerald, and the turkeys, a idea.
The sucarnic corall, amber's golden hue,
The chrysolite, jacint, achate, ruby red.

- Taylor : The Water-pot (1531).

Agate is supposed to render a person invisible, and to turn the sword of foes against themselves.

Agate. A very diminutive person. Shakespeare speaks of Queen Mab as no bigger than an agate-stone on the forefinger of an alderman.

"I was never manned with an agate till now."

- Shakespeare: 2 Hen. iv. 1. 1. 2.

Agathia. Daughter of Cuno, the fanger, in love with Max, to whom she is to be married, provided he carries off the prize in the annual trial-shot. She is in danger of being shot by Max unwittingly, but is rescued by a hermit, and becomes the bride of the young huntsman. Wiel's Opera of Her Freischutz.

Agatha (St.). Represented in Christian art with a pair of shears, and holding in her hand a salver, on which her breasts are placed. The reference is to her martyrdom, when her breasts were cut off by a pair of shears.

Agave (3 syl.) or "American aloe," from the Greek, ἀγαβή, admirable. The Mexican plant fences of Agave round their wigwams, as a defence against wild beasts. The Mahometans of Egypt regard it as a charm and religious symbol; and pilgrims to Mecca indicate their exploit by hanging over the door of their dwelling a leaf of Agave, which has the further charm of warding off evil spirits. The Jews in Cairo attribute a similar virtue to the plant, every part of which is utilised.

Agdistes (self-undulating). The god who kept the porch of the "Bower of Bliss." He united in his own person the two sexes, and sprang from the stone Agdus, parts of which were taken by Deucalion and Pyrrha to cast over their Age as accords. (Spenser: Faerie Queens, book II. 12.) Age-es-ties in 3 syll.

Age as accords (To). To do what is fit and right (Scotch law term). Here "Age" is from the Latin agère, to do.

"To set about the matter in a regular manner, or, as he termed it, to "see as accords." - Sir W. Scott: Repunzelsel, chap. 2.

Age of Animals. An old Celtic rhyme, put into modern English, says:

"Thrice the age of a dog is that of a horse: Thrice the age of a horse is that of a man: Thrice the age of a man is that of a deer: Thrice the age of a deer is that of an eagle."

Age of Women (The). Though many women are mentioned in the Bible, the age of only one (Sarah, Abraham’s wife) is recorded, and that to show at her advanced age she would become the mother of Isaac.

"Elizabeth, the mother of the Baptist," we are told by St. Luke, "was well stricken in age."

Age of the Bishops (The). The ninth century. (Hallam: Middle Ages.)

Age of the Popes (The). The twelfth century. (Hallam: Middle Ages.)

Age now. "Attend to this." In sacrifice the Roman crier perpetually repeated these words to arouse attention. In the "Common Prayer Book" the attention of the congregation is frequently aroused by the exhortation, "Let us pray," though nearly the whole service is that of prayer.

Ages. Varro (Frequentes, p. 219, Scaliger’s edition, 1623) recognizes three ages:—

(1) From the beginning of mankind to the Deluge, a time wholly unknown.
(2) From the Deluge to the First Olympiad, called the mythical period.
(3) From the first Olympiad to the present time, called the historical period.

Titsian symbolised the three ages of man thus:—

(1) An infant in a cradle.
(2) A shepherd playing a flute.
(3) An old man meditating on two skulls.

According to Lucretius also, there are three ages, distinguished by the materials employed in implements (v. 1282), viz.:

(1) The age of stone, when celts or implements of stone were employed.
(2) The age of bronze, when implements were made of copper or brass.
(3) The iron, when implements were made of iron, as at present.

Hesiod names five ages, viz.:

(1) The Golden or patriarchal, under the care of Saturn.
(2) The Silver or voluptuous, under the care of Jupiter.
(3) The Bronze or warlike, under the care of Neptune.
(4) The Heroic or renaissance, under the care of Mars.
(5) The Iron or present, under the care of Pluto.

The present is sometimes called the wire age, from its telegraphs, by means of which well-nigh the whole earth is in intercommunication.

Fichte names five ages also: the ante-diluvian, post-diluvian, Christian, satanic, and millenarian.

Agelasta. The stone on which Cœrus rested when worn down by fatigue in searching for his daughter. (Greek, joyless.)

Agenorides (5 syl.). Cadmus, who was the son of Agenor.

Agent. Is man a free agent? This is a question of theology, which has long been mooted. The point is this: If God fore-ordains all our actions, they must take place as he fore-ordains them, and man acts as a watch or clock; but if, on the other hand, man is responsible for his actions, he must be free to act as his inclination leads him. Those who hold the former view are called necessitarians; those who hold the latter, libertarians.

Agglutinate Languages. The Turanian family of languages are so called because every syllable is a word, and these are glued together to form other words, and may be ungles and so as to leave the roots distinct, as "inkstand."

Aghast. Frightened, as by a ghost; from Anglo-Saxon gæst, a ghost.

Agio. The percentage of charge made for the exchange of paper money into cash. (Italian.)

"The profit is called by the Italians aggio."—

Agis. King of Sparta, who tried to deliver Greece from the Macedonian yoke, and was slain in the attempt.

Agist. To take the cattle of another to graze at a certain sum. The feeding of these beasts is called agistment. The words are from the Norman agisser (to be levant and couchant, rise up and lie down), because, says Coke, beasts are levant and couchant whilst they are on the land.
Agla. A cabalistic name of God, formed from the initial letters of Appiah, Gibbor, Leholah, Adonai (Thou art strong for ever, O Lord!). (See Nor-Abica.)

Aglaecns. The poorest man in Arcadia, pronounced by Apollo to be far happier than Gyges, because he was "contented with his lot."

"Poor and content is rich and rich enough; But riches endless are as poor as winter. To him who ever fears he shall be poor."

Shakespeare: Othello iii. 3.

Agnes. She is an Agnes (elle fait l'Agnes)—i.e., she is a sort of female "Verdant Green," who is so unsophisticated that she does not even know what love means. It is a character in Molière's L'École des Femmes.

Agnes (St.) is represented by Domenichino as kneeling on a pile of fagots, the fire extinguished, and the executioner about to slay her with the sword. The introduction of a lamb (agnus) is a modern innovation, and play on the name. St. Agnes is the patron of young virgins.

"St. Agnes was first tied to a stake, but the fire of the stakes went out; whereupon Aspasia, set to watch the martyrdom, drew his sword, and cut off her head."

Agnes' Day (St.), 21st January. Upon St. Agnes' night, you take a row of pans, and pull out every one, one after another. Saying a pater-noster, stick a pin in your sleeve, and you will dream of him or her you shall marry. —Ld. Gay: Miscellany, p. 135.

Agnotes (3 syl.). Ag-nou-ites, or Ag-no-its (4 syl.).

(1) Certain heretics in the fourth century who said "God did not know everything."

(2) Another sect, in the sixth century, who maintained that Christ "did not know the time of the day of judgment." (Greek, μη, not; γινωσκω, to know.)

Agnostic (An). A term invented by Prof. Huxley in 1865 to indicate the mental attitude of those who withhold their assent to whatever is incapable of proof, such as the absolute. In regard to miracles and revelation, agnostics neither dogmatically accept nor reject such matters, but simply say Agnus—I do not know—they are not capable of proof.

Agnus-castus. A shrub of the Vitex tribe, called agnos (chaste) by the Greeks, because the Athenian ladies, at the feast of Ceres, used to strew their couches with violets leaves, as a palladium of chastity. The monks, mistaking agnos (chaste) for agnus (a lamb), but knowing the use made of the plant, added castus to explain its character, making it chaste-lamb. (For another similar blunder, see I.H.S.)

Agnus Dom. A cake of wax or dough stamped with the figure of a lamb supporting the banner of the Cross, and distributed by the Pope on the Sunday after Easter as an amulet. Our Lord is called Agnus Dei (the Lamb of God). There is also a prayer so called, because it begins with the words, Agnus Dei, qui tollis peccata mundi (O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world).

Agog. He is all agoa, in nervous anxiety; on the qui vive, like a horse in clover. (French, à gogo, or oùvère à gogo, to live in clover.)

Agonistes (4 syl.). Samson Agonistes (the title of Milton's drama) means Samson wrestling with adversity—Samson combating with trouble. (Greek, agonizomai, to combat, to struggle.)

Agonistics. A branch of the Donatists of Africa who roamed from town to town affirming they were ministers of justice. The Greek agon (an assembly) = the Latin mundus, days when the law-courts were opened, that country people might go and get their law-suits settled.

Agony properly means contention in the athletic games; and to agonise is the act of contending. (Greek, agon, a game of contest, as well as a "place of assembly").

Agony, meaning "great pain," is the wrestle with pain or struggle with suffering.

Agony Column of a newspaper. A column containing advertisements of missing relatives and friends; indicating great distress of mind in the advertiser.

Agrarian Law, from the Latin agrar (land), is a law for making land the common property of a nation, and not the particular property of individuals. In a modified form, it means a redistribution of land, giving to each citizen a portion.

Agrimony. The older spelling was Argemomy, and Pliny calls it argemonia, from the Greek argemon, a white speck on the eye, which this plant was supposed to cure.
Agué (A cure for). (See Homer.)

Agué-cheek. Sir Andrew Agué-cheek, a straight-haired country squire, stupid even to silliness, self-conceited, living to eat, and wholly unacquainted with the world of fashion. The character is in Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Agur's Wish (Prov. xxx. 8). "Give me neither riches nor poverty."

Ahasuerus, or Ahashverosh. A title common to several Persian kings. The three mentioned in the Bible are supposed to be Cyaxares (Dan. xi. 1); Xerxes (Esther); and Cambyses (Ezra iv. 0).

An abasement once found at Bath carnasses gives four renderings of the name Ahasuerus. Persia, Xerxes, Khosrow, Ahasuerus, Xerxes, and the greek, Xerxes: the Sanskrit root Kha means "to rule," Khosrau (Zoroastrian), a king.

Ahead. The wind's ahead—i.e., blows in the direction towards which the ship's head points; in front. If the wind blows in the opposite direction (i.e., towards the stern) it is said to be astern.

When one ship is ahead of another, it is before it, or further advanced. "Ahead of the class," means at the head. Ahead in a race, means before the rest of the runners.

To go ahead is to go on without hesitation, as a ship runs ahead of another.

Abihophel, or Abiophel. A treacherous friend and adviser. Abiophel was David's counsellor, but joined Absalom in revolt, and advised him "like the oracle of God" (2 Sam. xvi. 20-23). In Dryden's political satire, Abiophel stands for the Earl of Shaftesbury. (See Abiophel.)

Ahmed (Prince). Noted for the tent given him by the fairy Pari-banou, which would cover a whole army, but might be carried in one's pocket; and for the apple of Sampamol, which would cure all diseases. — Arabian Nights, Prince Ahmed, etc.

This text coincides in a marvellous manner with the Norse ship called Skibladnir (q.v.). (See Solomon's Carpet.)

Abhilah (Ezek. xxiii. 4, 11, etc.). The personification of prostitution. Used by the prophet to signify religious adultery or harlotry. (See Harlot.)

"The great difficulty in exposing the immorality of this Abhilah is that her [acts] are so recondite."—Papers on the Social Evil, Inst.

Abiliahmah. A granddaughter of Cain, loved by the seraph Samia's. She is a proud, ambitious, queen-like beauty, a female type of Cain. When the flood came, her angel-lover carried her under his wings to some other planet.—Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Ahriman, or Ahirmanes. The principle or angel of darkness and evil in the Magian system. (See Oumdad.)

"I conjure the evil spirit, in name, and do honour to Ahirmanes in this young man."—Fenimore.

Aide toi et le Ciel t'aidera (God will help those who help themselves). The party-motto of a political society of France, established in 1824. The object of the society was, by agitation and the press, to induce the middle classes to resist the Government. Guizot was at one time its president, and Le Globe and Le National its organs. This society, which doubtless aided in bringing about the Revolution of 1830, was dissolved in 1832.

Aigrette (2 syl.). A lady's head-dress, consisting of feathers or flowers. The French call the down of hstiles and dandelions, as well as the tuft of birds, aigrette.

Aim. To give aim, to stand afloat. A term in archery, meaning to stand within a convenient distance from the butt, to give the archers information how near their arrows fall to the mark aimed at.

"But, gentle people, give me aim awhile, For nature puts me to a heavy task; Stand afloat!"—Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 3.

To cry aim. To applaud, encourage. In archery it was customary to appoint certain persons to cry aim, for the sake of encouraging those who were about to shoot.

"All my neighbours shall cry aim."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 2.

Aim-eater. An abettor, one who encourages. In archery, the person employed to "cry aim." (See above.)

"Thus salving aim-eater at princes' fall."—English Archaism.

Air, an element. Anxugaros held air to be the primary form of matter. Aristotle gives Fire, Air, Earth, and Water as the four elements.

Air, a manner, as "the air of the court," "the air of gentility," "a good air" (manner, deportment) means the prevailing habit.

Air, in music, is that melody which predominates and gives its character to the piece.

Air one's opinions (To). To state opinions without having firmly based Air-brained. Giddy, heedless. This word is now generally spelt "hair-brained;" but, by ancient authors, hair-brained. In C. Thomson's Autobiography it is spelt "Air-brained," which seems plausible.

Air-line signifies (in the United States) the most direct and shortest possible route between two given places, as the Eastern and Western Air-line Railway.

"Presently a north-easterly current of wind struck the air-ship, and it began to move with great velocity upon a horizontal line."—Mr. Aherne in The Captains' Log.

Air-throne. Odin's throne in Gladsheim. His palace was in Asgard.

Air. To give oneself mighty airs: to assume, in manner, appearance, and tone, a superiority to which you have no claim. The same as Air, manner (q.v.).

The plural is essential in this case to keep it out of the category of mere eccentricity, or to distinguish it from "air" in the sense of department, as "he had a fine, manly air, " his air was that of a gentleman. Air, in the singular, being generally complimentary, but "air's" in the plural, always conveying censure. In Italian, we find the phrase, Si da di l'aria.

Air-rap-adam. The white elephant, one of the eight which, according to Indian mythology, sustain the earth.

Aisle (pronounce iel). The north and south wings of a church. Latin, aula (axilla, ascella), through the French, aile, a wing. In German the nave of a church is schieff, and the aisle fligel (a wing). In some church documents the aisles are called alleys (walks), and hence the nave is still sometimes called the "middle aisle" or alley. The choir of Lincoln Cathedral used to be called the "Chanters' alley;" and Olden tells us that when he came to be churchwarden, in 1638, he made the Puritans "come up the middle alley on their knees to the rail."".

Aitch-bone of beef. Corruption of "Naith-bone," i.e. the haunch-bone (Latin, nexus, a haunch or buttlock).

Similarly, "an aipron" is a corruption of a "spine-rod," or, more correctly, a corruption of a nadder (Old Eng. nadder). In other words, we have reversed the order; thus "a new" is an old, "a new" is an old, "a new."-Letter from Daniel. Latin, gauda, a horse.

Ajax, the Greater. King of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring, and self-confident. Generally called Telamon.

Ajax, because he was the son of Telamon. When the armour of Hector was awarded to Ulysses instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself.— Homer's Iliad, and later poets.

Ajax, the Less. Son of Oileus (3 syl.), King of Locris, in Greece. The night Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, the prophetic daughter of Priam; in consequence of which his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea.—Homer's Iliad, and later poets.

Akbar. An Arabic word, meaning "Very Great." Akbar-Khan, the "very great Khan," is applied especially to the Khan of Hindustan who reigned 1556-1605.

Akbar. The giant whom Kustan slew. (Persian mythology.)

Akmans. The most inoffensive of all the Persian gods.

Alabama. U. S. America. The name of an Indian tribe of the Mississippi Valley, meaning "here we rest."

Alabaster. A stone of great purity and whiteness, used for ornaments. So called from "Alabaster," in Upper Egypt, where it abounds.

Aladdin. In the Arabian Nights' Tales, obtains a magic lamp, and has a splendid palace built by the genie of the lamp. He marries the daughter of the sultan of China, loses his lamp, and his palace is transported to Africa. Sir Walter Scott says, somewhat incorrectly:

"Vaneed into air like the palace of Aladdin."

? The palace did not vanish into air, but was transported to another place.

Aladdin's Lamp. The source of wealth and good fortune. After Aladdin came to his wealth and was married, he suffered his lamp to hang up and get rusty.

"It was impomptly ornamented which once overful nobleman in Scotland could have offered it to new an employment."—Aladdin.

Aladdin's Ring, given him by the African magician, was a "preservative against every evil."—Arabian Nights: Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp.

Aladdin's Window. To finish Aladdin's Window.—i.e. to attempt to com-Aladine. The sagacious but cruel old king of Jerusalem in Tasso's 'Jerusalem Delivered,' book xx. This is a fictitious character, inasmuch as the Holy Land was at the time under the dominion of the caliph of Egypt. Aladine was slain by Raymond.

Alakho. Son of Baro-Devel, the great god of the gipsies. The gipsies say that he will ultimately restore them to Assan in Assyria, their native country. The image of Alakho has a pen in his left hand and a sword in his right.

Alans. Large dogs, of various species, used for hunting deer.

Alarcon. King of Barca, who joined the armament of Egypt against the Crusaders. His men were only half armed.—'Jerusalem Delivered.'

Alarm. An outcry made to give notice of danger. (Italian, allarme; French, alarmer.)

Alarum Bell. In feudal times a 'alarum bell' was rung in the castle in times of danger to summon the retainers to arms. A variant of alarm (q.v.).

Alasnam. Alasnam's lady. In the 'Arabian Nights' Tales Alasnam has eight diamond statues, but had to go in quest of a ninth more precious still, to fill the vacant pedestal. The prize was found in the lady who became his wife, at once the most beautiful and the most perfect of her race. •

• There is wanting one rare and perfect model, and that one, wherever it is to be found, is like Alasnam's lady, worth them all.—Sir Walter Scott.

Alasnam's Mirror. The 'touchstone of virtue,' given to Alasnam by one of the Genii. If he looked in this mirror it informed him whether a damsel would remain to him faithful or not. If the mirror remained unsullied so would the maiden; if it clouded, the maiden would prove faithless.—'Arabian Nights: Prince Zeyn Alasnam.'

Alastor. The evil genius of a house; a Nemesis. Cicero says: 'Who moditated killing himself, that he might become the Alastor of Augustus, whom he hated.' Shelley has a poem entitled 'Alastor, or The Spirit of Solitude.' The word is Greek (alastor), the avenging god, a title applied to Zeus; the Romans had their Jupiter Vindex; and we read in the Bible, 'Vengeance is mine. I will repay, saith the Lord' (Rom. xii. 19).

Alauda. A Roman legion raised by Julius Cesar in Gaul, and so called because they carried a lurk's tuft on the top of their helmets.

Alawy. The Nile is so called by the Abyssinians. The word means 'the giant.'

Alb. The long white tunic (Latin, albus, white) bound round the waist with a girdle. The dress is emblematical of purity and continence, and worn by priests when saying Mass.

Albadara. A bone which the Arabs say defies destruction, and which, at the resurrection, will be the germ of the new body. The Jews called it Luca (q.v.); and the 'Ossacrum' (q.v.) refers probably to the same superstition.

Alban (St.), like St. Denis, is represented as carrying his head between his hands. His attributes are a sword and a crown.

Albania. Turkey, or rather the region about the Caucasus. The word means the 'mountainous region.'

Albanian Hat (An). 'Un chapeau à l'Albanaise.' A sugar-loaf hat, such as was worn by the Albanians in the sixteenth century.

Albano Stone or Peperino, used by the Romans in building; a volcanic tufa quarried at Albano.

Albany. Scotland. (See ALBIX.)

Albati. The white brethren. Certain Christian fanatics of the fourteenth century, so called because they dressed in white. Also the recently baptised. (Lat.)

Albatross. The largest of web-footed birds, called by sailors the Cape Sheep, from its frequenting the Cape of Good Hope. It gorges itself, and then sits motionless upon the waves. It is said to sleep in the air, because its flight is a gliding without any apparent motion of its long wings. Sailors say it is fatal to shoot an albatross. Coleridge's Ancient Mariner is founded on this superstition.

Albert (An). A chain from the waistcoat pocket to a button in front of the waistcoat. So called from Prince Albert, the consort of Queen Victoria. When he went to Birmingham, in 1849, he was presented by the jewellers of the town with such a chain, and the fashion took the public fancy.

Albertus (An) in Orlando Furioso) married Alda, daughter of Otho, Duke of Saxony. His sons were Hugh or Ugo, and Fulke or Fulco. From this family springs the Royal Family of England.

Albinazar (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the leaders of the Arab host which joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. "A chief in rapine, not in knighthood bred." (Book xvii.)

Albigenses (4 syl.). A common name for heretics prior to the Reformation; so called from the Albigenses, inhabitants of the district which now is the department of the Tarn, the capital of which was Albi. It was here the persecution of the Reformers began, under the direction of Pope Innocent III., in 1209. The Waldenses rose after them, but are not unfrequently confounded with them.

Albin. A name at one time applied to the northern part of Scotland, called by the Romans "Caledonia." This was the part inhabited by the Picts. The Scots migrated from Scotia in the North of Ireland, and acquired mastery under Kenneth MacAlpin in 813. In poetry Scotland is called Albion.

The Albigenses were a religious and political movement in medieval France, centered in the region around the city of Albi. The name Albigenses refers to the followers of the Cathar heresy, who were known for their dualistic beliefs and their rejection of the traditional Christian teachings. The movement was suppressed by the papacy in the Albigensian Crusades, which lasted from 1209 to 1229.

Albino. A term originally applied by the Portuguese to those negroes who were mottled with white spots; but now applied to those who are born with red eyes and white hair. Albinos are found among white people as well as among negroes. The term is also applied to beasts and plants. (Latin, albus, white.)

Albino-poets. Oliver Wendell Holmes, in the Antecedent of the Breakfast Table (chap. viii.), speaks of Kirke White as one of the "sweet Albino poets," whose "plaintive song" he admires. It implies some deficiency of virility, as albinism suggests weakness, and possibly is meant as a play upon the name in this particular instance.

Albion. England, so named from the ancient inhabitants called Albiones. The usual etymology of albion (white) is said to have been given by Julius Cæsar in allusion to the "white cliffs."" is quite untenable, as an old Greek treatise, the De Mondo, formerly ascribed to Aristotle, mentions the islands of Albion and Ierne three hundred years before the invasion of Cæsar. Probably "Albion" or Albany was the Celtic name of all Great Britain, subsequently restricted to Scotland, and then to the Highlands of Scotland. Certainly the inhabitants of the whole island are implied in the word Albiones in Festus Avienus' account of the voyage of Hunicus in the fifth century A.D. (See ALEN.)

"Beyond the Pillars of Hercules is the ocean which they found the earth, and in it are 2 very large islands called Britannia, Albion and Ierne." - De Mondo, Sec. III.

Albion. Son of the king of this island when Oberon held his court in what we call Kensington Gardens. He was slain by the elfin Milkah, and brought up in fairyland. When nineteen years of age, he fell in love with Kenna, daughter of King Oberon, but was driven from the empire by the indignant monarch. Albion invaded the territory, but was slain in the battle. When Kenna knew this, she poured the juice of moly over the dead body, and it changed into a snow-drop. - T. Tickell.

Albion the Giant. Fourth son of Neptune, sixth son of Osiris, and brother of Hercules, his mother being Amphitrite. Albion the Giant was put by his father in possession of the island of Britain, where he speciously subdued the Saxons, the first inhabitants. His brother Bergen ruled over Ireland and the Orkneys. Another of his brothers was Lestrigon, who subjected Italy. (See W. Harrison's Introduction to Hakluyt's Chronicle.)

Albracca's Damsel (in Orlando Furioso) is Angelica. Albracca is the capital of Cathay (q.v.).

Album. A blank book for scraps. The Romans applied the word to certain tables overlaid with gypsum, on which were inscribed the annals of the chief priests, the edicts of the praetors, and rules relating to civil matters. In the Middle Ages, “album” was the general name of a register or list; so called from being kept either on a white (albus) board with black letters, or on a black board with white letters. For the same reason the boards in churches for notices, and the boards in universities containing the names of the college men, are called albums.

Alcâde (3 syl.). A magistrate is so called in Spain and Portugal. The word is the Arabic al qadi (the Judge).

Alcâcio Verse or Alcaíos. A Greek and Latin metre, so called from Alcaeus, a lyric poet, who invented it. Each line is divided into two parts, thus:

\[ \sim | \sim | - | - | \sim | - | \sim | - | \sim | \]

The first two lines of each stanza of the ninth ode of Horace are in Alcaics. The first two lines of the ode run thus, and in the same metre:

And weari woodbarks bend with the tollsome weight.”

Alcântara (Order of). A military and religious order instituted in 1214 by Alfonso IX., King of Castile, to commemorate the taking of Alcântara from the Moors. The soverign of Spain is, ex-officio, head of the Order. A reenactment of the order of St. Julian of the Pear-tree, instituted by Fernando Gomez in 1756, better known by the French title St. Julian du Parcier. The badge of the order was a pear-tree.

Alcanus (in Jerusalem Delivered). The Capuanus of the Crusaders, leader of 6,000 foot soldiers from Helvetia.

Alce (2 syl.). One of the dogs of Actæon. The word means “strength.”

Alocete (2 syl.). The hero of Molière’s Misanthropie. Not unlike Shakespeare’s character of Timon.

Alchemilla or Lady’s Mantle. The alchemist’s plant; so called because alchemists collected the dew of its leaves for their operations. Lady means the Virgin Mary, to whom the plant was dedicated.

Alchemy (Al-ki-mâ). The Arabic al kimya (the secret art); so called not only because it was carried on in secret, but because its main objects were the three great secrets of science—the transmutation of baser metals into gold, the universal solvent, and the elixir of life.

Alcâmedon. A generic name for a first-rate carver in wood.

Alcânas. The personification of carnal pleasure in Orlando Furioso; the cârcie of classic fable, and Làz of the Arabsians. She enjoyed her lovers for a time, and then changed them into trees, stones, fountains, or beasts, as her fancy dictated.

Alcoine pôma dare (to give apples to Alcinos). To carry coals to Newcastle; sending cider to Herefordshire. The orchards of Alcinos, King of Coreyra (Corfu), were famous for their fruits.

Alcuinth, mentioned by the Venerable Bede, is Dunbarton.

Aldabella or Alabell (in Orlando Furioso). Sister of Oliviero and Brandimarte, daughter of Monaldus, and wife of Orlando.

Alibaba. A marchioness of Florence, who gave entertainment to the magistrates of the city. She was very handsome, heartless, and arrogant. When Fazio became rich with Bartoldo’s money, Alibaba invited him from his wife, and his wife, out of jealousy, accused her husband of being privy to Bartoldo’s death. Fazio being condemned for murder and robbery, his wife Bianca accused Alibaba of inveigling him, and the marchioness was condemned by the Duke of Florence to spend the rest of her life in a nunnery. —Jean Milman: Fazio.

Aldebaran. The sun in Arabian mythology. In astronomy, the star called the Bull’s eye in the constellation Taurus. (Arabic al-thu, debaran.)

Alderman. One of the seniors or elders. Now applied to a class of magistrates in corporate towns. In London an alderman is the chief magistrate in a ward appointed by election. There are also aldermen of the County Council.

A turkey is called an alderman, both from its presence in aldermanic feasts, and also because of its red and purple colours about the head and neck, which make it a sort of poultry alderman.
Alderman

An alderman in chains, by a similar effort of wit, is a turkey hung with sausages.

Alderman (An). A burglar’s tool; a crowbar for forcing safes. So called from the high rank it holds withburglars.

Alderman (An). A cant term for half-a-crown. An alderman as chief magistrate is half a king in his own ward; and half a crown is half a king.

Aldgate Pump. A draught on Aldgate Pump. A cheque with no effects. A worthless bill. The pun is on the word draught, which means either an order on a bank for money or a sup of liquor.

Aldiger (in Orlando Furioso). Buovo’s son, of the house of Claramont, who lived in Agrissom Castle. He was brother of Malagigi and Vivian; all Christians.

Aldine (2 syl). Leader of the second squadron of Arabs who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. — Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered. (See Syphax.)

Aldine Editions. Editions of the Greek and Latin classics, published and printed under the superintendence of Aldo Manuzio, his father-in-law Andrea of Asolo, and his son Paolo (1490-1597); most of them in small octavo, and all noted for their accuracy. The father invented the type called italic, once called Aldine, and first used in printing Virgil, 1501.

Aldingar (Sir). Steward of Queen Eleanor, wife of Henry II. He impeached her fidelity, and submitted to a combat to substantiate his charge; but an angel, in the shape of a child, established the queen’s innocence. — Percy’s Reliques.

Alo is the Scandinavian ol, called aho in our island. Beer, written hoo, even in the reign of James I. is the Anglo-Saxon bare, from here (barley). A beverage made from barley is mentioned by Tacitus and even Herodotus. Hops were introduced from Holland and used for brewing in 1524, but their use was prohibited by Act of Parliament in 1528—a prohibition which soon fell into disuse. Ale is made from pale malt, whence its light colour; porter and stout from malt more highly dried. Beer is the general word, and in many parts of England includes ale, porter, and stout. The word ale was introduced by the Danes, and the word beer by the Teutons. Among London brewers beer means the dark form, called also stout or porter.

“Ale is among men; but by the gods called beer.” — The Almonist.

Aleberry, a corruption of ale-bree. A drink made of hot ale, spice, sugar, and toast. Burns speaks of the barley-bree (Anglo-Saxon hreu, broth).

“Give an aleberry to be made for her, and put into it powder of camphor.” — The Pathway to Health.

“Be that drunken with cutlers must not be without his ale dagger.” — Shaw. (See N.D. B.)

Pierce Penniless says: — “All that will not wear ale-house daggers at your tuckers [should abstain from inns].” — See Shakespeare Society, p 55.

Ale-draper, a tapster. Ale-drapery, the selling of ale, etc.

“No other occupation gave I but to be an ale-draper.” — H. Chidley: The Play, 1595.

Ale Knight (An). A knight of the ale-hub, a tippler, a sot.

Ale-silver. A yearly tribute paid to the corporation of London, as a licence for selling ale.

Ale-stake. The pole set up before ale-houses by way of signal. A bush was very often fixed to its top. A tavern.

“A earland had he set upon his head
As great as it were for an ale-stake.” — Cumer.

“I know many an ale-stake.”

Headline: English Drama, I, 100.

Ale-wife. The landlady of an ale-house or ale-stand.

Alecto. One of the Furies, whose head was covered with snakes.

“They like Alecto, terrible to view.”

On it: Medusa, the Gorgon’s gaze.

Russe, Journal: Belvedere, b. vi.

Alcetorian Stone (An). A stone, said to be of talismanic power, found in the stomach of cocks. Those who possess it are strong, brave, and wealthy. Milo of Croton owed his strength to this talisman. As a philtre it has the power of preventing thirst or of assuaging it. (Greek, elevator, a cock.)

Alectromancy. Divination by a cock. Draw a circle, and write in succession round it the letters of the alphabet, on each of which lay a grain of corn. Then put a cock in the centre of the circle, and watch what grains he eats. The letters will prognosticate the answer. Libanius and Jamblicus thus discovered who was to succeed the emperor Valens. The cock ate the grains over the letters t, h, e, o, d = Theod [orus]. Greek alector, cock; manteca, divination.

Aleria (in Orlando Furioso). One of the Amazons, and the best beloved of the ten wives of Guido the Savage.

Alert. To be on the watch. From the Latin cretus, part. of cregere, to set upright; Italian, cretto; French, créte, a watch-tower. Hence the Italian stare all' estra, the Spanish estar alerta, and the French être à l'erte, to be on the watch.

Alessio. The lover of Liza, in Bellini's opera of La Sonambula (Scribe's libretto).

Aletheus (3 syl.). An ambassador from Egypt to King Aludine. He is represented as a man of low birth raised to the highest rank, subtle, false, deceitful, and sly.—Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.

Alexander and the Robber. The robber's name was Diodoros.—Gesta Romanorum, cxlvii.

You are thinking of Parmenio, and I of Alexander—i.e., you are thinking what you ought to receive, and I what I ought to give; you are thinking of those castigated, rewarded, or gifted; but I of my own position, and what punishment, reward, or gift is consistent with my rank. The illusion is to the talk about Parmenio and Alexander, when the king said, "I consider not what Parmenio should receive, but what Alexander should give."

Only two Alexanders, Alexander said, "There are but two Alexanders—the invincible son of Philip, and the inimitable painting of the hero by Apelles."

The Continence of Alexander. Having gained the battle of Issus (B.C. 333) the family of King Darius fell into his hand; but he treated the ladies as queens, and observed the greatest decorum towards them. A cunning, having escaped, told Darius of this noble continence, and Darius could not but admire such nobility in a rival.—Avrian Annals of Alexander, iv. 20. (See Continence.)

Alexander, so Paris, son of Priam, was called by the shepherds who brought him up.

Alexander of the North. Charles XII. of Sweden, so called from his military achievements. He was conquered at Pultowa, in Russia (1709), by Czar Peter the Great (1682-1718).

"Representing here The frantic Alexander of the North."—Thomson: Winter.

The Persian Alexander. Sandjar (1117-1158).

Alexander the Corrector. Alexander Cruden, author of the "Concordance to the Bible," who petitioned Parliament to constitute him "Corrector of the People," and went about constantly with a sponge to wipe out the licentious, coarse, and profane chalk scrawls which marked his eye. (1760-1770.)

Alexander's Beard. A smooth chin, no beard at all. An Amazonian chin.

"Disguised yet with Alexander’s beard."—Tasso: Pia Stella civis.

Alexandra (in Orlando Furioso). Oronthea's daughter; the Amazon queen.

Alexandra, so Cassandra, daughter of Priam, is called. The two names are mere variants of each other.

Alexandrian. Anything from the East was so called by the old chroniclers and romancers, because Alexandria was the depot from which Eastern stores reached Europe. (Reigned on Alexandrian capitals, i.e., Ptolemy, Augustus, Orestes, Orlando Furioso, x. 3.)

Alexandrian Codex. A manuscript of the Scriptures in Greek, which belonged to the library of the patriarchs of Alexandria, in Africa, A.D. 1998. In 1628 it was sent as a present to Charles I., and (in 1753) was placed in the British Museum. It is on parchment, in uncial letters, and contains the Septuagint version (except the Psalms), a part of the New Testament, and the Epistles of Clement Romamus.

Alexandrian Library. Founded by Ptolemy Soter, in Alexandria, in Egypt. The tale is that it was burnt and partly consumed in 391: but when the city fell into the hands of the caliph Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to "heat the baths of the city for six months." It is said that it contained 700,000 volumes.

Alexandrian School. An academy of literature by Ptolemy, son of La'gos, especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians. Of its grammarians the most noted are Aristarchos, Harpocration, and Eratosthenes; and of its mathematicians, Ptolemy and Euclid, the former an astronomer, and the latter the geometer whose Elements are still very generally used.

Alexandrine Age. From A.D. 323 to 640, when Alexandria, in Egypt, was the centre of science and literature.

Alexandrine Philosophy. The system of the Gnostics, or Platonised form of Christianity.

Alexandrines (4 syl.). Lambic verses of 12 or 13 syllables, divided into two parts between the sixth and seventh syllable; so called because they were first employed in a metrical romance of Alexander the Great, commenced by Lambert-li-Cors, and continued by Alexandre de Bornay, also called Alexandre de Paris. The final line of the Spenserian stanza is an Alexandrine.

"A needless Alexandrine ends the song.
Which, like a wounded snake, it deigns to show again;"

Alexandrite (4 syl.). A variety of chrysoberyl found in the nica-slate of the Urals. So named from Czar Alexander II. (1818-1855-1881), because it shows the Russian colours, green and red.

Alexis (St.). Patron saint of hermits and beggars. The story goes that he lived on his father’s estate as a hermit till death, but was never recognized. He is represented, in Christian art, with a pilgrim’s habit and staff. Sometimes he is drawn as if extruded on a mat, with a letter in his hand, lying.

Alfader (father of alf). The most ancient and chief of the Scandinavian gods. Odín, father of the Æsir, or gods.

Alfa na. (See Horse.)

Alfar. The good and bad genii of the Scandinavian gods.

Alfheim (home of the good genii). A celestial city inhabited by the elves and fairies. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Alfonsin. An instrument for extracting balls. So called from Alfonse Ferri, a surgeon of Naples, who invented it. (1592.)

Alfonsoine Tables. Astronomical tables constructed in 1252 by Isaac Hazan, a Jewish rabbi, who named them in honour of his patron, Alfonso X., King of Castile, surnamed ”The Wise.”

Alfonso, to whom Tasso dedicated his Jerusalem Delivered, was Alfonso d’Este, Duke of Ferrara.

Alfonso XII. of Castile, whose “favourite” was Leonora de Guzman. Being threatened with excommunication unless he put her away (as Leonora was in love with Ferdinand, a brave officer), the king created Ferdinando Marquis of Montalba, and gave him the hand of his mistress in marriage. As soon as Ferdinando discovered who Leonora was, he restored her to the king, and retired to a monastery. — Donzetti’s Opera, La Favorita.

Alfred’s Scholars. Werfirth, Bishop of Worcester; Ethelstan and Werwulf, two Mercian priests; Plegmund (a Mercian), afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Asser a Welshman; Grimbald, a great French scholar, etc., invited over to England by King Alfred.

Algarifio (3 syl.). Son of Cambuscan, and brother of Cambula, who “won Theodora to wife.” It was in the “Squire’s Tale,” by Chaucer, but was never finished. (See CANACE.)

"Call him up that left half told
The story of Cambuscan bold,
Of Cambula, and of Algarifio,
And who had Cancer to wife."

Milton: L’Aldebaran.

Algebra. is the Arabic al-gebir (the equalisation); “the supplementing and equalising (process);” so called because the problems are solved by equations, and the equations are made by supplementary terms. Peculiarly identical with the Arabian chemist Gebir.

Algrind. of Spencer, is meant for Grindal, Bishop of London in the beginning of Elizabeth’s reign. He was a Marian exile, and not a very cordial co-operator with Bishop Parker.

"The bulls where dwelt old holy saints
I reverence and adore;
Not for themselves, but for the saints.
Which had been a dead of ore,
And now they were to heaven for went,
Their good is with them so;
Then came they to us only lent,
That we might do so much;
Shepherds they were of the best,
And lived in cowling less,
And sith their souls be now at rest.
Why done we them disere;
Such one was (as I have heard)
Old Algrind often see,
That while one was the first shepherd,
And lived with little care." — _Elegy VI._

Alhambra. The palace of the ancient Moors in Granada. The word is the Arabic al-hamra, or at full length kal-at al hamra (the red castle).

All. Cousin and son-in-law of Mahomet, the beauty of whose eyes is with the Persians proverbial; insomuch that the highest term they employ to express beauty is Ayn Halu (eyes of All).—Chardin.

"You have as many aliases as Robin of Bagshot," one of Macbeth's gang: he was Robin of Bagshot, alias Gordon, alias Bluff Bob, alias Carbuncle, alias Bob Booty.—Gay: The Beggar's Opera.

Alibi (elsewhere). A plea of having been at another place at the time that an offence is alleged to have been committed.

"Never mind the character, and stick to the alley! Nothing like an alley, Sammy, nothing."—Dickens: Pickwick Papers.

Alibi Clock (Ay), 1887. A clock which strikes one hour, while the hands point to a different time, the real time being neither one nor the other.

Alibon. Maitre Alibon. Mr. Jackass. Alibon is the name of a jackass in La Fontaine's Fables. (See Gomik.)

Alice. The foster-sister of Robert le Diable, and bride of Rambaldo, the Norman troubadour. She came to Pleremo to place in the duke's hand her mother’s will, which he was enjoined not to read till he was a virtuous man. When Bertram, his head-father, tempted her son to evil, Alice proved his good genius; and when, at last, Bertram claimed his soul as the price of his ill deeds, Alice read the "will," and won him from the evil one. —Meyerbeer's Opera, Roberto il Diavolo.

Alice Brand. Wife of Lord Richard, cursed with the "sleepless eye." Alice signed Urgan the dwarf thrice with the sign of the cross, and he became "the fairest knight in all Scotland;" when Alice recognized him in her own brother. —Sir Walter Scott: The Lady of the Lake, iv. 12.

Alicino (wing dropped). A devil, in The Inferno of Dante.

Ali and Sandic. Contractions of Alexander: the one being Alex and the other ‘xander.

Alex. The seventh heaven, to which Azrael conveys the spirits of the just. (Mohammedan mythology.)

Alien Priory (Is). A priory which owes allegiance to another priory. A sub-priory, like Rufford Abbey, Notts, which was under the prior of Rievaulx in Yorkshire.

Alifanfaron, the giant. Don Quixote attacked a flock of sheep, which he declared to be the army of the giant Alifanfaron. Similarly Ajax, in a fit of madness, fell upon a flock of sheep, which he mistook for Grecian princes.

Allat. The name by which the Arabs adore nature, which they represent by a crescent moon.

Aliprand (in Jerusalem Delivered). One of the Christian knights. Having discovered the armour of Rinaldo cast on one side, he took it to Godfrey, who very naturally inferred that Rinaldo had been slain. (See Gen. xxxvii. 31-55.)

Allira. Sultan of Lower Bucharia. Under the disguised name of Feramor, he accompanied Lulla Rookh, his betrothed, from Delhi, and won her heart by his ways, and the tales he told on the journey. The lady fell in love with the poet, and was delighted to find, on the morning of the wedding, that Feramor was, in fact, the sultan, her intended husband.—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh.

Al Kader (the Divine decree). A particular night in the month Ramadhan, when the Arabs say that angels descend to earth, and Gabriel reveals to man the decrees of God.—Al Koran, ch. xviii.

Alkahest. The hypothetical universal solvent. The word was invented by Paracelsus.

Al Rakim (pronounce Rah-keem). The dog in the legend of the Seven Sleepers of Ephesus.

Al-Sirat (Arabian, the path). The bridge over hell, no wider than the edge of a sword, across which every one who enters heaven must pass. (Mohammedan theology.)

All. Everything. "Our all," everything we possess.

"All is as in clock." "Vadis u: Status at War.

All and Some. "One and all." (Old English, ealle et smaer, all at once, altogether.)

"Now stop your noses, readers, all and same." "Bite u: Alas to an E Athigan.

All and Sunday. All without exception.

"He placed all and sundry to a single sled, and thus they went." "Bite u: Alas to an E Athigan.

All cannot do all. Horace says, "Non omnia possumus omnes." German proverb, "Ein jeder kann nicht
All Fools’ Day

All Fools’ Day (April 1st). (See April Fool.)

All Fours. A game of cards; so called from the four points that are at stake, viz. High, Low, Jack, and Game.

To go on all fours is to crawl about on knees and hands like a little child.

It does not go on all fours is to crawl about on hands and knees like a little child.

It does not go on all fours means it does not suit in every minute particular; it does not fully satisfy the demand. It limps as a quadruped which does not go on all its four legs. Omnibus comparatione omnium (all similie limps).

"No smile can go on all-fours."

All-hallow Summer. The second summer, or the summerly time which sets in about All-Hallows-tide. Called by the French, L’été de St. Martin (from October 9th to November 11th). Also called St. Luke’s Summer (St. Luke’s Day is October 18th). The Indian summer. Shakespeare uses the term—

"Farewell, thou little spring; farewell, All-hallow Summer."

All Hallow’s Day (November 1st).

The French call it Transmant, which we have translated All Saints’ Day. Hallowmas is All-Saints’ festival. (Anglo-Saxon, halig, but Halig-moonth was September, and Halig-deg was simply a Holy-day.)

All Hallowes’ Eve. The Scotch tradition is, that those born on All Hallow’s Eve have the gift of double sight, and commanding powers over spirits. Mary Avenged, on this supposition, is made to see the White Lady, invisible to less gifted vision.

"Being born on All-hallow’s Eve, she Mary Avenged was supposed to be invested with power over the invisible world." (See Sir Walter Scott. The Monastery, chap vi.)

All in all. He is all in all to me, that is, the dearest object of my affection. God be all in all means all creation shall be absorbed or gathered into God. The phrase is also used adverbially, meaning altogether, as:

"Take him for all in all.
I shall not look upon his like again.
Shakespeare. Hamlet iii. 2.

All in the Wrong. A drama, by Murphy, borrowed from De-Touches, the French dramatist.

All Souls’ Day

All is lost that is put in a riven dish.
In Latin, "Pertusum quicquid infunditur in dolium. perit." (It is no use helping the insolvent.)

All is not gold that glitters or glisters. Trust not to appearances. In Latin, "Nulla fides frontis."

"Not all that glitters is lawful prize, Nor all that glisters gold."

(Grey : The Cat and the Gold Fish.)

All my Eye and Betty Martin.

All nonsense. Joe Miller says that a Jack Tar went into a foreign church, where he heard some one uttering these words—Ah! mihi, beate Martin (Ah! [grant] me, Blessed Martin). On giving an account of his adventure, Jack said he could not make much out of it, but it seemed to him very like "All my eye and Betty Martin," Grose has "Mii beate Martinis" [sic]. The shortened phrase, "All my eye," is very common.

All one. The same in effect. Answers the same purpose.

All-overish. A familiar expression meaning all over ill at once. "I feel all-overish," not exactly ill, but uncomfortable all over. The precursor of a fever, influenza, ague, etc.

All Saints or All Hallowes. In 610 the Pope of Rome ordered that the heathen Pantheon should be converted into a Christian church, and dedicated to the honour of all martyrs. The festival of All Saints was first held on May 1st, but in the year 834 it was changed to November 1st. "Hallowes" is from the Anglo-Saxon halig (holy).

All Serene, derived from the Spanish word sereno. In Cuba the word is used as a countersign by sentinels, and is about equivalent to our "All right," or "All’s well."

All Souls’ Day. The 2nd of November, so called because the Roman Catholics on that day seek by prayer and almsgiving to alleviate the sufferings of souls in purgatory. It was first instituted in the monastery of Cluny, in 993.

According to tradition, a pilgrim, returning from the Holy Land, was compelled by a storm to land on a rocky island, where he found a hermit, who told him that among the cliffs of the island was an opening into the infernal regions through which huge flames ascended, and where the groans of the tormented were distinctly audible. The pilgrim told Odillo, abbot of Cluny, of this; and the abbot appointed the day following, which was November 2nd, to be set apart for the benefit of souls in purgatory.

All the go. All the fashion. Drapers will tell you that certain goods "go off well." They are in great demand, all the mode, quite in vogue.

"Her corsé is hung in the West-end shops, With her name in full on the white below; And all day long there's a big crowd shops To look at the lady who's "all the go.""

Sims: Ballad of Babyman ("Beauty and the Beast").

All there. Said of a sharp-witted person. Not all there, said of one of weak intellect. The one has all his wits about him, the other has not.

All this for a Song! The exclamation of Burleigh, when Queen Elizabeth ordered him to give £100 to Spenser for a royal gratuity.

All to break (Judges ix. 33). "A certain woman cast a piece of millstone upon Abimelech's head, and all to brake his skull" does not mean for the sake of breaking his skull, but that she wholly smashed his skull. A spurious form, owing its existence to a typographical mistake. The to really belongs to the verb; and in the last passage quoted it should be read "all to brake." The to is a Teutonic particle, meaning asunder, in pieces. It is very common in Old English, where we have "To-bite," i.e. bite in pieces, to-cleave, to-root, to-tear. All is the adverb entirely, wholly. So "all to be batterscht" was wholly battered to pieces. All-to-frozen. Here to-frozen is intensive. So in Latin dis-crucior = valde crucior. Plautus (in his Menexeni, ii. line 21) uses the phrase "dis cavit mus," i.e. he fully gives the guard, etc. very much beware of.

Gothic, dis; O. X., tor; Old High German, sar; Latin, dis; Greek,

"Mercutio's my hand had all-to-frozen name" is, wholly frozen up name. Romeo and Juliet (1597).

Her wings were all-to-ruffled and sometimes rustled.

"Witten: Genres.

All waters (I am for). I am a Jack of all trades, can turn my hand to anything, a good all-round man. Like a fish which can live in salt or fresh water.

"I am for all waters." Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

All work. A mind of all work. A general servant who does all the work of a house; at once nurse-maid, housemaid, and cook.

Allah or Allah (that is, al-lahh). "The adorable." The Arabic name of the Supreme Being.

The city was for Allah from the tower.

Byron: Childe Harward, ii.

Allis Akbar. Allah is most mighty. The cry of the Arabs.—Ockley.

Allan-a-Dale. The minstrel of Robin Hood's yeomen. He was assisted by Robin Hood in carrying off his bride, when on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

Allemand. "Une querelle d'Allemand," a quarrel about nothing. We call put valour "Dutch courage."

Allen. (See Allworthy.)

Allestre. Richard Allestrae, of Derby, was a noted almanac maker in Ben Jonson's time.

"A little more Would fetch all his astronomy from Allestrae." Ben Jonson: Magnetic Lady, iv. 2 (1642).

Alley (Ther). The Stock Exchange Alley.

"John Bye, after many active years in the Alley, retired to the Continent, and died at the age of 86."—Old and New London, p. 476.

Alliensis (Danes) (June 16th, b.c. 390), when the Romans were cut to pieces by the Gauls near the banks of the river Allia; and ever after held to be a dies nefastus, or unlucky day.

Alligator. When the Spaniards first saw this reptile in the New World, they called it el lagarto (the lizard). Sir Walter Raleigh called these creatures lagartos, and Ben Jonson aligartus.

To the present day the Europeans in Ceylon apply the term alligator to what are in reality crocodiles. J. E. Smeaton: Ceylon (vol. i. part 2, chap. iii. p. 146.

Alligator Pears (the fruit of Persea griffithiius) is a curious corruption. The aboriginal Carib word for the tree is "anakara," which the Spanish discoverers pronounced "avocado," and English sailors called "alligator," as the nearest approach to which occurred to them.

Alliteration. Dr. Bethel of Eton.

"Babette dy, declaratory, dull,
Big, bashful Bethel behoves like a bull.

Eton College.

Cardinal Wolsey.

"Brew to butchers, but by bishops bred.
How much his Roman holds his haughty head."

Huchard composed an alliterative poem on Charles the Bald, every word of which begins with c.

Henry Harder composed a poem of 100 lines, in Latin hexameters, on cats, every word of which begins with c. The title is Canum canum Catis certamen cuncta componere currente calamo.

C Cattulli Canni. The first line is—

"Un canum cannus cattum canis canoquem."
Almondials

Hamonicus wrote the Certamen catholicum cum Calvinista, every word of which begins with C.

It is a curious coincidence that the names of these three men all begin with H.

In the Materia more Magistralis every word begins with m.

Placentius, the Dominican, who died 1348, wrote a poem of 258 Latin hexameters, called Pten Poreorum, every word of which begins with p. It begins thus:

"Plandte, Porelli, poreorum pten propria."

Which may be translated:

"Praise, Paul, prue pten's puate progeny."

Tussor, who died 1380, has a rhyming poem of twelve lines, every word of which begins with t.

The Rev. B. Poultier, prebendary of Winchester, composed in 1828 the famous alliterative alphabetic poem in rhymes. Each word of each line begins with the letter of the alphabet which it represents. It begins thus:

"An Austrian army awfully arrived.
Boldly by battery besieged Belgard.
Consick commandar, commanding come.
Dealing destruction, devastating doom.

SOME aspire this alliterative ven to Alaric A. Watts (1820). (See H. Southgate, Many Thoughts on Many Things.)

Another attempt of the same kind begins thus:

"About an age ago, as all agree.
Beautiful Belinda, dwelling best.
Cock-a-doodle-down, contending clean.
Dublin's derisive, disputations deem.

Allo-Idials. Lands which are held by an absolute right, without even the burden of homage or fidelity; opposed to feudal. The word is Teutonic: all-Id (all property).

Allopathy is in opposition to Hamonopathy. The latter word is from the Greek, homoeopathos, similar disease; and the former is allo pathos, a different disease. In one case, "like is to cure like"; and in the latter, the disease is cured by its antitode.

Allo. The fire Allo. A public-house s. It has five human figures, with a motto to each:

1) A king in his regalia . . . . motto I ever all
2) A bishop, in his pontificals . . . . I proc all
3) A lawyer, in his gown . . . . . I plead all
4) A soldier in his regimentals . . . . I fight all
5) A bannister, with his tools . . . . I pay for all.

Several of these signs still exist.

Allo. Tap-droppings. The refuse of all sorts of spirits drained from the glasses, or spilt in drawing. The mixture is sold in gin-houses at a cheap rate.

Allworth. In A New Way to Pay Old Debts, by Massinger.

Allworthy, in Fielding's Tom Jones, is designed for the author's friend, Ralph Allen, of Bristol.

"Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame."

Pope: Epilogue to Sat. i. 135, 136.

Alma (the human soul), quom of "Body Castle," beset by enemies for seven years (the Seven Ages of Man). The besiegers are a rabble rout of evil desires, foul imaginations, and silly conceits. Alma conducted Arthur and Sir Guyon over her castle. "The divine part of a man," says Spenser, "is circular, a curve being the emblem of eternity; but the mortal part triangular, as it consists of three things—blood, flesh, and bones." - Prior's Eneid.

Alma Mater. A college and so calls the university of which he is a member. The words are Latin for "fostering mother."

"Expulsion from his Alma Mater." - The Coltume and the Porter.

Almack's. A suite of assembly rooms in King Street, St. James's (London), built in 1763 by a Scotchman named Macaul, who inverts his name to ovigate all prejudice and hide his origin. Balls, presided over by a committee of ladies of the highest rank, used to be given at these rooms; and to be admitted to them was as great a distinction as to be presented at Court. The rooms were afterwards known as Wii's, from the name of the next proprietor, and used chiefly for large dinners. They were closed in 1890.

Almagest. The Sylvaria-maggistro of Ptolemy, translated by the Arabians in 800, by order of the calip Al Maimon, and then called Al-maghest, i. e. "the magistri." It contains numerous observations and problems of geometry and astronomy. It is very rare, and more precious than gold.

Alman. a German. The French Almano, a German, which, of course, is the classic Almano or Almano. Similarly, Almany Germany, French, Almanogue.

"the homomundum and Veteris, Almano linke, . . . set the mdish were unto Aigenturum," - Holland: Annuaire Marcellus.

"Now Folkes comes and comes in Almanac is the Arabic al manac (the diary). Verstegen says it is the Saxon al-man-eght (all moon heel), and that it refers to the tallies of the full and new moons kept by our Saxon ancestors. One of these tallies may still be seen at St. John's College, Cambridge.

Before printing, or before it was common:
- Solomon Jarchi . . . in and after 150
- Peter de Bellas . . . about 1230
- Walter de Hunveden . . . 137
- John Deane, Oxford . . . 1381
- Nicholas de Lyuna . . . 1296
- Paroch . . . 1350-1364
- First printed by Gutenburg, at Mainz 1457
- By Bodenham, at Nuremburg 1472-73
- Zainer, at Ulm . . . . 1476
- Richard Pymont (Simpson's head) . . . 1497
- Stratter, in Venice . . . . 1498
- Poor Robin's Almanack . . . 1652
- Francis Morant's Almanack between . . . 1728 and 1729
- Stamp duty imposed 1720, repealed 1834.

The Man 't the Almanack stunk with pins (Nat. Lee), is a man marked with points referring to signs of the zodiac, and intended to indicate the favourable and unfavourable times of letting blood.

I don't consult your Almanack (French) I shall not come to you to know what weather to expect. The reference is to the prognostications of weather in almanacs.

Almsbury. It was in a sanctuary at Almsbury that Queen Guenever took refuge, after her adulterous passion for Lancelot was revealed to the king (Arthur). Here she died, but her body was buried at Glastonbury.

Almighty Dollar. Washington Irving first made use of this expression, in his sketch of a "Creole Village" (1837).

"The Almighty Dollar, that great object of universal devotion throughout the land."

"Ben Jonson speaks of "almighty gold."

Almond Tree. Grey hairs. The Preacher thus describes old age:

"I will not keep young men in the house of my children, and the grinders that be upon the brazen altar, because they are few, and those that look out of the windows shall be desolate, and the young men shall be girded with sackcloth, and the maiden girded with wool. She shall sit alone upon the walls, and her daughters shall be grieved for her, because all her grinders are broken with grief." (Eccles. 10: 2-3.)

Almonry. The place where the almoner resides, or where alms are distributed. An almoner is a person whose duty it is to distribute alms, which, in ancient times, consisted of one-tenth of the entire income of a monastery. (See Amherst.)

Alms. Gifts to the poor.

Dr. Johnson says the word has no singular; whereas Todd says it has no plural. Like ricer, it is wholly singular in construction, but is used both as a noun singular and noun plural. Of course it is Almsman, alms-in, Almsman, almes, almes, the 1st and the plural suffix. Riches in the French richece. Both words are singular, but, as nouns of multitude, yes for the plural conjunction. (Latin almos, Greek xoreougen, from the verb xoreo, I pay.)

Alms-basket. To live on alms basket. To live on charity.

Alms-drink. Another's leavings; for alms consists of broken bread and the residue of drink. It is also applied to the liquor which a drinker finds too much, and therefore hands to another.

Alms-flock. Peter's peace, or Rome sect. Abolished in England by Henry VIII.

Alms-house. A house where paupers are supported at the public expense; a poor-house. Also a house set apart for the aged poor free of rent.

"Only sin the two who had neither friends nor attendant set away to me in the alms-house, home of the homeless." (Laughter, Groaners, part iv. 5. 2.)

Alms-man. One who lives on alms.

Alnaschar Dream (Av). Counting your chickens before they are hatched. Alnaschar, the harbinger's fifth brother, invested all his money in a basket of glass-ware, on which he was to make a certain profit. The profit, being invested, was to make more, and this was to go on till he grew rich enough to marry the vizier's daughter. Being angry with his imaginary wife he gave a kick, overturned his basket, and broke all his wares.

"To indulge in Alnaschar-like dreams of commercial interest is not wise."

Alnaschar of Modern Literature. Coleridge has been so called because his "dream" his Kulla Khan, and wrote it out next morning. (1772-1834.)

"I probably had been reading Purchas's Pilgrimage, for no one can doubt the resemblance of the two pieces.

Aloe. A Hebrew word, Greek aloë. A very bitter plant: hence the proverb, Plus alae quam mellis habent, "(Life) has more bitterness than sweets." The French say, "La côte d'Adam contient plus Along-shore Men

...d'aloës de miel," where côté d'Adam, of course, means woman or one's wife.

Socotrine Aloes came originally from the island called Secotra, in the Indian Ocean.

Along-shore Men or Longshoremen, that is stevedores (2 syl.), or men employed to load and unload vessels.

Alonso of Aguilar. When Fernando, King of Aragon, was laying siege to Granada, after chasing Zagal from the gates, he asked who would undertake to plant his banner on the heights. Alonso, "the lowmost of the dons," undertook the task, but was cut down by the Moors. His body was exposed in the wood of Oxijerm, and the Moorish damsels, struck with its beauty, buried it near the brook of Alpujarra.

Alone. Stand aloof, away. A sea term, meaning originally to hear to windward, or leeward. (Norwegian, German, etc., leeft, wind, breeze.)

Alorus, so the Chaldeans called their first king, who, they say, came from Babylon.

A l'entrance. To the uttermost. (Anglo-French for a l'entrance.)

"A champion has started up to maintain a l'entrance her innocence of the said offence."—Standard.

Alp. The Adrian renegade, a Venetian by extraction, who forswore the Christian faith to become a commander in the Turkish army. He led the host to the siege of Corinth, while that country was under the dominion of the Doge. He loved Francesca, daughter of Minotti, governor of Corinth, but she died of a broken heart because he deserted her country and was an apostate. The renegade was shot in the siege. Byron: Siege of Corinth.

Alph. A mythical "sacred river in Xanadu," which ran "through caverns measureless to man."—Coleridge: Kubla Khan.

Alpah. "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last." (Rev. 1:8). "Alpha" is the first, and "Omega" the last letter of the Greek alphabet. Α Ω.

Alphabet. This is the only word compounded of letters only. The Greek alphabet (a) beta (b); our ABC (book), etc.

The number of letters in an alphabet varies in different languages. Thus there are

* The Chinese have no alphabet, but about 20,000 syllabic characters.

Kora VII, 21 contains all the letters of the English language, presume "a" to be identical. Even the Italian alphabet is capable of more than seventeen trillion combinations; that is, 17 followed by eighteen other figures. ad 17,000,000,000,000,000,000,000.

while the English alphabet will combine into more than twenty-nine thousand quadrillion combinations; that is, 29 followed by twenty-seven other figures, ad 29,000,000,000,000,000,000,000.

Yet we have no means of marking the several sounds of our different vowels; nor can we show how to pronounce such simple words as fast, pull and hull, sugar (rather and rather), gin and beans, etc. Hence, hence, went in "Beau-seas," rope, and thousands of other words.

* We want the restoration of th to distinguish between this and that: a Greek χι to distinguish between Church and Christ, two g's (one soft and one hard), two c's, two o's, half a dozen a's, and so on.

* Take a, we have sat, sat, Thomas (c), war (o), ad (u), etc. So with r, we have pray (a), met (e), England (i), sew (o), herd (u), etc. The other vowels are equally indefinite.

Alphoes and Arctnusa. The Greek fable says that Alphones, the river-god, fell in love with the nymph Arctusa, who fled from him in affright. The god pursued under the sea, but the nymph was changed into a spring, which comes up in the harbour of Syracuse.

"We have seen a monstrous Alphone of Pamflete, who was an attainted Arctusa."—London Review.

Alpheus (in Orlando Furioso). A magician and prophet in the army of Chaucegagne, slain in sleep by Florida'sno.

Alphesibe or Arsinoe, wife of Alcaeus. She gave her spouse the fatal collar, the source of numberless evils.

As was the meekness of Hamon, and so wore the collar and veil of Empyrié, wife of Amphidias.

Alphonse, etc. (See Alfonso, etc.)
Alpisch or "Elfenreigen" (the weird spirit-song), that music which some hear before death. Faber refers to it in his Pilgrims of the Night.

"Hark, hark, my soul! Angelic songs are swelling."

Pope also says, in the Dying Christian—

"Hark! they whisper: angels say, Satyrs spit, come away."

Alpoc, Alpica (Alpen), in the game of Basset, doubling the stake on a winning card.

"What ply 'tis those conquering eyes Which all the world subdue, Should, while the love wearing dies, Be only on alpica." Etheridge: Basset.

Alquife (al-ke-fy). A famous enchanter, introduced into the romances of ancient times, especially those relating to Amadis of Gaul.

Alrinach. The demon who presides over floods and earthquakes, rain and hail. It is this demon who causes shipwrecks. When visible, it is in a female form. (Eastern mythology.)

Alruns-wife (Av). The Alruns were the larcies or penates of the ancient Germans. An Alruns-wife was the household goddess of a German family. An Alruns-maiden is a household maiden goddess.

"She (Hypatia) looked as fair as the sun and talked like an Alruns-wife." Kingsley: Hypatia, ch. vii.

Alsatia. The Whitefriars sanctuary for debtors and law-breakers. Cunningham thinks the name is borrowed from Alsace, in France, which being a frontier of the Rhine, was everlastingly the seat of war, and the refuge of the disaffected. Sir Walter Scott, in his Fortunes of Nigel, has described the life and state of this monastery. He has borrowed largely from Shadwell's comedy, The Square of Alsatia. (See PETRANK.)

Alvindur. (See House.)

Altemar (in Jerusalem Delivered). King of Samarcand, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders. "He was supreme in courage as in might." (Book xvii.) He surrendered himself to Godfrey. (Book xx.)

Altan Kol or Gold River (Thibet). So-called from the gold which abounds in its banks.

Altar (An), in Christian art. St. Stephen (the Pope), and Thomas Becket are represented as immolated before an altar. St. Canute is represented as lying before an altar. St. Charles Borromoe is represented as kneeling before an altar. St. Gregory (the Pope) is represented as offering sacrifice before an altar. And the attribute of Victor is an altar overturned, in allusion to his throwing down a Roman altar in the presence of the Emperor Maximian.

Led to the altar, i.e. married. Said of a lady. The altar is the communicant table reared from the body of the church, where marriages are solemnised. The bride is led up the aisle to the rail.

Altes ego. My double or counterpart. In The Corsican Brothers, the same actor performs the two brothers, the one being the altes ego of the other. (Latin, "a second I"). One who has full powers to act for another.

Althea's Brand, a fatal contingency. Althea's son was to live so long as a log of wood, then on the fire, remained unconsumed. She contrived to keep the log unconsumed for many years, but being angry one day with Meleager, she pushed it into the midst of the fire, and it was consumed in a few minutes. Meleager died at the same time. —Ortel: Metamorphoses, viii. 4.

"The fatal brand Althea burned."

Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., Act i. 1.

Althea (Divine). The divine Althea of Richard Lovelace was Lucy Sacheverell, called by the poet, "Lucretia."

"When love with unconfined wines

Bore us within my gates,

And my divine Althea brings

To whisper at my grates."

The "grates" referred to were the prison grates. Lovelace was thrown into prison by the Long Parliament for his petition from Kent in favour of the king.

Altisdorna (in the "Curious Impertinent"), an episode in Don Quixote.

Alitia. The plot of ground on which the Greeks held their public games.

Alto relievo. Italian for "high relief." A term used in sculpture for figures in wood, stone, marble, etc., so cut as to project at least one-half from the tablet. It should be reliex (2 syl.).

Alumbrado, a perfectionist; so called from a Spanish sect which arose in 1575, and claimed special illumination. (Spanish, meaning "illuminated," "enlightened").

Alvina Weeps, or "Hark! Alvina weeps," i.e. the wind howls loudly, a Flemish saying. Alvina was the daughter of a king, who was cursed by her parents because she married unsuitably. From that day she roamed about the air invisible to the eye of man, but her means are audible.

Alyface (Amais), servant of Dame Christian Custance, the guy widow, in Udall’s comedy Ralph Roister Doister.

Alysdo (in Orlando Furioso). King of Tremizien, in Africa. He was overthrown by Orlando on his way to join the allied army of Agramant.

A.M. or M.A. When the Latin form is intended the A comes first, as Aetius Magister; but where the English form is meant the M precedes, as Master of Arts.

Amadis of Gaul. The hero of a romance in prose of the same title, originally written in Portuguese in four books. These four were translated into Spanish by Montalvo, who added a fifth. Subsequent romancers added the exploits and adventures of other knights, so as to swell the romance to fourteen books. The French version is much larger still, one containing twenty-four books, and another running through seven volumes. The original author was Vasco de Lobeira, of Oporto, who died 1403.

The hero, called the “Lion-knight” from the device on his shield, and “Beltenbrok” (darkly beautiful), from his personal appearance, was a love-child of Perion, King of Gaul, and Elizena, Princess of Brittany. He is represented as a poet and musician, a linguist and a gallant, a knight-servant and a king, the very model of chivalry.

Other names by which Amadis was called were the Lorely Obscur, the Knight of the Burning Sword, the Knight of the Incalp, etc. Bernard, in 1563, wrote “Amadigi di Gaula.”

Amadis of Greece. A supplemental part of the romance called Amadis of Gaul, added by Felchen de Silva.

Amaimon (3 svl). One of the chief devils whose dominion is on the north side of the infernal gulf. He might be bound or restrained from doing harm from the third hour till noon, and from the ninth hour till evening.

“Amaimon sounds well: Lucifer well.” Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Amalician Code. A compilation of maritime laws, compiled in the eleventh century at Amalfi, then an important trading town.

Amalivaca. An American spirit, who had seven daughters. He broke their legs to prevent their running away, and left them to people the forests.

Amalthaea. (See Sillyline Books.)

Amalthea’s Horn. The cornucopia or horn of plenty. The infant Zeus was fed with goats’ milk by Amalthea, one of the daughters of Melisseus, King of Crete. Zeus, in gratitude, broke off one of the goat’s horns, and gave it to Amalthea, promising that the possessor should always have in abundance everything desired. (See Zeus.)

Amanda, the impersonation of love in Thomson’s Spring, is Miss Young, afterwards married to Admiral Campbell.

Amarant. A cruel giant slain by Guy of Warwick.—Guy and Amarant, Perry’s Reliques.

Amaranth. Clement of Alexandria says—Amaranthos flor. symbolum est immortalitatis. The word is from the Greek amarantos (everlasting). So called because its flowers never fade like other flowers, but retain to the last much of their deep blood-red colour.

“Immortal amaranth— a flower which once
In Paradise, last in the tree of life,
Began to bloom; but soon, for man’s offence,
To heaven removed, where first it grew, there Grows
And flowers still, shedding the light of life...
With these that never fade, the spring’s chief Bind their resplendent locks.”

* In 1653 Christina, Queen of Sweden, instituted the Order of the “Knights of the Amaranth,” but it ceased to exist at the death of the Queen. Among the ancients it was the symbol of immortality.

The best known species are “Love lies bleeding” (amaranthus caudatus), and “Prince’s feather” (amaranthus hypochondriacus). “Cock’s comb” is now ranked under the genus Celosia.

Amaryllis. A pastoral sweetheart. The name is borrowed from the pastoral of Theocritus and Virgil.

Amasis (Ring of), same as Polycrates’ Ring. Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Amasis, King of Egypt, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea an engraved ring of extraordinary value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which the ring was found. Amasis now renounced all friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards, a satrap, having entrapped the too fortunate despot, put him to death by crucifixion. — Herodotus, iii. 40.

Amati. A first-rate violin; properly, one made by Amati of Cremona (c. 1600). (See Cremona.)

Amaurot (Greek, the shadowy or unknown place), the chief city in UtOpia (no-place), a political novel by Sir Thomas More, Rabelais, in his Panœgri- gruel, had previously introduced the word, and tells us that the Amaurots conquered the Dipodeans or Duplicians.

Amaurotoe, a bridge in UtOpia. Sir Thomas More says he could not recollect whether Raphael Hyghholday told him it was 500 paces or 300 paces long; and he requested his friend Peter Giles, of Antwerp, to put the question to the adventurer.

"I cannot recollect whether the reception room of the Spaniard's Castle in the Air is 200 or 300 feet long. I will get the next account who journeys to the moon to take the exact dimensions for me, and will memorise the learned society of Laputa." — Bunyan; Gulliver's Travels.

Amazement. Not afraid with any amazement (1 Peter iii. 6), introduced at the close of the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer. The meaning is, you will be God's children so long as you do his bidding, and are not drawn aside by any distraction (πρόμαχος). No doubt St. Peter meant "by any terror of persecution." Cramer, being so afraid, was drawn aside from the path of duty.

Amazin, meant for Charles II., in Pardage's poem of Azaria and Husaia. We are told by the poet, "his father's murderers he destroyed;" and then he postposcruously adds—

"Behold of all, for merciful was he, Like God, in the superlative degree."

To say that such a selfish, promise-breaking, impious libertine was "like God, in the superlative degree," is an outrage against even poetical licence and court flattery.

Amazon. A horsewoman, a fighting or masculine woman. The word means "without breast," or rather, "deprived of a pap." According to Grecian story, there was a nation of women in Africa of a very warlike character. There were no men in the nation; and if a boy was born, it was either killed or sent to his father, who lived in some neighbouring state. The girls had their right breasts burnt off, that they might have the better draw the bow.

"These dreadful Amazons, gallant viragoes who . . . carried victorious arms . . . into Syria and Asia Minor"—J. E. Chambers: David Livingstone (Introduction, p. 24).

Amazonia. In South America, originally called Mura'nion. The Spaniards first called it Orellana; but after the women joined their husbands in attacking the invaders, the Spaniards called the people Amazons and the country Amazonia.

Amazonian Chin (Al). A beardless chin, like that of a woman warrior.

"When with his Amazonian chin he drove The haughty lion before him," Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 2.

Ambassador, a practical joke played on greenhorns aboard ship. A tub full of water is placed between two stools, and the whole being covered with a green cloth, a sailor sits on each stool, to keep the cloth tight. The two sailors represent Neptune and Amphitrite, and the greenhorn, as ambassador, is introduced to their majesties. He is given the seat of honour between them; but no sooner does he take his seat than the two sailors rise, and the greenhorn falls into the tub, amidst the laughter of the whole crew.

Amber. This fossilised vegetable resin is, according to legend, a concretion of birds' tears. The birds were the sisters of Melègir, who never ceased weeping for the death of their brother.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, viii. line 270, etc.

"Around thee shall the sweetest honey flow, That ever the sorrowing soul hath wept," T. Moore: The Wandering Minstrel.

Amber, a repository. So called because insects and small leaves are preserved in amber.

"You may be despised to preserve it in your vaults," — *S. and G. Scott: Waverley.  "Pretty in amber, to observe the forms Of birds, or stars, or dust, or grubs, or worms, The things, we know, are neither rich nor rare, But wonder how the devil they got there." — Pope: Ep. to Arbuthnot, 60-72.

Amberabid. Amber-city, one of the towns of Jinnistan, or Fairy Land.

Ambes-as or Ambes-us. Two aces, the lowest throw in dice; figuratively, bad luck. (Latin, ambus-as, both or two aces.)

"I had rather be in this choice than throw ambes-as for my life"—Alf's Well, etc., i. 3.

Ambi-dexter properly means both hands right hands; a double dealer; a juror who takes money from both parties for his verdict; one who can use his left hand as deftly as his right.
Ambition, strictly speaking, means "the going from house to house" (Latin, ambitio, going about canvassing). In Rome it was customary, some time before an election came on, for the candidates to go round to the different dwellings to solicit votes, and those who did so were ambitious of office.

Ambrose (St.), represented in Christian art in the costume of a bishop. His attributes are (1) a bertha, in allusion to the legend that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth when lying in his bed, and (2) a scapula, by which he expelled the Arians from Italy.

The pension he inflicted on the Emperor Theodosius has been represented by Rubens, a copy of which, by Vandeck, is in the National Gallery.

Ambrosia. The food of the gods (Greek, a privative, brutus, mortal); so called because it made them not mortal, i.e. it made them immortal. Anything delicious to the taste or fragrant in perfume is so called from the notion that whatever is used by the ce-stials must be excellent.

"A table where the hallowed ambrosia lay." Homer, by Bryant: Odyssey, 1. 444.

"Husband and wife must drink from the cup of conjugal life; but they must both taste the same ambrosia, or the same gall."--R. C. Houghton: A woman of the Orient, part III.

Ambrosian Chant. The choral music introduced from the Eastern Church by St. Ambrose, the Bishop of Milan, in the fourth century. It was used till Gregory the Great changed it for the Gregorian.

Ambrosian Library. A library in Milan, so called in compliment of St. Ambrose, the patron saint.

Ambrosio, the hero of Lewis's romance, called The Monk. Abbot of the Capuchins at Madrid. The temptations of Matilda overcome his virtue, and he proceeds from crime to crime, till at last he sells his soul to the devil. Ambrosio, being condemned to death by the Inquisition, is released by Lucifer; but no sooner is he out of prison than he is dashed to pieces on a rock.

Ambry, a cupboard, locker, or recess. In church, for keeping vestments, books, or other articles. Used by a confusion for almonry, or niche in the wall where alms, etc., were deposited. Now used for holding the sacramental plate, consecrated oil, and so on. The secret drawers of an escritoire are called ambries. (Archaic English almonry, Latin armarium, French armoire.)

"Their exorcism hath ambries,
And yron-bounden cofre."--Pierre de Ronsard, p. 798

Almonry is from the Latin clewmosynium, a place for alms.

"The place wherein this Chapter or Almonry stands was called the 'Rhenomosyng' or Almonry, now corrupted into Ambrose, for that the alms of the Abbey are there distributed to the poor."--Nonesbury.

Ambusado (3 syl.) is the Italian imboscatura (concealed in a wood).

Ame damné (French), a scapegoat.

"He is the one damne of everyone about the court; the scapegoat, who is to carry away all their iniquities."--Sir Walter Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. 46.

Amedieu (3 syl.), "Friends of God:" a religious body in the Church of Rome, founded in 1500. They wore no breeches, but a grey cloak girded with a cord, and were shod with wooden shoes.

Amelia. A model of conjugal affection, in Fielding's novel so called. It is said that the character is intended for his own wife.

Amemon is another hero of Chaldea, who reigned 12 sires. Amemon reigned 6 sires.

Amen Corner, London, the end of Paternoster Row, where the monks finished their Pater Noster, on Corpus Christi Day, as they went in procession to St. Paul's Cathedral. They began in Paternoster Row with the Lord's prayer in Latin, which was continued to the end of the street; then said Amen, at the corner or bottom of the Row; then turning down Ave Maria Lane, commenced chanting the "Hail, Mary!" then crossing Ludgate, they chanted the Uredo. Amen Lane no longer exists.

Amenable honorable, in France, was a degrading punishment inflicted on traitors, parricides, and sacrilegious persons, who were brought into court with a rope round their neck, and made to beg pardon of God, the king, and the court.

Now the public acknowledgment of the offence is all that is required.

Amen'tho's (3 syl.). The Egyptian Hadès. The word means hiding-place.
American Flag. The American Congress resolved (June 14, 1777), that the flag of the United States should have thirteen stripes, alternately red and white, to represent the thirteen States of the Union, together with their thirteen stars, on a blue ground. General Washington's escutcheon contained two stripes, each alternated with red and white, and, like the American stars, those of the General had only five points instead of six. A new star is now added for each new State, but the stripes remain the same.

However, before the separation the flag contained thirteen stripes of alternate red and white to indicate the thirteen colonies, and the East India Company flag, as far back as 1714, had thirteen stripes. The Company flag was sanctioned with St. George's Cross, the British American flag with the Union Jack.

American States. The eight states which retain the Indian names of the chief rivers, as: Alabama, Arkansas, Illinois, Kentucky, Mississippi, Missouri, Ohio, and Wisconsin.

Amothea. (See Horse.)

Amethyst. A species of rock-crystal supposed to prevent intoxication (Greek: αμέθυστος, the antidote of intoxication). Drinking-cups made of amethyst were supposed to be a charm against inebriety.

It was the most cherished of all precious stones by Roman matrons, from the superstition that it would preserve inviolate the affection of their husbands.

Amiable Numbers. (See Amicable, etc.)

Amicable Numbers. Numbers which are mutually equal to the sum of all their aliquot parts: as 220, 24. The aliquot parts of 220 are 1, 2, 4, 5, 10, 11, 20, 22, 44, 55, 110, the sum of which is 284. Again, the aliquot parts of 284 are 1, 2, 4, 71, 142, the sum of which is 220.

Amicus curiae (Latin, a friend to the court). One in the court who informs the judge of some error he has detected, or makes some suggestion to assist the court.

Amicus Plato, sed magis amica Veritas (Plato I love, but I love Truth more). A noble dictum attributed to Aristotle, but certainly a very free translation of a phrase in the Nicomachean Ethics ("Where both are friends, it is right to prefer Truth").

Amiel (3 syl.). A form of the name Elium (friend of God). In Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel it is meant for Sir Edward Seymour, Speaker of the House of Commons. (2 Sam. xxii. 31.)

"Who can Amiel's praise refuse?
Of ancient race by birth, but noblest yet
In his own worth, and without titles great.
The scholar and the soldier too long time as comrades met;
Their reason guided and their passion coiled.

Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, l. 296-303.

Amiens (3 syl.). The Peace of Amiens, March 27, 1802, a treaty signed by Joseph Bonaparte, the Marquis of Cornwallis, Azara, and Schimmel, and, to settle the disputed points between France, England, Spain, and Holland. It was dissolved in 1803.

Amiha. An orphan adopted by a miller, and beloved by Elvino, a rich farmer. The night before her espousals she is found in the bed of Count Rodolpho, and is renounced by her betrothed husband. The court explains to the young farmer and his friends that Amiha is innocent, and has wandered in her sleep. While he is still talking, the orphan is seen getting out of the window of the mill, and walking in her sleep along the edge of the roof under which the mill-wheel is rapidly revolving. She crosses a crazy bridge, and comes among the spectators. In a few minutes she awakes, flies to Elvio’no, and is claimed by him as his beloved and innocent bride.—Bellini’s best opera, La Sonnambula.

Aminadab. A Quaker. The Scripture name has a double use, but in old comedies, where the character represents a Quaker, the name has generally only one. Obadiah is used, also, to signify a Quaker, and Rachel a Quackress.

Amine (3 syl.). Wife of Sidi Nouman, who ate her rice with a bodkin, and was in fact a ghoul. “She was so hard-hearted that she led about her three sisters like a leash of greyhounds.”—Arabian Nights.

Aminta (2 syl.) The name assumed by Cathos as more aristocratic than her own. She is courted by a gentleman, but discards him because his manners are too simple and easy for “bon ton;” he then sends his valet, who pretends to be a marquis, and Aminta is charmed with his “distinguished style of manner and talk.” When the game has gone far enough, the trick is exposed, and Aminta is saved from a misalliance.—Molière: Les Précieux Ridicules.

It was a prevailing fashion in the Middle Ages to change names: Voltaire’s proper name was André (1694-1778), Melina Mercouri’s was Scherezade (1922-2003). The real names of Desdemona and Antony were Theodora and Theodosio (1657-1663). Aeschylus was called Jephtah (Ezra 2:1).

Amiral or Amiral. An early form of the word “admiral.” (French, amiral; Italian, ammiraglio.) (See Amiral.)

Amlet (Richard). The gamester in Vanbrugh’s drama called The Confederacy.

Ammon. The Libyan Jupiter; so called from the Greek Ammos (sand), because his temple was in the desert. Herodotus calls it an Egyptian word (li. 42).

Son of Jupiter Ammon. Alexander the Great. His father, Philip, claimed to be a descendant of Hercules, and therefore of Jupiter; and the son was salute the priests of the Libyan temple as son of Ammon. Hence he called the son or descendant both of Jupiter and of Ammon.

Ammonian Horn (Thc), the cornucopia. It was in reality a trunt of very fertile sand, in the shape of a ram’s horn, given by Ammon, King of Libya, to his mistress, Amalthea (q.v.) (the mother of Bacchus).

Ammonites (3 syl.). Fossil molluscs allied to the nautilus and cuttlefish. So called because they resemble the horn upon the ancient statues of Jupiter Ammon. (See above.)

Amon’s Son (in Orlando Furioso) is Rinaldo. He was the eldest son of Amon or Aymon, Marquis d’Esté, and nephew of Charlemagne.

Amoret, brought up by Venus in the courts of love. She is the type of female loveliness—young, handsome, gay, witty, and good; soft as a rose, sweet as a violet, chaste as a lily, gentle as a dove, loving everybody and all beloved. She is no Diana to make gods and men fear her stern brow”; no Minerva to “freeze her foes into congealed stone with rigid looks of chaste austerity”; but a living, breathing virgin, with a warm heart, and beaming eye, and passions strong, and all that man can wish and woman want. She becomes the loving, tender wife of Sir Scudamore. Titius finds her in the arms of Cornambo (sensual passion); combats the monster unsuccessfully, but wounds the lady.—Spenser: Fairy Queene, book iii.

Amoret, a love-song, love-knot, love-affair, love-personified. A pretty word, which might be reintroduced.

He will be in his amoret, and his cantorets pastoral, and his madrigals.—Heywood’s Mistletoe.

“For not in able in she be, But all in hearts and honour, I painted all with amorettes.”—Romanus of the Rose, 265.

Amorous (Thc). Philippe I. of France; so called because he divorced his wife Berthe to espouse Bertrade, who was already married to Foulques, count of Anjou. (1061-1108.)

Amour propre. One’s self-love, vanity, or opinion of what is due to self. To make an appeal to one’s amour propre, is to put a person on his metal. To wound one’s amour propre, is to gull his good opinion of himself—to wound his vanity. (French.)

Amparo de Pobres. A book exposing the begging impostors of Madrid, written by Herrera, physician to Felipe III.

Ampersand, the character made thus, “&”and. In the old Hornbooks, after giving the twenty-six letters, the character & was added, and was called “Ampersand,” a corruption of Amphialus

"and per-se &! (by itself, and) A B C D . . . X Y Z &.

"Any odd shape folks understand To mean my French superstitio.")

The martyr Bradford says Lord Russell says
"A per-se &!" with them, "to their comfort, etc., to stand alone in their defence.

Amphialus, son of Cecropia, in love with Philocea, but he ultimately married
Queen Helen of Corinth. —Sir
Philip Sidney: The Countess of Tram- broke's Arcadia.

Amphitryon's Council. A council of confederate Greeks from twelve of their tribes, each of which had two deputies. The council met twice a year — in the spring at Delphi, and in the autumn at Thermopylae. According to fable, it was so called from Amphictyon, son of Deucalion, its supposed founder.
(Greek, amphictiones, dwellers round about.)

Amphigoria. Words strung together without any real connection. The two pleaders in Pantagruel by Rabelais (book ii. c. 11-13) give an excellent example.

Amphigour, nonsense verse, rigmarole.

"A kind of overcurious amphigour, a heterogenous combination." —Quarterly Review, i. 30 1836.

Porson's 'Three Children sliding on the Ice' is a good specimen of amphigour.

Amphion is said to have built Thebes by the music of his lute, which was so melodious that the stones danced into walls and houses of their own accord.
Tennyson has a rhyming jeu d'esprit.

Amphitrite (either 3 or 4 syl.) The sea. In classic mythology, the wife of Neptune (Greek, amphi or for tribe, rubbing or wearing away [the shore] on all sides.

"His weary chariot hit the bowers

Amphipryon. Le véritable Amphipryon est l'Amphipryon de l'Odéon (Molière).
That is the person who parades the front (whether master of the house or not) is the real host. The tale is that Jupiter assumed the likeness of Amphipryon, and gave a banquet; but Amphipryon himself came home, and claimed the honour of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and guests were concerned, the dispute was now decided—"he who gave the feast was to them the host."

Amphryssian Prophetess (Amphryssia Vales). The Cumean sibyl; so called from Amphryssos, a river of Thessaly, on the banks of which Apollo fed the herds of Admetus; consequently Amphryssian means Apolloian.

Ampouille (Sauce). The jug or bottle containing oil in anointing the kings of France, and said to have been brought from heaven by a dove for the coronation service of St. Louis. It was preserved at Rheims till the first Revolution, when it was destroyed.

Amram's Son. Moses. (Exodus vi.
20.)

"As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in kay pha el day,
Wailed round the coast.
Malson: Paradise Lost, i. 230-40.

Amri, in the satire of Abulam and Aethophei, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Henage Finch, Earl of Nottingham and Lord Chancellor.

A list of nobles next for Amri grace,
Who merits claimed the Abulam's (Lord Chancellor's) such place—
To whom the double blessing does belong.
With Moses' inspiration, Amri's tongue.
Part ii.

Amrita. The elixir of immortality, made by churning the milk-sea (Hindu mythology). Sir William Jones speaks of an apple so called, because it bestows immortality on those who partake of it.
The word means immortal. (See Ams-bro sia.)

Amsanctus. A lake in Italy, in the territory of Hirtia minor, said to lead down to the infernal regions. The word means sacred water.

Amonk. To run amuck. To talk or write on a subject of which you are wholly ignorant; to run foul of. The Malays, under the influence of opium, become so excited that they sometimes rush forth with daggers, yelling "Away! Away!" (Kill! Kill!). and fall foul of any one they chance to meet.

"Satire is my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run amuck and tilt at all I meet." — Pope: Satires i. 92-93.

Amulet. Something worn, generally round the neck, as a charm. (Arabic, hamælet, that which is suspended.)
The early Christians used to wear amulets called Ichthus, fish; the word is composed of the initial letters of Jesus Christ, Son of God, our Saviour. (See Notarica.)

Amundeville. Lady Adeline Amandeville, a lady who "had a twilight tinge of blue," could make epigrams, give delightful soirées, and was fond of making matches.—Byron: Don Juan, xv, xvi.

Amyclean Brothers (The). Castor and Pollux, who were born at Amyclae.

Amyclæan Silence. More silent than Amyclae. The inhabitants of Amyclae were so often alarmed by false rumours of the approach of the Spartans, that they made a decree no one should ever again mention the subject. When the Spartans actually came against the town, no one dared mention it, and the town was taken.

Amyris plays the fool, i.e. a person assumes a false character with an ulterior object, like Junius Brutus. Amyris was a Sybarite (3 syl.) sent to Delphi to consult the Oracle, who informed him of the approaching destruction of his nation. Amyris fled to Peloponesus and his countrymen called him a fool; but, like the madness of David, his "fool" was true wisdom, for thereby he saved his life.

Amys and Amylion. The Pythias and Orestes of medieval story.—Ellis’s Specimens.

Anabaptists. A nickname of the Baptist Dissenters; so called because, in the first instance, they had been baptised in infancy, and were again baptised on a confession of faith in adult age. The word means the twice-baptised.

Anabaptists. A sect which arose in Germany in 1521.

Anacharsia. Anacharsis among the Scythians. A wise man amongst fools: "Good out of Nazareth; "A Sir Sidney Smith on Salisbury Plain." The opposite proverb is "Saul amongst the Prophets," i.e., a fool amongst wise men.

Anacharsis was a Scythian by birth, and the Scythians were proverbial for their uncultivated state and great ignorance.

Anacharsis Cloutz. Barum Jean Baptiste Cloutz, a Frenchman by birth, but brought up in Paris, where he adopted the revolutionary principles, and called himself The Orator of the Human Race. (1755-1791.)

Anacreon. The stone on which Ceres rested after searching in vain for her daughter. It was kept as a sacred deposit in the Prytaneum of Athens.

Anacreon. A Greek poet, who wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine. (c. 514-478.)

Anacreon Moore. Thomas Moore, who not only translated Anacreon into English, but also wrote original poems in the same style. (1779-1832.)

Anacreon of the Guillotine. Bertrand Barère de Vieuzy, president of the National Convention; so called from the flowery language and convivial jests used by him towards his miserable victims. (1735-1811.)

Anacreon of the Temple. Guillaume Amfrye, abbé de Chalion: the "Tom Moore" of France. (1830-1792.)

The French Anacreon. Pontus de Tyard, one of the Pleiad poets (1521-1605). P. Lejouan. (1727-1811.)

The Persian Anacreon. Mohammed Hâzi. (Fourteenth century.)

The Scotch Anacreon. Alexander Scott, who flourished about 1590.

The Sicilian Anacreon. Giovanni Meli. (1710-1815.)

Anacreon of Painters. Francesco Alhano, a famous painter of lovely females. (1578-1600.)

Anacoreton. In imitation of Anacreon (q.v.).

Anachronym. An event placed at a wrong date; as when Shakespeare, in Troilus and Cressida, makes Nestor quote Aristotle. (Greek, a(n) chronos, out of time.)

Anagnostos (Greek). A domestic servant employed by the wealthy Romans to read to them at meals. Charlemagne had his reader; and monks and nuns were said to read at meals. (Greek, anagnoskousa, to read.)

Anagrams. From Kleinor Davies (prophetess in the reign of Charles I) — Never so mad a lady.

Anastasia. Anaxar (daughter of Anaxilas of Citium).—Huma est a Vide made by Dr. Bu.

Que se vieta. — Jubilans Ye I requiem salut.

Quod est. Ye.

Voltaire. — citat of Anet (a fictious).

These are interchangeable words: — Amare and Citius; Amor and Roma; Bros and Rose;大陆 and Love; and many more.

Anah, a tender-hearted, pious, meek, and loving creature, granddaughter of Cain, and sister of Alolihbrmah. Japhet loved her, but she had set her heart on the serpent Azaziel, who carried her off to some other planet when the flood came.—Byron: Heaven and Earth.

Ana'na. The pine-apple (the Brazilian ananas).

"Witness then, best Ana'na' then the pride / Of vegetable life." Thomson: Summer, 92. 93.

Anastasia (St.). Her attributes are a stake and faggots, with a palm branch in her hand. The allusion is, of course, to her martyrdom at the stake.

Anathema. A denunciation or curse. The word is Greek, and means to place, or set up, in allusion to the mythological custom of hanging in the temple of a patron god something devoted to him. Thus Gordius hung up his yoke and beam; the shipwrecked hung up their wet clothes; workmen retired from business hung up their tools, etc. Hence anything set apart for destruction; and so, set apart from the Church as under a curse.

"Me tabula sacer / Vota servas immolavit / Suspensisse potuit / Vestimenta martyris." Homer: Iliad (v. 12-16).

"Horse, having escaped the lovescares of Pyrrha, hangs up his votive tablet, as one who has escaped the dangers of the sea.

Anatomy. He was like an anatomy—i.e. a mere skeleton, very thin, like one whose flesh had been anatomised or cut off. Shakespeare uses anatomy as a synonym. Thus the hostess quickly says to the Bragg: "Thou anatomy, thou!" and Puff Teasheet caps the phrase with, "Come, you thin thing; come, you rascal."—2 Henry IV., v. 1.

Anaxarates (5 syl.) of Salamis was changed into stone for despising the love of Iphis, who hung himself.—Ovid: Metamorphoses, xiv. 750.

Anaxar'te (4 syl.). A knight whose adventures and exploits form a supplemental part of the Spanish romance called Amadis of Gaul. This part was added by Feliciano de Silva.

Ancres. Helmsman of the ship Argo, after the death of Triphys. He was told by a slave that he would never live to taste the wine of his vineyards. When a bottle made from his own grapes was set before him, he sent for the slave to laugh at his prognostications; but the slave made answer, "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip." At this instant a messenger came in, and told Ances that a wild boar was laying his vineyard waste, whereupon he set down his cup, went out against the boar, and was killed in the encounter.

Ancolites (4 syl.). Inhabitants of parts of Berkshire and Wiltshire, referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Anchor. That was my sheet anchor—i.e. my best hope, my last refuge. The sheet anchor is the largest anchor of a ship, which, in stress of weather, is the sailor's chief dependence. The word sheet is a corruption of the word shote (thrown out), meaning the anchor "thrown out" in foul weather. The Greeks and Romans said, "my sacred anchor," because the sheet anchor was always dedicated to some god.

Anchor (The), in Christian art, is given to Clement of Rome and Nicholas of Bari. Pope Clement, in a.D. 80, was bound to an anchor and cast into the sea. Nicholas of Bari is the patron saint of sailors.

The anchor is a peak—that is, the cable of the anchor is so tight that the ship is drawn completely over it. (See Bower Anchor, Sheet Anchor.)

The anchor comes home, the anchor has been dragged from its hold. Figuratively, the enterprise has failed, notwithstanding the precautions employed. To weigh anchor, to haul in the anchor, that the ship may sail away from its mooring. Figuratively, to begin an enterprise which has hung on hand.

Anchor Watch (1st). A watch of one or two men, while the vessel rides at anchor, in port.

Ancien Régime. An antiquated system of government. This phrase, in the French Revolution, meant the monarchical form of government, or the system of government, with all its evils, which existed prior to that great change.

Ancient. A corruption of ensign—a flag and the officer who bore it. Pistol was Falstaff's "ancient."

"Ten times more dishonourably raged than an ancient lament."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 2.
Ancient of Days

At times, however, distress of mind drove him from land to land, and wherever he abode he told his tale of woe, to warn from cruelty and persuade men to love God's creatures.—Coleridge.

Ancient of Days (Daniel iii. 9).

Jehovah.

Anima (3 syl.). The Palladium of Rome. It was the sacred buckler which Numa said fell from heaven. To prevent its being stolen, he caused eleven others to be made precisely like it, and confided them to twelve priests called Salii, who bore them in procession through the city every year at the beginning of March.

1 Idque animile vocat, quod ab omni parte remissum est.
   Quemqua notes oculus, angulas omnis absolv.
   Ved.: Fonti, iii 37.

And. The character "&" is a monogram of et (and), made in Italian type, &.

Androns or Hand-iron, a corruption of andeura, andera, undelio, or andana. Ducange says, "Andena est ferrum, quo appodiatur ligna in foco, ut melius incandes, et melius comburatur." Further on he gives anduria, anderius, andellus, etc., as variants. Called "dogs" because they were often made in the resemblance of dogs. The derivation of anderous is not clear: Ducange says, "dictur andena, quasi ante in aum, i.e. calorum," but this probably will satisfy no one. The modern French word is lauder, old French andere, Low Latin andur.

Andrea Ferrara. A sword. So called from a famous sword-maker of the name. (Sixteenth century.)

We'll put in baill, my bar old Andrea Ferrera shall judge his security."—Scott: Waverley, ch. 36.

Andrew, a name commonly used in old plays for a valet or man-servant. Probably a Merry Andrew is simply the mirth-making Andrew or domestic jester. (See MERRY ANDREW.)

Similarly, Ambul is used in old plays for a waiting gentilwoman. (See AMBUL.)

Andrew (Anu). A merchant vessel, probably so called from Andrew Doria, the famous Genoese admiral.

"I should think of shallows and of sty.
   And see my wealthy Andrew doomed in sand."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice 1.1.

Andrew (St.). Depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a cross like the letter X, termed St. Andrew's cross. The great pictures of St. Andrew are his Flagellation by Domenichino, and the Adoration of the Cross by Guido, which has also been depicted by Andrea Sacchi, in the Vatican at Rome. Both the Flagellation and the Adoration form the subjects of frescoes in the chapel of St. Andrew, in the church of San Gregorino, at Rome. His day is November 30th. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Patera (A.D. 70). (See St. Andrew.)

The "adoration of the cross" means his fervent address to the cross on which he was about to suffer. "Hail, precious cross, consecrated by the body of Christ! I come to thee exulting and full of joy. Receive me into thy dear arms." The "flagellation" means the scourging which always preceded capital punishments, according to Roman custom.

St. Andrew's Cross is represented in the form of an X (white on a blue field). The cross, however, on which the apostle suffered was of the ordinary shape, if we may believe the recite in the convent of St. Victor, near Marseilles. The error rose from the way in which that cross is exhibited, resting on the end of the cross-beam and point of the foot.

According to J. Leslie (History of Scotland), this sort of cross appeared in the heavens to Achinius, King of the Scots, and Hungus, King of the Picts, the night before their engagement with Atholstan. As they were the victors, they went barefoot to the Kirk of St. Andrew, and vowed to adopt his cross as their national emblem. (See CONSTANTINE'S CROSS.)

Andrew Maca (The). The crew of H.M.S. Andrea Maca. Similarly, the Bellerophon was called by English sailors "Billy ruffian," and the Achilles the "Ash hook." (See BELLEROPHON, etc.)

Androcles and the Lion. Androcles was a runaway slave who took refuge in a cavern. A lion entered, and instead of tending him to pieces, lifted up his fore paw that Androcles might extract from it a thorn. The slave being subsequently captured, was doomed to fight with a lion in the Roman arena. It so happened that the same lion was let out against him, and, recognizing his benefactor, showed towards him every demonstration of love and gratitude.

In the Gesta Romanorum (Tale civ.) the same story is told, and there is a similar one in Esop's Fables. The original tale, however, is from Aulus Gellius, on the authority of Plutarch, who asserts that he was himself an eye-witness of the encounter.

Android. An automaton figure of a human being (Greek, andros-eidos, a man's likeness). One of the most famous of these machines is that by M. Vaucanson, called the flute-player. The chess-player by Kempelen is also celebrated. (See Automaton.)

Andromeda. Daughter of Cepheus (2 syl.) and Cassiopeia. Her mother boasted that the beauty of Andromeda surpassed that of the Nereids; so the Nereids induced Neptune to send a seaman on the country, and an oracle declared that Andromeda must be given up to it. She was accordingly chained to a rock, but was delivered by Perseus (2 syl.). After death she was placed among the stars. (See Angelica.)

Andromica (in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her beauty. She was sent with Sophrosyne to conduct Astolfo from India to Arabia.

Anon. Over against; concerning. (Old English, on-een; later forms, on-er, on-erf, on-rent.)

Angelo de Grève (French). A hangman or executioner. The "Place de Grève" was at one time the Tyburn of Paris.

Angel. Half a sovereign in gold; so called because, at one time, it bore the figure of the archangel Michael slaying the dragon.

When the Rev. Mr. Patten, vicar of Whistable, was dying, the Archbishop of Canterbury sent him £10. The wit said, "Tell this grace that now I am sure he is a man of God, for I have seen his angels."

Angel (a public-house sign), in compliment to Richard II., who placed an angel above his shield, holding it up in his hands.

To write like an angel (French). The angel referred to was Angelo Vergezio [Vergezio], a Cremon of the sixteenth century. He was employed both by Henry II. and by François I., and was noted for his calligraphy. (Diodor: Nouvelle Biographie Universelle [1852-66].)

Angel of the Schools. St. Thomas Aquinas. (See Angelic Doctor.)

Angels, say the Arabs, were created from pure, bright germs; the genii, of fire; and man, of clay.

Angels, according to Dionysius the Areopagite, were divided into nine orders:

1) Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones, in the first circle.
2) Dominions, Virtues, and Powers, in the second circle.
3) Principalities, Archangels, and Angels, in the third circle.

St. Gregory the Great: Homily 34.

In heaven above,
The effulgent lamps in triple circles move."

Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, xi. 13.

Angels. The seven holy angels are—Abdiel, Gabriel, Michael, Raguel, Raphael, Simiel, and Uriel. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible; Raphael in the Apocalypse.

Milton (Paradise Lost, book i., from 392) gives a list of the fallen angels.

Angel-beast. A favourite round game of cards, which enabled gentlewomen to let the ladies win small stakes. Five cards are dealt to each player, and three heaps formed—one for the king, one for play, and the third for Triolot. The name of the game was in bête (best). Angel was the stake. Thus we say, Shilling-wist.

"This gentleman offers to play at Angel-beast, though he scarce knows the cards."—Mulberry Garden.

Angel Visits. Delightful intercourse of short duration and rare occurrence.

"(Visits) Like those of angels, short and far between."—Brisie: Grève, Pl. 11, 568.

"Like angel-visits, few and far between."—Campbell: Pleasures of Hope, line 375.

Angel-water, a Spanish cosmetic, made of roses, trefoil, and lavender. Short for Angelica-water, because originally it was chiefly made of the plant Angelica.

"Angel-water was the wond-est scent about her."—Selly: Batham.

Angello Doctor. Thomas Aquinas was so called, because he discussed the knotty points in connection with the being and nature of angels. An example is, "Urusm Angelicae morrarur de hoc ad homin transmundo per medium?"

The Doctor says that it depends upon circumstances.

It is said of a quiz that one of his answers was: holy angels can dance on the point of a pin.

Angelic Hymn. The hymn beginning with Glory be to God so high, etc. (Luke ii. 14); so called because the former part of it was sung by the angel host that appeared to the shepherds of Bethlehem.

Angelica. Daughter of Galaphuron, king of Cathay, the capital of which was Alborace. She was sent to sow discord among the Christians, Charlemagne.
sent her to the Duke of Bavaria, but she made her escape from the duke's castle. Being captured in her flight, she was bound to a rock, and exposed to sea-monsters. Rogero delivered her, but she escaped out of his hands by a magic ring. Orlando greatly loved her, but she married Medoro, a young Moor, and returned to India, where Medoro succeeded to the crown in right of his wife. (Orlando Furioso.) (See Andromeda).

Angelic's Draught, something which completely changes affection. The tale is that Angelica was passionately in love with Rinaldo, who hated her, whereas Orlando, whom she hated, actually desired her shadow. Angelica and Rinaldo drink from a certain fountain, when a complete change takes place; Rinaldo is drunk with love, and Angelica's passion changes to abhorrence. Angelica ultimately married Medoro, and Orlando went mad. (Aviosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Angelic Stone. The speculum of Dr. Dee. He asserted that it was given him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. It passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough, thence to Lady Betty Germaine, by whom it was given to the Duke of Buckingham, whose son presented it to Horace Walpole. It was sold in 1842, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill.

Angelici. Certain heretics of the second century, who advocated the worship of angels.

Angelites (3 syll.). A branch of the Sabellian heretics; so called from Angelius, in Alexandria, where they used to meet. (Dr. Hook: Church Dictionary.)

Angelo. (See Michael Angelo.)

Angelo and Raffaele. Michael Angelo criticised Raffaule very severely.

"Such was the language of this false Italian (Angelou)!
One time he christened Raphael a Pythagorean,
Sware that his mullets were composed of stone;
Sware his expressions were like owls, so tame,
His drawings, like the lame, crippled, lame,
And as he composed, he had none."
Peter Panini: Lyric Odes, viii. (See Michael Angelo.)

Angelus (Thes.). A Roman Catholic devotion in honour of the Incarnation, instituted by Urban II. It consists of three texts, each said as verse and response, and followed by the salutation of Gabriel. The name is derived from the first words, Angelus Domini (The angel of the Lord, etc.). The prayer is recited three times a day, generally about 6 a.m., at noon, and about 6 p.m., at the sound of a bell called the Angelus. The Angelus bell (often wrongly called the Curfew) is still rung at 8 p.m. in some country churches.

"Sweetly over the village the bell of the Angelus sounded."

Anger. Athenodorus, the Stoic, told Augustus the best way to restrain unruly anger was to repeat the alphabet before giving way to it. (See Dander.)

"The sacred line: he did but once repeat,
And laid the storm, and cooled the raging heat."

Tickell: The Horn Book.

Angewin, adjective of Aunjou.

John was not the last of the Anges in Khins of England, though he was the last King of England who reigned over Aunjou.

Angiolina (1 syll.). The young wife of Marino Faliero, the doge. She was the daughter of Lorosano. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Anglais's Lord. Orlando, who was lord of Anglais and knight of Brava.

Angle. A dead angle. A term in fortification applied to the plot of earth before an angle in a wall which can neither be seen nor defended from the parapet.

Angle with a Silver Hook (Th.). To buy fish at market.

Angling. The father of angling, Izaak Walton (1583-1683). Angling is called "the gentle craft"; shoe-making was also so called. Probably there is a pun concealed in the first of these; a common bait of anglers being a "gentle." In the second case, St. Ciriass was a Roman gentleman of high birth, and his craftsman took from him their title of "gentle" (generosi).

Angoulaffre of the Broken Teth, a giant "12 cubits in height." His face measured 3 feet across; his nose was 9 inches long; his arms and legs were each 6 feet; his fingers 6 inches and 2 lines; his enormous mouth was armed with sharp-pointed yellow tusks. He was descended from Goliath, and assumed the title of "Governor of Jerusalem." Angoulaffre had the strength of 30 men, and his mace was the trunk of an oak-tree 300 years old. Some say the Tower of Pisa lost its perpendicularity by the weight of this giant, who Angry (The). Christian II., of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, was so called on account of his ungovernable temper. (1513-1559.)

Angry (Anguiar). Cross-grained; of a patchy temper; one full of angles, whose temper is not smooth.

Anguva’del. Frithiof’s sword, inscribed with Runic letters, which blazed in time of war, but gleamed with a dim light in time of peace. (See Sword.)

Anima Mundi (the soul of the world), with the oldest of the ancient philosophers, meant “the source of life”; with Plato, it meant “the animating principle of matter,” inferior to pure spirit; with the Stoics, it meant “the whole vital force of the universe.”

Stahl (1710) taught that the phenomena of animal life are due to an immortal anima, or vital principle distinct from matter.

Animal. To go the entire animal, a facetious euphemism for “To go the whole hog.” (See Hog.)

Animal Spirits. Liveliness and animation arising from physical vigour.

Animals admitted into Heaven (The). They are ten: (1) Jonah’s whale; (2) Solomon’s ant; (3) the ram caught by Abraham and sacrificed instead of Isaac; (4) the cuckoo of Belkis; (5) the camel of the prophet Saleh; (6) Balaam’s ass; (7) the ox of Moses; (8) the dog Kratim of the Seven Sleepers; (9) Mahomet’s ass, called Al Borak; and (10) Noah’s cow.

Animals in Christian Art. The ant symbolizes prudence; the ape, malice, lust, and cunning; the ass, sobriety, or the Jewish nation; the asp, Christ, or Christian faith; the bee, industry; the camel, submission; the cock, vigilance; the dog, fidelity; the fox, fraud and cunning; the hog, impurity; the lamb, innocence; the leopard, sin; the lion, pride; the wolf, cruelty.

Some animals are appropriated to certain saints: as the calf or ox to Luke; the cock to Peter; the eagle to John the Baptist; the lion to Mark, the raven to Brigid, etc.

The lamb, the pelican, and the unicorn, are symbols of Christ.

The dragon, serpent, and swine, symbolize Satan and his crew.

Animals sacred to special Deities. To Apollo, the wolf, the griffin, and the crow; to Bacchus, the dragon and the panther; to Diana, the stag; to Asclepius, the serpent; to Hercules, the deer; to Isis, the hen; to Jupiter, the eagle; to Juno, the peacock and the lamb; to Mars, the dog; to Mars, the horse and the raven; to Mercury, the cock; to Minerva, the owl; to Neptune, the bull; to Tethys, the dolphin; to Venus, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow; to Vulcan, the lion, etc.

Animals (Symbolical). The ant, futility and precision; ape, uncleanness; ass, stupidity; bantam cock, quickness, priggishness; bat, blindness; bear, ill-temper, meanness; bee, industry; beedle, blindness; bull, strength, straightforwardness; bullet-dog, pertinacity; butterfly, sportiveness, living in pleasure; cat, deceit; calf, lumpishness, cowardice; cicala, poetry; cock, vigilance, overbearing insolence; crow, longevity; crocodile, hypocrisy; cuckoo, cuckoldom; dog, fidelity, dirty habits; dove, innocence, harmlessness; duck, deceit (French, sourd, a hoop); eagle, majesty, inspiration; elephant, mystery, ponderosity; fly, fecundity, insignificance; fox, cunning, artifice; frog and toad, inspiration; goat, lasciviousness; goose, conceit; golly, gall, gullibility; grasshopper, old age; hare, timidity; hawk, rapacity, penetration; hen, maternal care; horse, speed, grace; jackal, vain ambition, empty conceit; jay, senseless chatter; kitten, playfulness; lamb, innocence, sacrifice; lark, cheerfulness; lion, noble courage; lynx, suspicious vigilance; magpie, garrulity; mole, blindness, obstinacy; monkey, tricks; mule, obstinacy; nightingale, falsehood; ostrich, stupidity; ox, patience; strength; owl, wisdom; parrot, mocking verbosity; peacock, pride; pigeon, creature (pigeon-livered); pig, obstinacy, obstinacy; puppy, empty-headed conceit; rabbit, friendliness; raven, ill-matched; robin red-breast, confiding trust; serpent, wisdom; snake, solitude, timidity; sparrow, lasciviousness; spider, williness; stag, cuckoldom; swallow, a sunshine friend; swan, grace; swine, filthiness; sword, cruelty; tiger, ferocity; tortoise, chastity; turkey-cock, official insolence; turtle-dove, conjugal fidelity; vulture, rapine; wolf, cruelty, savage ferocity, and rapine; worm, enmity; etc.

Animals (The cries of). Apes gibber; assae bray; bees hum; beetles drone; bears growl; bitterns boom; blackbirds whistle; blackcaps — we speak of the "chick-chick" of the blackcap; bullsellow; canaries sing or quaver; cats meow, purr, swear, and caterwaul; calves bleat and bawl; chaffinches chirp or yelp; chickens pip; cicadas sing; cocks crow; cows moo or low; crows caw; cuckoos cry cuckoo; deer bawl; dogs bark, bay, howl, yelp; doves coo; ducks quack; eagles scream; falcons chant; flies buzz; foxes bark and yelp; frogs croak; geese cackle and hiss; goldfinch—we speak of the "merry twinkle" of the female; grasshoppers chirp and pitter; grous—we speak of the "drumming" of the grouse; guineafowls cry "come back"; guineapigs squeak; hares squeak; hawks scream; hens cackle and cluck; horses neigh and whinny; hyenas laugh; jays chatter; kittens meow; lambs bay and bleat; larks sing; lions roar; magpies chatter; mice squeak and squawk; monkeys chatter and gibber; nightingales pipe and warble—we also speak of its "jug-jug"; owls hoot and sepulchre: oxen low and bellow; parrots talk; peacocks scream; peewits cry peewit; pigeons coo; pigs grunt, squeak, and squeal; ravens croak; redstarts whistle; rooks curse; screech owls seep or shrieck; sheep baa or bleat; snakes hiss; sparrows chirp or yelp; stags bell and call; swallows twitter; swans cry—we also speak of the "bomblation" of the swan; thrushes whistle; tigers growl; tills—we speak of the "twit-twit" of the bottle-tit; turkey-cocks gobble; vultures scream; whisthroughs chirr; wolves howl.

Animosity means animation, spirit, as the fire of a horse, called in Latin equis animositas. Its present exclusive use in a bad sense is an instance of the tendency which words originally neutral have to assume a bad meaning. (Compare chart. villain.)

Animula.

"Animula, vagula, blandula,
Hospes, comesque, corporis;
Quae nonne abias in loca,
Pallidula, rigida, nudula."

The Emperor Hadrian to his Son.

Sorrow-laden, bitte-little, flatterine spirit,
Comrade and guest in this body of clay,
Wither, ah! whither, departing in flight,
Rigui, half-naked, pale munition, away.

Anna. (Donna). A lady beloved by Don Ottavio, but seduced by Don Giovanni, who also killed her father, the "Commandant of the City," in a duel. (Mozart's opera of Don Giovanni.)

Annabel, in Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel is designed for the Duchess of Monmouth. Her maiden name and title were Anne Scott, Countess of Buccleuch, the richest heiress in Europe. The duke was faithless to her, and after her death, the widow, still handsome, married again.

"To all his [Monmouth's] wives, nothing he [David] denied;—
And made the charming Annabel his bride."

Part I, lines 22, 31.

Anna Matilda (Am), an ultra-sentimental girl. Mrs. Hannah Cowley used this pen-name in her responses in the World to Della Crucca (R. Merry). (See the Sacred by Gifford.)

Annates (2 syl.). One entire year’s income claimed by the Pope on the appointment of a bishop or other ecclesiastic in the Catholic Church. This is called the first fruits (Latin, annus, a year). By the Statute of Recusants (23 Hen. VIII., 6, 29, and the Confirming Act), the right to English Annates and Tenths was transferred to the Crown: but, in the reign of Queen Anne, annates were given up to form a fund for the augmentation of poor livings. (See BOUNTY, QUEEN ANNE’s.)

Anne. Sister Anne, Sister of Fatima, the seventh and last of Blueboard’s wives.

Anne’s Fan (Queen). Your thumb to your nose and your fingers spread.

Anne’s Great Captain. The Duke of Marlborough (1650-1722).

Annie Laurie was eldest of the three daughters of Sir Robert Laurie, of Maxwellton, born December 16, 1682. William Douglas, of Fingland (Kirkcudbright), wrote the popular song; but Annie married, in 1709, James Ferguson, of Craigdarroch, and was the mother of Alexander Ferguson, the hero of Burns’s song called The Whistle.

William Douglas was the hero of the song "Wiltie was a wammon wae."

Annulo De Figuram No Gestato (In). Wear not God’s image in a ring (or inscribe . . . ), the 24th symbol of the Pythagoreans. Jamblicus tells us that Pythagoras wished to teach by this prohibition that God had an "incorporeal subsistence." In fact, that it meant "thou shalt not liken God to any of His works."

Probably the ring, symbolizing eternity, bore upon the special prohibition.

Annunciation. Day of the Annunciation. The 25th of March, also called Lady Day, on which the angel announced to the Virgin Mary that she would be the mother of the Messiah.

Anus Luotus, the period during which a widow is morally supposed to remain chaste. If she marries within about nine months from the death of her late husband and a child is born, a doubt might arise as to the paternity of the child. Such a marriage is not illegal, but it is inexpedient.

Anus Mirabilis. The year of wonders, 1666, memorable for the great fire of London and the successions of our arms over the Dutch. Dryden has written a poem with this title, in which he describes both these events.

Anodyne Necklace (Au), a halter. An anodyne is a medicine to relieve pain. Probably a pun on nodos, a knot, is intended also. George Primrose says: “May I die by an anodyne necklace, but I had rather be an under-turnkey than an usher in a boarding-school.”

Anomous or Unlikists. A sect in the fourth century which maintained that the essence of the Son is wholly unlike that of the Father. (Greek, anomoeos, unlike.

Anon. Immediately, at once. The Old English an-on or au-anec = at once. Variants, on one, anon.

“They knew me in breeding of bridle, and anon he vanyste swaye fro him.”—MS. Lincoln, A 1, 17.

“To speak the lion
To the fox anon his wile.”

Wright’s Political Songs.

“... For the nonce” is a corrupt form of “For the once,” where the-in is the accusative case, meaning “For the once” or “For this once.”

Anon-rights. Right quickly.

“He had in town five hundred knaves,
His men [thems] of [off] sent anon-rights.”

Arthur and Meiton, p. 88.

Ansarian. The Moesians of Medina were called Ansarians (\*anarchi\*s) by Mahomet, because they received him and took his part when he was driven from house and home by the Kureishites (\*koreishit\*s).

Answer. The Old English and-swery, verb and swery-an or sweryan, where and is the preposition = the Latin in in repond-re. (See Swear.

To answer like a Norman, that is, evasively.

“We see in France, ‘Answering like a Norman’ which means to give an evasive answer, not by any means.”—Max O’Hall: Friend M’Donald, ch. 5.

To answer its purpose, to carry out what was expected or what was intended. Celsus says, “Medicina septius respondet, interdum tamen fallit.”

To answer the bell is to go and see what it was calling for.

To answer the door is to go and open it when a knock or ring has been given.

In both the last two instances the word is “answering to a summons.” To swear means literally “to affirm something,” and to an-swear is to “say something” by way of rejoinder; but figuratively both the “swer” and the “answer” may be made without words.

“... My story being done,
She [swear] an-swore [affirmed] ‘twas strange...”

“Twas pitiful, ’twas wondrous pitiful.”

Shakespeare: Othello, i. 2.

Answer more Scotio (To). To divert the direct question by starting another question or subject.

“’Hark you, sirrah,” said the doctor, “I trust you remember you are owing to the lord 4 stone of barren land, and a bow of oats.”...”

“I was thinking,” replied the man more Scotio, that is, returning no direct answer on the subject on which he was addressed; ‘I was thinking my best way would be to come down to your humour, and take your advice, in case my trouble should come back.’—Sir Walter Scott: The Abbot, ch. xxvi.

Anteas, in Greek mythology, was a gigantic wrestler, whose strength was invincible so long as he touched the earth; and every time he was lifted from it, was renewed by touching it again. (See Malgal.)

“Antaeus the Libyan strand,
More terra tend when he reached the sand,”

Holbe’s Athena, book iv.

It was Hercules who succeeded in killing this charmed giant. He “Tafts proud Antaeus from his mother’s plains,

And with strong grasp the struggling giant strains;
Back falls his panting head and clammy hair,
With his weak limbs and fits his life in air.”

Darwin: Economy of Vegetation.

Antecedents. I know nothing of his antecedents—his previous life, character, or conduct. (Latin, antecedens, foregoing.)

Antediluvian. Before the Deluge, meaning the Scripture Deluge.

Anthia. The lady-love of Abrocomes in Xenophon’s romance, called Ephesiaux. Shakespeare has borrowed from this Greek novel the leading incidents of his Romeo and Juliet, especially that of the potion and mock entombment. N.B. This is not the historian, but a Xenophon who lived in the fourth Christian century.

Anthony.

Anthony (St.). Patron saint of swineherds, because he always lived in woods and forests.
Anthroposophus

St. Anthony’s Cross. The tau cross, termed a lance.

St. Anthony’s Fire. Erysipelas is so called from the tradition that those who sought the intercession of St. Anthony recovered from the pestilential erysipelas called the sacred fire, which proved extremely fatal in 1098.

St. Anthony’s Pig. A pet pig, the smallest of the whole litter. St. Anthony was originally a swineherd, and, therefore, the patron saint of pigs.

Anthroposophus. The nickname of Dr. Vaughan, rector of St. Bride’s, in Bedfordshire. So called from his Anthroposophia Tromaeca, to show the condition of man after death.

Anti-Christ, or the Man of Sin, expected by some to precede the second coming of Christ. St. John so calls every one who denies the incarnation of the eternal Son of God.

Antigone. The Modern Antigone. Marie Thérèse Charlotte, Duchesse d’Angoulême, daughter of Louis XVI.; so called for her attachment to Louis XVIII., whose companion she was. (1778-1851.)

Antimony. Said to be derived from the Greek antimonathos (bad for monks). The tale is that Valentine once gave some of this mineral to his convent pigs, who thrived upon it, and became very fat. He next tried it on the monks, who died from its effects; so Valentine said, “thus good for pigs, it was bad for monks.” Thus falde is given by Furtéière.

Another derivation is anti-monos (averse to being alone), because it is found in combination with sulphur, silver, or some other substance.

Littre suggests athimonit, and connects it with stibium.

Antinomian. [Greek, anti-nomos, exempt from the law.] One who believes that Christians are not bound to observe the “law of God,” but “may continue in that grace may abound.” The term was first applied to John Agricola by Martin Luther.

Antinous (1 syl.). A model of manly beauty. He was the page of Hadrian, the Roman Emperor.

Antipathy (of human beings)

To Animals: Henri III. and the Duke of Schoenberg felt faint at the sight of a cat; Vanghalm felt the same at the sight of a pig, and abhorred pork; Marshal Brézé sickened at the sight of a rabbit; the Duc d’Epernay always swooned at the sight of a leveret, though he was not affected at the sight of a hare.

To Fish: Erasmus felt grievous nausea at the smell of fresh fish.

To Flowers and Fruits: Queen Anne, Grintry the composer, Favourite the Italian poet, and Vincenzo the painter, all abhorred the smell of roses; Scaliger had the same aversion to watercresses; and King Vladislas sickened at the smell of apples.

To Music: Le Mothe de Nayer felt faint at the sound of any musical instrument; Niceno had a strong aversion to the sound of a flute.

To Thunder: Augustus trembled at the noise of thunder, and retired to a vault when a thunderstorm was apprehended.

Witches have an antipathy to running water.

“Some men there are have not a gaping pig. Some that are mad if they behold a cat.”

Antipathy (of animals). According to tradition, wolves have a mortal antipathy to scillaroots; geese to the soil of Whithy; snakes to soil of Ireland; cats to dogs; all animals dislike the castor-oil plant; camphor keeps off insects; Russian leather is disliked by bookworms; paraffin by flies; cedar-wood is used for wardrobes, because its odour is disliked by moths. Ants dislike green sage.

Anti-pope is a pope elected by a king in opposition to the pope elected by the cardinals; or one who usurps the popedom in opposition to the rightful pope. Gibbes gives a list of twenty-four anti-popes, three of whom were deposed by the council of Constance.

Antisthenes. Founder of the Cynic School in Athens. He wore a ragged cloak, and carried a wallet and staff like a beggar. Socrates wittily said he could “see rank pride peering through the holes of Antisthenes’ rag.”

Antonius. The Wall of Antonius. A turf entrenchment raised by the Romans from Dunglass Castle, on the Clyde, to Cuer Ridden Kirk, near the Firth of Forth, under the direction of Lollius Urbicus, legate of Antoninus Pius, A.D. 140.

Antony. (See Antony.)

Antrusions. The chief followers of the Frankish kings, who were specially Ants trusty to them. (Old German, tröst, trust, fidelity.)—Stubs: Constitutional History.

Anta. "Go to the ant, thou sluggard...which provideth her meat in the summer" (Proverbs vi. 6-8; and xxx. 25). The notion that ants in general gather food in harvest for a winter's store is quite an error; in the first place, they do not live on grain, but chiefly on animal food; and in the next place they are torpid in winter, and do not require food. Colonel Sykes, however, says there is in Poona a grain-feeding species, which stores up millet-seed; and according to Lubbock and Moggridge, ants in the south of Europe and in Texas make stores.

What are called "ant eggs" are not eggs, but the pupae of ants.

Anubis. In Egyptian mythology, similar to the Hermes of Greece, whose office it was to take the souls of the dead before the judge of the infernal regions. Anubis is represented with a human body and jackal's head.

Anvil. It is on the anvil, under deliberation; the project is in hand. Of course, the reference is to a smithy.

"She had another arrangement on the anvil"—Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard.

Any-how, i.e., in an irregular manner. "He did it any-how," in a careless, slovenly manner. "He went on any-how," in a wild, reckless manner. Any-how, you must manage it for me; by hook or crook; at all events. (Old English, any-hew.)

Aörian. Poetical, pertaining to the Muses. The Muses, according to Greek mythology, dwelt in Aöria, that part of Boöcia which contains Mount Helicon and the Muse's Fountain. Thomson calls the fraternity of poets

"The Arian hive
Who praised are, and staves right merily"

Castle of Indolence. 1-29

A outrance. (French.) To the farthest point. The correct form of the phrase. (See A L'OUTRANCE.)

Ape. The buffoon ape, in Dryden's poem called The Hind and the Panther, means the Free-thinkers.

"Next her (the bow) the buffoon ape, as a thief Mimicked all sects, and had his own to choose."—Part I. 36. 48.

He keeps them, like an ape, in the corner of his jaw; first mouthed, to be last swallowed. (Homer iv. 2). Most of the Old World monkeys have cheek pouches, used as receptacles for food.

To lead apes or To lead apes in hell. It is said of old maids. Hence, to die an old maid.

"I will even take sixpence in earnest of the hear-ward, and lead his apes into hell."—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, i. 1.

Fadlaldin da says to Talanta (3 syl.):

"Buy that you who've served so long and well Should die a virgin, and lead apes in hell."—H. Caru: Chronicon ad mundum.

"Women, dye me maids, lead apes in hell."—The London Prodigal, i. 2.

To play the ape, to play practical jokes; to play silly tricks; to make facial imitations, like an ape.

To put an ape into your hood (or cap)—i.e., to make a fool of you. Apes were formerly carried on the shoulders of fools and simpletons.

To say an ape's paternoster, is to chatter with fright or cold, like an ape.

Apelles. A famous Grecian painter, contemporary with Alexander the Great.

"There conquers forms embroidered rose to view Than ever Apelles' wondrous pencil drew."—Archil. Orlando Furioso, book xxiv.

Apemantus. A churlish philosopher, in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens.

"The cynicism of Apemantus contrasted with the meanness of Timon."—Shakespe. A Winter's Tale.

A-per-se. An A 1; a person or thing of unusual merit. "A" all alone, with no one who can follow, remo proumis, and secundus.

Chaucer calls Cresside "the floure and A-per-se of Troi and Greek."

"London, thou art of townes A-per-se."—Lawdon ne M5S.

Apox, the topmost height, really means the pointed olive-wood spike on the top of the cap of a Roman priest. The cap fitted close to the head and was fastened under the chin by a fillet. It was applied also to the crest or spike of a helmet. The word now means the summit or tip-top.

Aphrodite (4 syl.). The Greek Venus; so called because she sprang from the foam of the sea. (Greek, aphros, foam.)

Aphrodite's Girdle. Whoever wore Aphrodite's magic girdle, immediately became the object of love. (Greek mythology.)

Apicius. A gourmand. Apicius was a Roman gourmand, whose income being reduced by his luxurious living to £80,000, put an end to his life, to avoid the misery of being obliged to live on plain diet.

A-pig-ja-back. (See Pig-back.)

Apis, in Egyptian mythology, is the bull symbolical of the god Apis. It was not suffered to live more than twenty-five years, when it was sacrificed and buried in great pomp. The madness of Cambyses is said to have been in retribution for his killing a sacred bull.

Aplomb means true to the plumbline, but is generally used to express that self-possession which arises from perfect self-confidence. We also talk of a dancer's aplomb, meaning that he is a perfect master of his art. (French, a plomb.)

"Here exists the best stock in the world... men of aplomb and reserve, of great range and many moods, of strong instincts, yet apt for culture."—Emerson: English Traits, p. 130.

Apocryphal Number. The mystical number 666. (Rev. xiii. 18.) (See NUMBER OF THE BEAST.)

Apocrypha. Those books included in the Septuagint and Vulgate versions of the Old Testament, but not considered to be parts of the original canon. They are accepted as canonical by Catholics, but not by Protestants, and are not printed in Protestant Bibles in ordinary circulation. The word means hidden (Greek, apokryphos), "because they were wont to be read not openly... but, as it were, in secret and apart." (Bible, 1539, Preface to the Apocrypha). As the reason why these books are not received as canonical is because their genuineness or their authenticity is doubtful, therefore the word "apocryphal" means not genuine or not authentic.

Apollinarians. An ancient sect founded in the middle of the fourth century by Apollinaris, bishop of Laodicea. They denied that Christ had a human soul, and asserted that the Logos supplied its place. The Athanasian creed condemns this heresy.

Apollo. The sun, the god of music. (Roman mythology.)

Do strike at an imposture,"

Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iii. 7.

A perfect Apollo. A model of manly beauty, referring to the Apollo Belvidere (q.v.).

The Apollo of Portugal. Luis Camoëns, author of the Lusíada; so called, not for his beauty, but for his poetry. He was god of poetry in Portugal, but was allowed to die in the streets of Lisbon like a dog, literally of starvation. Our own Otway suffered a similar fate. (1527-1579.)

Apollo Belvidere [Bel-vid-er-ace]. A marble statue, supposed to be from the chisel of the Greek sculptor Calamis, who flourished in the fifth ante-Christian era. It represents the god holding a bow in his left hand, and is called Belvidere from the Belvidere Gallery of the Vatican, in Rome, where it stands. It was discovered in 1506, amidst the ruins of Antium, and was purchased by Pope Julius II.

Apollodorus. Plato says: "Who would not rather be a man of sorrows than Apollodorus, envied by all for his enormous wealth, yet nourishing in his heart the scorpions of a guilty conscience?" (The Republic). This Apollodorus was the tyrant of Cassandra (formerly Iotentia). He obtained the supreme power B.C. 378, exercised it with the utmost cruelty, and was put to death by Antigonus Gonatas.

Apolloius. Master of the Rosicrucians. He is said to have had the power of raising the dead, of making himself invisible, and of being in two places at the same time.

Apollyon. King of the bottomless pit. (Rev. ix. 11.) His contest with Christian, in Bunyan's allegory, has made his name familiar. (Greek, the destroyer.)

Apostate (The.) Julian, the Roman emperor. So called because he forsook the Christian faith and returned to Paganism again. (231, 361-363.)

A posteriori [Latin, from the latter]. An a posteriori argument is proving the cause from the effect. Thus, if we see a watch, we conclude there was a watchmaker. Robinson Crusoe inferred there was another human being on the desert island, because he saw a human footprint in the wet sand. It is thus the existence and character of Deity is inferred from his works. (See A priori.)

Apostles. The badges or symbols of the fourteen apostles.

Andrew, a cross, because he was crucified on a; 5 cross shaped like the letter X, because he was hanged with a rope.

James the Greater, a scallop-shell, a pharaoh's staff, or a gourd bottle, because he is the patron saint of physicians. (See SCALLOP-SHELL.)

James the Less, a fish's pole, because he was killed by a blow on the head with a pole, dealt him by Simon the fuller.

John, a cup with a winged serpent figure out of it, in allusion to the tradition about Asclepius, priest of Diana, who challenged John to drink a cup of poison. John made the sign of a cross on the cup, Satan like a dragon flew from it, and John then drank the cup, which was quite innocuous.

Judas Iscariot, a bag, because he had the bag and "laid what was put therein." John xii. 6.

Jude, a club, because he was martyred with a club.

Matthew, a hatchet or halberd, because he was slain at Nadalbar with a halberd.

Mattias, a battle-axe, because he was first stoned, and then beheaded with a battle-axe.
Apostles, where buried. According to Catholic legend, seven of the Apostles are buried at Rome. These seven are distinguished by a star (*)

Andrew is buried at Amalfi (Naples).
Barnabas, at Rome, in the church of Bartholomew, in the Tiber.
James the Great was buried at St. Lazzaro at Compostella, in Spain.
James the Less, at Rome, in the church of the Holy Apostles.
John, at Ephesus.
Philip, at Rome.
Simon the Zealot at Rome. ("Zelotes"

Mark the Evangelist is said to have been buried at Venedig.
Luke the Evangelist is said to have been buried at Padua.
N.B. Holy Church thirteen of these apostles or evangelists—Rome seven, Naples three, Paul somewhere in Italy, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua.

Apostles of Apostles, at Rome (Fourth Alps, Felix Kell, (1746-1829).

Apostles, at Rome, in the church of St. Peter.
Apostles, at Rome.

N. B. Holy Church thirteen of these apostles or evangelists—Rome seven, Naples three, Paul somewhere in Italy, Mark at Venice, Luke at Padua.

Apostles' Creed (The). A church creed supposed to be an epitome of Scripture doctrines, or doctrines taught by the apostles. It was received into the Latin Church, in its present form, in the eleventh century; but a formula somewhat like it existed in the second century. Items were added in the fourth and fifth centuries, and verbal alterations much later.

Apostolic Fathers. Christian authors born in the first century, when the apostles lived. John is supposed to have died about 98, and Polycarp, the last of the Apostolic Fathers born about 98, was his disciple. These three are tolerably certain: Clement of Rome (90-100), Ignatius (died 113), and Polycarp (95-165). Three others are Barnabas, Hermas, and Papias. Barnabas was the companion of Paul, Hermas is a very doubtful name, and Papias (Bp. of Hierapolis) is mentioned by Eusebius.

Polycarp could hardly have been a disciple of John, although he might have received Christian instruction from the old "beloved one."

Apostolic Majesty. A title borne by the Emperor of Austria, as King of Hungary. It was conferred by Pope Sylvester II. on the King of Hungary in 1000.

Apparel. Dress. The ornamental parts of the alb, at the lower edge and at the wrists. Catechumens were used to talk of putting on their apparels, or fine white surplices, for the feast of Pentecost.

Pugin says: "The alb should be made with apparels worked in silk or gold, embroidered with ornaments."

"Rock tells us... That apparels were stiched on the upper part of the albine, like a collar to it."

Appeal to the Country (An). Asking electors by their choice of representatives to express their opinion of some moot question. In order to obtain the public opinion Parliament is dissolved, and a new election must be made.

Appalades (1 syl.). Five divinities whose temple stood near the fountains of Appius, in Rome. Their names are Venus, Fallas, Concord, Peace, and Vesta. They were represented on horseback, like Amazonas.

Appian Way. The oldest and best of all the Roman roads, leading from the Porta Capena of Rome to Capua. This "queen of roads" was commenced by Appius Claudius, the decemvir, B.C. 313.

Apple (Newton and the). Voltaire tells us that Mrs. Conduit, Newton's niece, told him that Newton was at Woolsthorpe, when, seeing an apple fall, he was led into a train of thought which resulted in his discovery of gravitation (1665).

His mother had married a Rev. B. Smith and in 1661 had returned to Woolsthorpe. Her granddaughter was the wife of Mr. Conduit, who succeeded Newton in the Mint. Newton was on a visit to his mother.

The apple of discord. A cause of dispute; something to contend about. At the marriage of Thetis and Peleus, where all the gods and goddesses met together, Discord threw on the table a golden apple "for the most beautiful." Juno, Minerva, and Venus put in their separate claims; and not being able to settle the point, referred the question to Paris, who gave judgment in favour of Venus. This brought upon him the vengeance of Juno and Minerva, to whose spite the fall of Troy is attributed.

The "apple" plays a large part in Greek story. Besides the "Apple of Discord," related above, we have the three apples thrown down by Hippomènes when he raced with Atalanta. The story says that Atalanta stopped to pick up the apples, whereby Hippomènes won the race, and according to the terms obtained her for wife.

Then there are the golden apples of the Hesperidès, guarded by a sleepless dragon with a hundred heads; but Hercules slew the dragon and carried some of the apples to Eurystheus. This was the twelfth and last of his "labours."

Of course, the Bible story of Eve and the Apple will be familiar to every reader of this dictionary.

Apples of Isakhar are "all sweetness on one side, and all bitterness on the other."

Apples of Paradise, according to tradition, had a bite on one side, to commemorate the bite given by Eve.

Apples of Pyban, says Sir John Mandeville, fest the pignmes with their odour only.

Apples of Sodom, Thuvanot says—"There are apple-trees on the sides of the Dead Sea which bear lovely fruit, but within are full of ashes." Josephus speaks of these apples. Witman says the same is asserted of the oranges there. (See Tacitus, Hist., v. 7.)

"Like to the apples on the Dead Sea's shore, All ashes to the taste."—Byron: Childe Harold, iii. 81.

The apple of perpetual youth. This is the apple of Idun, daughter of the dwarf Svall, and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting this apple that the gods preserve their perpetual youth. (Scandinavian mythology.)

The singing apple had the power of persuading any one to anything. (Chery and Fairstar: Countess D. Linnis.)

Pruner Amued's apple—a cure for every disorder. This apple the prince purchased at Samarcand. (Arabian Nights, Prune Amued, etc.)

The apple of the eye. The pupil, of which perhaps it is a corruption. It now, if not, is from an erroneous notion that the little blue or green spot of the eye is a little round solid ball like an apple. Anything extremely dear or extremely sensitive.

"He kept him in the apple of his eye."—Deut. xxiii. 3.

Apple-john (11n). An apple so called from its being at maturity about St. John's Day (May 6th). We are told that apple-johns will keep for two years, and are best when shrivelled.

"I am withered like an old apple-john."—Shakespeare: Henry III., iii. 3

Sometimes called the Apples of King John, which, if correct, would militate against the notion about "St. John's Day."

"There were some things, for instance, the Apples of King John— I should be tempted to say"—Russeau: Life of B. Franklin.

"In the United States there is a drink called Apple-Jack," which is apple or cider brandy.

Apple-pie Bed. A bed in which the sheets are so folded that a person cannot get his legs down; from the apple turnover; or, more probably, a corruption of "a nap-pe-pi bed." (French, nappe pliée, a folded sheet.)

Apple-pie Order. Prim and precise order.
The origin of this phrase is still doubtful. Some suggest cap-a-pie, like a knight in complete armour. Some tell us that apples made into a pie are quartered and methodically arranged when the cores have been taken out. Perhaps the suggestion made above of nap-pe-pi (French, nappe pliées, folded linen, neat as folded linen, Latin, pleo, to fold) is nearer the mark.

It has also been suggested that "Apple-pie order" may be a corruption of apples, beta, meaning as orderly as the letters of the alphabet.

"Everything being in apple-pie order, ... Dr. Johnson observed that we should accompany him ... in Mr. Thacker's kitchen."—Adventures in Mandanaland, p. 294 (1860).

April. The opening month, when the trees unfold, and the womb of nature opens with young life. (Latin, apere're, to open.)

April Fool. Called in France un poisson d'Avril (q.r.), and in Scotland a goose (cuckoo). In Hindustan similar tricks are played at the Huli Festival (March 31st). So that it cannot refer to the uncertainty of the weather, nor yet to the mockery trial of our Rodeenar, the two most popular explanations. A better solution is this: As March 25th used to be New Year's Day, April 1st was its octave, when its festivities culminated and ended.

For the same reason that the "Mockery of Jesus" is rejected as a solution of this custom, the tradition that it arose from Noah sending out the dove on the first of the month may be set aside.

Perhaps it may be a relic of the Roman "iucunda" held at the beginning of April. The tale is that Proserpina was spiritual in the Roman mounds, and had just filled her lap with daffodils, when Plato carried her off to the lower world. Her mother, Ceres, heard the echo of her screams, and went in search of the "voice." But her search was a fool's errand, it was hunting the goose, or looking for the "echo of a scream." Of course this tale is an allegory of secundine.

My April morn—i.e. my wedding day; the day when I was made a fool of. The allusion is to the custom of making fools of each other on the 1st of April.

April Gentleman (Av). A man newly married, who has made himself thus an April fool.

April Squire (Av). A novus homo. A man who has accumulated money, and has retired into the country, where his money may give him the position of a squire.

A priori [Latin, from an antecedent]. An a priori argument is when we deduce a fact from something antecedent, as when we infer certain effects from given causes. All mathematical proofs are of the a priori kind, whereas judgments in the law courts are of the a posteriori evidence; we infer the animus from the act. (See A Posteriori.)

Apron. This is a strange blunder. A napperon, converted into an appron. "Napperon" is French for a napkin, from nappe (cloth in general). Halliwell, in his Archarial Dictionary, p. 571, gives Nappern (an apron) North. Other examples of a attached to the following word, or detached from it, are an oster for a master (Old English, oster and man); a son (Danish, son) and a music (Shakespeare, mine uncle); for the nonce (this used, when it is transferred from the preceding pronoun them or them, i.e. the a posteriori case after for.

Apron-string Tenure (Av). A tenure held in virtue of one's wife. Tied to his mother's apron-string, completely under his mother's thumb. Applied to a big boy or young man who is still under mother rule.

A propos de bottes (French). Turning to quite another subject: a propos de rien.

Aqua Regia [royal water]. So called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. It consists of one part of nitric acid, with from two to four of hydrochloric acid.

Aqua Tofana or Aqua Tofanica. A poisonous liquid much used in Italy in the seventeenth century by young wives who wanted to get rid of their husbands. It was invented by a woman named Tofana, who called it the Manma of St. Nicholas of Bari, from the widespread notion that an oil of miraculous efficacy flowed from the tomb of that saint. In Italian called also Acquella di Napoli.

Aqua Vitas [water of life]. Certain ardent spirits used by the alchemists. Ben Jonson terms a seller of ardent spirits an "aqua-vite man." (Allchemist, i. 1). The "elixir of life" was made from distilled spirits, which were thought to have the power of prolonging life. (See Fat-de-Ver) Aquarian. A sort in the early Christian Church which insisted on the use of water instead of wine in the Lord's Supper.

Aquarius. One of the signs of the zodiac (January 20th to February 18th). So called because it appears when the Nile begins to overflow.

Aquaeus Rocks. Rocks produced by the agency of water, such as bedded limestones, sandstones, and clays; in short, all the geological rocks which are arranged in layers or strata.

Aquilant (in Orlando Furioso). A knight in Charlemagne’s army, son of Olivero and Sigismunda. He was called black from his armour, and his brother Gryphon white. While Aquilant was searching for his brother he met Marte’sno in Gryphon’s armour, and took him bound to Damascal, where his brother was.

Aquiline (3 syl.). Raymond’s matchless steed, bred on the banks of the Tagus. (Georgies, iii. 271-277; and Tusso, Jerusalem Delivered, book vii.) (See Horse.)

Aquinian Sage (The). Juvenal is so called because he was born at Aquium, a town of the Volscians.

Arabesque [Arabesк]. The gorgeous Moorish patterns, like those in the Alhambra, especially employed in architectural decoration. During the Spanish wars, in the reign of Louis XIV., arabesque decorations were profusely introduced into France. (French, “Arab-like.”) Arabian Bird (The). The phoenix; a marvellous man, quite sui generis.

“O Antony! O thou Arabian bird!”
Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

Arabian Nights (The). First made known in Europe by Antoine Galland, a French Oriental scholar, who translated them and called them The Thousand and One Nights (from the number of nights occupied in their recital). They are of Indian, Persian, Egyptian, and Arabian origin.

Common English translations—
4 vol. 12mo, 1795, by R. Heron, published in Edinburgh and London.
3 vol. 12mo, 1794, by Mr. Belloc, London.
3 vol. 8vo, 1800, by Rev. Edward Fenton.
"  1803, by Edw. Wm. Lane.
"  1821, 1822, 1823, 1824, by Rev. James Ridley, are excellent imitations.

Arabians. A class of Arabian heretics of the third century, who maintained that the soul dies with the body.

Arable Figures. The figures 1, 2, 3, 4, etc. So called because they were introduced into Europe (Spain) by the Moors or Arabs, who learnt them from the Hindus. Far more important than the characters, is the decimalism of these figures: 1 figure = units, 2 figures = tens, 3 figures = hundreds, and so on ad infinitum.

The figures i, ii, iii, iv, v, vi, vii, viii, ix, x, etc., are called Roman figures.

The Greeks arranged their figures under three columns of nine figures, units, tens, and hundreds, and employed the letters of the alphabet. As there are but twenty-four letters, a sanaduate letter had to be introduced into each column. In the units column it represented 0, and was called epsilon. In the tens column it represented 10, and was called kappa. And in the third column it represented 100, and was called sigma.

Arabs. Street Arabs. The houseless poor; street children. So called because, like the Arabs, they are nomads or wanderers with no settled home.

Arachné’s Labours. Spinning and weaving. Arachné was so skilful a needlewoman that she challenged Minerva to a trial of skill, and hung herself because the goddess beat her. Minerva then changed her into a spider. “Arachné’s labours ne’ver her hours disdine.” (See Limbo.)

Arab, Al [the partition]. A region, according to the Koran, between Paradise and Jhelum, for those who are neither morally good nor bad, such as infants, lunatics, and idiots. The inmates of Al Arab will be allowed to converse with the blessed and the cursed; to the former this region will appear a hell, to the latter a heaven. (See Limbo.)

Araspes (in Jerusalem Delivered), King of Alexandria, more famed for devices than courage. He joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders.

Ara’tos of Achea, in Greece, murdered Nicocles, the tyrant, in order to restore his country to liberty, and would not allow even a picture of a king to exist. He was poisoned by Philip of Macedon.

“Aratus, who at last returned the soul
Of fondly lingering liberty in Greece”
Thomson: Winter, 601, 492.

Arabes (3 syl.). A Mode and Assyrian satrap, who conspired against Arbor Day

Sardanapalus, and founded the empire of Media on the ruins of the Assyrian kingdom. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Arbor Day. A day set apart in Canada and the United States for planting trees. (See Historic Note Book, p. 42.)

Arbor Judae. Said to be so called because Judas Iscariot hanged himself thereon. This is one of those word-resemblances so delusive to etymologists. Judea is the Spanish juda (a French bean), and Arbor Judae is a corruption of Arbor Judae (the bean-tree), so called from its bean-like pods.

Arcades Ambo. [Arcaedes 3 syl.,] both sweet innocents or simpletons, both Verdant Greens. From Virgil’s Eclogue, vii. v. 4. (See below, Arcadian Youth.) Byron’s translation was “blackguards both.”

Arcadian. A shepherd, a fancy farmer: so called because the Arcadians were a pastoral people, and hence pastoral poetry is called Arcadic.

An Arcadian youth. A dunce or blockhead: so called because the Arcadians were the least intellectual of all the Greeks. Juvenal (vii. 160) uses the phrase Arcadian juratus for a stupid fool.

Arcadian Nightingales. Asses.

“April is the month of love, and the country of Chastellean amours with Arcadian nightingales.”—Robertson, Panegyric, v. 7 (verse).

Archangels. According to the Koran, there are four archangels. Gabriel, the angel of revelations; Michael, the champion, who fights the battles of faith; Azrael, the angel of death; and Israfil, who is commissioned to sound the trumpet of the resurrection.

Arch-monarch of the World. Napoleon III. of France. (1808, 1852-1870, died 1873.)

Archers. The best archers in British history and story are Robin Hood and his two comrades Little John and Will Scarlet.

The famous archers of Henry II. were Topus his bowman of the Gwairs, Gilbert, of the white hind, Hubert of Suffolk, and Clifton of Hampshire.

Nearly equal to these were Egbert of Kent and William of Southampton.

Domitian, the Roman emperor, we are told, could shoot four arrows between the spread fingers of a man’s hand.

Tell, who shot an apple set on the head of his son, is a replica of the Scandinavian tale of Egil, who, at the command of King Nidung, performed a precisely similar feat.

Robin Hood, we are told, could shoot an arrow a mile or more.

Archies (The Court of). The most ancient consistory court of England, the dean of which anciently held his court under the arches of Bow church. Of course we refer to the old church, the steeple of which was supported on arches. The present structure was the work of Sir Christopher Wren.

Archimedes (3 syl.), according to the Paracelsians, is that immaterial principle which energises all living substances. There were supposed to be numerous archaei, but the chief one was said to reside in the stomach.

Archilochian Bitterness. Ill-natured satire, so named from Archilochus, the Greek satirist (B.C. 714-672).

Archimago (3 syl.). The name given by Thomson to the “demon Indolence.” Archimago is the title borne by the High Priest of the Persian Magi.

“‘I will,’ he cried, ‘so help me god I destroy That villain Archimago.”

Thomson, Castle of Indolence, c. ii.

Archimago (Hypocrisy). In Spenser’s Faerie Queen (ii. i). He assumes the guise of the Red Cross Knight, and deceives Una; but Sancro sets upon him, and reveals his true character. When the Red Cross Knight is about to be married to Una, he presents himself before the King of Eden, and tells him that the Knight is betrothed to Duesa. The falsehood being exposed, Archimago is cast into a vile dungeon (book i.). In book ii. the arch-hypocrite is loosed again for a season, and employs Braggadochio to attack the Red Cross Knight. These allegories are pretty obvious: thus the first incident means that Truth (Una), when Piety (the Red Cross Knight) is absent, is in danger of being led astray by Hypocrisy; but any In-fidel (Sancro) can lay bare religious hypocrisy.

“Such when Archimago then did view
He wraped well to worke some unchrist wyle.”

Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii. i, st. 8.

“Sometimes Spenser employs the shortened form” Archimago.”

Archimedes’ Principle. The quantity of water removed by any body immersed therein will equal in bulk the bulk of the body immersed. This scientific fact was noted by the philosopher Archimedes. (See Eureka.)

Archimedes Screw. An endless screw, used for raising water, propelling ships, etc., invented by Archimede's of Syracuse.
Architect

Architect of his own Fortune.

Appius says, "Fabrum sua esse quemque fortunae." Longfellow says, "All are architects of Fate." (The Builders.)

Archeontics. Heretics of the second century, who held a number of idle stories about creation, which they attributed to a number of agents called "archons." (Greek, archon, a prince or ruler.)

Arctite (2 syl.). A young Theban knight, made captive by Duke Theseus, and shut up with Palamon in a prison at Athens. Here both the captives fell in love with Emily, the duke's sister-in-law. After a time both captives gained their liberty, and Emily was promised by the duke to the victor in a tournament. Arcite was the victor, but, as he was riding to receive the prize of his prowess, he was thrown from his horse, and died. So Emily became the bride of Palamon. (Chaucer: The Knight's Tale.)

The story is perhaps better known through Dryden's version, Palamon and Arcite.

Arco Barba. War steeds of Arcos, in Andalusia, very famous in Spanish ballads. (See BARRED STEEDS.)

Arctic Region means the region of Arcturus (the Bear stars). Ark in Sanskrit means "to be bright," applied to stars or anything bright. The Greeks translated ark into arktos, "a bear"; hence Arcturus (the Bear star), and Arctic region, the region where the north star is found.

Arden (Enoch). Mr. G. R. Emerson, in a letter to the Athenaeum (August 18th, 1866), points out the resemblance of this tale by Tennyson to one entitled Homeward Bound, by Adelaide Anne Procter, in a volume of Legends and Lyrics, 1838. Mr. Emerson concludes his letter thus: "At this point (i.e. when the hero sees his wife 'seated by the fire, whispering baby words and smiling on the father of her child') Tennyson departs from the story. Enoch goes away broken-hearted to die, without revealing his secret; but Miss Procter makes the three recognise each other, and the hero having blessed his wife, leaves her, to roam 'over the restless ocean.'"

Mrs. Gaskell's Manchester Marriage is a similar tale. In this tale "Frank" is made to drown himself; and his wife (then Mrs. Openshaw) never knows of his return.

Argantes

Arene-Neak. A boy or girl who sneaks about areas to commit petty thefts.

Areopagus or Mars' Hill. The seat of a famous tribunal in Athens; so called because the first cause tried there was that of Mars or Arês, accused by Neptune of the death of his son Halirrhothius.

"Then Paul stood in the midst of Mars' Hill."—Acts xvi. 29.

Arctine (3 syl.), or rather Pietro Arctino, patronised by François I. of France. A poet noted for his disreputable life and licentious verses. (1392-1557.)

"[Shakespeare] tried his hand with Arctine on a licentious subject."—Stevens.

Arctian Syllables. Ut, ve, mi, fa, sol, la, used by Guido d’Arezzo in the eleventh century for his system of hexachords. Hexachord means a scale of six notes. They are the first syllables of some words in the opening stanza of a hymn for St. John’s Day, "Ut queant laxis re-sonare fibris," etc. St, the seventh note, was not introduced till the seventeenth century. Originally these syllables consisted of six notes only. (See Do.)

"Aprayant on ne se servait que de six notes; et on emploieait le st par moyen de combinaisons appelées mances.—Bouhon: Dictionnaire des Sciences, p. 125, col. 2.)

Argan, a miserly hypochondriac. He reduced himself to this dilemma: if his apothecary would not charge less, he could not afford to be sick; but if he swallowed fewer drugs, he would suffer in health. (Molière’s Le Malade Imaginaire.)

Argand’s Lamp. A lamp with a circular wick, through which a current of air flows, to supply oxygen to the flame, and increase its brilliance. Invented by Aimé Argand, 1780.

Argante (3 syl.). A giantess of unbridled licentiousness, in Spenser’s Faerie Queene, iii. 7.

"That giantessse Argante in behold,
A daughter of the Thuan . . . . ."—Book iii. 7, st. 47.

Argantos (3 syl.). A Circassian of high rank and matchless courage, but fierce to brutality, and an ultra-defender of the sect of the Nazaréans. He was sent as an ambassador from Egypt to King Al'adine. He and Solymar were by far the most doughty of the Pagan knights. The former was slain by Rinaldo, and the other by Taucred. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

"Bonaspale stood before the deputes like the Argantes of Italy’s heroic poet, and gave them
Argensia. A political allegory by John Barclay, containing allusions to the state of Europe, and more especially to France, during the time of the league. (1582-1621.) (See Utopia.)

Argentile and Curan. Argentile was the daughter of King Adelbright, who, on his deathbed, committed her in charge to King Edel. Edel kept her a close prisoner, under hope of getting into his possession her lands and dominion. Curan, the son of a Dansk king, in order to woo her, became a kitchen drudge in Edel’s household, and Edel resolved to marry Argentile to this drudge, but she fled away. Curan now turned shepherd, and fell in love with a neathard’s maid, who turned out to be Argentile. The two were married, and Curan claiming his wife’s dominions, became King of Northumberland, and put Edel to death. (Percy’s Reliques.)

Argentine Republic. The Republic of the Argentine, or Silver River; in other words, the Confederation of the Rio de la Plata.

Argo (in Orlando Furioso). Baron of Servia, and husband of Gabrina. He is a sort of Potiphar. His wife tried to seduce Philander, a young Dutch knight, and failing in her effort, she accused him to her husband of adultery; whereupon Argo threw the “faithless guest” into durance. In the course of time Gabrina implored the young captive to defend her against a wicked knight who had assailed her virtue. He consented to be her champion, and was placed in concealment. Presently a knight drew near, and Philander, rushing on him, dispatched him; but the supposed “adulterer” was, in reality, Argo himself; and Gabrina, being now a widow, was free to marry her Dutch “Joseph.”

Argyllian (in Jerusalem Delivered). A haughty, turbulent knight, born on the banks of the Trent. Accusing Godfrey and his brother of having murdered Rinaldo, he induced the Latins to revolt. The revolt spread to the Swiss and English, but Godfrey succeeded in restoring order. Argyllian was arrested, but made his escape, and was slain in battle by Solyman. (Books viii. ix.)

Argo. A ship sailing on an adventure. The galley of Jason that went in search of the Golden Fleece was so called, from the Greek argos (swift).

Argonauts. The sailors of the ship Argo. Apollonios of Rhodes wrote an epic poem on the subject. (Greek, argonauts.)

Argosy. A merchant ship. A corruption of “ragusa.” Ships of the largest size were built at Ragusa in Dalmatia and Venice.

“He hath an argosy bound to Tripolis, another to the Indies...a third to Alexandria, fourth to England.”—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, 1.3.

Argot [Argo]. Slang or flash language (French).

“Sans le (le mot d’argot) faire venir du grec argos, que, comme l’on a prétendu avant nous, nous y verrions logiquement une diminutive du vieux mot argus qui signifiait inquisite, reproche, et aussi rus, astuce, subtilité.”—Lavater: Dictionnaire d’Argot, Françoise-Michel, however, in his Philosophie Comparses, says, “L’ancienne langue Française avait le mot argus, mais dans un sens bien différent, que l’on peut établir par les passages suivants...” He then gives five examples.

Argus-eyed. Jealously watchful. According to Grecian fable, Argus had 100 eyes, and Juno set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous.

Argyle (2 syl.)—of whom Thomson says, in his Autumn (928-30)—

“On thee, Argyle,
Her hope, her stay, her darling, and her host,
The food, importing country, turns her eyes,
Was John, the great duke, who lived
Only two years after he succeeded to the dukedom. Pope (Ep. Sat. ii. 86, 87) says—

“Argyle the state’s whole thunder born to wield,
And shake alike the senate and the field.”

Arians. The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the fourth century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh.

Aridous [A-reu-deu] in Jerusalem Delivered, herald in Jerusalem. The other herald is Findorius.

Ariel. A spirit of the air and guardian of innocence. He was enslaved to the witch Sycorax, who overtasked him; and in punishment for not doing what was beyond his power, shut him up in a pine-rift for twelve years. On the death of Sycorax, Ariel became the slave of Caliban, who tortured him most cruelly. Prospero liberated him from the pine-rift, and the grateful fairy served him for sixteen years, when he was set free. (Shakespeare: Tempest.)

Ariel. The sylph that watched over Belinda. (Pope: Rape of the Lock, i.)
Aries. One of the angels cast out of heaven. The word means lion of God. (Milton: Paradise Lost, book vi. 371.)

Aries. The Ram. The sign of the Zodiac in which the sun is from March 21st to April 20th.

"At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun." Thomson: Spring, 28.

Arimanes, pl. Arimaneses (4 syl.). "The prince of earth and air," and the fountain-head of evil. It is a personage in Persian mythology, introduced into Grecian fable under the name of Arimanis. Byron introduces him in his drama called Manfred.

Arimaspian. A one-eyed people of Scythia, who adorned their hair with gold. They were constantly at war with the griffins who guarded the gold mines.

As when a griffon, through the wilderness... Pursues the Arimaspian, who by stealth had from his wakeful custody purloined The guarded gold." Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 93-6.

Arioch. One of the fallen angels cast out of heaven. The word means a fierce lion. (Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 371.)

Arion. A Greek musician, cast into the sea by mariners, but carried to Tenea on the back of a dolphin.

Arion. The wonderful horse which Hercules gave to Adrastos. It sprang from Cerés and Neptune, had the power of speech, and its feet on the right side were the feet of a man. (See Horse.)

Aristotle was privately married to Alessandra Bennucci, widow of Tito Strozzi; she is generally called his mistress.

Aristotle of the North. So Lord Byron calls Sir Walter Scott. (Childe Harold, iv. 40.)

Aristeas. The wandering Jew of Grecian fable. (See Jew.)

"Then Aristides lifts his honest front, Spouter of heart; to whom the unblushing Voice Of Freedom gave the noblest name of Just." Thomson: Winter's Tale, I. 229.

The British Aristides. Andrew Marvell (1620-1678).

The French Aristides. Mons. Grévy, born 1813, president of the Third Republic 1879-1887, died 1891. He was a barrister by profession.

Aristippus. (See Hedonism.)

Aristocracy. The cold shade of the aristocracy—i.e. the unsympathizing

Armenians

Armenians. A religious sect so called from Armenia, where Christianity was introduced in the second century. They attribute only one nature to Christ and hold that the Spirit proceeds from the Father only. They enjoin the adoration of saints, have some peculiar ways of administering baptism and the Lord's Supper, but do not maintain the doctrine of purgatory.
Armida. One of the prominent female characters in Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered. She was a beautiful sorceress, with whom Rinaldo fell in love, and wasted his time in voluptuous pleasure. Two messengers were sent from the Christian army with a talisman to disenchant him. After his escape, Armida followed him in distraction, but not being able to allure him back, set fire to her palace, rushed into the midst of a combat, and was slain.

In 1806, Frederick William of Prussia declared war against Napoleon, and his young queen rode about in military costume to arouse the enthusiasm of the people. When Napoleon was told of it, he wittily said of her: “She is Armida, in her distraction setting fire to her own palace.”

Arminians (Anti-Calvinists), so called from James Harsenmuus, of Holland, whose name, Latinised, is Jacobus Arminius. He asserted that God bestows forgiveness and eternal life on all who repent and believe; that He wills all men to be saved; and that His predestination is founded on His foreknowledge.

Armory. Heraldry is so called, because it first found its special use in direct connection with military equipments, knightly exercises, and the mêlée of actual battle.

“The great man’s badge of war or armor.”
MORRIS: Earthly Paradise, ii 167.

Armoury. The place where armour is kept.

“But the sword of Michael from the armory of God Was given him.”
Milton: Paradise Lost, vi. 220. See also ii. 130.

Arms. In the Bayeux tapestry, the Saxon fight on foot with javelin and battle-axe, and bear shields with the British characteristic of a boss in the centre. The men were moustached.

The Normans are on horseback, with long shields and pommoned lances. The men are not only shaven, but most of them have a complete tumson on the back of the head, whence the spics said to Harold, “There are more priests in the Norman army than men in Harold’s.”

Arms of England (The Royal). The three lions jeopardised were the cognisance of William the Conqueror; the lion rampant, in the second quarter is from the arms of Scotland; and the harp in the fourth quarter represents Ireland. The lion supporter is in honour of England, and the unicorn in honour of Scotland. These two supporters were introduced by James I.

William I. had only two lions passant gardant; the third was introduced by Henry II. The lion rampant first appeared on Scotch seals in the reign of Alexander II. (1214-1249). The harp was assigned to Ireland in the time of Haury VII.; before that time the arm of Ireland were three crowns. The unicorn was not a supporter of the royal arms of Scotland before the reign of Mary Stuart.

Which arm of the service. Military or naval?

The secular arm, Civil, in contradistinction to ecclesiastical jurisdiction.

“The relapsed arm delivered to the secular arm.”—Priestley: Corrections of Christianity.

To arm a magnet. To put an armature on a loadstone.

A coat of arms. An heraldic device.

A passage of arms. A literary controversy; a battle of words.

An assault at arms (or of arms). An attack by fencers; a hand-to-hand military exercise.

At arm’s length. At a distance. To keep one at arm’s length is to reject familiarity.

In arms. A child in arms is an infant carried about in one’s arms.

A city in arms is one in which the people are armed for war.

King of arms. A chief herald in the College of Heralds. Here arms means heraldic devices.

Small arms. Those which do not, like artillery, require carriages.

To appeal to arms. To determine to decide a litigation by war.

To arms! Make ready for battle.

“To arms!” cried Mortimer,
And caught his quivering lance.

Come to my arms. Come, and let me embrace you.

To lay down their arms. To cease from armed hostility; to surrender.

Under arms. Prepared for battle; in battle array.

Up in arms. In open rebellion; roused to anger, as the clergy were up in arms against Colenso for publishing his Lectures on the Pentateuch. The latter is a figure of speech.

With open arms. Cordially; as persons receive a dear friend when they open their arms for an embrace.

Arms [brave men]. Albanian mountaineers.

“Stained with the best of Arms’s blood.”
Byron: The Giaour.

Arn-monat. Anglo-Saxon, arn-month, barn month. The Anglo-Saxon name for August, because it was the month for garnering the corn.

Arnold, of Melchtal, patriarch of the forest cantons of Switzerland. He was in love with Matilda, a sister of Gessler, the Austrian governor of the district. When the tyranny of Gessler drove the people into rebellion, Arnold gave up Matilda and joined the insurgents; but when Gessler was shot by William Tell, he became united to her in marriage. (Rossini’s opera of Guglielmo Tell.)

Arnoldists. The partisans of Arnold of Brescia, who raised his voice against the abuses and vices of the papacy in the twelfth century. He was burnt alive by Pope Adrian IV.

Arod, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is designed for Sir William Waller.

But in the sacred annals of our plot
Industrious Arod never be forgot.
The labours of this midnight magistrate
May vie with Cymh. Titus Oates to preserve
The state.”

Aroint thee. Get ye gone, be off. In Cheshire they say, rynt ye, witch; and milk-maids say to their cows when they have done milking them, rynt ye, (or ‘roint) my beauties; but it is doubtful whether this is connected with the word in question.

Aronthous (4 syl.), in Jerusalem Delivered. An Asiatic king, who joined the Egyptian armament against the Crusaders, “not by virtue fired, but vain of his titles and ambitious of fame.”

Ar'soundight. The sword of Sir Laurencelot of the Lake. (See Swoold.)

"It is the sword of a good knight,
Though homespun was his mail,
What matter if it be not louth,
Joyere, Coda's, Durrnho,
Excelsior, or Aoundight?’

Longfellow.

Arras, tapestry. So called from Arras, in Artois, famed for its manufacture. When rooms were hung with tapestry it was a common thing for persons to hide behind it, especially the arras curtain before the door. Hubert concealed the two villains who were to put out Arthur’s eyes behind the arras. Polonius was slain by Hamlet while concealed behind the arras. Falstaff proposed to hide behind the arras at Windsor, etc.

Arrisa, a Roman lady, the wife of Casina Petus. Petus being accused of conspiring against the Emperor Claudius was condemned to death and sent by sea to Rome. Arria accompanied him, and stabbed herself in the boat, then presenting the dagger to her husband, she said: “Petus, it gives no pain” (non dolet). (Pliny, vii.)

Her daughter Arria, wife of Thraseas, when her husband was condemned to death by Nero, opened her veins; but Thraseas entreated her to live, for the sake of her children.

Arrière Pensée (plural arrière pensées), a hidd’n or reserved motive, not apparent on the surface.

Arrot. the weasel, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Arrow. The broad arrow, thus . A mark used by the British Board of Ordnance, and placed on their stores. (See Broad Arrow.)

Arrowroot is araruta, the Indian word aru is the name of the plant. There is no evidence of its being used to absorb the poison of poisoned arrows in fleshly wounds.

Arseis (in Jerusalem Delivered). The aged eunuch who brought up Clorinda, and attended her steps.

Artaxerxes, called by the Persians Kais-Ardeshir, and surnamed diruz-dent (long-handed), because his right hand was longer than his left. The Romans translated diruz-dent into longi-mannus; the Greek Artis into Arde (“noble”).

Artégal (Nir) (in Speusier’s Faérie Querne), is the hero of the fifth book, and impersonates Justice, the foster child of Astraea. In the previous books he occasionally appears, and is called Sir Arthegal. It is said that Arthur, Lord Grey of Wilton, was the prototype of this character. He was sent to Ireland as Lord Lieutenant in 1580, and the poet was his secretary. In book iv., canto 6, Sir Artégal is married to Britomart, and proceeds to succour Ire’na (Ireland), whose heritage had been withheld by the tyrant Grantorto. (See Artégal.)

Artemus Ward. A showman, very cute, and very American. The hypothetical writer of the essays or papers so called, the real author being Charles F. Browne.

Being asked if his name was Artémus or Artemus, he wrote on his address card:—

"Don’t bother me with your eee’s and short e’s.
Nor ask me more than you have on my card.
Oh! spare me from etymological sorties.
And simply accept me as Artemus Ward."
Artesian Wells

Which, however, leaves the pronunciation of “Ward” doubtful.

Artesian Wells. So called from Artesium (the Latin for Artòis), in France, where they were first bored.

Artful Dodger. A young thief, a most perfect adept in villainy, up to every sort of wicked dodge. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Arthegal. Uterine brother of Prince Arthur. Spenser, in his Faerie Queene (book iii.), makes Britomart see his person and name in the magic glass. She falls in love with the looking-glass hero, and is told by Merlin that she will marry him, and become the mother of a line of kings that would supersede both the Saxons and Normans. He referred, of course, to the Tudors, who were descendants of Cadwallader. (See Artegal.)

Arthur, King of the Silures, a tribe of ancient Britons, was mortally wounded in the battle of Camlan, in Cornwall, raised by the revolt of his nephew, Modred. He was taken to Glastonbury, where he died.

His wife was Guenever, who committed adultery with Sir Launcelot of the Lake, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

He was the natural son of Uther and Igraine (wife of Gorlois, duke of Cornwall), and was brought up by Sir Ector. He was born at Tintadgol or Tintagel, a castle in Cornwall.

His habitual residence was Caerleon, in Wales; and he was buried at Avalon.

His sword was called Excalibur or Excelsior; his spear, Rome (1 syl.), and his shield, Tristram. His dog was named Cavall. (See Round Table Knights.)

Arthurian Romances. These may be divided into six parts:

(2) The Merlin, which celebrates the birth and exploits of King Arthur. By Walter Mapes.

(3) The Launcelot. Perhaps by Ulrich.

(4) The search or Quest of the San Grael. It is found by Sir Galahad, a knight of pure heart and great courage; but no sooner does he find it than he is taken up to heaven. By (?) Walter Mapes.

(6) Sundry Tales, but especially the adventures of Sir Tristan. By Luke Gast, of Salisbury.

Arthur’s Seat, a hill near Edinburgh, is A’rd Seir (hill of arrows), where people shot at a mark.

Articles of Roup (Scotch). Conditions of sale at an auction announced by a crier. (Roup is the Teutonic re-open, to cry out.)

Artists. The Prince of, Albert Dürer; so called by his countrymen. (1471-1528.)

Artotyrites (4 syl.). Certain heretics from among the Montanists; so called because they used bread and cheese in the Eucharist. They admitted women to the priesthood. (Greek, artos, barley-bread, and turoe, cheese.)

Arts. Degrees in Arts. In the mediaeval ages the full course consisted of the three subjects which constituted the Trivium, and the four subjects which constituted the Quadrivium—:

The Trivium was grammar, logic, and rhetoric.

The Quadrivium was music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy.

The Master of Arts was the person qualified to teach or be the master of students in arts; as the Doctor was the person qualified to teach theology, law, or medicine.

Arundel. The heraldic device of the family is six swallows (hirondelles), a pun upon the name.

Arundel. (See Horse.)

Arundelian Marbles. A collection of ancient sculptures collected at great expense by Thomas Howard, Earl of Arundel, and presented to the University of Oxford in 1667 by his grandson, Henry Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk. They contain tables of ancient chronology, especially that of Athens, from B.C. 1582 to 264, engraved in old Greek capitals. Date of the tables, B.C. 263.

Arvakur. (See Horse.)

Aryans. The parent stock of what is called the Indo-European family of nations. They lived probably in Bactria, i.e., between the river Oxus and the Hindu-koosh mountains. The Aryan family of languages include the Persian and Hindu, with all the European except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, and Finnic. Sometimes called the Indo-European, sometimes the Indo-Germanic, and sometimes the Japetic.

Sanskrit, Zend, Latin, Greek, and Celtic are, of course, included.
Arzina. A river that flows into the North Sea, near Wardhus, where Sir Willoughby's three ships were frozen, and the whole crew perished of starvation.

"In these fell regions, in Arzina caught, And to the story deep his idle ship, Immediate seal'd, he with his hapless crew... Froze into statues." — Thomson: Winter, 984.

As you were, in military drilling, means, return to the position in which you were before the last exercise. As you were before.

Asa was a term of address to all the gods of Gladshoeim; as Asa Odin, Asa Thor, Asa Loki, Asa Tyr, etc.

"That's all very well, Asa Odin," answered Frey; "but who, let me ask, is to undertake the feeding of the human animal?" — Kneyer: Heroes of Asgard, p. 73.

Asa Loki. Descended from the giants and received among the celestials. He is represented as a treacherous malignant power, fond of assuming disguises, and plotting evil. One of his progeny is Helo (g.v.). (Scandinavian mythology.) (See ESIR.)

Asa Thor. Eldest son of Asa Odin, and the first-born of mortals. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Asaph. A famous musician in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2). Mr. Tate, who wrote the second part of Abalom and Achitophel, lauds Dryden under this name.

"While Judith's throne and Sion's rock stand fast, The song of Asaph and the same shall last." — Abalom and Achitophel, part II. 1085-1.

Asbolos. One of Actaeon's dogs. The word means stout-coloured. (See AMARANTH.)

Ascalaphus. Turned by Proserpine, for mischief-making, into an owl. (Greek fable.)

Ascapart. A giant conquered by Sir Bevis of Southampton. He was thirty feet high, and the space between his eyes was twelve inches. This mighty giant, whose effigy figures on the city gates of Southampton, could carry under his arm without feeling distressed Sir Bevis with his wife and horse. (See GIANTS.)

"As Bevis of Southampton fell upon Ascapart." — Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI, act ii. 3.

Ascendant. In casting a horoscope the easternmost star, representing the house of life, is called the ascendant, because it is in the act of ascending. This is a man's strongest star, and so long as it is above the horizon his fortune is said to be in the ascendant. When a man's circumstances begin to improve, and things look brighter, we say his star is in the ascendant. (See HOUSES, STARS.)

House of the Ascendant includes five degrees of the zodiac above the point just rising, and twenty-five below it. Usually, the point of birth is referred to.

The lord of the Ascendant is any planet within the "house of the Ascendant." The house and lord of the Ascendant at birth were said by astrologers to exercise great influence on the future life of the child. Perhaps Deborah referred to the influence of the stars when she said "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera." (Judges v. 20.)

Ascension Day or Holy Thursday. The day set apart by the Catholic and Anglican Church to commemorate the ascenst of our Lord from earth to heaven.

Formerly it was customary to beat the bounds of each respective parish on this day, and many practical jokes were played even during the first quarter of the nineteenth century, to make the boys remember the olden time. The custom was as such; "hounding them," pouring water clandestinely on them from house windows, beating them with thin rods, etc. Beating the bounds was called in Scotland riding the marches (boundes).

Asolepides or Asolepide Metry. A Greek and Latin verse, so called from Asolepides, the inventor. Each line is divided into two parts, thus: —

--- || --- || ---

The first ode of Horace is Asolepide. The first and last two lines run thus, and in the same metre:—

Dear friend, patron of my song, sprung from the race of kings; Thy name ever a grace and a protection brings.

My name, if to the lyre haply you chance to wed, Pride would thine as the stars lift my exalted head. E. C. B.

Ascodrogites (4 syl.). Certain heretics who said "they were vessels full of new wine" (Greek, anakos). By new wine they meant the Gospel. (Matt. ix. 17.)

Ascot Races. A very fashionable "meet," run on Ascot Heath, Berkshire (6 miles from Windsor). The best horses of all England compete, and at a somewhat more advanced age than at the "great classic races" (g.v.).

Aseran Poet or Sage. Hesiod, the Greek didactic poet, born at Asera, in Boeotia. Virgil calls him "the Old Aseran." (Eclogues, vii. 70.)

Asgard. The fortress of the Aisir or the Northern gods, the Olympos of Scandinavian mythology. It is said to be situated in the centre of the universe, and accessible only by the rainbow-bridge (Bifrost). The word As means a “god,” and yard an “enclosure,” our “yard.” Odin was priest of Asgard before he migrated to the Lake Logur or Mokar Sea.

Ash Tree, or “Tree of the Universe.”
(See Yggdrasil.)

Ash Wednesday. The first Wednesday in Lent, so called from an ancient Roman Catholic custom of sprinkling ashes on the heads of those condemned to do penance on this day.

The ashes were those of the palms burnt on Palm Sunday. The penitents were sprinkled with ashes, the less offending were signed on the forehead with the sign of the cross, the officiating minister saying, “Rerneras, homo, quam parvis et in pulverum reverteres.” The custom, it is said, was introduced by Gregory the Great.

Ashmolean Museum. Presented to the University of Oxford in 1682 by Elias Ashmole. Sometimes called the Tradesman’s Museum. Sometimes it belonged to the Tradesman family.

— Heavens’ queen and mother both.”
Milton: The Phoenix.

Ashur. The highest god of the Assyrians. It had the head of an eagle and four wings, but the body of a man.

“Out of that land went forth Ashur, and settled Nineveh.”—Gen. x. 11.

Astitus. Astitus, astitum frvent (Latin, “one ass rubs another”), that is, we fraternise with persons like ourselves; or, in other words, “Birds of a feather flock together.” The allusion needs no explanation.

A'sir. [See Aesir.]

Ask. The vulgar Ask is the more correct (Saxon, axian, to ask). In assenting to Bills, the King used to reply, “Be it as it is axed.” Chaucer says in the Doctor of Medicine’s Tale, “For my worke nothing will I axe.” Launfal, 1027, has, “Ho that wyle there asy justus.” Other quotations could easily be added.

Ask and Embla. The Adam and Eve made by Odin, one from ash-wood and the other from elm.
(See Horse.)

Asmodeus [the destroyer]. The demon of vanity and dress, called in the Talmud “the king of devils.”

The Asmodeus of domestic peace (in the Book of Tobit). Asmodeus falls in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and causes the death of seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. After her marriage to Tobit, he was driven into Egypt by a charm, made by Tobias of the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes, and being pursued was taken prisoner and bound.

“Better pleased
Than Asmodeus with the fishy fare
That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse
Of Tobit’s son, and with a vengeance sent
From media prof to Egypt, there fast bound.”

Asmodeus. The companion of Don Cleofas in The Devil on Two Sticks.
(Chap. III.)

Asmodeus’ flight. Don Cleofas, catching hold of his companion’s cloak, is perched on the steeple of St. Salvador. Here the holy fiddler stretches out his hand, and the roofs of all the houses open in a moment, to show the Don what is going on privately in each respective dwelling.

“void the reader take an Asmodeus-flight, and, waiting open all roofs and privacies, look down from the roof of Notre Dame, what a Paris were it!”—D’Arblay: French Revolution II, 11 chap. VI.

As’oka of Mugadha. In the third century the “nursing father” of Buddhism, as Constantine was of Christianity. He is called “the king beloved of the gods.”

As’ors. Evil genii of the Indians.

Aspa’sia, a courtezen. She was the most celebrated of the Greek Hetaroe, to whom Pericles attached himself. On the death of Pericles she lived with Lycurgus, a cattle-dealer.

Asp’a’tia, in the Maid’s Tragedy, of Beaumont and Fletcher, is noted for her deep sorrows, her great resignation, and the pathos of her speeches. Amyntor deserts her, women point at her with scorn, she is the jest and by-word of every one, but she bears it all with patience.

Aspen. The aspen leaf is said to tremble, from shame and horror, because our Lord’s cross was made of this wood. The fact is this: the leaf is broad, and placed on a long leaf-stalk so flexible as scarcely to be able to support it in an upright position. The upper part of the stalk, on which the play mainly depends, is flattened; and, being at right angles with the leaf, is peculiarly liable to be acted on by the least breath of air.

Aspen leaf. Metaphorically, a chattering tongue, never quiet.

"Those aspen leaves of theirs never leave wagging."—Sir T. More.

Aspersions properly means "sprinklings" or "scatterings." Its present meaning is base insinuations or slanders.

"No sweet aspersion [rain] shall the heavens let fall.
To make this contract grow."

Shakespeare: The Tempest, iv. 1.

Casting aspersions on one, i.e. sprinkling with calumnies, slandering or insinuating misconduct.

"I defy all the world to cast a just asperion on my character."—Fielding: Tom Jones.

Aspinaltic Lake. The Dead Sea, where asphalt abounds both on the surface of the water and on the banks. Asphalt is a bitumen. (From the Greek asphaltes.)

Asrael. (See Azrael.)

Ass. (See Golden Ass.)

Ass. The ass on which Mahomet went to heaven to learn the will of God was called Al Borak (the lightning).

Ass. There is a dark stripu running down the back of an ass, crossed by another at the shoulders. The tradition is that this cross was communicated to the creature when our Lord rode on the back of an ass in His triumphant entry into Jerusalem. (See Christian Traditions.)

Ass, dref to music. This tradition arose from the hideous noise made by "Sir Balam" in braying. Because Midas had no power to appreciate music, Apollo gave him the ears of an ass. (See Ass-Kared.)

"Avarice is as dref to the voice of virtue, as the ass to the voice of Apollo."—Orlando Furioso, x. 11.

An ass in a lion's skin. A coward who hectors, a fool that asps the wise man. The allusion is to the fable of an ass that put on a lion's hide, but was betrayed when he began to bray.

An ass with two panniers. A man walking the streets with a lady on each arm. This occupies the whole pavement, and is therefore bad manners well meriting the reproach. In Italy they call such a simpleton a pitchir with two handles, his two arms akimbo forming the two handles. In London we call it walking bodkin, because the man is sheathed like a bodkin and powerless. Our expression is probably a corruption of the French Faire le panier à deux anses ("put your arms akimbo," or "make yourself a basket with two handles").

The ass waggheth his ears. This proverb is applied to those who lack learning, and yet talk as if they were very wise; men wise in their own conceit. The ass, proverbial for having no "taste for music," will nevertheless wag its ears at a "concord of sweet sounds," just as if it could well appreciate it.

Till the ass ascends the ladder—i.e. never. A rabbinical expression. The Romans had a similar one, Cum asinus in tegulis ascenderit (when the ass climbs to the tiles). And Buxtorf has Si ascenderit asinus per scutas.

Sell your ass. Get rid of your foolish ways.

That which thou knowest not procure thane ass can tell thee. An allusion to Balaam's ass.

To make an ass of oneself. To do something very foolish. To expose oneself to ridicule.

To mount the ass (French). To become bankrupt. The allusion is to a custom very common in the sixteenth century of mounting a bankrupt on an ass, with his face to its tail. Thus mounted, the defaulter was made to ride through the principal thoroughfares of the town.

Asses have ears as well as pitchirs. Children, and even the densest minds, hear and understand many a word and hint which the speaker supposed would pass unheeded.

Asses that carry the mysteries (as inus portae mysteria). A classical knuck at the Roman clergy. The allusion is to the custom of employing asses to carry the cista which contained the sacred symbols, when processions were made through the streets. (Warburton: Divine Legation, ii. 4.)

Well, well! honey is not for the ass's mouth. Persuasion will not persuade fools. The gentlest words will not divert the anger of the unreasonable.

Wriggle for an ass's shadow. To contend about trifles. The tale told by Demosthenes is, that a man hired an ass to take him to Megara; and at noon, the sun being very hot, the traveller dismounted, and sat himself down in the shadow of the ass. Just then the owner came up and claimed the right of sitting in this shady spot, saying that he let out the ass for hire, but there was no bargain made about the ass's shade. The two men then fell to blows to settle the point in dispute. A passer-by told the travelers to move on, and leave the owner of the beast to walk in the ass's shadow as long as he thought proper.

Ass's Bridge (The). Prop. 5, book i. of Euclid. This is the first difficult proposition in geometry, and stupid boys rarely get over it the first time without tripping.

It is the ass's pitfall, not his bridge.

If this be rightly called the "Bridge of Asses," He's not the fool who sticks, but he that passes. E. C. B.

Asses (Feast of). (See FOOLS.)

Ass-eared. Midas had the ears of an ass. The tale says Apollo and Pan had a contest, and chose Midas to decide which was the better musician. Midas gave sentence in favour of Pan; and Apollo, in disgust, changed his ears into those of an ass.

Assas'sins. A band of Carmathians, collected by Hassan, subah of Nishapur, called the Old Man of the Mountains, because he made Mount Lebanon his stronghold. This band was the terror of the world for two centuries, when it was put down by Sultan Bibar. The assassins indulged in hashish (bang), an intoxicating drink, and from this liquor received their name. (A.D. 1090.)

"The Assassins . . . before they attacked the enemy, would intoxicate themselves with a powder made of hemp-leaves . . . called hashish."—J. Wolf.

Assay' or Essay'. To take the assay is to taste wine to prove it is not poisoned. Hence, to try, to taste; a savour, trial, or sample. Holinshed says, "Wolsey made dukes and earls serve him of wine with a say taken" (p. 847).

Edmund, in King Lear (v. 5), says to Edgar, "Thy tongue, some say of breeding breathes;" i.e. thy speech gives indication of good breeding—it savours of it. Hence the expression, I make my first assay (trial).

"[He] makes now before his uncle no more To give the assay of arms against your majesty."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, ii. 2.

A cup of assay. A cup for the assay of wine.

To put it in assay. To put it to the test.

Assaye Regiment. The 74th Foot, so called because they first distinguished themselves in the battle of Assaye, where 2,000 British and 2,000 Sepoy troops under Wellington defeated 50,000 Maharrattas, commanded by French officers, in 1803. This regiment is now called "the 2nd Battalion of the Highland Light Infantry." The first battalion was the old No. 71.

Assen'to Treaties. [Spanish, agreement treaties.] Contracts entered into by Spain with Portugal, France, and England, to supply her South American colonies with negro slaves. England joined in 1713, after the peace of Utrecht.

Assine'go. A young ass, a simpleton (a Portuguese word).

"Thou hast no more brain than I have in mine elbows; and an ass may turn it twice."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

Assumption (Feast of). The 15th of August, so called in honour of the Virgin Mary, who (according to the Roman and Greek Churches) was taken to heaven that day (A.D. 45), in her corporeal form, being at the time seventy-five years of age.

This seems very improbable, if Christ was crucified A.D. 33. It would make Mary survive her son twelve years, and to have been thirty years old at his birth instead of about fifteen.

Assurance. Audacity, brazen self-confidence. "His assurance is quite unbearable."

To make assurance double sure. To make security doubly secure.

"But yet I'll make assurance double sure, And take a bond of fate."

Shakespeare: Macbeth, i. 4.

Astag'oras (in Jerusalem Delivered). A female fiend, who had the power of raising storms, and whose partners were the three Furies: Tisip'honé, Meg'ará, and Alé'cto.

Astar'te (3 syl.). Goddess of the Moon, in Phoenician mythology.

"With these in troop Came Astaroth, whom the Phenicians called Astarte, queen of heaven, with crescent horns."—Miller: Paradise Lost, i. 457-8.

Astar'te (3 syl.). The lady beloved by Manfred. In order to see and speak to her, the magician entered the hall of Arima'nes, and the spirits called up the phantom of the young lady, which told the count that "to-morrow would end his earthly ills." When Manfred asked her if she loved him, she sighed "Manfred," and vanished. (Byron: Manfred.)

"Astarte, my beloved, speak to me."

Manfred, ii. 4.
Astolat. By some identified with Guilford, in Surrey.

Astolpho (in Orlando's Furioso). An English duke (son of Otho), who joined Charlemagne against the Saracens. He was carried on the back of a whale to Algina's isle; but when Alduna tird of him, she turned him into a myrtle. He was disenchanted by Melissa. Astolpho descended into the inferior regions, and his flight to the moon (book xviii.) is one of the best parts of the whole poem. (See Inferno.)

It came upon them like a blast from Astolpho's horn — i.e. it produced a panic. Logistica gave Astolpho a magic horn, and whatever man or beast heard its blast was seized with panic, and became an easy captive. (Orlando Furioso, book vii.)

Like Astolpho's book, it told you everything. The same fairy gave Astolpho a book, which would not only direct him aright in his journeys, but would tell him anything he desired to know. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso, book viii.)

Astoreth. (See Ashtaroth.)

Astrea. Equity, innocence. During the Golden Age this goddess dwelt on earth, but when sin began to prevail, she reluctantly left it, and was metamorphosed into the constellation Virgo.

"When hard-hearted interest first began to poison earth, Astrea left the plain." — Thomson: Castle of Indolence, can. 1.

Astral Body (The). The nomenclature of a phenomenal body. This "spirit body" survives after the death of the material body, and is the "ghost" or "double." Macbeth's dagger was an astral body; so, in theosophy, is the "kama-rupa," or mind body; and in transubstantiation the verbal "blood and flesh" of Christ is the astral body of the accidents "bread and wine."

Man is supposed to consist of body, soul, and spirit. The last is the astral body of man.

Astral Spirits. The spirits of the stars. According to the mythology of the Persians, Greeks, Jews, etc., each star has its special spirit. PTOLEMAEUS maintained that every man had his attendant star, which received him at death, and took charge of him till the great resurrection.

Astrea. A poetical name of Mrs. Aphra Behn, born of good family in the reign of Charles I. Her works are very numerous and very indecent, including seventeen dramatic pieces. She died 1689, and was buried in Westminster Abbey.

Astronomy. (See DIAPOZON, MICRO-COSM.)

Astronomer of Dublin (The). The head of the chief rebel of Dublin, set on a tall white-painted stake on the highest point of Dublin Castle, where it remains till it falls to decay or is replaced by the head of a greater rebel. The Irish say: "God send to Dublin many more astronomers."

"His head is poised high Upon the castle hear. Devising stars as though he were A great astronomer." — Derrick.

Astronomers Royal: (1) Flamsteed, 1675; (2) Halley, 1719; (3) Bradley, 1742; (4) Bliss, 1792; (5) Maskelyne, who originated the Nautical Almanack, 1753; (6) Pond, 1811; (7) Airy, 1835; (8) Christie, 1881.

Asthropel. Sir Philip Sidney. "Phil. Sid." being a contraction of Philos Sidus, and the Latin sidus being changed to the Greek astron, we get astron-philos (star-lover). The "star" that he loved was Penelope Devereux, whom he called Stella (star), and to whom he was betrothed. Edmund Spenser wrote a pastoral called Astrophei, to the memory of his friend and patron, who fell at the battle of Zutphen. (1564-1586.)

Asylum means, literally, a place where refuge is forbidden (Greek, "a Canton, right of pillage"). The ancients set apart certain places of refuge, where the vilest criminals were protected, both from private and public assaults.

Asynth. The goddesses of Asgard. The gods were called the Æsir, the singular of which is Æsa.

At. Straining at a quat (Matt. xxiii. 24). Greek, di-antize, to strain off. Here "at" is an error, probably in the first instance typographical, for "out." "Out" is given in the Bible of 1603, and has been restored by the Revisers.

Ate (2 syl.). Goddess of vengeance and mischief. This goddess was driven out of heaven, and took refuge among the sons of men.

"With Ate by his side come hot from hell, ... Cry 'Har o,' and let sin the dogs of war." — Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.
Atellanes or Atellan Fables. Includes in the Roman theatres, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macchus and Bucco are the foundations of our Punch and Clown. (See Punch.)

Atergates. A deity with the upper part like a woman and the lower part like a fish. She had a temple at Ascalon. (See Dagon.)

Athanasian Creed, so called because it embodies the opinions of Athanasius respecting the Trinity. It was compiled in the fifth century by Hilary, Bishop of Arles.

7 In the Episcopal Prayer Book of America this creed is omitted.

Athelstan (3 syl.), surnamed "The Unready" (i.e. impolitic, unwise), thane of Coningsburgh. (Sir Walter Scott: Ivanhoe.)

Athensium (the review so called) was founded by James Silk Buckingham in 1829. It was named after the institution founded by Hadrian, where works of art and learning were dedicated to Athene.

Atheneian Bee. Plato, a native of Athens, was so called because his words flowed with the sweetness of honey.

Athens. The Modern Athens, i.e. Edinburgh. Willis says that its singular resemblance to Athens, approached from the Piraeus, is very striking.

"An imitation Acropolis is commenced on the Calton Hill, and has the effect of the Parthenon. Hyndmarch is rather more lofty than the Pentland Hills, and Pentlandic is farther off and grander than Arthur's Seat; but the old Castle of Edinburgh is a noble feature, superbly magnificent." - Euphranor.

Athens of Ireland, Belfast. Athens of the New World, Boston, noted for its literary merit and institutions.

Athens of the West. Cordova, in Spain, was so called in the Middle Ages.

Athole Brose. A compound of oatmeal, honey, and whisky.

At Home (At). A notification sent to friends that the lady who sends it will be at home on the day and at the hour specified, and will be glad to see the persons mentioned in the card of invitation. These "At homes" are generally held in an afternoon before dinner. Light refreshments are provided, and generally some popular games are introduced, occasionally music and dancing.

Not at Home. Not disengaged, or prepared for the reception of visitors; not in the house.

Atin. Strife. The squire of Pyrochloes, and stirrer up of contention. (Spenser: Fairie Queene, book ii.)

Atkins. (See Tommy Atkins.)

Atlantaean Shoulders. Shoulders able to bear a great weight, like those of Atlas, which, according to heathen mythology, supported the whole world.

"Sage he spoke:
With Atlantean shoulders fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies."

Atlantida. Figures of men, used in architecture instead of pillars. So called from Atlas, who in Greek mythology supported the world on his shoulders. Female figures are called Caryatides (q.v.). (See Telemones.)

Atlante (3 syl.) (in Orlando Furioso). A sage and a magician who lived in an enchanted palace, and brought up Rigoletto all manly virtues.

Atlantic Ocean. An ocean, so called from the Atlas mountains.

Atlantis. A mythic island which contained the Elysian Fields.

The New Atlantis. An island imagined by Lord Bacon, where was established a philosophical commonwealth bent on the cultivation of the natural sciences. (See Utopia, City of the Sun.)

Atlas. King of Mauritania in Africa, failed to have supported the world upon his shoulders. Of course, the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that the Atlas mountains prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty. We call a book of maps an "Atlas," because it contains or holds the world. The word was first employed in this sense by Mercator, and the title-page of his collection of maps had the figure of Atlas with the world on his back.

"How Atlas, propping heaven, as poets feign,
His subterranean wonders spread!"

Thomson: Atlantis, 495-8.

Atman, in Buddhist philosophy, is the noumenon of one's own self. Not the Ego, but the ego divested of all that is objective; the "spark of heavenly flame."

"The unseen and unperceivable, which was formerly called the soul, was now called the self, Atman. Nothing could be predicated of it except that it was, that it perceived and thought, and that it must be blessed." - Max Muller: Aeschylean Tragedy, 1855, p. 77.

Atomic Philosophy. The hypothesis of Leucippus, Democritus, and Epicurus, that the world is composed of a congeries of atom, or particles of matter so minute as to be incapable of further diminution.

Of course it is quite impossible even to think of a portion of matter which has not an upper and under side, with some breadth and thickness. According to Democritus, the expounder of the Atomic Theory of matter, images composed of the atoms floated from the object to the mind.—McCoY: Psychological Cogitative Powers, p. 53.

Atomic Theory. That all elemental bodies consist of aggregations of atoms, not united fortuitously, but according to fixed proportions. The four laws of Dalton are—constant proportion, reciprocal proportion, multiple proportion, and compound proportion.

*: This has nothing to do with the atomic theory of Leucippus. It merely means that gases and other elements always combine in certain known ratios or units.

* Atomic Volume. The space occupied by a quantity, compared with, or in proportion to, atomic weight.

Atomic Weight. The weight of an atom of an element, compared with an atom of hydrogen, the standard of unity.

Atossa. Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough, so called by Pope, because she was the friend of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, whom he calls Sappho. Herodotus says that Atossa, the mother of Xerxes, was a follower of Sappho.

Atrip. The anchor is atrip when it has just been drawn from the ground in a perpendicular direction. A sail is atrip when it has been hoisted from the cap, and is ready for trimming. The word is from the Norwegian and Danish trip, a short stop.

Attaint. A term in chivalry, meaning to strike the helmet and shield of an antagonist so firmly with the lance, held in a direct line, as either to break the lance or overthrow the person struck. Hence to "attain of treason," etc.

"Attaint was a term of taking, used to express the champion's having attained his mark, or, in other words, struck his lance straight and fair against the helm or breast of his adversary."—Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery (note).

Attercop. An ill-tempered person, who mars all sociability. Strictly speaking, the attercop is the poison-spider. (Anglo-Saxon, attor, poison; cop, spider. Our cob-web should be cop-web, i.e., spider-web.)

Attice Beé (The). Sophocles, the tragic poet, a native of Athens: so called from the great sweetness of his compositions. (b.c. 495-405.)

Attice Bird (The). The nightingale; so called because Philomel was the daughter of the King of Athens.

"Where the Attic bird
Trills her thick-varied notes the summer long,"—Milton: Paradise Regained, iv. 226-6.

Attic Boy (The). Cephalus, beloved by Aurora or Morn; passionately fond of hunting.

"Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not tricked and frowned, as she was wont
With the Attic boy to hunt.
But kerchoated in a comedy cloud."—Milton: Il Penseroso.

Attic Faith. Inviolable faith, the very opposite of "Punic Faith."

Attic Muse (The). Xemophon, the historian, a native of Athens; so called because the style of his composition is a model of elegance. (b.c. 444-359.)

Attic Order, in architecture, a square column of any of the five orders. (See Orders.)

Attic Salt. Elegant and delicate wit. Salt, both in Latin and Greek, was a common term for wit, or sparkling thought well expressed: thus Cicero says, "Scipio annus sale superbabat" (Scipio surpassed all in wit). The Athenians were noted for their wit and elegant turns of thought, and hence Attic salt means wit as pointed and delicately expressed as by the Athenians. "Attic point," wit.

Attic Science. A knowledge of Attic Greek.

Attics, Attic Storey. Attics are the rooms in the attic storey, and the attic storey generally is an extra storey made in the roof. In the Roman and Renaissance styles of architecture the low storey above the cornice or entablature is called the "Attic Storey." Professor Goldsacker derives the word from the Sanskrit attaka (a room on the top of a house). (See The Transactions of the Philological Society, 1834.)

Attic storey. The head; the body being compared to a house, the head is the highest, or attic storey.

"Here a gentleman present, who had in his attick
More pepper than brains, shrieked: 'The man's a famine.'"—Jonson: Fable for Critics (stanza 50).

Ill-furnished in the attic storey. Not clever, dull.
Quer in the attic storey. Fuddled, partially intoxicated.

Atticus. The most elegant and finished scholar of the Romans. His admirable taste and sound judgment were so highly thought of that even Cicero submitted to him several of his treatises, Attingians. Hereticks of the eighth century, who solemnised baptism with the words, “I am the living water.” (Attin, a name of Neptune.)

Attock. The forbidden river, beyond which no pure Hindoo can pass.

Attorney, Solicitor (French, avocat, to attend, or turn over to another). One legally qualified to manage matters in law for others, and to prosecute or defend others, as the case may be. A solicitor is one who solicits or petitions in Courts of Equity on behalf of his clients. At one time solicitors belonged to Courts of Equity, and attorneys to the other courts.

From and after Act 36, 37 Vict. c. 57, “all persons admitted as solicitors, attorneys, or process, . . . empowered to practise in any court, the jurisdiction of which is hereby transferred to the High Court of Justice, or the Court of Appeal, shall be called Solicitors of the Supreme Court” (1873).

Power of Attorney. Legal authority given to another to collect rents, pay wages, invest money, or to act in matters stated in the instrument on your behalf, according to his own judgment. In such cases quius aliquam facit per alienum, facit per se.

Warrant of Attorney. The legal instrument which confers on another the “Power of Attorney.”

Atys. Metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cybele. See the poem by Catullus, translated by Leigh Hunt.

Au Courant (French). “acquainted with” (lit. = in the current of events). To keep one au courant of everything that passes, is to keep one familiar with, or informed of, passing events.

Au Fait (French). Skilful, thorough master of; as, He is quite au fait in those matters, i.e. quite master of them or conversant with them.

Au Grand Sérieux (French). In sober earnest.

Au Pied de la Lettre (French). Literatim et verbatim; according to the strict letter of the text.

Au Revoir (French). “Good bye for the present.” Literally, till seeing you again.

Aubry’s Dog. (See Doo.)

Audeanism. The doctrine of Audaus of Mesopotamia, who lived in the fourth century. He maintained that the Old Testament justifies the belief that God has a sensible form (Gen. i. 26).

Audhumla [the nourishing power], in Scandinavian mythology, is the cow created by Surt to nourish Ymir. She supplied him with four rivers of milk, and was herself nourished by licking the rocks. (See Ymir.)

Bör, the first man, was made by Audhumla licking salt from the snow. Odin was the son of Bör.

The breath of Audhumla was very sweet, but her milk was bitter.

Audley. We will John Audley it, i.e. abridge it. A theatrical phrase. In the eighteenth century one Shuter had a travelling company which visited different fairs. It was his custom to lengthen out his performance till a goodly number of new-comers had collected on the open stage of his theatre, when a boy called out John Audley, and the play which was going on inside was brought to an end as soon as possible. (1759.)

Audrey. A country wench, who jilted William for Touchstone. (Shakespeare: As You Like It.)

Auga’s Stables. The stables of Augas, King of Elis, in Greece. In these stables he had kept 3,000 oxen, and the stalls had not been cleansed for thirty years. When Herculés was appointed to cleanse these stables, he caused two rivers to run through them.

To cleanse the Augeran stables. To clear away an accumulated mass of corruption, moral, religious, physical, or legal. To reform wrongs almost past the power of man to tackle.

Augsburg Confession. The chief standard of faith in the Lutheran church. So called because, while the Diet of the German Empire was sitting at Augsburg, in 1530, the confession of faith drawn up by Melanchthon and Luther was presented to Charles V.
August

Aug'gury means properly the function of an augur (perhaps from arium garrisus). St. Pierre says: "The first navigators, when out of sight of land, watched the flight of birds, as indications of the shore, and with no other guidance discovered many new islands." From this custom (he says) arose the practice of consulting birds before entering on any important enterprise. (Studies.)

August. The sixth month (beginning from March) was once called sextilis, but was changed to Augustus in compliment to Augustus Caesar of Rome, whose "lucky month" it was, in which occurred many of his most fortunate events.

The preceding month (July), originally called Quintilis, had already been changed to Julius in honour of Julius Caesar.

Augusta. London; so called by the Romans.

"Oft let me wander o'er the dewy fields, or ascend Rome's eminence, Augusta, in thy plains, And see the country far diffused around." Thomas: Spring, lxxii, 16-20.

Augustan Age. The best literary period of a nation; so called from Augustus, the Emperor of Rome, the most palmy time of Latin literature. Horace, Ovid, Propertius, Tibullus, Virgil, etc., flourished in this reign.

Augustan Age of English Literature. Beginning in the reign of Elizabeth and ending in that of James I. For list of authors, see Historic Note-book, p. 69.

Augustan Age of China, France, Germany, Hindustan, Portugal, etc., see ditto.

Augustan History. A series of histories of the Roman Empire from 157 to 285, ascribed to the six following authors: Delius Spartianus, Julius Capitolinus, Ælius Lampridius, Valutius Gallicanus, Trebellius Pollio, and Flavius Vopiscus.

Augustine (The Second). Thomas Aquinas, also called the Angelic Doctor. (1224-1275.)

Augustinians. Friars or nuns of the Augustine Order, established in the eleventh century in commemoration of St. Augustine, and in imitation of the ancient order founded by him in the fourth century.

Those who believe, on the authority of St. Augustine, in absolute predestination and effectual grace. That is, that predestination is quite independent of man, and that grace has no reference to preceding piety and moral conduct, but is vouchsafed by God's own absolute will. Whom He would He did predestinate, and "whom He did predestinate, them He also called" (Romans viii. 30).

Augustus. No proper name, but a mere title given to Octavian, because he was head of the priesthood. In the reign of Diocletian the two emperors were each styled Augustus (sacred majesty), and the two viceroys Caesar. Prior to that time Hadrian limited the title of Caesar to the heir presumptive.

Augustus. Philippe II. of France; so called because he was born in the month of August. (1165, 1180-1223.)

Sigismund II. of Poland. (1520, 1546-1572.)

Aulay, in Indian mythology, is the horse with a huge trunk, on which Baly the giant rode.

"Through these wide portals oft bad Baly rode Triumphant from his proud abode. When, in his greatness, he bestowed The Aulay, hunger of four-footed kind. The Aulay-horse, that in his force With elephantine trunk, could bend And lift the elephant, and on the wind Whirl him away, with away and swing, Even like a pebble from the practised sling." Sonnet: Curses of Kahana, xii. 2.

Auld Brig and New Brig, of Robert Burns, refers to the bridges over the river Ayr, in Scotland.

Auld Hornie. After the establishment of Christianity, the heathen deities were degraded by the Church into fallen angels; and Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat's beard, pointed ears, and goat's feet, was transformed to his Satanic majesty, and called Old Horny.

"O thou, whatever title suit thee, Auld Hornie, Satan, Nick, or Choiste." Burns.

Auld Rookie. Edinburgh old town; so called because it generally appears to be capped by a cloud of "reek" or smoke.

Aulno Council. The council of the Kaiser in the old German Empire, from which there was no appeal (1495-1866) (Latin, aulé, a court). The name is now given in Austria to a council of Vienna which manages the war department of the Austrian Empire.

Aunt Sally. A game in which a wooden head is mounted on a pole. The fun of the game is to knock the nose of the figure, or break the pipe stuck in its mouth. This is to be done by throwing at it, from a stated distance, a short club. The word aunt was anciently
Aureola

A circle of light, emblematical of glory, placed by the old painters round the heads of martyrs and saints. The notion was derived from Exod. xxv. 23, Facies coronam aureolam (Thou shalt by thine own merits make for thyself a crown, besides that of gold which God has promised to the faithful) (Donne: Sermons). Strictly speaking, the glory confined to the head alone is a nimbus, and only when it envelopes the entire body is it called an aureola.

Du Cange informs us that the aureola of nun is white, of martyrs red, and of doctors green.

"The nimbus of a Christ should contain a cross, of the Virgin Mary, a circle of stars, of God the Father, a triangle with rays; of a living saint, a square without rays.

"They say, who know the life divine, And upward gaze with rapt gaze, That by each golden crown on high, Rich with celestial jewelry, Which far our Lord's renowned set. There hangs a radiant crown, All glistening with pure and living light Too dazzling for a sinner alone, Prepared for virgin souls, and them Who seek the martyr's reward."—Keble: Christian Year.

Auris

Auri sacra fames (the cursed hunger for wealth), applied to that restless craving for money which is almost a monomania.

Aurora

Early morning. According to Grecian mythology, the goddess Aurora, called by Homer "rosy-fingered," sets out before the sun, and is the pioneer of his rising.

"You cannot shut the windows of the sky, Through which Aurora shows her brightening face."—Thomson: Castle of Indulgence, canto ii. 8.

Aurora's tears. The morning dew.

Aurora Australis. The Southern lights, a similar phenomenon to the "Aurora Borealis."

Aurora Borealis (Latin). The electrical lights occasionally seen in the northern part of the sky: also called "Northern Lights," and "Merry Dancers." (See Derwentwater.)

Aurora Rubra. A rich, noble English orphan; left to the care of guardians; a Catholic in religion; and in person "A rose with all its sweetest leaves yet folded."—Byron: Don Juan, xxi. 43.

Aurora Septentrionalis. Same as Aurora Australis (q.v.).

Austria. An ancient name of Italy; so called from Auson, son of Ulysses, and father of the Ausona.

"All the green delights Ausonia pours."—Thomson: Summer, 190.

Austro. A wind pernicious to flowers and health. In Italy one of the South winds was so called; its modern name is the Sirocco. (Greek, austeros, hot, dry). In England it is a damp wind, generally bringing wet weather.

"Nought but purrid streams and nauseous fogs, For ever hang on doozy Auster's head."—Thomson: Castle of Indulgence, l. 78.

Austrian Lips. The thick underlip, characteristic of the house of Hapsburg. Derived from Cymburgis, daughter of Ziemovitz, Duke of Masovia, and niece of the then King of Poland, Cymburgis was noted for her beauty and unusual strength.

Aut Caesar aut nullus [Latin, Either Caesar or no one,] everything or nothing; all or not at all. Caesar used to say, "he would sooner be first in a village than second at Rome," Milton makes Satan say,

"Better to reign in Hell, than serve in Heaven."—Milton: Par. Lost, l. 163. (See 6th.)

Authentic Doctor. Gregory of Rimini. (Fourteenth century.)

Auto da Fe. [In act of faith.] A day set apart by the Inquisition for the examination of "heretics." Those not acquitted were burnt. The reason why inquisitors burnt their victims was, because they are forbidden to "shed blood"; an axiom of the Roman Catholic Church being, "Evetis ad non port norit unguinem" (the church is untainted with blood).

Autolyus. The craftiest of thieves. He stole the flocks of his neighbours, and changed their marks. Sisyphos outwitted him by marking his sheep under their feet, a device which so tickled the rogue that he instantly "cottoned" to him. Shakespeare introduces him in The Winter's Tale as a pedlar, and says he was called the son of Mercury, because he was born under that "thieving planet."

"Autunnuus is no lapidary, though he drives a roaring trade in flash jewellery." — Paul Koll Gazette.

Automaton—plural, automatons or automata. Machines which imitate the actions, etc., of living creatures. The most famous are the following:—(1) The pigeon that could fly, made, n.c. 400, by Archytas, of Tarentum; (2) the wooden eagle of Regiomontanus, the German, which flew from the city of Königsberg to meet the emperor, saluted him, and returned, 1430-1476; (3) the duck of Vaucanson of Grenoble, which could eat and drink, and even in a way digest food; its wings, viscera, bones, etc., minutely resembled those of a living animal. Vaucanson also made an image of Pan, which, at the beek of Syrinx, rose from his seat, played on his pipe, bowed when applauded, and sat down again. He also made an asp which, on being touched by an actress, in the character of Cleopatra, flew at her breast with a malignant hiss. Louis XV. set him to make a human figure, but he died before he had completed it. (Greek, auta-nao, I self-move.) (See ANDROID.)

7 Pierre Droz and his son Louis were noted for their automatons; so was Frederick of Knause (Vienna). The chess-player of Wolfgang, baron of Kempelen, in 1784, created quite a furor in Paris. Napoleon on one occasion played chess with this automaton. (See BRAZEN HEADS.)

Automédon. A coachman. He was the charioteer of Achilles.

Autumn. He is come to his autumn, i.e. to be hanged, to his "fall." A pun on the phrase "turning a man off" by dropping the plank on which he stands. The drop is the "leaf," and autumn is called the "fall," or "full of the leaf."

Avia. In Burmah, has marble quarries of which idols are made, and only priests are allowed to trade there. (Synax, vol. ii. p. 376.)

"As on Avia’s shore, Where none but priests are privileged to trade In that base marble of which gods are made." — T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, part i.

Avalanche (3 syl.) means properly something which goes downwards (French, à râler). The word is applied to a mass of snow mixed with earth, ice, and stones, which slips down a mountain side to the lower ground. Metaphorically, we speak of an "avalanche of applause," an "avalanche of bouquets" showered on the stage, etc.

Avernus. An ocean island, where King Arthur resided and was buried. The word means "apple island" (aervil, apple; ystl, island); and it is generally thought to mean Glastonbury, a name derived from the Saxon glasun (green like glass).

Avant Courier. (French, avant courrier.) A "messenger sent before" to get things ready for a party of travellers, or to announce their approach. Anything said or done to prepare the way for something more important to follow; a foiler, a harbinger.

Avant Garde. (French.) The van or advanced guard of an army.

Avatar. The advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The ten avatāras of Vishnu, in Hindū mythology, are by far the most celebrated. 1st advent, in the form of a fish; 2nd, in that of a tortoise; 3rd, of a hog; 4th, of a monster, half man and half lion, to destroy the giant Iravan; 5th, in the form of a dwarf (this Avātar is called Varuna); 6th, in human form, under the name of Rama; 7th, under the same figure and name, to slay the thousand-armed giant Rautasurṣiγunjan; 8th, as a child named Krishna, who performed numerous miracles (this is the most memorable of all the advents); 9th, under the form of Buddha. These are all past. The 10th advent will be in the form of a white horse (Kalki) with wings, to destroy the earth.

"In Vishnu land what a nature? Or who in Moscow, towards the czar?"

—Bionnoum.

Ave María [Hail, Mary] (1 syl. 2 syl.) The first two words of the angel’s salutation to the Virgin Mary. (Luke i. 28.) In the Roman Catholic Church the phrase is applied to an invocation to the Virgin beginning with those words; and also to the smaller beads of a rosary, the larger ones being termed pater-nosters.

Avenel (2 syl.) White Lady of Arveol. A tutelary spirit in Scott’s Monastery.

Avenger of Blood (The). The man who, in the Jewish polity, had the right of taking vengeance on him who had slain one of his kinsmen. The Avenger in Hebrew is called goel.

"Of the priests were appointed for the protection of homicides, and of those who had caused another’s death by accident. The Korn sanctions the Jewish custom. Familial feuds have been a common hunting ground of poets and novelists.

Avernum (Greek, a-orinis, "without a bird"). A lake in Campaunia, so called from the belief that its sulphurous and mephitic vapours killed any bird that happened to inhale them. Poets call it the entrance to the infernal regions; hence the proverb, The descent to Avernus is easy, but coming back again is quite another matter, meaning that all bad habits are easily acquired, but very hard to be abandoned.

Avertin (St.). The patron saint of lunatics; so called from the French avertiner (lunatics).

Avesta. The sacred Scriptures of the Magians, composed by Zoroaster. Better known as the Zend-Avesta or “living word in the Zend language.”

Avenègle. Son of Erebus and Nox. (Spenser: Faerie Queen.)

Aviènas. A writer of fables in the decline of the Roman empire. In the Middle Ages, a collection of fables used to be called Avyнет, or Esqoet.

A vinculo matrimonii (Latin). Divorced from marriage ties. A total divorce. A divorce a mensa et thoro is a partial divorce. The divorce a vinculo matrimonii is because the marriage was never legal, as in the case of bigamy, or marriage within the prohibited degrees; but a divorce a mensa et thoro is because the parties cannot live together from incompatibility of temper, in which case they may, if they choose, come together again.

Avis. An order of knighthood in Portugal, founded by Sancho I., and having for its object the subjugation of the Moors.

Avoid Extremes. The wise saw of Pittacus of Mytilene. (B.C. 652-569.)

Avoir. Avoir Martel en tête (French). To be distracted. Martel is a hammer, hence distraction, torment, torture.

Avoirdupois. French, avoir, avert or aver, goods in general, and pouez = poids (weight). Not the verb, but the noun avoir. Properly avoir de poids (goods having weight), goods sold by weight. We have the word aver, meaning goods in general, hence also cattle; whence such compounds as aver-corn, aver-penny, a-er-silver, aver-land, and so on. We have also the noun “having, havings” = possessions.

There is a common French phrase avoir du poids (to be weight), with which our word avoirdupois has been amalgamated.

“Fared my present havings [properties] to bestow My bounties upon you.”
Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 2.

Axinomancy. Divination by an axe; much practised by the ancient Greeks with a view of discovering

“One of your having, and yet cart and care.”
Mirms Looking Glass.

Even medicines, as wholesale goods, are bought and sold by avoirdupois weight.

A-weather. The reverse of a-lee. “A-weather” is towards the weather, or the side on which the wind strikes. “A-lee” is in the lee or shelter, and therefore opposite to the wind side; as helm a-weather.

Awkward. French, gauche, not dexterous. Awk means the left hand. Hence in Holland’s Plutarch we have “The awk or left hand”; and again, “They receive her awkly when she presenteth... the right hand.” (See Sinister.)

Awkward Squad. In military language means recruits not yet fitted to take their place in the regimental line.

“A squad is a troop or company of soldiers under a sergeant. It is a contraction of squadron. A squadron of cavalry is the unit of a regiment. Three or four squadrons make a regiment, and a certain number of regiments constitute an army.” In naval affairs a squadron is a section of a fleet.

Awl. “I’ll pack up my awes and be gone,” i.e. all my goods. The play is on awl and all.

Axe. “To hang up one’s axe.” To retire from business, to give over a useless project. The allusion is to the ancient battle-axe, hung up to the gods when the fight was done. All classical scholars will call to mind the allusion of Horace to a similar Roman custom. Being snubbed by Pyrrha, he says, “He will hang up his axe upon her wall,” or more literally, his “drenched garments on the temple-walls of Neptune.” (1 Odes, V. 14-17.) (See Ask.)

To put the axe on the helve. To solve a difficulty. To hit the right nail on the head.

To send the axe after the helve. To spend good money after bad, or under the hope of recovering bad debts.

He has an axe to grind. Some selfish motive in the background; some personal interest to answer. Franklin tells of a man who wanted to grind his axe, but had no one to turn the grindstone. Going to the yard where he saw young Franklin, he asked the boy to show him how the machine worked, and kept praising him till his axe was ground, and then laughed at him for his pains.
Crime. An agate was placed on a red-hot axe, and indicated the guilty person by its motion. (Greek, azīnē manteia.)

Ayang (Anglo-Indian). A native Hindu nurse or lady’s maid.

"The ayahs, or nurses, are said to be the best in the world." — D. Tylor: Visit to India, chap. ii. p. 57.

Aye’shah (3 syl.). Muhomet’s second and favourite wife. He married her when she was only nine years old, and died in her arms.

Ayrshire Poet. Robert Burns, born near the town of Ayr. (1759-1796.)

Azarel. The scape-goat; so called by the Jews, because the high priest cast lots on two goats; one lot was for the Lord, and the other lot for Azazel or Satan, and the goat on which the latter lot fell was the scape-goat.

Azazel. A seraph who fell in love with Aynah, a granddaughter of Cain. When the flood came, he carried her under his wing to some other planet. (Byron: Heaven and Earth.)

Azazel. In Milton’s Paradise Lost, Azazel is the standard-bearer of the infernal host. According to the Koran, when God commanded the angels to worship Adam, Azazel replied, "Why should the son of fire fall down before a son of clay?" and God cast him out of heaven. His name was then changed to Ekbal, which means "despair."

"Then straight commands that at the walk the sound
Of trumpets loud, and clarions, he appeared
His mighty standard; that proud honour claimed Azazel as his right, a cherub tall." — Milton: Paradise Lost, book i. 531-4.

Azim. The young convert who joined "the creed and standard" of the veiled prophet of Khorassan, in Moore’s Lalla Rookh. When he was witness of the prophet’s infamy, he joined the caliph’s army, and was mainly instrumental in defeating that of the veiled prophet.

Azo, Marquis of Esté, married Parisina, who fell in love with Hugo, a natural son of Azo. The marquis ordered Hugo to be beheaded; but no one knows what the fate of Parisina was. Azo, at any rate, married again, and had a family. This Azo was in reality Niccolo of Ferara. (Byron: Parisina.)

Azor’s Mirror. Zemira is the name of the lady, and Azor that of the bear, in Marmontel’s Tale of Beauty and the Beast. Zemira entreats the kind monster to let her see her father, if only for a few moments; so drawing aside a curtain, he shows him to her in a magic mirror. This mirror was a sort of telescope, which rendered objects otherwise too far off distinctly visible.

Azoth. The panacea of Paracelsus, regarded by his followers as "the tincture of life."

Azrael (3 syl.). The angel that watches over the dying, and takes the soul from the body. The angel of death. He will be the last to die, but will do so at the second trump of the archangel.

"The Mohammedan doctors say that Azrael was commissioned to inflict the penalty of death on all mankind." — R. Christmas.

The wings of Azrael. The approach of death; the signs of death coming on the dying.

"Those who listen in the . . . watch the hour for the wings of Azrael." — Dante.

Azrael. The archangel commissioned to blow the trumpet of the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Aztecs. An indigenous people of Mexico who, in 1325, founded Tenochtitlan. They were in the zenith of their power in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. When the Spaniards arrived, their king was Montezuma; their supreme god was Tlatoani; and Huitzilopochtli was the divine protector of their nation, to whom they offered human victims.

Azucena. An old gipsy who stole Manrico, infant son of Garzia, the Conte di Luna’s brother. (Verdi: Il Trovatore.)

Azur. Sky blue. Represented in royal arms by the planet Jupiter, in noblemen’s by the sapphire. The ground of the old shield of France was azure. Emblem of fidelity and truth. Represented in heraldic devices by horizontal lines.

Azuriel. The fairy who owned what we call Holland Park. King Oberon gave him his daughter Keena in marriage when he drove Albion from his empire. Albion invaded Kensington, the territory of King Oberon, but was slain in battle by Azuriel. (Tickell.)

Azymites (3 syl.). The Roman Catholics are so called by the Greek Church, because the holy wafers used by them in the eucharist are made of unleavened bread. (Greek, azūmos, unleavened.)
This letter is the outline of a house. It is called in Hebrew beth (a house). In Egyptian hieroglyphs this letter is a sheep.

B stands for 300. Satis B. trecentum subi cognaturn retinere. And, again, Et B. trecentum per se retinere videtur. But with a line above, it denotes 3,000.

For Becca and Beval (French for B sharp and B flat), see Beckenham.

Marked with a B (French), i.e. a poor thing. In the French language almost all personal defects begin with the letter B; e.g. bgle (squint-eyed), borgue (one-eyed), boan (humpty), boiteux (lame), etc.

Not to know B from a battledoar. To be quite illiterate, not to know even his letters. Migeon tells us that hornbooks used to be called battledoars. The phrase might therefore originally mean not to know the B of, from, or out of, your hornbook. But its more general meaning is "not able to distinguish one letter from another."

"He knoweth not a B from a battledoar."—Howell: English Proverbs.

"Distinguish a B from a battledoar."—Decker: Quarterly Hornebook.

I know B from a Bull's foot. Similar to the proverb, "I know a hawk from a herneshaw." (See HAWK.) The bull's parted hoof somewhat resembles a B.

"There were members who scarcely knew it from a bull's foot."—Birkenhead: Modern Chivalry.

B. C. Marked with B.C. (bad character). When a soldier disgraced himself by insubordination he was formerly marked with "B. C." before he was drummed out of the regiment.

B. and S. Brandy and soda-water.

B. K. K. The name of "residence" given by officers in mutiny, who do not wish to give up their address. The word stands for BurracKN.

B. Flata. Bugs. The pun is "B" (the initial letter), and "flat." from the flatness of the obnoxious insect. Also called Norfolk Howard, from Mr. Bugg, who advertised in the Times that he should in future change his name into "Norfolk Howard." (See P SHARP.)

Register of the B.'s, i.e. the British.

A Carlow caution.

B. of B.K. Some mysterious initials applied to himself in his diary by Arthur Orton, "the Tichborne Claimant." Supposed to denote "Baronet of British Kingdom."

Baal-Pear or Belephegor. The Triaps of the Moabites and Midianites.

Baal Samin. The god of celestial places.

Baal Shemesh. The Sun-god.

Baal Zebubb [Beelzebub], god of corruption or of flies. (See FLIES.)

Baba. Same as papa (Turkish). Alibaba is "father Ali."

Babu. The bogie with which nurses in Languedoc terrify unruly children.

Babes in the Wood. (1) Simple trustful folks, never suspicious, and easily gullible.

(2) Insurrectionary hordes that infested the mountains of Wicklow and the wooded hills of Enniscorthy towards the close of the eighteenth century. (See CHILDREN.)

(3) Men in the stocks or in the pillory.

Babes (Brittle ot), in Rome. VATICAN, or, more correctly, VAGITAN-US (q.v.), the god who caused infants to utter their first cry. FABULIN-US (q.v.), the god to whom Roman parents made an offering when an infant uttered its first word. CUBA (q.v.), the goddess who kept infants quiet in their cots. DOMIDUCHA, the goddess who brought young children safe home, and kept guard over them when out of their parents' sight.

Babies in the Eyes. That is, love in the expression of the eyes. Love is the little babe Cupid, and hence the conceit, originating from the reflection of the onlooker in the pupil of another's eyes.

"In each of her two crystal eyes Simileth a naked boy [Cupid]."

She clung about his neck, gave him ten kisses.

Tood eld his locks, looked babies in his eyes.

Babel. A perfect Babel. A thorough confusion. "A Babel of sounds." A confused uproar, in which nothing can be heard but hubbub. The allusion is to the confusion of tongues at Babel. (Genesis xi.)

"God... comes down to see their city,

And in divers sorts

Upon their tongues a various spirit, to rage

Quite out their native language, and instead

To saw a jangling noise of words unknown.

For with a hideous gabble rashly loud

Among the building's each to other calls.

Not understood... Thus was the building left

H ridious, and the work Confusion nam'd.

Babonc. (See Bacchus.)

Babouin. Taissez-vous, petit babouin; laissez parler votre mère, qui est plus sage que vous. The tale or fable is this: A girl one day went out to make an offering to Venus, and prayed the goddess to give her for husband a young man on whom she had fixed her affections. A young fellow happened at the time to be behind the image of Cupid, and hearing the petition, replied, “So fine a gentleman is not for such as you.” The voice seemed to proceed from the image, and the girl replied, “Hold your tongue, you little monkey; let your mother speak, for she is wiser than you.”

Baby Charles. So James I. used to call his son Charles, afterwards Charles I.

Babylon. The modern Babylon. So London is sometimes called, on account of its wealth, luxury, and dissipation.

Babylonian Numbers. Nce Babylonianos textus numerus. Do not pry into futurity by astrological calculations and horoscopes. Do not consult fortune-tellers. The Chaldeans were the most noted of astrologers. (Hoyuac : Odes, book i. xi. 2.)

Babylonic Captivity. The seventy years that the Jews were captives in Babylon. They were made captives by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus (B.C. 538).

Babylonian Garment (A). Babylonea vestis, a garment woven with divers colours. (Plluy, viii. 74.)

"I saw among the spoils a goodly Babylonian garment."—Joshua vii. 21.

Baca. The Valley of Baca, also called the Valley of Tears, translated in the New Version "the Valley of Weeping," apparently a dry sterile valley, the type of this earth spoilt by sorrow and sin. "Blessed is the man . . . in whose heart are the ways of them. Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well . . ." (Psalm lxxxiv. 6). That man is blessed whose trust in God converts adverse circumstances into proofs of divine love. "Whom He loveth He chasteneth." They "go from strength to strength."

In the mountains of Lebanon is a valley called Baca, but it is described as fertile and very delicious. The Valley of Lebanon (Joshua xi. 17) is encompassed by mountains, one of which is very barren, and abounds in thorns, rocks, and flints but another is called a terrestrial paradise. Baca means "mulberry trees," but Bekah means a "plain." Perowne says Bacah is from a Hebrew root which means "weeping."

Our sources of common pleasure dry up as we journey on through the vale of Baca."—Walter Scott: The Antiquary.

Bacchus. The Holy Bottle, and also the priestess of the Holy Bottle, the oracle of Lantern-land consulted by Panurge on the momentous question whether or not he ought to marry. The Holy Bottle answered with a click like the noise made by a glass snapping. Bacbuc told Panurge the noise meant true (drink), and that was the response, the most direct and positive ever given by the oracle. Panurge might interpret it as he liked, the obscurity would always save the oracle.

So Pic or thuck (say 1) or neither.
Or both, for ought I care, or neither:
None understood than Bacoat.
Here's heads for Pic, and tails for thuck.
E. C. B.

Bacchanaalia. Festivals in honour of Bacchus, distinguished for their licentiousness and debauchery. Plato says he has seen the whole population of Athens drunk at these festivals.

Bacchanaalian. Drunken, rollicksome, devoted or pertaining to Bacchus (q.v.).

Bacchant. A person given to habits of drinking; so called from the "bacchants," or men admitted to the feasts of Bacchus. Bacchants wore fillets of ivy.

Bacchante (2 syl.). A female wine-bibber; so called from the "bacchantes," or female priestesses of Bacchus. They wore fillets of ivy.

Baccho. A sacred bull which changed its colour every hour of the day. (Egyptian mythology.)

Bacchus [genus]. In Roman mythology the god of wine. He is represented as a beautiful youth with black eyes, golden locks, flowing with curls about his shoulders and filleted with ivy. In peace his robe was purple, in war he was covered with a panther's skin. His chariot was drawn by panthers.

The famous statue of Bacchus in the palace of Borghese (3 syl.) is represented with a bunch of grapes in his hand and a panther at his feet. Pliny tells us that, after his conquest of India, Bactchus entered Thebes in a chariot drawn by elephants.

* The Etruscan Bacchus was called Esar or Nosar; the Umbrian Desar; the Bacchus, in the Lusiad, is the evil demon or antagonist of Jupiter, the lord of destiny. As Mars is the guardian power of Christianity, Bacchus is the guardian power of Mohammedanism.

Bacchus sprang from the thigh of Zeus. The tale is that Semelē asked Zeus to an early betrothal "in all his glory, but the foolish request proved her death. Zeus saved the child which was prematurely born by sewing it up in his thigh till it came to maturity. The Arabian tradition is that the infant Bacchus was nourished during infancy in a cave of Mount Meros. As "Meros" is Greek for a thigh, the Greek fable is readily explained.

What has that to do with Bacchus? i.e. what has that to do with the matter in hand? When Thespis introduced recitations in the vintage songs, the innovation was suffered to pass, so long as the subject of recitation bore on the exploits of Bacchus; but when, for variety sake, he wadered to other subjects, the Greeks puller him up with the exclamation, "What has that to do with Bacchus?" (See Hecuba, Moutons.)

Bacchus a voyo plus d'hommes que Neptune. The ace-hole wrecks more men than the ocean.

A priest of Bacchus. A toper.

"The jolly old priests of Bacchus in the parlour make their lionations of cheer." J. S. Le Fanu: The House in the Churchyard, p. 135

A son of Bacchus. A toper.

Bacchoch. The travelling cripple of Ireland. Generally, a talkative, facetious fellow, prompt at repartee, and not unlike the ancient jester.

Bachelor. A man who has not been married. Probably from burerlarum, a man employed on a grazing-farm, Paris, bachelor, bachelette (a damsel).

A Bachelor of Arts. The student who has passed his examination, but is not yet of standing to be a master. Formerly the bachelor was the candidate for examination. The word used to be spelt bachiller: thus in the Proceedings of the Privy Council, vol. i. p. 72, we read: "The king ordered that the bachillers should have reasonable pay for their trouble."

Bachelor of Salamanca (The). Don Cherubim. He is placed in different situations of life, and is made to associate with all classes of society. (Le Sage: The Bachelor of Salamanca (a novel).)

Bachelor's Buttons. Several flowers are so called. Red Bachelor's Buttons, the double red campion; yellow Bachelor's Buttons, the "upright crowfoot"; white Bachelor's Buttons, the white ranunculus and white campion.

"The similitude these flowers have to the jagged cloath buttons ancienntly worn ... gave occasion ... to call them Bachelor's Buttons."—Herold: Herold.

Or else from a custom still sometimes observed by rustics of carrying the flower in their pockets to know how they stand with their sweethearts. If the flower dies, it is a bad omen; but if it does not fade, they may hope for the best.

To wear bachelor's buttons. To remain a bachelor. (See above.)

Bachelor's Fare. Broad and cheese and kisses.

Bachelor's Porch. The north door used to be so called. The menservants and other poor men used to sit on benches down the north aisle, and the maidservants, with other poor women, on the south side. Even when married the custom was not discontinued. After service the men formed one line and the women another, down which the clergy and gentry passed amidst salutations, and the two lines filed off. In some country churches these arrangements are still observed.

Bachelor's Wife (i). A hypothetical wife. A bachelor has only an imaginary wife.

"Bachelor's wives and old maid's children be well taught."—Heywood: Phoebe.

Back (To). To support with money, influence, or encouragement: as to "back a friend." A commercial term meaning to endorse. When a merchant backs or endorses a bill, he guarantees its value.

Fulstaff says to the Prince:—

"You care not who sees your back. Call you Back and Edge

Entirely, heartily, tooth and nail, with might and main. The reference is to a wedge driven home to split wood.

"They were working back and edge for me."—Baldwood: Robbery under Arms, ch. ii.

To back and fill. A mode of tacking, when the tide is with the vessel and the wind against it. Metaphorically, to be irresolute.

To back out. To draw back from an engagement, bargain, etc., because it does not seem so plausible as you once thought it. Many horses are unwilling to go out of a stable head foremost, and are backed out.

"Octavius back[s] out; his caution and reserve come to his rescue."—C. Clarke: Shakespeare.

To back the field. To bet on all the horses bar one. A sporting term used in betting.

To back the sails. So to arrange them that the ship’s way may be checked.

To back up. To uphold, to support. As one who stands at your back to support you.

At the back of. Behind, following close after. Figure from following a leader.

"With half the city at his back."—Byron: Don Juan.

To see his back; to see the back of anything. To get rid of a person or thing: to see it leave.

Back the eam or back water is to row backwards, that the boat may move the reverse of its ordinary direction.

On the back of. Immediately after. Figure from soldiers on the march.

To the back, that is, to the backbone, entirely.

To break the back of a thing. To surmount the hardest part.

His back is up. He is angry, he shows that he is annoyed. The allusion is to a cat, which sets its back up when attacked by a dog or other animal.

To get one’s back up. To be irritated (See above).

To have his back at the wall. To act on the defensive against odds. One beset with foes tries to get his back against a wall that he may not be attacked by foes behind.

"He planted his back against a wall, in a skilful attitude of fence, ready with his bright shining rapier to do battle with all the heavy, fierce, unarmed men, some six or seven in number."—Mrs. Gaskell: The Poor Clare, iii.

To set one’s back up. (See above.)

"That word set my back up."—Dame Huddles Letter (1110).

To turn one’s back on another. To leave, forsake, or neglect him. To leave one by going away.

"At length we ... turn our backs on the outskirts of civilization."—Proutum: Moss, i. 10.

Behind my back. When I was not present. When my back was turned.

Laid on one’s back. Laid up with chronic ill-health; helpless. Figure from persons extremely ill.

Backbite (To). To slander behind one’s back.

"The only thing in which all parties agreed was to backbite the manager."—W. Irving: Traveller, Barnthorn, p. 158.

Backbone (The). The main stay.

"Sober ... practical men ... constitute the moral backbone of the country."—W. J. Scott: In Darkest England (Part 1, 2, p. 17).

To the backbone. Thoroughly, as true to the backbone.

"A union man, and a nationalist to the backbone."—F. Roosevelt: T. H. Benton, chap. 1, p. 117.

Backgammon is the Anglo-Saxon bar eanen (back game); so called because the pieces (in certain circumstances) are taken up and obliged to go back to enter at the table again.

Background. Placed in the background, i.e. made of no consequence. Pictures have three distances, called grounds: the foreground, where the artist is supposed to be; the middle ground, where the most salient part of the picture is placed; and the background or distance, beyond which the eye cannot penetrate.

Back-lander. A blow on the face with the back of the hand. Also one who takes back the decanter in order to hand himself another glass before the decanter is passed on.

"I’ll take a back-lander, as Clive don’t seem to drink."—Thackeray: The Newcomes.

Back-spear (To). To cross-examine.

(Scotch.)

"He has the wit to lay the scene in such a remote ... country that nobody should be able to back-spear him."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed (Introduction).

Back-stair Influence. Private or unrecognised influence. It was customary to build royal palaces with a staircase for state visitors, and another for those who sought the sovereign upon private matters. If any one wanted a private interview with royalty, it was highly desirable to conciliate those appointed to guard the back stairs, as they could admit or exclude a visitor.

"Once, we confess, beneath the patriot's cloak, From the cracked bag the drooping guineas broke.
And, jingling down the back stairs, told the crew
'Old Cato is as great a rogue as you.'"

Backwardation (Stockbrokers' term). The sum paid by a speculator on a "bear account" (i.e. a speculation on a fall in the price of certain stock), in order to postpone the completion of the transaction till the next settling day. (See Contango.)

Backward Blessing (Muttering a). Muttering a curse. To say the Lord's Prayer backwards was to invoke the devil.

Backwater. (1) Water at the lower end of a millrace to check the speed of the wheel. (2) A current of water from the island, which clears off the deposit of sand and silt left by the action of the sea; as the Backwater of Weymouth.

Bacon. The Bacon of Theology. Bishop Butler, author of the Analogy. (1692-1752."

"Bacon's brazen head. (See Brazen.) To taste your bacon. To strike or scourge one. The Saxons were called "hogs" by their Norman lords. Henry VIII. spoke of the common people as the "swinish multitude"; and Falstaff says to the travellers at Gadshill, "Oh, bacons, on!" (1 Henry IV., ii. 2). Bacon is the outside portion of the sides of pork, and may be considered generally as the part which would receive a blow.

To save one's bacon. To save oneself from injury.

"But as he rose to save his bacon,
By hat and wig he was forsaken."

(Comus: Dr. Synge, stanza vi. line 240.

There seems to be another sense in which the term is used - viz. to escape loss; and in this sense the allusion is to the care taken by our forefathers to save from the numerous dogs that frequented their houses the bacon which was laid up for winter store, the loss of which would have been a very serious calamity.

A chaw-bacon. A rustic. Till comparatively modern times the only meat which rustic had to eat was bacon. I myself know several farm labourers who never taste any meat but bacon, except on club and feast days.

He may fetch a fitch of bacon from Durnmore, i.e. he is so amiable and good-tempered he will never quarrel with his wife. The allusion is to a custom founded by Juga, a noble lady, in 1111, and restored by Robert de Fitzwalter in 1244; which was, that "any person from any part of England going to Durnow, in Essex, and humbly kneeling on two stones at the church door, may claim a gammon of bacon, if he can swear that for twelve months and a day he has never had a household brawl or wished himself unmarried."

Baconian Philosophy. A system of philosophy based on principles laid down by Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam, in the 2nd book of his Novum Organum. It is also called inductive philosophy.

Baconian Theory. The theory that Lord Bacon wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

Bactrian Sage. Zoroaster, a native of Bactria (Balkh), about 500 years before the birth of Christ.

Bad. Charles le mauvais. Charles II. of Navarre (1332-1387). He is gone to the bad. Has become a ruined man, or a depraved character. He has gone amongst bad people, in bad ways, or to bad circumstances.

To the bad. On the wrong side of the account; in arrears.

Bad Blood. Vindictiveness, ill-feeling.

"If there is any bad blood in the fellow he will be sure to show it." - Brother Jonathan.

To make bad blood, to stir up bad blood. To create or renew ill-feeling and a vindictive spirit.

Bad Books. You are in my bad books. Under disgrace. Also In my black books. (See under Black Books.)

Bad Debts. Debts not likely to be paid.

Bad Form. not comme il faut. Not in good taste.

Bad Lot (A). A person of bad moral character, or one commercially unsound. Also a commercial project or stock of worthless value. The allusion is to auctioneering slang, meaning a lot which no one will bid for. So an inefficient soldier is called one of the Queen's bad bargains.

Bad Shot (A). A wrong guess. A sporting phrase; a bad shot is one which does not bring down the bird shot at, one that misses the mark.

Badaud. A booby. C'est un frère badaud: he is a regular booby. Le Badger

A licensed huckster, who was obliged to wear a badge. By 5 Eliz., c. 12, it was enacted that "Badgers were to be licensed annually, under a penalty of £5."

"Under Dec. 17, 1665, we read of 'Certain persons upon Houses side who . . . by great quantities of corn, two of whom were authorized badgers.'"—State Papers (Domestic Series).

Baggage

In allusion to the ancient custom of badger-baiting. A badger was kennelled in a tub, where dogs were set upon him to worry him out. When dragged from his tub the poor beast was allowed to retire to it till he recovered from the attack. This process was repeated several times. Badger. It is a vulgar error that the legs of a badger are shorter on one side than on the other.

"I think that Titus Gates was as much a badger."—Lord Macaulay.

"Drawing a badger" is drawing him out of his tub by means of dogs.

Badinage. Playful merriment, banter (French), from the verb badiner, to joke or jest. The noun badinage means a switch, and in France they catch wild ducks by covering a boat with switches, in which the ducks seek protection. A person quizzed is like these wild ducks.

Badinage. A nickname given to Napoleon III. It was the name of the workman whose clothes he wore when he contrived to escape from the fort of Ham, in 1846.

"If Badinage and Bismarck have a row together let them settle it between them with their fists, instead of troubling hundreds of thousands of men who have no wish to fight."—Zola: The Dreyfusat, chap. ii. (1892).

Baggian. The party of the Emperor Napoleon III. The party of the Empress were called "Montjoyeux" and "Montjoicressis," from Montijo in Spain. She was the second daughter of the Count of Montijo.

Bag. Bag and Baggage, as "Get away with you, bag and baggage," i.e. get away, and carry with you all your belongings. Bag and baggage policy. In 1876 Mr. Gladstone, speaking on the Eastern question, said, "Let the Turks now carry away their abuses in the only possible manner, namely, by carrying away themselves . . . One and all, bag and baggage, shall, I hope, clear out from the province they have desolated and profaned." This was termed by the Conservatives the bag and baggage policy.

A bag of bones. Very emaciated; generally "A mere bag of bones."

A bag of game. A large butte, from the custom of carrying game home in "bags."

A bag of tricks or A whole bag of tricks. Numerous expedients. In allusion to the fable of the Fox and the Cat. The fox was commiserating the cat because she had only one shift in the case of danger, while he had a thousand tricks to evade it. Being set upon by a pack of hounds, the fox was soon caught, while puss ran up a tree and was quite secure.

A good bag. A large catch of game, fish, or other animals sought after by sportmen.

Got the bag. Got his dismissal. (See Sack.)

"Old bag." The bottom of the bag. The last Bag

expedient, having emptied every other one out of his bag.

To empty the bag. To tell the whole matter and conceal nothing. (French, vider le sac, to expose all to view.)

To let the cat out of the bag. (See under Cat.)

Bag (n. 76). To steal, or slip into one's bag, as a poacher or pilferer who slyly slips into his bag what he has contrived to purloin.

Bags. A slang word for trousers, which are the bags of the body. When the pattern was very staring and "loud," they once were called howling-bags.

Bag-man (A.). A commercial traveller, who carries a bag with specimens to show to those whose custom he solicits. In former times commercial travellers used to ride a horse with saddle-bags sometimes so large as almost to conceal the rider.

Bag o' Nails. Some hundreds of years ago there stood in the Tyburn Road, Oxford Street, a public-house called The Bacchanals; the sign was Pan and the Satyrs. The jolly god, with his cloven hoof and his horns, was called "The devil;" and the word Bacchanals soon got corrupted into "Bag o' Nails." The Devil and the Bag o' Nails is a sign not uncommon even now in the midland counties.

Bags de Secrètes. Records in the Record Office of trials for high treason and other State offences from the reign of Edward IV, to the close of the reign of George III. These records contain the proceedings in the trials of Anne Boleyn, Sir Walter Raleigh, Guy Fawkes, the recidivists, and of the risings of 1715 and 1745. (Bags = Bag.)

Bagatelle (A). A trifle; a thing of no consideration. "Oh! nothing. A mere bagatelle." In French, "Il dépense tout son argent en bagatelles" means, he squanders his money on trumpery. "Il ne s'amuse qu'à des bagatelles," he finds no pleasure except in trifling. Bagatelle! as an exclamation, means Nonsense! as "Vos dites qu'il me fera un procès. Bagatelle!" (fiddlesticks!)

"He considered his wife a bagatelle, to be shut up at pleasure."—The Depraved Husband.

Baguette d'Armide (Le). The sorcerer's wand. Armida is a sorceress in Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered. Baguette is a rod or wand.

Bahagnia, Bohemia; Bahaignons, Bohemians. (1330.)

Bailiff

Bahr Geist (A). A banshee or grey-spectre.

"Know then (said Eveline) it [the Bahr Geist] is a spectre, usually the image of the deposed person, who, either for wrong suffered, sustained during life, or through treasure hidden, haunts the spot from time to time, becomes familiar to those who dwell there, and takes an interest in their fate."—Sir W. Scott: The Border, chap. 12.

Bail (French, bailleur). To deliver up.

Common bail or bail below. A bail given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, to guarantee that the defendant will appear in court at any day and time the court demands.

Special bail or bail above, consists of persons who undertake to satisfy all claims made on the defendant, and to guarantee his rendering himself up to justice when required.

Bail. (See LEG-BAIL.)

To bail up. To disarm before robbing, to force to throw up the arms. (Australian.)

Bailey. The space enclosed within the external walls of a castle, not including the "Keep." The entrance was over a drawbridge, and through the embattled gate (Middle-age Latin baliiun or ballium, a corruption of valium, a rampart).

When there were two courts to a castle, they were distinguished as the outer and inner bailey (rampart). Subsequently the word included the court and all its buildings; and when the court was abolished, the term was attached to the castle, as the Old Bailey (London) and the Bailey (Oxford).

Bailiff. At Constantinople, the person who had charge of the imperial children used to be called the bajalin, from baios, a child. The word was subsequently attached to the Venetian consul at Constantinople, and the Venetian ambassador was called the bailio, a word afterwards extended to any superintendent or magistrate. In France the bailii was a superintendent of the royal domains and commander of the troops. In time, any superintendent of even a private estate was so called, whence our farmer's bailiff. The sheriff is the king's bailiff—a title now applied almost exclusively to his deputies or officers. (See BUMBAILIFF.)

Bailleur. Un bon bailleur en fait bailleur deux (French). Yawning is catching.

Bailiff (Harry). Mine host in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales. When the poet began the second "Fit" of the Bain Marie. A saucepan containing hot water into which a smaller saucepan is plunged, either to keep it hot, or that it may boil without burning. A glue pot is a good example. Mons. Bouillet says, "Ainsi appelé du nom de l'inventeur" (Balneum Maris). But derivations from proper names require authentication.

Bairam (3 syl.). The name given to two movable Moslem feasts. The first, which begins on the first day of the moon which follows that of Ramadan, and lasts three days, is a kind of Paschal feast. The second, seventy days later, lasts four days, and is not unlike the Jewish Feast of Tabernacles.

"As the Mohammedan year is a lunar one, in 53 years these feasts will have occurred at all the four seasons.

Baisser. Il semble qu'il n'y a qu'à se baisser et en prendre (French). One would think he has only to pick and choose. Said of a person who fancies that fortune will fall into his lap, without his stirring. Literally, "to stoop down and pick up what he wants."

Bait. Food to entice or allure, as bait for fish. Bait for travellers is a "feed" by way of refreshment taken en passant. (Anglo-Saxon, betan, to bait or feed.)

Bajaderes. Indian dancing girls. A corruption of the Portuguese baia-dervae, whence baiadera, bajadera.

Bajulus. A pedagogue. A Grand Bajulus, a "big" pedagogue. In the Greek court, the preceptor of the Emperor was called the Grand Bajulus. Originally "porter." (Cf. Bailiff.)

Bajura. Mahomet's standard.

Baked. Half-baked. Imbecile, of weak mind. The metaphor from half-baked food.

Baked Meat means meat-pie. "The funeral baked meats did coldly furnish forth the marriage table" (Hamlet); i.e. the hot meat-pies (venison pasties) served at the funeral and not eaten, were served cold at the marriage banquet.

Baker (The). Louis XVI. was called "the Baker," the queen was called "the baker's wife" (or La Boulangerie), and the dauphin the "shop boy," because a heavy trade in corn was carried on at Versailles, and consequently very little was brought to Paris.

"The return of the baker, his wife, and the shop-boy to Paris [after the king was brought from Versailles] had not had the expected effect. Flour and bread were still scarce." — A. Dumas: The Countesses de Charzy, Chap. ix.

Baker's Dozen. Thirteen for twelve. When a heavy penalty was inflicted for short weight, bakers used to give a surplus number of loaves, called the inbread, to avoid all risk of incurring the fine. The 13th was the "vantage loaf."

Mr. Riley (Liber Albus) tells us that the 13th loaf was "the extent of the profit allowed to retail dealers," and therefore the vantage loaf means, the loaf allowed for profit.

To give one a baker's dozen, in slang phraseology, is to give him a sound drubbing — i.e. all he deserves and one stroke more.

Baker's Knee (.d). A knop-knee, or knee bent inwards, from carrying the heavy bread-basket on the right arm.

Bakshish. A Persian word for a gratuity. These gifts are insolently demanded by all sorts of officials in Turkey, Egypt, and Asia Minor, more as a claim than a gratuity.

Bal. Donner le bal à quelqu'un (French). To make one dance for it; to abuse one. In several games played with a ball, the person who catches the ball or to whom the ball is given, is put to an immense amount of labour. Thus, in Hurling, the person who holds the ball has one of the labours of Hercules to pass through. His opponent tries to lay hold of him, and the hurler makes his way over hills, dales, hedges, and ditches, through bushes, briars, mire, plashes, and even rivers. Sometimes twenty or thirty persons lie tugging together in the water, scrambling and scratching for the ball. (See Strutt, Sports and Pastimes, section xii.) (See Ball.)

Balsam. The Earl of Huntington, one of the rebels in Monmouth's army.

"And, therefore, in the name of dulness, he The well-lunged Balsam," Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, 1273-4.

Balsam. A "citizen of sober fame," who lived hard by the Monument of London: "he was a plain, good man; religious, punctual, and frugal," his week-day meal being only "one solid dish." He grew rich; got knighted; seldom went to church; became a courtier; "took a bribe from France;" was hanged for treason, and all his goods were confiscated to the State. (See Diamond Pitt.) It was Thomas Pitt, grandfather of the Earl of Chatham, who suggested to Pope this sketch. (Pope: Moral Essays, Ep. iii.)

Balaam. Matter kept in type for filling up odd spaces in periodicals. These are generally refuse bits—the words of an oft, who talks like "Balaam's ass." (Numb. xxii. 30.) (American.)

Balaam Basket or Box (A). An ass's pannier. In printer's slang of America, it is the place where rejected articles are deposited. (See Balaam.)

Balafre, Le [the gashed]. Henri, son of Francois, second Duke of Guise. In the Battle of Dormans he received a sword-cut which left a frightful scar on his face. (1550-1598). So Ludovic Lealy, an old archer of the Scottish Guards, is called in Sir Walter Scott's Quintin Durward.

Bala. Donner trois tours de balai par le chemin (French). To be a witch. Literally, to run your brush three times up the chimney. According to an ancient superstition, all witches had to pass their brooms on which they rode three times up the chimney between one Sabbath and the following.

Balak, in the second part of Abra- lon and Achitophel, a satire by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Dr. Burnet, author of Burnet's Own Time.

Balâm the ox, and the fish Nun, are the food of Mahomet's paradise; the mere lobs of the livers of these animals will suffice for 70,000 saints. (Al Koran.)

Balas. Bravest and strongest of the giant race. Vasco de Lobeira, in Annals of Gaul. Also, Emir of the Saracens, and father of Ferembras or Fierabras (q.v.).

Balance (The). "Libra," the 7th sign of the zodiac, which contains the autumnal equinox. According to fable it is Astraea, who, in the iron age, returned from earth to heaven. Virgil, to praise the equity of Augustus, promises him a future residence in this sign.

According to Persian mythology, at the last day there will be a huge balance big as the vault of heaven. The two scale pans will be called that of light and that of darkness. In the former all good will be placed, in the latter all evil. And each individual will receive an award according to the judgment of the balance.

Balance. He has a good balance at his bankers. His credit side shows a large balance in his favour.

Balance of power. The States of Europe being so balanced that no one nation shall have such a preponderance as to endanger the independence of another.

Balance of trade. The money-value difference between the exports and imports of a nation.

To balance an account. To add up the debit and credit sides, and subtract the loss of the two from the greater. The remainder is called the balance.

To strike a balance. To calculate the exact difference, if any, between the debit and credit side of an account.

Balayer. Chauve doit balayer devant sa porte (French), "Let everyone correct his own faults." The allusion is to a custom, nearly obsolete in large towns, but common still in London and in villages, for each housewife to sweep and keep clean the pavement before her own dwelling.

Balclutha (The tower of), in Ossian, is Dunn-dee, where Dunn means a tower. Those circular buildings so common in the Orkney and Shetland Islands, the Hebrides, and all the north of Scotland, are duns. Dee is a corruption of Tay, the river on which the city is built; in Latin, Tus-duunum.

Baldachin. The dais or canopy under which, in Roman Catholic processions, the Holy Sacrament is carried (Italian, baldacchino, so-called from Baldacco (Italian for Bagdad), where the cloth was made). Also the canopy above an altar.

Baldassare. Chief of the monastery of St. Jacopo di Compostella. (Doni- zetti's opera La Favorita.)

Balder. The god of peace, second son of Odin and Frigg. He was killed by the blind god Höder, at the instigation of Loki, but restored to life at the general request of the gods. (Scandinavian mythology.)

N.B.—Sydney Dobell (born 1824) has a poem entitled Balder, published in 1854.

Balder is the sun or daylight which is killed by the blind god at the instigation of Loki or darkness, but is restored to life the next day.
Balders abode was Broadblink (cast splendour).

Baldersdash. Ribaldry, jargon. (Danish baldor, tattle, clatter.)

Baldwin. The youngest and comeliest of Charlemagne’s paladins; and the nephew of Sir Roland.

Baldwin (in Jerusalem Delivered). The leader and ambitious Duke of Bologna, leader of 1,200 horse in the allied Christian army. He was Godfrey’s brother; not so tall, but very like him.

Baldwin, the Ass (in the tale of Reynard the Fox). In the third part of the Beast-epic he is called “Dr. Baldwin.” (Old German, bold friend.)

Bale. When bale is highest, boot is highest. When things have come to the worst they must needs mend.

Balearica Tormenta. Here tormenta means instruments for throwing stones. Caesar (Gallie War, iv. 25) says: “Fundi, tormentis, sagittis hostes propellere.” The inhabitants of the Balearic Islands were noted slingers, and indeed owe their name to this skill. (Greek, ballo, to cast or hurl.) Pronounce Bale-ari-ca.

Balfour of Burley. Leader of the Covenanters in Scott’s Old Mortality, a novel (1816).

Ballow. (See Horse.)

Balissarda or Balisarda. Roger’s sword, made by a sorceress, and capable of cutting through enchanted substances.

“With Balisarda’s slightest blow
Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail,
Nor sturdy-tempered plate, nor twisted mail.”

Rinaldo (Orlando Furioso), book xva.

Balistraría. Narrow apertures in the form of a cross in the walls of ancient castles, through which cross-bowmen discharged their arrows.

Baliverse (in Orlando Furioso). The basest knight in the Saracen army.

Balk means the high ridge between furrows (Anglo-Saxon balce, a beam, a ridge); hence a rising ground.

A balk of timber is a beam running across the ceiling, etc., like a ridge. As the balk is the part not cut by the plough, therefore “to balk” means to leave untouched, or to disappoint.

To make a balk. To miss a part of the field in ploughing. Hence to disappoint, to withhold deceitfully.

To make a balk of good ground. To throw away a good chance.

Balik. One who from an eminence balks or directs fishermen where shoals of herring have gathered together. (Anglo-Saxon, balt-an, to shout.)

Balista. The Queen of Sheba or Saba, who visited Solomon. (Al Kowm, c. ii.)

Ball. To strike the ball under the line. To fail in one’s object. The allusion is to the game of tennis, in which a line is stretched in the middle of the court, and the players standing on each side have, with their racketts, to knock it alternately over the line.

“Then last strucken the ball under the line.”—John Heywood’s Works (London, 1590).

To take the ball before the bound. To anticipate an opportunity; to be over-hasty. A metaphor from cricket, as when a batsman runs up to meet the ball at full pitch, before it bounds. (See Balle.)

Ball of Fortune (A). One tossed, like a ball, from pillar to post; one who has experienced many vicissitudes of fortune.

“Brown had been from infancy a ball for fortune to spurn at.”—Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xxvii.

The ball is with you. It is your turn now.

To have the ball at your feet. To have a thing in one’s power. A metaphor from foot-ball.

“We have the ball at our feet; and, if the government will allow it, we can now crush out the rebellion.”—Lord Auckland.

To keep the ball a-rolling. To continue without intermission. To keep the fun alive; to keep the matter going. A metaphor from the game of bandy, or la feit de la croix.

“It is Russian that keeps the ball rolling [the Servian and Bulgarian War, has, fomented and encouraged by Russian agents].”—Newspaper paragraph, 1883.

To keep the ball up. Not to let conversation or fun flag; to keep the thing going. A metaphor taken from several games played with balls.

“I put in a word now and then to keep the ball up.”—Bentham.

To open the ball. To lead off the first dance at a ball. (Italian, ballar, to dance.)

Balls. The three golden balls. The emblem of St. Nicholas, who is said to have given three purses of gold to three virgin sisters to enable them to marry.

As the cognisance of the Medici family, they probably represent three golden pills—a punning device on the name. Be this, however, as it may, it is from the Ballad

Lombard family (the first great moneylenders in England) that the sign has been appropriated by pawnbrokers. (See MUGGILLO for another account.)

Ballad means, strictly, a song to dance-music, or a song sung while dancing. (Italian, ballare, to dance, ballata, our ballad, ballet [g.r.]).

Ballads. "Let me make the ballads, and who will pay make the laws." Andrew Fletcher of Saltoun, in Scotland, wrote to the Marquis of Montrose, "I knew a very wise man of Sir Christopher Musgrave's sentiment. He believed, if a man were permitted to make all the ballads, he need not care who should make the laws" (1703).

Ballambangan (The Straits of). A sailor's joke for a place where he may lay any wonderful adventure. These straits, he will tell us, are so narrow that a ship cannot pass through without jamming the tails of the monkeys which haunt the trees on each side of the strait; or any other rigmarole which his fancy may conjure up at the moment.

Ballast. A man of no ballast. Not steady; not to be depended on. Unsteady as a ship without ballast. A similar phrase is, "The man wants ballast."

Balle. Prendre de balle un bon (French). Strike while the iron is hot; make hay while the sun shines. The allusion is to certain games at ball, which must be struck at the moment of the rebound.

Ballare. To take a ball to someone. (French.)

Balladino (Don Antonio). Intended for Anthony Munday, the dramatist. (Ben Jonson, The Case Illustred, a comedy.)

Ballad (pronounce bal-lay). A theatrical representation of some adventure or intrigue by pantomime and dancing. Baltazarini, director of music to Catherina de' Medici, was the inventor of modern ballads.

Balliol College. Oxford, founded in 1263, by John de Bailiol, Knight (father of Bailiol, King of Scotland).

Balloon. (A pilot.) Metaphorically, a feeler, sent to ascertain public opinion. "The first balloon sent from . . . has shown (the sender) the direction of the wind, and he now trims his sails accordingly." — Newspaper paragraph, January, 1889.

Balloon Post. During the siege of Paris, in 1871, fifty-four balloon posts were dispatched, carrying two-and-a-half million letters, weighing ten tons.

Balm (French, baume). Contraction of balas (g.r.). The Balm of Gilead = the balsam of Gilead.

Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no remedy, no consolation, not even in religion?

Balmawhapple. A stupid, obstinate Scottish laird in Scott's Waverley, a novel (1805).

Balmérito (Lord) was beheaded, but the executioner at the first stroke cut only half through the neck, and (we are told) his lordship turned round and grinned at the bungler.

Balmung or Gram. The sword of Siegfried, forged by Wieland, the Vulcan of the Scandinavians. Wieland, in a trial of merit, drove Amilias, a brother smith, through steel helmet and armour, down to the waist; but the cut was so fine that Amilias was not even aware that he was wounded till he attempted to move, when he fell into two pieces. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Balm. "I am going to the balm" — i.e. "To Balmal asleep;" one of Dick Swiveller's pet phrases. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Balm-stick (To put on the). In prison slang means to feign insanity: and the "Balm Yard" is the prison ward in which the insane, real or feigned, are confined.

Balmire. A land occupied by projectors. (Sciff: Gulliver's Travels.)

Balteswar. One of the kings of Cologne — i.e. the three Magi, who came from the East to pay reverence to the infant Jesus. The two other magi were Melchior and Gasper.

Balto. The Mediterranean of the north (Swedish, balten; Danish, ballt; Latin, balteus; English, belt), the sea of the "Belts."

Balwhadder (The Rev. Micah). A Scotch Presbyterian minister, full of fossilised national prejudices, but both kind-hearted and sincere. (Galt: Annals of the Parish, a novel (1821).)

Bambino. A picture or image of the infant Jesus, swaddled (Italian, bambino, a little boy). The most celebrated is that in the church of Sta. Maria, in the Ara Coeli of Rome.
Bambocciaides (4 syl.). Pictures of grotesque scenes in low life, such as country wakes, penny weddings, and so on. They are so called from the Italian word bamboccio (a cripple), a nickname given to Pieter van Laer, the first Dutch painter of such scenes, distinguished in Rome.

Bamboozle or Bamboche. (See Michael-Angelo des Bamboches.)

Bamboozle. To cheat by cunning, or daze with tricks.

"The third refinement observable in the letter I send you, consists of the choice of certain words invented by some pretty fellows, such as bauer, bambocci, ... and kidney ... some of which are now struggling for the vogue, and others are in possession of it."—Swift: The Tatler (Sept. 28, 1710).

To bambocci into (doing something). To bambocci one out of something. To get something by trickery.

Bampton Lectures. Founded by the Rev. John Bampton, canon of Salisbury. He left an estate to the university of Oxford, to pay for eight divinity lectures on given subjects, to be preached at Great St. Mary's, and printed afterwards.

Ban. A proclamation of outlawry; a denunciation by the church (Anglo-Saxon, ge-ban, a proclamation; verb, ge-bannan).

Marriage bans. (See BANNS.)

To ban is to make a proclamation of outlawry. To banish is to proclaim a man an exile. (See BANID.)

Lever le ban et l'arrière ban (French). To levy the ban was to call the king's vassals to active service; to levy thearrière ban was to levy the vassals of a suzerain or under-lord.

"Le mot ban, qui signifie bannie, se disait de l'appel fait par le seigneur a ses vassaux pour les convoyer sous son étendard. On distinguait le ban composite des vassaux immédiats, qui étaient convoqués par le roi lui-même, et l'arrière ban, composite des vassaux convocés par leurs suzerains."—Pouillet: Dictionnaire d'Histoire, etc.

Banagher. (See under BEATS.)

Banat. A territory under a ban (lord), from the Illyrian word bojan, a lord. The Turks gave this title to the lords of frontier provinces—e.g. the Banat of Croatia, which now forms part of the kingdom of Hungary.

Banbury. A Banbury-man—i.e. a Puritan (Ben Jonson); a bigot. From the reign of Elizabeth to that of Charles II. Banbury was noted for its number of Puritans and its religious "zeal."

As thin as Banbury cheese. In Jack Drum's Entertainment we read, "You are like a Banbury cheese, nothing but paring;" and Bardolph compares Smollett to Banbury cheese (Merry Wives, i. 1). The Banbury cheese is a rich milk cheese about an inch in thickness.

Banco. Sittings in Banco. Sittings of the Superior Court of Common Law in its own bench or court, and not in circuit, as a judge of nisi prius (q. v.). (Banco is Italian for "bench" or "seat of justice.")

So much banco—i.e. so much bunk money, as distinguished from current coin. At Hamburg, etc., currency is inferior to "bank money." (Not money in the bank, but the fictitious value set on cash by bankers.)

Bancus Regius. The king's or queen's bench. Bancus Communis, the bench of common pleas.

Bando. A pocket-handkerchief. It is an Indian word, properly applied to silk goods, but now restricted to cotton handkerchiefs having a dark ground of Turkey red or blue, with little white or yellow spots. (Hind., bandhu, a mode of dyeing.)

Bandbox. He comes out of a bandbox—i.e. he is so neat and precise, so carefully got up in his dress and person, that he looks like some company dress, carefully kept in a bandbox.

Neat as a bandbox. Neat as clothes folded and put by in a bandbox.

Bandbox Plot (The). Rapin (History of England, iv. 297) tells us that a bandbox was sent to the lord-treasurer, in Queen Anne's reign, with three pistols charged and cocked, the triggers being tied to a pack-thread fastened to the lid. When the lid was lifted, the pistols would go off, and shoot the person who opened the lid. He adds that [dean] Swift happened to be by at the time, and seeing the pack-thread, cut it, thereby saving the life of the lord-treasurer.

"Two ink-horns took your Whigs did fill\nWith gunpowder and lead;\nWith two sepulchres made of quill,\nYou in a bandbox laid;\nA tinder-box there was beside,\nWhich had a trigger to it;\nTo which the very string was tied,\nThat was designed to do it."

Plot upon Plot (about 1719).

Bande Noire. Properly, a black band; metaphorically, the Vandal Society. Those capitalists that bought up the Church property confiscated in the great French revolution were so called, because they recklessly pulled down ancient buildings and destroyed relics of great antiquity.
Bandit, plural banditti or bandits, properly means outlaw (Italian, bandito, banished, men pronounced “banned”). As these outlaws very often became robbers, the term soon came to signify banded highwaymen.

Banda. Clerical bands are a relic of the ancient amice, a square linen tippet tied about the neck of priests during the administration of mass (Discontinued by the parochial clergy the latter part of the 19th century, but still used by clerics on the Continent.)

Legal bands are a relic of the wide collars which formed a part of the ordinary dress in the reign of Henry VIII., and which were especially conspicuous in the reign of the Stuarts. In the showy days of Charles II., the plain bands were changed for lace ends.

"The eighth Henry, as I understand, was the first prince that ever wore a band." John Taylor, the Water Poet (1659-1654).

Bandy. I am not going to bandy words with you—i.e. to dispute about words. The reference is to a game called Bandy. The players have each a stick with a crook at the end to strike a wooden or other hard ball. The ball is banded from side to side, each party trying to beat it home to the opposite goal. (Anglo-Saxon, bendan, to bend.)

"The bat was called a bandy from its being bent."—Bandy: Popular Antiquities (article 'Bandy'), p. 330.

Bane really means ruin, death, or destruction (Anglo-Saxon, banna, a murderer); and "I will be his bane," means I will ruin or murder him. Bane is, therefore, a mortal injury.

"My bane and antidote are both before it. The word in a moment turns me to an end, But this [Pisto] assures me I shall never die."—Addison: Cato.

Bangorian Controversy. A theological paper-war stirred up by a sermon preached March 31st, 1717, before George I., by Dr. Hoadly, Bishop of Bangor, on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world." The best reply is by Law, in a series of Letters to Hoadly.

Bang-up, or Slap-bang. First-rate, thumping, as a "thumping legacy." It is a slang punning synonym of thumping or striking. Slap-bang is double bang, or doubly striking.

Banian or Banyan (A). A loose coat (Anglo-Indian).

"His coat was brownish black perhaps of wool, In summer time a banyan loose he wore."—Leblond: Passion's Story (stanza 12).

Bantín Days [Ban-yen]. Days when no meat is served to a ship’s crew. The term is derived from the Banians, a class of Hindu merchants, who carried on a most extensive trade with the interior of Asia, but being a caste of the Vaiya, abstained from the use of meat. (Sanskrit, banij, a merchant.)

Bank. A money-changer’s bench or table. (Italian banco or banca.)

Bank of a River. Stand with your back to the source, and face to the sea or outlet: the left bank is on your left, and right bank on your right hand.

Sisters of the Bank, i.e. of the bankside, "the brothel quarter" of London. Now removed to a different quarter, and divided into “North” and “South.”

"On this side of the Banke was sometimes the bordello or stews."—Stow: Survey.

Bankrupt. Money-lenders in Italy used to display the money they had to lend out on a banco or bench. When one of these money-lenders was unable to continue business, his bench or counter was broken up, and he himself was spoken of as un banco-bello, i.e. a bankrupt.

Bankside. Part of the borough of Southwark, noted in the time of Shakespeare for its theatres and retreats of the demi-monde, called “Sisters of the Bank.”

"Come, I will send for a whole coach or two of Bankside lasses, and we will be jovial!"—Randelph: The Muse's Looker, f. Gillis.

Bank’s Horse. A learned horse, called Marocco, belonging to one Banks, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. It is said that his shoes were of silver. One of his exploits was “the ascent of St. Paul’s steeple.”

Bannameyne Club. A literary club which takes its name from George Bannameyne, to whose industry we owe the preservation of very much of the early Scotch poetry. It was instituted in 1823 by Sir Walter Scott, and had for its object the publication of rare works illustrative of Scotch history, poetry, and general literature. The club was dissolved in 1839.

Banner means a piece of cloth. (Anglo-Saxon, fana; Latin, unda; Welsh, bann; Italian, bandiera; French, banniere.)

"An emperor’s banner should be six feet long, and the same in breadth; a king’s banner five feet; a prince’s and a duke’s banner, four feet; a marquis’s, an earl’s, a viscount’s, a baron’s, and a banneret’s banner shall be but three feet square."—Park.

The banner of the Prophet is called Banneret, and is kept in the Eyab mosque of Constantinople.

The two black banners borne before the Califs of the house of Abbas were called Night and Shadow.

The sacred banner of France is the Oriflamme (q.v.).

Banners in churches. These are suspended as thank-offerings to God. Those in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, Henry VII.'s Chapel, Westminster, etc., are to indicate that the knight whose banner is hung up, avows himself devoted to God's service.

Banneret. One who leads his vassals to battle under his own banner. A knight made in the field was called a banneret, because the chief ceremony was cutting or tearing off the pointed ends of his banner.

Bannière. Cent ans bannière, cent ans censure. The ups and downs of life. A grand seigneur who has had his banner carried before him for a century, may come to drive his hand-barrow through the streets as a costermonger.

Bannière. Il faut la croix et la bannière pour l'âme. If you want to have him, you must make a great fuss over him—you must go to meet him with cross and banner, "aller au devant de lui avec un croix et la bannière."

Banns of Marriage. The publication in the parish church for three successive Sundays of an intended marriage. It is made after the Second Lesson of the Morning Service. To announce the intention is called "Publishing the banns," from the words "I publish the banns of marriage between . . . . ." (Anglo-Saxon, ge-bannan, to proclaim, to announce).

To forbid the banns. To object to the proposed marriage.

"And a better fate did poor Maria deserve than to have a banns forbidden by the curate of the parish who published them."—Sterne: Sentimental Journey.

Banquet used at one time to mean the dessert. Thus, Taylor, in the Penniless Pilgrim, says: "Our first and second course being三位一体 dishes at one board, and after that, always a banquet." (French, banquet: bain, a bath, or table. We use "table" also for a meal or feast, as "the funeral baked meats did coldly furnish for the marriage table," i.e. feast.)

"After supper . . . . a delicate banquet, with abundance of wine."—Cromwell's End.

A banquet of brine. A flood of tears.

"My heart was charged to overflowing, and forced into my eyes a banquet of brine."—G. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 343.

Banquet. A Scotch general of royal extraction, who obtained several victories over the Highlanders and Danes in the reign of Donald VII. He was murdered by the order of Macbeth, and his ghost haunted the guilty usurper. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Banshee. The supposed domestic spirit of certain Irish or Highland Scottish families, supposed to take an interest in its welfare, and to wail at the death of one of the family. The Welsh "Cyfaeth" is a sort of Banshee.

The distinction of Banshee is allowed only to families of pure Milesian stock. (Gaelic, ban-sith, a woman-fairy.)

Bantam. A little bantam cock. A little plucky fellow that will not be bullied by a person bigger than himself. The bantam cock will encounter a dung-hill cock five times his own weight, and is therefore said to "have a great soul in a little body." The bantam originally came from Bantam, in Java.

Bantling. Dum Bantling. Reducing superfluous fat by living on meat diet, and abstaining from beer, furnaceous food, and vegetables, according to the method adopted by William Banting, a London cabinet-maker, once a very fat man (born 1796, died 1878). The word was introduced about 1864.

Bantling. A child. Mahn suggests the German, bauklings, a bastard. (Query, bantling, a little one in swaddling-clothes.)

Banyan. A Hindū shopkeeper. In Bengal it denotes a native who manages the money concerns of a European, and also serves as an interpreter. In Madras such an agent is called Dubash (i.e. one who can speak two languages). (See BANIAN DAYS.)

Bap or Raphomat. An imaginary idol or symbol, which the Templars were said to employ in their mysterious rites. The word is a corruption of Mahomet. (French, Raphomat; Old Spanish, Matomat.)

Baptes (2 syl.). Priests of the goddess Cotyto, whose midnight orgies were so obscene that they disgusted even Cotyto, the goddess of obscenity. They received their name from the Greek verb bapto, to wash, because they bathed themselves in the most effeminate manner. (Juvenal, ii, 91.)
Baptist. John the Baptist. His symbol is a sword, the instrument by which he was beheaded.

Bar. The whole body of barristers; as bench means the whole body of bishops.

"A dinner was given to the English Bar."—The Times.

Bar, excepting. In racing phrase a man will bet "Two to one, bar one," that is, two to one against any horse in the field with one exception. The word means "barring out" one, shutting out, or debarring one.

Bar. At the bar. As the prisoner at the bar, the prisoner in the dock before the judge.

Trial at bar, i.e. by the full court of judges. The bar means the place set apart for the business of the court.

To be called to the bar. To be admitted a barrister. The bar is the partition separating the seats of the benchers from the rest of the hall. Students having attained a certain status used to be called from the body of the hall within the bar, to take part in the proceedings of the court. To disbar is to discard from the bar. Now, "to be called within the bar" means to be appointed king's (or queen's) counsel; and to disbar means to expel a barrister from his profession.

Bar, in heraldry. An honourable ordinary, consisting of two parallel lines drawn across the shield and containing a fifth part of the field.

A bar sinister in heraldic shield means one drawn the reverse way; that is, not from left to right, but from right to left. Popularly but erroneously supposed to indicate bastardy.

Bar (Trial at). The examination of a difficult cause before the four judges in the superior courts.

"A mere monster, brought in with a large painted nose. ... He kills a sport, ruining whole nurseries, invents infernal machines."—C. Lamb.

Barataria. Sancho Panza's island-city, over which he was appointed governor. The table was presided over by Doctor Pedro Bézio de Aquére, who caused every dish set upon the board to be removed without being tasted—some because they heated the blood, and others because they chilled it; some for one ill effect, and some for another; so that Sancho was allowed to eat nothing. The word is from barato (cheap).

"The meat was put on the table, and whisked away, like Sancho’s inauguration feast at Barataria."—Thackeray.

Barathron. A deep ditch behind the Acropolis of Athens into which malefactors were thrown: somewhat in the same way as criminals at Rome were cast from the "Tarpeian Rock."

Barb. An arrow. The feathers under the beak of a hawk were called barb feathers (beard feathers). The point of an arrow has two iron "feathers," which stick out so as to hinder the extraction of the arrow. (Latin, barba, a beard.)

N.B.—The barb is not the feather on the upper part of the shaft, but the hooked iron point or head.

Barb. A Barbary steed, noted for docility, speed, endurance, and spirit. (See Barbed Steeds.)

Barbari. Quod non fecerunt Barbari, fecerunt Barberini (What the barbarians left standing, Barberini contrived to destroy). Pope Barberini robbed the roof of the Pantheon to build the Baldacchino, or canopy of St. Peter's. It is made entirely of bronze, and weighs ninety tons.

Barbarians is certainly not derived from the Latin barba (a beard), as many suppose, because it is a Greek word, and has many analogous ones. The Greeks and Romans called all foreigners barbarians (babblers; men who spoke a language not understood by them); the Jews called them Gentiles (other nations); the Russians Ostrogs (foreigners). The reproachful meaning crept in from the natural egotism of man. It is not very long ago that an Englishman looked with disdainful pity on a foreigner, and the French still retain much of the same national exclusiveness. (S. Wunderberg.)

"If then I know not the meaning of the voice [words], I shall be to him that speaketh a barbarian [a foreigner], and he that speaketh will be a barbarian unto me."—1 Cor. xiv. 11.

Barbarossa [Red-beard, similar to Rufus]. The surname of Frederick I. of Germany (1121-1190). Also Khair-eddin Barbarossa, a famous corsair of the sixteenth century.

Barbary. St. Barbary, the patron saint of arsenals and powder magazines. Her father delivered her up to Martian, governor of Nicomedia, for being a Christian. After she had been subjected to the most cruel tortures, her unnatural father was about to strike off her head, when a lightning flash laid him dead at her feet. Hence, those who invoke saints select St. Barbara in thunderstorms. (See BARBE.)

Roan Barbary. The favourite horse of Richard II. (See Horse.)

"O, how it joyed my heart when I beheld in London streets that comination day, When Bolingbroke rode on roan Barbary. To think that thou (Rich. II.) so often hast beatrieid, That horse that I so carefully have dressed." Shakespeare: Richard II., v. 5.

Barbason. A fiend mentioned by Shakespeare in the Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2, and in Henry V., ii. 1.

"Aaminam sounds well, Lucifer well, Barbason well; yet they are . . . the names of fiends."— Merry Wives.

Barbashure (or Blue-Beard). See "Punch's Prize Novelists," by Thackeray.

Barbe (Sic.). The powder-room in a French ship: so called from St. Barbara, the patron saint of artillery. (Sec BARBARY.)

A barbe de fou apprend-on a voir (French). An apprentice is taught to shave on the chin of a fool.

T'as fait un barbe, qui n'est pas beau (French). You may waste half the day on making your toilet, and yet not come forth an Adonis. You cannot make a silk purse of a sow's ear. Not every block will make a Mercury.

"Heed lying cards a million on your head.
On socks, a cubic high, plant your proud tread,
You're just what you are—all's all about it."— Pope: Anacreon, iii. 38.

Barbecue (3 syl.). A West Indian dish, consisting of a hog roasted whole, stuffed with spices, and basted with Madeira wine. Any animal roasted whole is so called.

"Oldfield, with more than hearty throat inflated.
Cries, 'Send me, ye gods, a whole hog barbecued!'"— Pope: Satires, ii. 23, 29.

Barbed Steed (a corruption of barbeted). A horse in armour. (French, barde, caparisoned.)

"And now, instead of mounting barbeted steeds To strew the souls of fearful creatures,
He eathers mildly in a lady's chateau,
To the lascivious pleasing of a lust."— Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 11.

Barbel. Latin, belerbellos (the barbel fish): so called from the barbules, or fleshy appendages round the mouth.

Barbellona. A sect of Gnostics. Their first immortal son they called Barbeloth, omniscient, eternal, and incorruptible. He engendered light by the instrumentality of Christ, author of Wisdom. From Wisdom sprang Autogenes, and from Autogenes, Adam (male and female), and from Adam, matter. The first angel created was the Holy Ghost, from whom sprang the first prince, named Protarchontes, who married Arrogance, whose offspring was Sin.

Barber. Every barber knows that "Omnibus notum totius mundi."— Horace: Ep. a Brutus, v. 1. 3.

In Rome the towmegue or barbers' shops were the fashionable resort of loutards and idlers. Here every scandal was known, and all the talk of the town was repeated.

Barber Poet. Jacques Jasmin, last of the Troubadours, who was a barber of Gascony. (1798-1864.)

Barber's Pole. The gilt knob at the end represents a brass basin, which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole. The basin has a notch cut in it to fit the throat, and was used for lathering customers who came to be shaven. The pole represents the staff held by pereous in venescence; and the two spiral ribbons painted round it represent the two bandages, one for twisting round the arm previous to blood-letting, and the other for binding. Barbers used to be the surgeons, but have fallen from "their high estate." Since science has made its voice "to be heard on high."

N.B. — The Barbers' Hall stood in Monkwell Street, Cripplegate. The last barber-surgeon in London was Middle-ditch, of Great Suffolk Street, in the Borough. He died 1821.

"To this day" (1811), says Warton, "belongs the Barber-Surgeon's picture of Henry VIII granting a charter to the Corporation. The barbers and surgeons of London, originally constituting one company, had been separated, but were again, in the 33 Henry VIII., reunited into a single society and it was the ceremony of presenting them with a new charter which is referred to in that memorable line in Holinshed's history, now in their hall in Monkwell Street."

Barbican (Thre) or Barbacan. The outwork in a fort to defend the drawbridge in a fortified town or castle (French, barbacan). Also an opening or loophole in the wall of a fortress, through which guns may be fired.

Barbier. Un barbier rase l'antre (French). Caw me and I'll caw thee. One good turn deserves another. One barber shaves another.

Barcarole (3 syl.). A song sung by Venetian barcaroli, as they row their gondolas. (Italian, barcarola, a boatman.)

Barcelona (J). A fichu, piece of velvet for the neck, or small neck-tie, made at Barcelona, and common in Barclayans

Barrochëbah or Barochëbehah (Shimeon). A fanatical leader of the Jews who headed a revolt of the Jews against the Romans A.D. 132, took Jerusalem in 132, and was slain by Julius Severus in an assault of Bethel, A.D. 153.

Bardeasanists. Followers of Bardeasian, of Edessa, founder of a Gnostic sect in the second century. They believed that the human body was ethereal till it became imbruted with sin. Milton, in his Comus, refers to this:—

"When Lust
By unchaste looks, loose gestures, and foul talk,
But most by beard, and his lashings so
Let’s in declension to the inward put,
The soul groves cliffed by contagion,
Embodiments and imbrutes."

Bardit. The ancient German chant, which incited to war.

Bardo de Bard. A wealthy Florentine scholar, father of Romola, in George Eliot’s Romola, a novel (1863).

Bardo. One of Falstaff’s inferior officers. Falstaff calls him “the knight of the burning lamp,” because his nose was so red, and his face so “full of meteors.” He is a low-bred, drunken swaggerer, without principle, and poor as a church mouse. (Merry Wives; Henry IV., i., ii.)

"We must have better assurance for Sir John than Bardot’s. We like not the security."—Lord Macaulay.

Barbs. The oldest bardic compositions that have been preserved are of the fifth century; the oldest existing manuscript is the Psalter of Cashel, a collection of bardic compilations, compiled in the ninth century by Cormac Mac Cullinan, bishop of Cashel and king of Munster.

Bard of Ayton. Shakespeare, who was born and buried at Stratford-upon-Avon. Also called “The bard of all times.” (1564-1616.)

Bard of Ayrshire. Robert Burns, a native of Ayrshire. (1759-1796.)

Bard of Hope. Thomas Campbell, author of The Pleasures of Hope. (1777-1844.)

Barley. Dogs in their wild state never bark: they howl, whine, and growl, but do not bark. Barking is an acquired habit; and as only domesticated dogs...
Barley-mow. A heap of barley housed, or where it is housed. (Anglo-Saxon, mow, a heap; Italian, mucedo; Spanish, mucho.)

Barley Sugar. Sugar boiled in a decoction of barley. It is not now made so, but with saffron, sugar, and water, flavoured with oil of citron, orange, or lemon.

"Barley sugar was prepared by boiling down ordinary sugar in a decoction of pearl barley."—Knowledge (July 19th, 1863).

Barmecide (3 syl.). The word is used to express the uncertainty of things on which we set our heart. As the beggar looked forward to a feast, but found only empty dishes; so many a joy is found to be mere illusion when we come to partake of it.

"To-morrow! the mysterious unknown guest. Who comes aloud. Remember Barmecide! And tremble to be happy with the rest."—Longfellow.

Barmecide's Feast. A feast where there is nothing to eat: any illusion. Barmecide asked Schac'abac, a poor, starving wretch, to dinner, and set before him an empty plate. "How do you like your soup?" asked the merchant. "Exceptionally well," replied Schac'abac. "Did you ever see whiter bread?" "Never, honourable sir," was the civil answer. Wine was then brought in, and Schac'abac was pressed to drink, but excused himself by saying he was always quarrelsone in his cups. Being over-persuaded, he fell foul of his host, and was provided with food to his heart's content. (Arabian Nights: Barré's Sixth Brother.)

Barnabas. St. Barnabas' Day, June 11. St. Barnabas was a fellow-labourer of St. Paul. His symbol is a rake, because the 11th of June is the time of hay-harvest.

Barnabites (3 syl.). An Order of monks, so called because the church of St. Barnabas, in Milan, was given to them to preach in. They are also called "Canons of St. Paul," because the original society made a point of reading St. Paul's Epistles.

Barnaby Lecturers. Four lecturers in the University of Cambridge, elected annually on St. Barnabas' Day (June 11), to lecture on mathematics, philosophy, rhetoric, and logic.

Barnaby Rudge. A half-witted lad whose companion is a raven. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge.)

Barnacle. The Solar goose. The strange tales of this creature have arisen Barnacles. Placemen who stick to their offices but do little work, like the barnacles which live on the ship but impede its progress.

"The redundants would be 'Barnacles' with a vengeance... and the work be all the worse done for theingers-on."—Nineteenth Century Augusts, 1888, p. 280.

Barnacles. Spectacles, or rather reading-glasses; so called because in shape they resemble the twitchers used by farriers to keep under restraint unruly horses during the process of bleeding, dressing, or shoeing. This instrument, formerly called a barnacle, consisting of two branches joined at one end by a hinge, was fixed on the horse's nose. Dr. Latham considers the word a corruption of binocles (double-eye), Latin, binus oculus. Another suggestion is "binnacle," the case on board ship in which the steering compass is placed, illuminated when it is dark by a lamp.

Barnardine. A reckless, dissolute fellow, "fearless of what's past, present, and to come." (Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.)

Barn-burners. Destructive, who, like the Dutchman of story, would burn down their barns to rid themselves of the rats.

Barnet. An epicure who falls in love with, and marries, a lady on account of her skill in dressing a dish of stewed carp. (Edward, a novel by Dr. John Moore, 1706.)

Barnwell (George). The chief character in a prose tragedy, so called, by George Iffle. He was a London apprentice, who fell in with a wanton in Shore-ditch, named Sarah Millwood, whom he visited, and to whom he gave £200 of his master's money, and ran away. He next robbed his uncle, a rich grazier at Lud-low, and beat out his brains. Having spent the money, Sarah turned him out of doors, and each informed against the other. Sarah Millwood and George Barnwell were both hanged. (Lillo, 1693-1739.)

Baron-Devel. The great god of the gipsies. His son is named Alako.

Baron properly means a man (Old High German, baro). It was a term applied to a serving-soldier, then to a military chief, and ultimately to a lord. The reverse of this is seen in our word slave (a servile menial), which is the Slavonic word slav (noble). (See Idiot.)

Baron Bung. Mine host, master of the beer bung.

Baron Munchausen (pron. Mookh-muzehn). Said to be a satire on Bruce, the Abyssinian traveller, to whom the work was dedicated. The author was Raspé, a German fugitive from the officers of justice, living in Cornwall (1785). The chief incidents were compiled from various sources.

Baron of Beef. Two sirloins left uncuit at the backbone. The baron is the backpart of the ox, called in Danish, the ruy. Jocosely, but wrongly, said to be a pun upon baron and sir loin.

Barons' War (The). An historical poem by Michael Drayton (1603), "The pictures of Mortimer and the queen, and of Edward's entrance into the castle, are splendid and Upstart."—Campbell.

Barrack Hack (The). A lady who hangs on the sleeve of a military officer, attends all barrack fêtes of every description, and is always ready to get up a dance, dinner, or picnic, to please the officers on whom she dances attendance.

Barracks. Means huts made of the branches of trees (Gaelic, barr, the top of anything; barrach, the top-branches of trees; barrachad, a hut made of branches). Our word is plural, indicative of the whole collection; but the French baraque is singular. (See B. K. S.)

Barrack (7s). To jeer at, to receive with derisive applause. The substantive barrackoing = derisive cheers and shouts, is also in use. These terms were introduced during the visit of the Australian cricketers in 1899.

Barratry or Bartry. Qui fait barat, barat lui vient (French). With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. Barratry is false faith to one's employers. It is a sea term, and means the commission of a fraud on the owners or insurers of a ship by the captain or the crew. The fraud may consist of many phases, such as deserting the ship, sinking her, falsifying her cargo, etc. The French have other proverbs to the same effect: as, La tricherie revient presque toujours à son maître. “He made a pit and... is fallen into the ditch which he made. His mischief shall return upon his own head.” (Psalm vii. 14, 15, 16.)

Barrel Fever. Intoxication or illness from intemperance in drink.

Barrel’s Blues. The 4th Foot; so called from the colour of their facings, and William Barrel, colonel of the regiment (1794-1799). Now called “The King’s Own (Royal Lancaster Regiment).” They were called “Lions” from their badge, The Lion of England.

Barrette. Parler à la barrette (French). To give one a thump on the head. The word barrette means the cap worn by the lower orders.

“Et moi, je pourrais me servir à la barrette.”
Molière; Le Bourgeois. It is also used to signify the ordinary birretta of ecclesiastics and (probably) of French lawyers. Il à reçu le chapeau or la barrette. He has been made a cardinal.

“Le pape lui envoya sa barrette, mais elle ne servit qu’à le faire mourir cardinal.”—Voltaire; Le Siècle de Louis XIV., chap. xxix.

Barrière’s (3 syl.). To block up. The term rose in France in 1588, when Henri de Guise returned to Paris in defiance of the king’s order. The king sent for his Swiss Guards, and the Parisians tore up the pavement, threw chains across the streets, and piled up barrels filled with earth and stones, behind which they shot down the Swiss as they passed through the streets. The French for barrel is barrique, and to barricade is to stop up the streets with these barrels.

The day of the Barricades:
(1) May 12th, 1588, when the people forced Henri III. to flee from Paris.
(2) August 6th, 1648, the beginning of the Fronde War.
(3) July 27th, 1830, the first day of the grand séminaire which drove Charles X. from the throne.
(4) February 21th, 1848, which drove Louis Philippe to abdicate and flee to England.
(5) June 23rd, 1848, when Affre, Archbishop of Paris, was shot in his attempt to quell the insurrection.
(6) December 2nd, 1851, the day of the coup d’état, when Louis Napoleon made his appeal to the people for re-election to the Presidency for ten years.

Barrier Treaty, November 5th, 1715, by which the Dutch reserved the right of holding garrisons in certain fortresses of the Spanish Netherlands.

Barriskin. Jargon, words not understood. (Old French, baraska, from the Breton, bara gwyn, “white bread,” taken as a type of barbarous words; modern French, baragouin, gibberish.)

Barring-out. A practice of barring the master out of the schoolroom in order to dictate terms to him. It was once common, but is now number with past customs. Miss Edgeworth has a tale so called.

Barrister. One admitted to plead at the bar; one who has been called to the bar.” The bar is the rail which divides the counsel from the audience, or the place thus enclosed. Tantamount to the rood-screen of a church, which separates the chancel from the rest of the building. Both these are relics of the ancient notion that the laity are an inferior order to the privileged class.

“A silk gown or bencher pleads within the bar, a stuff gown or outer barrister pleads without the bar.

An Outer or Utter Barrister. This phrase alludes to an ancient custom observed in courts of law, when certain barristers were allowed to plead; but not being benchers (king’s counsel or sergeants-at-law) they took their seats: “at the end of the forms called the bar.” The Utter Barrister comes next to a bencher, and all barristers inferior to the Utter Barristers are termed “Inner Barristers.”

The whole society is divided into three ranks: Benchers, Utter Barristers, and Inner Barristers.

An Inner Barrister. A barrister inferior in grade to a Bencher or Utter Barrister.

A Renewing Barrister. One appointed to revise the lists of electors.

A Vacation Barrister. One newly called to the bar, who for three years has to attend in “long vacation.”

Barristers’ Bags. In the Common Law bar, barristers’ bags are either red or dark blue. Red bags are reserved for Queen’s Counsel and sergeants; but a stuff gownsman may carry one “if presented with it by a silk.” Only red bags may be taken into Common Law Courts; blue bags must be carried no farther. than the robing room. In the Chancery Courts the etiquette is not so strict.

Barristers’ Gowns. “Utter barristers wear a stuff or bombazine gown, and the puckered material between the shoulders of the gown is all that is now left of the purse into which, in early days, the successful litigant... dropped his... pecuniary tribute... for services rendered.” Notes and Queries, 11 March, 1893, p. 124. The fact is that the counsel was supposed to appear merely as a friend of the litigant. Even now he cannot recover his fees.

Barry Cornwall, poet. A nom de plume of Bryan Waller Procter. It is an anagram of his name. (1788-1874.)

Baranianas. Heretics who arose in the sixth century. They made their sacrifices consist in taking wheat flour on the top of their first finger, and carrying it to their mouth.

Bar-sur-Aube (Prévôt). Je ne pourrais pas être roi, si j’étais prévôt de Bar-sur-Aube (French). I should not care to be king, if I were Provost of Bar-sur-Aube [the most lucrative and honourable of all the provostships of France]. Almost the same idea is expressed in the words

> “And often to our comfort we shall find, / The sharped beak in a safer hold / Than in the full-winged eagle.”

> Almost to the same effect Pope says: / “And more true joy Marcellus exult’d feels, / Than Caesar with a senate at his heels.”

> See Castle of Bungay.

Bartolo. A doctor in the comedies of Le Mariage de Figaro, and Le Barbier de Séville, by Beaumarchais.

Bartholomew (St.). The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was flayed alive.

St. Bartholomew’s Day, August 24th. Probably Bartholomew is the apostle called “Nathaniel” by St. John the Evangelist (i. 45-51).

Massacre of St. Bartholomew. The slaughter of the French Protestants in the reign of Charles IX., begun on St. Bartholomew’s Day, i.e. between the 24th and 25th August, 1572. It is said that 30,000 persons fell in this dreadful persecution.

Bartholomew Fair. Held in West Smithfield (1333-1855) on St. Bartholomew’s Day.

> A Bartholomew doll. A tawdry, overdressed woman; like a flashy, bespangled doll offered for sale at Bartholomew Fair.

A Bartholomew pig. A very fat person. At Bartholomew Fair one of the chief attractions used to be a pig, roasted whole, and sold piping hot. Falstaff calls himself,

> “A little tidy Bartholomew boar-pig.” — Henry IV., l. 4.

Barthram’s Dirge (in Sir Walter Scott’s Border Minstrelsy). Sir Noel Paton, in a private letter, says: “The subject of this dirge was communicated to Sir Walter as a genuine fragment of the ancient Border Muse by his friend Mr. Surtees, who is in reality its author. The ballad has no foundation in history; and the fair lady, her lover, and the nine brothers, are but the creation of the poet’s fancy.” Sir Noel adds: “I never painted a picture of this subject, though I have often thought of doing so. The engraving which appeared in the Art Journal was executed without my concurrence from the oil sketch, still, I presume, in the collection of Mr. Pender, the late M.P., by whom it was brought to the Exhibition of the Royal Scottish Academy here” (at Edinburgh) November 19th, 1866.

Bartol’doo. A rich old miser, who died of fear and penurious self-denial. Fazio rifled his treasures, and, being accused by his own wife Bianca, was put to death. (Dun Milman: Fazio.)

Bartole (2 syl.). He knows his “Bartole” as well as a cordelier his “Dormi” (French). Bartole was an Italian lawyer, born in Umbria (1313-1365), whose authority amongst French barristers is equal to that of Blackstone with us. The cordeliers or Franciscans were not great at preaching, and perhaps for this reason used a collection called Dormi, containing the best specimens of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. This compilation was called Dormi from the first word in the book. The compilation is anonymous.

Bartolist. One skilled in law. (See above.)

Bazilai (3 syl.). The Duke of Ormond, a friend and staunch adherent of Charles II. The allusion is to Bazilai, who assisted David when he was expelled by Absalom from his kingdom (2 Sam. xvii. 27-29).

> “Bazilai crowned with honours and with joy / In exile with his godlike prince he mourned, / For him he suffered, and with him returned.”

> Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, l. 517-524.

Bas Bleu. (See Blue Stocking.)
Base. The basis, or that on which an animal walks (Greek, báima, to go, and básis, a footstep). The foot is the foundation—hence, base of a pillar, etc. It is also the lowest part, and hence the notion of worthless. Base in music (Italian, basso) is the lowest part, or the part for the lowest compass of voice.

Base Tenure. Holding by copy of court-roll, in opposition to freeholders.

Base of Operation, in war. That is, a fortified or otherwise secure spot, where the magazines of all sorts can be formed, whence the army can derive stores, and upon which (in case of reverse) it can fall back. If a fleet, it is called a mooring base; if a fortified or other immovable spot, it is called a fixed base. The line from such a base to the object aimed at is called "the Line of Operation."

Basah. An arrogant, domineering man; so called from the Turkish viceroyes and provincial governors, each of whom bears the title of bascha (pacha).

A three-tailed basah. A beglerbeg or prince of princes among the Turks, having a standard of three horse-tails borne before him. The next in rank is the basah with two tails, and then the bey, who has only one horse-tail.

Basilian Monks. Monks of the Order of St. Basil, who lived in the fourth century. This Order has produced 14 popes, 1,905 bishops, 3,010 abbots, and 11,983 martyrs.

Basileia. Originally the court of the Athenian archon, called the basileus, who used to give judgment in the stoa basileiké. At Rome these courts of justice had their naves, aisles, porticoes, and tribunals; so that when used for Christian worship very little alteration was needed. The church of St. John Lateran at Rome was an ancient basilica.

Basilois or Basiliaca. A digest of laws begun by the Byzantine emperor Basil I in 867, and completed by his son Leo, the philosopher, in 880.

Basilidians. A sect of Gnostic heretics, followers of Basilides, an Alexandrian Gnostic, who taught that from the unborn Father "Mind" was begotten; from Mind proceeded "The Word"; from the Word or Logos proceeded "Understanding"; from Understanding "Wisdom" and "Power"; from Wisdom and Power "Excellencies," "Princes," and "Angels," the agents which created heaven. Next to these high mightinesses come 305 celestial beings, the chief of whom is Abraxas (q.v.), and each of whom has his special heaven. What we call Christ is what the Basilidians term The first-begotten "Mind."

Basiliscus. A braggart; a character in an old play entitled Solymus and Perseda. Shakespeare makes the Bastard say to his mother, who asks him why he boasted of his ill-birth, "Knight, knight, good mother, Basiliscus-like"—i.e. my boasting has made me a knave.

(King John, i. 1.)

Basilisk. The king of serpents (Greek, basiliscus, a king), supposed to have the power of "looking any one dead on whom it fixed its eyes." Hence Dryden makes Clytus say to Alexander, "Nay, frown not so; you cannot look me dead." This creature is called a king from having on its head a mitre-shaped crest. Also called a cockatrice, and fabulously alleged to be hatched by a serpent from a cock's egg.

Plunging a beast in mortal's gore: Or basilisk, when roused, whose breath Teeth, sting, and exhal'd all are death.

King: Art of Love.

Basket. To be left in the basket. Neglected or un cared for. Left in the waste-basket.

To give a basket. To refuse to marry. In Germany a basket [korb] is fixed on the roof of one who has been jilted, or one who, after long courtship, cannot persuade the lady courted to become his wife.

Baschians. Clerks of the basilica or palace. When the Kings of France inhabited the "Palace of Justice," the judges, advocates, proctors, and lawyers went by the common name of the clercs de la bascoche; subsequently (in 1303) divided into "Clerks of the Palace," and "Clerks of the Châtelet." The chief of the baschians was called Le roi de la bascoche, and had his court, coin, and grand officers. He reviewed his "subjects" every year, and administered justice twice a week. Henri III. suppressed the title of the chief, and transferred all his functions and privileges to the Chancellor.

Bass. Matting made of bast, that is the lime or linden tree. Dutch, bast, bark; Swedish, basta, to bind; so called because used for binding. "Ribbons from the linden tree give a wreath no charms to me." The shepherds of Bastard. Any sweetened wine, but more correctly applied to a sweet Spanish wine (white or brown) made of the bastard muscadine grape.

"I will pledge you willingly in a cup of bastard."—See Walter Scott: Kenilworth, chap. III.

Baste (1 syl.). I’ll baste your jacket for you, i.e. cane you. I’ll give you a thorough basting, i.e. beating. (Spanish, baston, a stick; Italian, bastone; French, bâton.)

 Bastille means simply a building (French, bastir, now bâtir, to build). Charles V built it as a royal château; Philippe-Auguste enclosed it with a high wall; St. Louis administered justice in the park, under the oak-trees; Philippe de Valois demolished the old château and commenced a new one; Louis XI. first used it as a state prison; and it was demolished by the rabble in the French Revolution, July 14th, 1789.

 Bastina’d, A beating (Italian, bastone; French, baston, now bâton, a stick). The Chinese, Turks, and Persians punish offenders by beating them on the soles of the feet. The Turks call the punishment zarb.

 Bastion (4), in fortification, is a work having two faces and two flanks, all the angles of which are salient, that is, pointing outwards towards the country. The line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two bastions is technically called a curtain.

 Bastions in fortifications were invented in 1526 by Archimedes Pauly; but San Michael of Verona, in 1577, is said by Maffei and Vassari to have been the real inventor.

Bat. Harlequin’s lath wand (French, batte, a wooden sword).

To carry out one’s bat (in cricket). Not to be “out” when the time for drawing the stump has arrived.

Off his own bat. By his own exertions; on his own account. A cricketer’s phrase, meaning runs won by a single player.

Bat-horses and Bat-men. Bat-horses are those which carry officers’ baggage during a campaign (French, bâ, a pack-saddle). Bat-men are those who look after the pack-horses.

Batavia. The Netherlands; so called from the Batavi, a Celtic tribe who dwelt there.

"Flat Batavia’s willowy groves.”—Wordsworth.

Bat me an Ace. (See Bolton.)

Bath. Knights of the Bath. This name is derived from the ceremony of bathing, which used to be practised at the inauguration of a knight, as a symbol of purity. The last knights created in this ancient form were at the coronation of Charles II. in 1661. G.C.B. stands for Grand Cross of the Bath (the first-class); K.C.B. Knight Commander of the Bath (the second class); C.B. Companion of the Bath (the third class).

King of Bath. Richard Nash, generally called Beau Nash, a celebrated master of the ceremonies at Bath for fifty-six years. (1674-1761.)

There, go to Bath with you! Don’t talk nonsense. Insane persons used to be sent to Bath for the benefit of its mineral waters. The implied reproof is, what you say is so silly, you ought to go to Bath and get your head shaved.

Bath Brick. Alluvial matter made in the form of a brick, and used for cleaning knives and polishing metals. It is not made at Bath, but at Bridgewater, being dredged from the river Parrett, which runs through Bridgewater.

Bath Chair (A). A chair mounted on wheels and used for invalids. Much used at Bath, frequented by invalids for its hot springs.

Bath Metal. The same as Pinchbeck (q.v.). An alloy consisting of sixteen parts copper and five of zinc.

Bath Post. A letter paper with a highly-glazed surface, used by the highly-fashionable visitors of Bath when that watering-place was at its prime. (See Post.) Since the introduction of the penny post and envelope system, this paper has gone out of general use.

Bath Shillings. Silver tokens coined at Bath in 1811-1812, and issued for 4s., for 2s., and for 1s., by C. Culverhouse, J. Orchard, and J. Phipps.

Bath Stone. A species of limestone, used for building, and found in the Lower Oolite, in Wiltshire and Somersetshire. It is easily wrought in the quarry, but hardens on exposure to the air. Called “Bath stone because several of the quarries are near Bath, in Somersetshire.
Bath (Major). A poor, high-minded officer, who tries to conceal his poverty by bold speech and ostentatious bearing. Colman's Poor Gentleman (Lieutenant Worthington) is a similar character. (Fielding: Amelia (a novel) 1751.)

Bath-kol (daughter of the voice). A sort of divination common among the ancient Jews after the gift of prophecy had ceased. When an appeal was made to Bath-kol, the first words uttered after the appeal were considered oracular.

Bathos [Greek, bathos, depth]. A ludicrous descent from grandiloquence to commonplace. A literary mermaid.

"Humano capit cervicem plector equinam
Jungere at seit ... ut tumipter strum
Denomat in pacem nullar fornas suprema."
"Partiunt montes, nascetur ridiculus mus.
Horrors: De Arte Poetica, bk. x. 130.
A good example is the well-known couplet:
"And thou, Dalmatia, the great god of war, Lieutenant-general to the earl of Mar."

Bathsheba. The Duchess of Portsmouth, a favourite court lady of Charles II. The allusion is to the wife of Uriah the Hittite, criminally betrayed by David (2 Sam. xi.). The Duke of Monmouth says:

"My father, whom with reverence yet I use, Charmed into ease, is careless of his name: And, bribed with petty sums of foreign gold, Is grown in Bathsheba's embrace old."
( Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, l. 707-10.

Bathyllus. A beautiful boy of Samos, greatly beloved by Polykrates the tyrant, and by the poet Anacreon. (See Horace: Epistle xiv. 9.)

"To them [i.e. the aesthetic school] the boyhood of Bathyllus is of more moment than the maturish of Napoleon." —Mallet: The New Republic, book iv. chap. 1.

Battista. The fabric is so called from Battista of Cambrai, who first manufactured it.

Batrachomyomachia (pronounce Ba-trako-nyo-mak'ia). A storm in a puddle; much ado about nothing. The word is the name of a mock heroic poem in Greek, supposed to be by P. of Caria, and means The Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Batta or Batty (Hindustanee). Perquisites; wages. Properly, an allowance to East Indian troops in the field. In garrison they are put on half-batta.

"He would rather lie on half-pay in garrison than court the venison, than vegetate on full batta where there was none." —O. K. Duty: Thomas Muero, vol. i. chap. iv. p. 227.

Battar, Al [the Trenchant]. One of Mahomet's swords, consecrated from the Jews when they were exiled from Medina.

Battle. Rations or "commons" allowed to students at the University of Oxford. (To batten, to feast.)

Battel Bills. Battery bills at the universities. (See above.)

Battersea. You must go to Battersea to get your simples cut. A reproof to a simpleton, or one who makes a very foolish observation. The market gardeners of Battersea used to grow simples (medicinal herbs), and the London apothecaries went there to select or cut such as they wanted. (See Navio.)

Battle. Professor Creasy says there are fifteen decisive battles, which led to some great political change: B. C. 490. Marathón; 413, Syracuse; 331, Arbela; 207, Metaurus; the defeat of the Romans under Varus by Arminius, 9; Chalons, A.D. 451; Tours, 732; Hastings, 1066; Joan of Arc's victory at Orléans, 1429; the Armada, 1588; Blenheim, 1704; Pultowa, 1709; Saratoga, 1777; Valmy, 1792; and Waterloo, 1815.

Battle royal. A certain number of cocks, say sixteen, are pitted together; the eight victors are then pitted, then the four, and last of all the two; and the winner is victor of the battle royal. Metaphorically, the term is applied to chess, etc.

Battle scenes. Le Clerc could arrange on a small piece of paper not larger than one's hand, an army of 20,000 men.

The Battle-painter or Delle Battaglie. (See Michael Angelo.)

Battle of the Books. A satire, by Dean Swift, on the contention among literary men whether ancient or modern authors were the better. In the battle the ancient books fight against the modern books in St. James's Library.

Battle of the Giants; i.e. the battle of Marignan (Mar-rin-yun) in 1515, when Francois I. won a complete victory over 12,000 Swiss, allies of the Milanese.

Battle of the Hervings, in 1429. A sortie made by the men of Orleans, during the siege of their city, to intercept a supply of salt herrings sent to the besiegers.

Battle of the Moat. A skirmish or battle between Mahomet and Abu Sofian (chief of the Koreishites) before Medina; so called because the "prophet" had a most dug before the city to keep off the invaders; and in the most much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Standard, in 1138, when the English overthrew the Scotch, at Northallerton, in Yorkshire. The standard was a high crucifix borne by the English on a wagon.

Battle of the Spurs (1892), in which the allied citizens of Ghent and Bruges won a famous victory over the chivalry of France under the walls of Courtray. After the battle more than 700 gilt spurs (worn by French nobles) were gathered from the field.

In English history the Battle of Guinganget (1613) is so called, "because the French spurred their horses to flight, almost as soon as they came in sight of the English troops."

A close battle. A naval fight at "close quarters," in which opposing ships engage each other side by side.

A line of battle. The position of troops drawn up in battle array. At sea, the arrangement formed by ships in a naval engagement. A line-of-battle ship is a ship fit to take part in a main attack. Frigates do not join in a general engagement.

A pitched battle. A battle which has been planned, and the ground pitched on or chosen beforehand, by both sides.

Half the battle. Half determines the battle. Thus, "the first stroke is half the battle," that is, the way in which the battle is begun half determines what the end will be.

Trial by battle. The submission of a legal suit to a combat between the litigants, under the notion that God would defend the right. It was legal in England till the nineteenth century.

Wager of Battle. One of the forms of ordeal or appeal to the judgment of God, in the old Norman courts of the kingdom. It consisted of a personal combat between the plaintiff and the defendant, in the presence of the court itself. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice (The). [See Batraciomyomachia.]

Battle of the Kegs (The). A mock-heroic by Francis Hopkinson (1738-1791). In the War of Independence certain machines, in the form of kgs, charged with gunpowder, were sent down the river to annoy the British at Philadelphia. When the British found out the nature of these machines, they waged relentless war with everything they saw floating about the river.

Battle of the Poets (The). A satirical poem by John [Sheffield], Duke of Buckingham, in which all the versifiers of the time are brought into the field (1725).

Battle of the Whips. The Scythian slaves once rose in rebellion against their masters, and many a bloody encounter followed. At length, one of the Scythian masters said to his followers: Let us throw away our spears and swords, and fight in future with whips. We get killed by the former weapons and weakened. So in the next encounter they armed themselves with whips, and immediately the slaves saw the whips, remembering former scourgings, they turned tail and were no more trouble.

Battle (Sarah), who considered whist the business of life and literature one of the relaxations. When a young gentleman, of a literary turn, said to her he had no objection to unbind his mind for a little time by taking a hand with her, Sarah was indignant, and declared it worse than sacrilege to speak thus of her noble occupation. Whist "was her life business; her duty; the thing she came into the world to do, and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards over a book." (J. Lamb: Elia.)

Battledore (3 syl.) means, properly, a baton for washing linen by striking on it to knock out the dirt. The plan is still common in France. The word is the French bateau; a beater used by washerwomen; Portuguese, Batador; Spanish, batidero, a wash-board.

Battu. Autant pleure mal batin que bien batin (French). It little matters whether stripes are given maliciously or not, as they smart the same. Whether misfortunes come from God or Satan, they are misfortunes still. A slight variant is "Autant yaut bien batin que mal batin," which means, it is of no consequence whether badly beaten or not, enough that I am beaten; "over shoes, over boots."

Battu de fol Oiseau (Etre), or "étre batin de l'oiseau," to be utterly dismayed; to be dazed. The allusion is to bird-catching at night, when a candle or lantern is held up before the birds aroused from their sleep; the birds, being dazed, are beaten down easily with sticks.

Battus paieront (Les). Ve victis! Those who lose must pay the piper. C'est la loi du pays de Béarn que le battu paie l'amende." Again, "C'est la coutume de Lorré, les battus paient
Baebœ. (See Bawbee.)

Baebœ. A fool should never hold a baebœ in his hand. "'Tis a foolish bird that fouls its own nest." The baebœ was a short stick, ornamented with ass's ears, carried by licensed fools. (French, baudoil, a playing ; Old French, baudel, a child's toy.)

If every fool held a baebœ, fuel would be dear. The proverb indicates that the world contains so many fools that if each had a separate baebœ there would be but little wood left for lighting fires.

To deserve the baebœ. "To be so foolish as to be qualified to carry a fool's emblem of office.

Baua. (See Philemon.)

Baua. (Thc.) A merciless satire by Gifford on the Della Crusca poem, published 1794. The word is from Virgil's Eclogue, iii. 9.

He may with foxes plough, and walk be-greats, Who praises Baua of on Marvum dotes. E. C. B.

Bave'sca. The Ciel's horse.

Bavus. Any bad poet. (See BVIAD.)

"May none choice patron bless each grey goose quick.
May every Bavius have but go still." Pope: Prologue to the Nature; 26-30.

Bawbee.

"What'IL hire, what'IL hire, what'IL hire me?" Three plums and a wallip for an bawbee."

The tale is that the people of Kirkmahoe were so poor, they could not afford to put any meat into their broth. A 'cute cobbler invested all his money in buying four sheep-shanks, and when a neighbour wanted to make mutton broth, for the payment of one halfpenny the cobbler would "plump" one of the sheep-shanks into the boiling water, and give it a "wallip" or whisk round. He then wrapped it in a cabbage-leaf and took it home. This was called a guslin bone, and was supposed to give a rich "gust" to the broth. The cobbler found his guslin bone very profitable.

Jenny's barbear. Her marriage portion. The word means, properly, a dulcised copper coin, equal in value to a halfpenny, issued in the reign of James V. of Scotland. (French, ba illion, de-based copper money.)

The word "bawbee" is derived from the laird of Sillebawhy, a mint-master. That there was such a laird is quite certain from the Treasurer's account, September 7th, 1541, "In argent but she rejected his suit. On one occasion the god was so importunate that Daphnis fled from him and sought the protection of her father, who changed her into the bay-tree. The gallant god declared henceforth he would wear bay leaves on his brow and lyre instead of the oak, and that all who sought his favour should follow his example.

The Queen's Bays. The 2nd Dragoon Guards; so called because they are mounted on bay horses. Now called The Queen's.

Bay. The colour of a horse is Varro's equus badius, given by Ainsworth as: "brown, bay, sorrel, chestnut colour." Coles gives the same. Our bayard; bright bay, light bay, blood bay, etc.

Bay the Moon (To). To bark at the moon. (French, aboyer, to bark at.) (See Bark.)

Bay Salt is salt of a bay colour. It is the salt of sea-water hardened by the heat of the sun.

Bayadere (bah-yah-dare). A dancing girl dressed in Eastern costume; so called from the bajaderes of India, whose duty is to dance before the images of the gods; but the grandees employ similar dancers for their private amusements. The word is a corruption of the Portuguese baila-deira.

Bayard (Chevalier), Pierre du Terrail, a celebrated French knight (1476-1521). Le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche.

The British Bayard. Sir Philip Sidney. (1554-1584.)

Bayard of the East (The) or Of the Indian Army. Sir James Outram (1803-1863).

Bayard. A horse of incredible swiftness, belonging to the four sons of Aymon. If only one of the sons mounted, the horse was of the ordinary size; but if all four mounted, his body became elongated to the requisite length. The name is used for any valuable or wonderful horse, and means a "high-bay" (bay-ard). (Villemoue: Les Quatre-Fils Aymon.) (See Horse.)

"Keep Bayard in the stable, i.e. keep what is of value under lock and key. (See above.)"

Bold as Blind Bayard. Foolhardy. If a blind horse leaps, the chance is he will fall into a ditch. Grose mentions the following expression, To ride bayard of ten toes—"Going by the marrow-bone stage"—i.e. walking.

Bayarde. The famous steed of Rinaldo, which once belonged to Amadis of Gaul. (See Horse.)

Bayardo's Leap. Three stones, about thirty yards apart, near Sleaford. It is said that Rinaldo was riding on his favourite steed Bayardo, when the demon of the place sprang behind him; but the animal in terror took three tremendous leaps and unhorsed the fiend.

Bayes, in the Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham, was designed to satirise John Dryden, the poet laureate.

Bayes's Troops. Dead men may rise again, like Bayes's troops, or the savages in the Fantoccini (Something New). In the Rehearsal, by George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, a battle is fought between foot-soldiers and great horses. At last Drawcasir kills all on both sides. Smith then asks how they are to go off, to which Bayes replies, "As they came on—upon their legs"; upon which they all jump up alive again.

Bayeux Tapestry. Supposed to be the work of Matilda, wife of William the Conqueror. It represents the mission of Harold to the duke, and all the incidents of his history from that event till his death at Hastings in 1066. It is called Bayeux from the place where it is preserved. A drawing, on a reduced scale, of this curious antique is preserved in the Guildhall Library.

Bayle (2 syl.). Dances of the common people were so called in Spain, in opposition to the stately court dances, called danza. The Baylès were of Moorish invention, the most celebrated being La Sarabanda, La Chacona, Las Gambelas, and El Hermano Bartolo.

Bayonet. So called from La Bayonne, a lower ridge of the Montagne d'Arrhune. A Basque regiment, early in the seventeenth century, running short of powder, stuck their knives into their muskets, and charged the Spaniards with success. Some derive this word from Bayonne.

Bayonets. A synonym of "rank and file," that is, privates and corporals of infantry. As, "the number of bayonets was 25,000."

"It is on the bayonets that a Quartermaster-General relies for his working and fatigue parties."—Howitt: Hist. of Eng. (1854, p. 256.)

Bead (Anglo-Saxon, bid, a prayer). When little balls with a hole through them were used for keeping account of the number of prayers repeated, the term was applied to the prayers also, (See Beadman).

To count one's beads. To say one's prayers. In the Catholic Church beads are threaded on a string, some large and some small, to assist in keeping count how often a person repeats a certain form of words.

To pray without one's beads. To be out of one's reckoning. (See above.)

Bailly's Beads. When the disc of the moon has (in an eclipse) reduced that of the sun to a thin crescent, the crescent assumes the appearance of a string of beads. This was first observed by Francis Bailly, whence the name of the phenomenon.

St. Cuthbert's Beads: Single joints of the articulated stems of escrinutes. They are perforated in the centre, and bear a fanciful resemblance to a cross; hence, they were once used for rosaries (beads). St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be called the St. Patrick of the north of England and south of Scotland.

St. Martin's Beads. Flash jewellery. St. Martin-le-Grand was at one time a noted place for sham jewellery.

Bead-house. An almshouse for beadsmen.

Bead-roll. A list of persons to be prayed for; hence, also, any list.

Beadle. A person whose duty it is to bid or cite persons to appear to a summons; also a church servant, whose duty it is to bid the parishioners to attend the vestry, or to give notice of vestry meetings. (Anglo-Saxon, beadle, from bedan, to bid or summon.)

Beadsmen or Bedsmen. An inhabitant of an almshouse; so called because in Catholic times most charities of this class were instituted that the inmates might "pray for the soul of the founder." (See Beard.)

"Seated with some grey beadsmen." Craple : Borough.

Beak. A magistrate. (Anglo-Saxon beag, a gold collar worn by civic magistrates.)

* W. H. Black says, "The term is derived from a Mr. Beke, who was formerly a resident magistrate at the Tower Hamlets.

Beaker. A drinking-glass; a rummer. (Greek, bikos, a wine jar.)

"Here, tierrad, reach your beaker." Browning: "Die in the 'S dhearon, l. 1.

Bean. Thrown on my bean-ends. Driven to my last shift. A ship is said to be on her beam-ends when she is laid by a heavy gale completely on her beams or sides. Not unfrequently the only means of righting her in such a case is to cut away her masts.

On the starboard beam. A distant point out at sea on the right-hand side, and at right angles to the keel.

On the port beam. A similar point on the left-hand side.

On the weather beam. On that side of a ship which faces the wind.

Bean (of a stag). That part of the head from which the horns spring. (Anglo-Saxon beam, a tree; the horns are called branches.)

Bean. Every bean has its black. Nemo sine vitis nascitur, "everyone has his faults." The bean has a black eye. (Ogni grano la sua semola.)

He has found the bean in the cake, he has got a prize in the lottery, has come to some unexpected good fortune. The allusion is to twelfth cakes in which a bean is buried. When the cake is cut up and distributed, he who gets the bean is the twelfth-night king.

Beans, slang for property, money, is the French biens, goods. "A bean" =a guinea, is in Grose.

"Like a beans [almu-money] in a monk's hood." --Colyer.

(See Barristers' Gowns.)

Beans. Pythagoras forbade the use of beans to his disciples—not the use of beans as a food, but the use of beans for political elections. Magistrates and other public officers were elected by beans cast by the voters into a helmet, and what Pythagoras advised was that his disciples should not interfere with politics or "love beans"—i.e. office.

Aristotle says the word bean means ven'ery, and that the prohibition to "abstain from beans" was equivalent to "keeping the body chaste."

* The French have the proverb, "If he gives me beans I will give him beans." N'v'l me donne des pois, je lui donnerai des fèves, i.e. I will give him tit for tat, a Rowland for an Oliver.

Beans are in flower, les fèves fleurissent, and this will account for your being so silly. Our forefathers imagined that the perfume of the flowering bean was bad for the head, and made men silly or light-headed.

He knows how many beans go to make
Bear Feast. He is “up to snuff;” he is no fool; he is not to be imposed upon. The reference is to the ancient custom of moving beans in counting.

“I was a fool, I was, and didn’t know how many beans make five [that is, how many beans must be moved to make up five].”—Farquhar.

“Few men knew how many blue beans it takes to make five.”—Gell.

“F. Mark! does it rattle?
S. Yes, like three blue beans in a blue bladder.”
Old Fortunatus (Ancient Drama), iii. p. 158.

“Blue beans” are bullets or shot.
Three small bullets or large shot in a bladder would make a very good rattle for a child. (See Blue Beans.)

Full of beans. Said of a fresh and spirited horse.

To get beans. To incur reproof.

I'll give him beans. A joking; a good joke. A very common phrase. Probably from the French referred to above, meaning as good as I get; “beans for his peas.”

Bean Feast. Much the same as wayz-goose (q.v.). A feast given by an employer to those he employs.

Bean Goose (The). A migratory bird which appears in England in the autumn of the year, and is so named from a mark on its bill like a horse-bean. It is next in size to the Grey Lag-goose. The term comes from the northern counties where the bean (goose) is common.

Bean-king (The). Rey de Habas, the child appointed to play the part of king on twelfth-night. In France it was at one time customary to hide a bean in a large cake, and he to whom the bean fell, when the cake was distributed, was for the nonce the bean king, to whom all the other guests showed playful reverence. The Greeks used beans for voting by ballot.

Bean-king’s festival. Twelfth-night. (See above.)

Bear (A). (Stock Exchange), a fall, or a speculator for a fall. To operate for a bear. To realise a profitable bear.

Bearing the market is using every effort to depress the price of stocks in order to buy it.

The centres of bears and bulls, i.e. the Stock Exchange.

Dr. Warton says the term bear came from the proverb of “Selling the skin before you have caught the bear,” and referred to those who entered into contracts in the South Sea Scheme to transfer stock at a stated price. (See Bull.)

“So was the huntsman by the bear oppressed, Whose hide he sold before he caught the beast.”

Waller: Battle of the Summer Islands, c. II.

A Bear account. A speculation in stocks on the chance of a fall in the price of the stock sold, with a view of buying it back at a lower price or receiving the difference. (See Bulls.)

Bear (The). Albert, margrave of Brandenburg. He was also called “The Fair” (1106-1170).

The bloody Bear, in Dryden’s poem called The Hind and Panther, means the Independents.

Pt. i. 35, 36.

The Great Bear and Little Bear. The constellations so called are specimens of a large class of blunders founded on approximate sounds. The Sanskrit raksh means “to be bright;” the Greeks corrupted the word into arktos, which means a bear; so that the “bear” should in reality be the “bright ones.” The fable is that Calisto, a nymph of Diana, had two sons by Jupiter, which Juno changed into bears, and Jupiter converted into constellations.

“The wind-shaken surge, with high and monstrous wave, Seems to cast water on the burning bear, And quench the guards of thy ever-fixed pole.”
Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1.

“Twas here we saw Calisto’s star retire Beneath the waves, unawed by Juno’s ire.”
Clinic: Lyly, book v.

The Bear or Northern Bear. Russia.

“France turns from her abandoned friends aevalf, And scatters the bear that grew for patriot flesh.”
Campbell: Poland, stanza 5.

A Broided Bear. A young nobleman under the control of a travelling tutor. (See Bear-Leader.)

The Bear and Ragged Staff. A public-house sign in compliment to Warwick, the king-maker, whose cognisance it was. The first earl was Arth or Artgal, of the Round Table, whose cognisance was a bear, because arth means a bear (Latin, ursus). Morvid, the second earl, overcame, in single combat, a mighty giant, who came against him with a club, which was a tree pulled up by the roots, but stripped of its branches. In remembrance of his victory over the giant he added “the ragged staff.”

The Bear and the Tea-kettle (Kamchatka). Said of a person who injures himself by foolish rage. One day a bear entered a hut in Kamchatka, where a kettle was on the fire. Master Bruin went to the kettle, and smelling at it burnt his nose; being greatly irritated, he seized the kettle with his paws, and squeezed it against his breast. This, of course, made matters worse, for the boiling water scalded him terribly, and he growled in agony till some neighbours put an end to his life with their guns.

A bear sucking its paws. It is said that when a bear is deprived of food, it sustains life by sucking its paws. The same is said of the English badger. Applied to industrious idleness.

As savage as a bear with a sore (or seald) head. Unreasonably ill-tempered.

As a bear has no tail, for a lion he'll fail. The same as Ne sutor supra crepida, "let not the cobbler aspire above his last." Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, being a descendant of the Warwick family, changed his own crest, which was "a green lion with two tails," for the Warwick crest, a "bear and ragged staff." When made governor of the Low Countries, he was suspected of aiming at absolute supremacy, or the desire of being the monarch of h's fellows, as the lion is monarch among beasts. Some wit wrote under his crest the Latin verse, "Ursae carent causad non quaeat esse too."

"Your bear for lion needs must fall.
Because your true bear has no tail."

To take the bear by the tooth. To put your head into the lion's mouth; needlessly to run into danger.

You dare as soon take a bear by his tooth. You would no more attempt such a thing, than attempt to take a bear by its tooth.

Bear (To). Come, bear a hand! Come and render help! In French, "Donner un coup à quelqu'un." Bring a hand, or bring your hand to bear on the work going on.

To bear arms. To do military service.

To bear away (Nautical). To keep away from the wind.

To bear one company. To be one's companion.

"His faithful dog shall bear him company." Pope: Essay on Man, epistle I. 112.

To bear down. To overpower; to force down.

"Fuly prepared to bear down Cooper. The Pilot, chap. xvi.

To bear down upon (Nautical). To approach from the weather side.

To bear in mind. Remember; do not forget. Carry in your recollection.

"To learn by heart." means to learn memoriter. Mind and heart stand for memory in both phrases.

To bear out. To corroborate, to confirm.

To bear up. To support; to keep the spirits up.

To bear with. To show forbearance; to endure with complacency.

"How long shall I bear with this evil congregation?" - Numbers xv. 27.

To bear the bell. (See Bell.)

Bear of Bradwardine (The) was a wine goblet, holding about an English pint, and, according to Scott, was made by command of St. Duthac, Abbot of Aberbrothoc, to be presented to the Baron of Bradwardine for services rendered in defence of the monastery. Inscribed upon the goblet was the motto: "Beware the bear!"

Bear Account (A). (See Bear.)

Bear Garden. This place is a perfect bear-garden—that is, full of confusion, noise, tumult, and quarrels. Bear-gardens were places where bears used to be kept and baited for public amusement.

Bear-leader. One who undertakes the charge of a young man of rank on his travels. It was once customary to lead muzzled bears about the streets, and to make them show off in order to attract notice and gain money.

"Bear" [said Dr. Pangloss to his pupil]. Under favour, young gentleman, I am the bear-leader, being appointed your tutor." - C. Colman: Feast-at-Law.

Bears are caught by Honey. In French, "If faut avoar mouzaine bite par douceur," for, as La Fontaine says, "Plus fait douceur que violence." Bears are very fond of honey. Bribes win even bears.

: There is another phrase: Divise honey with a bear, i.e. It is better to divide your honey with a bear than to provoke its anger.

Beard. Cutting the beard. The Turks think it a dire disgrace to have the beard cut. Slaves who serve in the seraglio have clean chins, as a sign of their servitude.

Kissing the beard. In Turkey wives kiss their husband, and children their father on the beard.

To make one's beard (Chaucer). This is the French "Faire la barbe à quelqu'un," and refers to a barber's taking hold of a man's beard to dress it, or to his shaving the chin of a customer. To make one's beard is to have him wholly at your mercy.
Beard (27). To beard one is to defy him, to contradict him flatly, to insult by plucking the beard. Among the Jews, no greater insult could be offered to a man than to pluck or even touch his beard.

To beard the lion in his den. To contradict one either in his own gory way, or on some subject he has made his hobby. To defy personally or face to face.

"Dar'st thou, then, To hear the lion in his den, The Douglas in his hall?"—Sir W. Scott: Marmion, canto vi. stanza 14.

Maugre his beard, in spite of him.

To laugh at one's beard. To attempt to make a fool of a person—to deceive by ridiculous exaggeration.

"By the prophet! but he laughs at our beards," exclaimed the Pacha angrily. "These are foolish lies."—Maryat: Pacha of Many Tales.

To laugh in one's beard [Rire dans sa barbe] To laugh in one's sleeve.

To run in one's beard. To offer opposition to a person; to do something obnoxious to a person before his face. The French say, "à la barbe de quelqu'un," under one's very nose.

With the beard on the shoulder (Spanish). In the attitude of listening to overhear something; with circumspection, looking in all directions for surprises and ambushes.

"They rode, as the Spanish proverb expresses it, with the beard on the shoulder, looking round from time to time, and using every precaution against pursuit."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. vll.

Tax upon beards. Peter the Great imposed a tax upon beards. Every one above the lowest class had to pay 100 roubles, and the lowest class had to pay a copee, for enjoying this "luxury." Clerks were stationed at the gates of every town to collect the beard-tax.

Bearded. Bearded Master (magister barbatus). So Persius styled Socrates, under the notion that the beard is the symbol of wisdom. (n.c. 468-399.)

The Bearded. Geoffrey the Crusader, and Bouchard of the house of Montgomery.

Hangman's-beard. Baldwin IV., Earl of Flanders. (1160-1186.)

John the Bearded. Johann Mayo, the German painter, whose beard touched the ground when he stood upright.

Bearded Women:

Bartel Grettje, of Stuttgart, born 1562.

The Duke of Saxony had the portrait taken of a poor Swiss woman, remarkable for her large bushy beard.

In 1728 a female dancer appeared at Venice, with a large bushy beard.

Charles XII. had in his army a woman whose beard was a yard and a half long. She was taken prisoner at the battle of Pultowa, and presented to the Czar, 1724.

Mlle. Bois de Chêne, born at Geneva in 1834, was exhibited in London in 1852-3; she had a profuse head of hair, a strong black beard, large whiskers, and thick hair on her arms and back.

Julia Pastrana was exhibited in London in 1857; died, 1862, at Moscow; was embalmed by Professor Suckaloff; and the embalmed body was exhibited at 191, Piccadilly. She was found among the Digger Indians of Mexico.

Margaret of Holland had a long, stiff beard.

Bearings. I'll bring him to his bearings. I'll bring him to his senses. A sea term. The bearings of a ship at anchor is that part of her hull which is on the water-line when she is in good trim. To bring a ship to her bearings is to get her into this trim. (Dana: The Seaman's Manual, 84.)

To lose one's bearings. To become bewildered; to get perplexed as to which is the right road.

To take the bearings. To ascertain the relative position of some object.

Bearnais (Le). Henri IV. of France; so called from Le Bearn, his native province (1553-1610).

Beasts (Heraldic):

Couchant, lying down.

Counterpassant, moving in opposite directions.

Dormant, sleeping.

Gardant, full-faced.

Assant, rising from the top or bottom of an ordinary.

Nascant, rising out of the middle of an ordinary.

Passant, walking.

Passant gardant, walking, and with full face.

Passant regardant, walking and looking behind.

Rampant, rearing.

Regardant, looking back.

Seant, seated.

Salient, springing.

Statant, standing still.
Beastly Drunk. It was an ancient notion that men in their cups exhibited the vicious qualities of beasts. Nash describes seven kinds of drunkards:—
(1) The Ape-drunk, who leeps and sings;
(2) The Lea-drunk, who is quarrelsome;
(3) The Swine-drunk, who is sleepy and yapping;
(4) The Sheep-drunk, wise in his own conceit, but unable to speak;
(5) The Martin-drunk, who drinks himself sober again;
(6) The Goat-drunk, who is lascivious; and
(7) The Fox-drunk, who is crafty, like a Dutchman in his cups. [See MAULIN.]

Beat. A track, line, or appointed range. A walk often trodden or beaten by the feet, as a policeman's beat. The word means a beaten path.

Not in my beat. Not in my line; not in the range of my talents or inclination.

Off his beat. Not on duty; not in his appointed walk; not his speciality or line.

"Off his own best his opinions were of no value."—Emerson: English Traits, chap. 1.

On his beat. In his appointed walk; on duty.

Out of his beat. In his wrong walk; out of his proper sphere.

To beat up one's quarters. To hunt out where one lives; to visit without ceremony. A military term, signifying to make an unexpected attack on an enemy in camp.

"To beat up the quarters of some of our less-known relations."—Lamb: Essays of Elia.

Beat (To). To strike. (Anglo-Saxon, beatan.)

To beat an alarm. To give notice of danger by beat of drum.

To beat or drum a thing into one. To repeat as a drummer repeats his strokes on a drum.

To beat a retreat (French, battre en retraite); to beat to arms; to beat a charge. Military terms similar to the above.

To beat the air. To strike out at nothing, merely to bring one's muscles into play, as pugilists do before they begin to fight; to toil without profit; to work to no purpose.

"Make fight, not as one that beateth the air."—1 Cor. ix. 26.

To beat the bush. One beat the bush and another caught the hare. "Il a battu les buissons, et autre a pris les oiseaux." "Il bat le buisson sans prendre les oiseaux" is a slightly different idea, meaning he has toiled in vain. "Other menlaboured, and ye are entered into their labours" (John iv. 48). The allusion is to beaters, whose business it is to beat the bushes and start the game for a shooting party.

To beat the Devil's Tattoo. (See Tarroon.)

To beat the Dutch. To draw a very long bow; to say something very incredible.

"Well! if that don't beat the Dutch!"

To beat time. To mark time in music by beating or moving the hands, feet, or a wand.

To beat up supporter. To hunt them up or call them together, as soldiers are by beat of drum.

Beat (To). To overcome or get the better of. This does not mean to strike, which is the Anglo-Saxon beaten, but to better, to be better, from the Anglo-Saxon verb bētan.

Dead beat. So completely beaten or worsted as to have no leg to stand on. Like a dead man with no fight left in him; quite tired out.

"I'm dead beat, but I thought I'd like to come in and see you all once more."—Loë: Without a Home, p. 32.

Dead beat escoumment (of a watch). One in which there is no reverse motion of the escape-wheel.

That beats Banagher. Wonderfully inconsistent and absurd—exceedingly ridiculous. Banagher is a town in Ireland, on the Shannon, in King's County. It formerly sent two members to Parliament, and was, of course, a famous pocket borough. When a member spoke of a family borough where every voter was a man employed by the lord, it was not unusual to reply, "Well, that beats Banagher."

"Well," says he, "to gratify them I will. So let a mewel. But, Jack, this beats Banagher" (c.f.).—W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasants, p. 105.

That beats Ternagant. Your ranting, raging pomposity, or exaggeration, surpasses that of Ternagant (q.v.).

To beat hollow is to beat wholly, to be wholly the superior.

To beat up against the wind. To tack against an adverse wind; to get the better of the wind.

Beat. (French, batir, to abate.)

To beat down. To make a seller "abate" his price.

Beaten to a Mummy. Beaten so that one can distinguish neither form nor feature.

Beaten with his own Staff. Confuted by one's own words. An argumentum ad hominem.

"Can High Church bigotry go farther than this? And how well have I since been beaten with mine own staff."—J. Wesley. (He refers to his excluding Bohus from "the Lord's table," because he had not been canonically baptized.)

Beating about the Bush. Not coming directly to the matter in hand, but feeling your way timidly by indirection, as persons beat bushes to ascertain if game is lurking under them.

Beating the Bounds. On Holy Thursday, or Ascension Day, it used to be customary for the parish school children, accompanied by the clergymen and parish officers, to walk through their parish from end to end. The boys were struck with willow wands all along the lines of boundary. Before maps were common, the boys were thus taught to know the bounds of their own parish. The custom still prevails in some parishes.

Benti Possidentes. Blessed are those who have [for they shall receive]. "Possession is nine points of the law."

Beatific Vision. The sight of the Deity, or of the blessed in the realms of heaven. (See Isaiah vi. 1-4, and Acts vii. 55, 56.)

Beatrice. Beloved from girlhood by Dante, a native of Florence, was of the Portinari family. She died under twenty-four years of age (1296-1290). Beatrice married Simone de' Bardi, and Dante married Gemma Donati.

Beau. Beau Brummel. George Bryan. (1778-1840.)

Le Beau D'Orsay. Father of Count D'Orsay, and called by Byron Jennu Capoèn. Beau Fielding, called "Handsome Fielding" by Charles II., whose name was Hendrome Fielding. He died in Scotland Yard, London.

Beau Heurt. The "Sir Foping Flutter" of Etheredge. (The Man of Mode: or, Sir Foping Flutter.)

Beau Nash. Son of a Welsh gentleman, a notorious dinner-out. He undertook the management of the bath-rooms at Bath, and conducted the public baths with a splendour and decorum never before witnessed. In old age he sank into poverty. (1674-1761.)

Beau Tibbs. noted for his finery, vanity, and poverty. (Godsmith: Citizen of the World.)

Beau Ideal. The model of beauty or excellency formed by fancy.

Beau Jour beau Retour (A). My turn will come next. (Never used in a good sense, but always to signify the resentment of an injury.)

Beau Lion (Un). A fine dashing fellow; an aristocrat every inch; the "lion" of society. The lion is the king of beasts.

Beau Monde. The fashionable world; people who make up the coterie of fashion.

Beau Trap. A loose pavement under which water lodges, and which squirts up filth when trodden on, to the annoyance of the smartly dressed.

Beaudero [good scholar]. Applied to Henry I., who had clerk-like accomplishments, very rare in the times in which he lived (1068, 1100-1135).

Beaumontagne [pronounce bo-mohn-tay]. Bad work, especially ill-fitting carpenter's work; literary padding; pasto and scissors literature; so called from putty used by carpenters, etc., for filling up cracks and bad joinery. German, peg, dough; and Emile Beaumont, the geologist (1798-1851), who also gives his name to "Beaumontite."

Beautiful. Beautiful or fair as an angel. Throughout the Middle Ages it was common to associate beauty with virtue, and ugliness with sin; hence the expressions given above, and the following also—"Seraphic beauty," "Cherubic loveliness," "Ugly as sin," etc.

Beautiful Parricide. Beatrice Cenci, the daughter of a Roman nobleman, who plotted the death of her father because he violently defiled her. (Died 1599.)

"Francesco Cenci (vi siècle) ... avait quatre fils et une fille (Beatrice). Il les maîtrisait cruellement, on les faisait servir à ses plaisirs ordinaires ... révélatrice de tant d'horreurs, Beatrice, sa fille, de concert avec deux de ses frères, et Lucrèce leur mère, fit assassiner Francesco Cenci. Accusée de Parricide, elle périt tout à coup sur l'ordre de la sentence de Clement VIII. 1599."

Beauty. Tout est beau sans chandelles. "La nuit tous les chats sont gris." Beauty in but skin deep.

"Il forme de jeune, minuit ne crée colori." Virgil, Georgica, i.

Beauty and the Beast. The hero and heroine of Madame Villeneuve's fairy tale. Beauty saved the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast, and the Beast, being disenchanted by Beauty's love, became a handsome prince, and married her. (Contes Marins, 1740.)
Beauty

✍ A handsome woman with an uncouth or uncomely male companion.

Beauty of Buttermere. Mary Robinson, married to John Hatfield, a heartless impostor, executed for forgery at Carlisle in 1803.

Beauty Sleep. Sleep taken before midnight. Those who habitually go to bed, especially during youth, after midnight, are usually pale and more or less haggard.

"Would I please to remember that I had raised him up at night . . . [in] his beauty sleep."—Brontë: Lorna Doone, ch. 64.

Beaux Esprits (French). Men of wit or genius (singular number, un bel esprit, a wit, a genius).

Beaux Yeux (French). Beautiful eyes or attractive looks. "I will do it for your beaux yeux" (because you are so pretty, or because your eyes are so attractive).

Beaver. A hat; so called from its being made of beaver-skins.

Beaver. That part of the helmet which lifted up to enable the wearer to drink. Similarly bever, the afternoon draught in the harvest-field, called four's. (Italian, bevere, to drink; Spanish, beber; Latin, bibere, French, buveur, a drinker; Armoric, benvauch, beverage, etc.)

"Hamlet: Then you saw not his face?"

"Horatio: O, yes, my lord: he wore his beaver up."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1.2.

Becarre, Bethel. Sauter de becarrs en bénil (French), to jump from one subject to another without regard to pertinence; "Sauter du coq à l'âne," from Genesis to Revelation. Literally, to jump from sharps to flats. Becarre is the Latin B quadratum or B quarré. In old musical notation B sharp was expressed by a square b, and n flat by a round b.

Bénil is B mollis, soft (flat).

Becasse. You goose; you simpleton; you buoby. Becasse is a woodcock. "C'est une becasse," he or she is a fool.

Becket's Assassins. William de Tracy, Hugh de Morville, Richard Brito (or le Bret), and Fitz-Urse.

Bed. The great bed of Ware. A bed twelve feet square, and capable of holding twelve persons; assigned by tradition to the Earl of Warwick, the king-maker. It is now in Rye House.

"Although the sheet were long enough for the bed of Ware in England."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 2.

Bed-post. To make the bed. To arrange it and make it fit for use. In America this sense of "make" is much more common than it is with us. "Your rooms is made," arranged in due order. To make it all right.

"As you make your bed you must lie on it. Everyone must bear the consequences of his own acts. "As you sow, so must you reap." "As you brew, so must you bake."

To bed out. To plant what are called "bedding-out plants" in a flower-bed.

* Bedding-out plants are reared in pots, generally in a hot-house, and are transferred into garden-beds early in the summer. Such plants as geraniums, marguerites, fuchsias, penstemons, petunias, verbenas, lobelias, calceolarias, etc., are meant.

You got out of bed the wrong way, or with the left leg foremost. Said of a person who is patchy and ill-tempered. It was an ancient superstition that it was unlucky to set the left foot on the ground first on getting out of bed. The same superstition applies to putting on the left shoe first, a "fancy" not yet wholly exploded.

* Augustus Caesar was very superstitious in this respect.

Bed of Justice. (See Lit.)

Bed of Roses (A). A situation of case and pleasure.

Bed of Thorns (A). A situation of great anxiety and apprehension.

Bed-post. In the twinkling of a bed-post. As quickly as possible. In the ancient bed-frames movable staves were laid as we now lay iron laths; there were also staves in the two sides of the bedstead for keeping the bed-clothes from rolling off; and in some cases a staff was used to beat the bed and clean it. In the reign of Edward I., Sir John Chichester had a mock skirmish with his servant (Sir John with his rapier and the servant with the bed-staff), in which the servant was accidentally killed. Wright, in his Domestic Manners, shows us a chambermaid of the seventeenth century using a bed-staff to beat up the bedding. "Twinkling" means a rapid twist or turn. (Old French, girier: Welsh, gwyng, *gwing", our wriggle.)

"I'll do it instantly, in the twinkling of a bed-staff."—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, 1670.

"He would have cut him down in the twinkling of a bed-post."—Robinson: dlue into English.

* Bobadil, in Every Man in his Humour, and Lord Duberley, in the Heir-at-Law,

Bede (Adam). A novel by George Eliot (Marian Evans), 1859. One of the chief characters is Mrs. Poyser, a woman of shrewd observation, and as full of wise saws as Sancho Panza.

Bedell. The Vice-chancellor’s bedell (not beadle). The officer who carries the mace before the Vice-Chancellor, etc., in the universities is not a beadle but a bedell (the same word in an older form).

Beder. A valley famous for the victory gained by Mahomet, in which “he was assisted by 3,000 angels, led by Gabriel, mounted on his horse Haiyum.” (Al Koran.)

Beder. King of Persia, who married Giauha’re, daughter of the most powerful of the under-sea emperors. Queen Labè tried to change him into a horse, but he changed her into a mare instead. (Arabian Nights, “Beder and Giuahar.”)

Bedford. Saxon, Bede can fords (fortresses ford)—that is, the ford at the fortress of the river Ouse.

Bedford Level. Land drained by the Earl of Bedford in 1649. This large tract of fenny land lay in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdonshire, Northamptonshire, and Lincolnshire.

Bedfordshire. I am off to Bedfordshire. To the land of Nod, to bed. The language abounds with these puns, e.g. “the narrowbone stage,” “A Dunce scholar,” “Knight of the beer-barrel,” “Admiral of the blue,” “Master of the Mint” (q.e.), “Master of the Rolls” (q.e.), etc. And the French even more than the English.

Bediver. A knight of the Round Table, and the butler of King Arthur.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum or madhouse; a contraction for Bethlehem, the name of a religious house in London, converted into a hospital for lunatics. Tom o’ Bedlam. (See Tom.)

St. Mary of Bethlehem, London, was founded as a priory in 1247, and in 1248 it was given to the mayor and corporation of London, and incorporated as a royal foundation for lunatics.

Bedlamite (3 syl.). A madman, a fool, an inhabitant of a Bedlam.

Bedouins [Bedwins]. The homeless street poor are so called. Thus the Times calls the ragged, houseless boys “the Bedouins of London.” The Bedouins are the nomadic tribes of Arabia (Arabic, bedawin, a dweller in a desert; badr, a desert). (See STREET ARABS.)

“These Bedouins of the prairie busily carry their beds with them.”—A.D. Richardson: Beyond the Mississippi, chap. V.

Bedreddin Hassan, in the story of Nonreddin and his Son, in the Arabian Nights.

“Comparing herself to Bedreddin Hassan, whom the vizier... discovered by his superlative skill in composing stream-barts without pepper in them.”—Scott: Heart of Midlothian.

Bed-rock. American slang for one’s last shilling. A miner’s term, called in England the “stone-head,” and in America, the “Bed-rock,” the hard basis rock. When miners get to this bed the mine is exhausted. “I’m down to the bed-rock,” i.e. my last dollar.

“‘No, no!’ continued Tennessee’s partner, hastily, ‘I’ll play this yer hand alone. I’ve come down to the bedrock; it’s just as Tennessee, that has played it pretty rough and expensive, like, on a stranger... Now what’s the fair thing? Some would say more, and some would say less. Here’s seventeen hundred dollars in one hand and a watch—it’s about all my pile, and call it square.’”—Fred Hoots: Tennessee’s Partner.

Bedver. King Arthur’s butler; Caius or Kaye was his sewer. (Geoffrey: British History, ix. 13.)

Bee. The Athenian Bee. Plato. (See Athenian Bee, page 72, col. 1.)

It is said that when Plato was in his cradle, a swarm of bees alighted on his mouth. The story is good enough for poets and orators. The same tale is told of St. Ambrose. (See Ambrose, page 41, col. 1.)

Xenophon (b.c. 444-356) is also called “the Bee of Athens,” or “the Athenian Bee.”

See also ANIMALS (SYMBOLICAL), page 50, col. 2.

To have your head full of bees. Full of devices, crotches, fancies, inventions, and dreamy theories. The connection between bees and the soul was once generally maintained: hence Mahomet admits bees to Paradise. Porphyry says of fountains, “they are adapted to the nymphs, or those souls which the ancients called bees.” The moon was called a bee by the priestesses of Ceres, and the word lunatic or moon-struck still means one with “bees in his head.”

“Un des rats dans la tête.”—French Proverb.

(See MAGGOT.)

To have a bee in your bonnet. To be cranky; to have an idiosyncrasy; also, to carry a jewel or ornament in your cap. (See Hughes.)

"For , sir, find out that bee
That here my love away—
I'll seek him in your honest brave! . . ."
Herrick: The Maid Maid's Song.

Bee. A social gathering for some useful work. The object generally precedes the word, as a spelling—bee (a gathering to compete in spelling). There are apple-bees, husking-bees, and half a dozen other sorts of bees or gatherings. It is an old Devonshire custom, which was carried across the Atlantic in Elizabethan times.

Bee-line. The line that a bee takes in making for the hive; the shortest distance between two given points.

"Our footsteps, seen afterwards, showed that we had steered a bee-line to the bug."—Kane: Arctic Explorations, vol. i. chap. xvii. p. 198.

Bees.

Jupiter was nourished by bees in infancy. (See Athenian Bee, p. 72, col. 1.)

Pindar is said to have been nourished by bees with honey instead of milk.

The coins of Ephesus had a bee on the reverse.

The Greeks consecrated bees to the moon.

With the Romans a flight of bees was considered a bad omen. Appian (Civil War, book ii.) says a swarm of bees lighted on the altar and prognosticated the fatal issue of the battle of Pharsalia.

The priestesses of Ceres were called bees.

In Christian Art St. Ambrose is represented with a bee-hive, from the tradition that a swarm of bees settled on his mouth in his infancy.

Beef, Ox. The former is Norman, and the latter Saxon. The Normans had the cooked meat, and when set before them used the word they were accustomed to. The Saxon was the herdsman, and while the beast was under his charge called it by its Saxon name.

"Old Alderman Ox continues to hold his Saxon title while he is under the charge of serfs and hindsman; but becomes Bef, a very French gallant, when he arrives before the worshipful jaws that are destined to consume him."—Townsh.

Weaver's beef of Colchester, i.e. sprats, caught abundantly in the neighbourhood. (Fuller : Worthies.)

Beefeaters. Yeomen of the Guard in the royal household, appointed in 1483, by Henry VII., to form part of the royal train in banquets and other grand occasions. The old theory was that the word means "an attendant on the royal buffets," Anglicised into buffeters or buffeters, and corrupted into Beefeaters; but Professor Skeat says no such word as buffeter has yet been found in any book; nor does buffeter exist in French.

A plausible reply to this objection is that the word may have got corrupted almost ab initio in those unlettered days; and the earliest quotation of "Beefeater," already adduced, is above 150 years from the institution of the force, and even then the allusions are either satirical or humorous: as "Begone, ye greeny beefeaters, ye," are "best." (Innsmouth, ii. 1; A.D. 1610): "Bows, or Beefeaters, as the French were pleased to term us" (1628): "You beefeater, you saucy cur" (1671). Not one of the quotations fixes the word on the Yeomen of the Guard, and that the English have been called Beefeaters none will deny. Even if the allusion given above could be certainly affixed to Yeomen of the Guard it would only prove that 150 or 160 years after their establishment in the palace they were so called (corruptly, humorously or otherwise).

Arguments in favour of the old derivation:

(1) Certainly Henry VII. himself did not call these yeomen "beef-eaters." He was as much French as Welsh, and must have been familiar with the buffet (buf-ey); he had no spark of humour in his constitution, and it is extremely doubtful whether beef was a standing dish at the time, certainly it was not so in Wales. We have a good number of menus extant of the period, but beef does not appear in any of them.

(2) We have a host of similar corruptions in our language, as Andrew Mines (q.v.), Billy-ruffians (see Bille-Rophon), Hurl and Hmoth (q.v.), Charlin's War (q.v.), Bag-o-Nails, Goat and Companion, Sparrow-grens (asparagus), Wince (obscure), Linstrum (lustring, from lustre), Dog-cheap (god-kepe, i.e. a good bargain), and many more of the same sort.

(3) There can be no doubt that the "beefeaters" waited at the royal table, for in 1602 we read that "the dishes were brought in by the latheryards [beefeaters], who are fine, big fellows" (quoted in Notes and Queries, February 4th, 1893, p. 86).

(4) If beef was a general food in the sixteenth century, which is extremely doubtful, it would be supremely ridiculous to call a few yeomen "eaters of beef," unless beef was restricted to them. In the present Argentine Republic, beef dried, called "jerked beef," is the common diet, and it would be foolish indeed to restrict the phrase “eaters of jerked beef” to some half-score waiters at the President’s table.

(5) That the word buffetier or bufeetier is not to be found (in the English sense) in any French author, does not prove that it was never used in Anglo-French. We have scores of perverted French words, with English meanings, unrecognised by the French; for example: encore, double entendre, surtout (a frock coat), epervine, and so on.

(6) Historic etymology has its value, but, like all other general rules, it requires to be narrowly watched, or it may not infrequently over-ride the truth. Historically, Rome comes from Romulus, Scotland from Scotia or Scotia, Britain from Brutus. All sorts of rubbishy etymology belong to the historic craze.

Beefsteaks. Yeomen Extraordinary of the Guard appointed as warders of the Tower by Edward VI. They wear the same costume as the Yeomen of the Guard mentioned above. (See BUPHA-90.)

Beefsteak Club o’ved its origin to an accidental dinner taken by Lord Peterborough in the scene-room of Rich, over Covent Garden Theatre. The original gridiron on which Rich broiled the peer’s steak is still preserved in the palladium of the club, and the members have it engraved on their buttons. (History of the Clubs of London.)

Beefington or Milor Beefington, a character in Canning’s mock tragedy, The Rovers, a burlesque, in the Anti-Jacobin, on the sentimental German dramas of the period. Casimere is a Polish emigrant, and Beefington an English nobleman, exiled by the tyranny of King John.

Beelzebub. God of flies, supposed to ward off flies from his votaries. One of the gods of the Philistines. (See AYYY.) The “rooks had a similar deity, Zeus Apomoniou.” The Jews, by way of reproach, changed Beelzebub into Baal Zeboub (q.v.), and placed him among the demons. Milton says he was next in rank to Satan, and stood

"With Atlas’on shoulders, fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies."

(BOOK II.)

"One next himself in power, and next in cruise,
Long after known in Palestine, and named
Beelzebuth." (Paradise Lost, 1. 78-81)

Beer. Ceres, when wandering over the earth in quest of her daughter, taught men the art of making beer, because "ils me ne purent apprendre l’art de faire le vin." (Mem. de l’Academie des Inscriptions, xvii.) (See AVE.)

He does not think small beer of himself. [See SMALL BEER.]

Beer and Skittles. Life is not all beer and skittles, i.e. not all eating, drinking, and play; not all pleasure; not all harmony and love.

"Sport like life, and life like sport, isn’t all skittles and beer."

Beer aux Monches, or Bier aux cornes. To stand gaping in the air (at the flies or the rooks). Bier, Old French for bayer, to gape.

Beeswing. The film which forms on the sides of a bottle of good old port. This film, broken up into small pieces, looks like the wings of bees. A port drinker is very particular not to “break the beeswing” by shaking the bottle, or turning it the wrong way up.

"Beeswingsed port is old port which has formed its second crust or beeswing.

Beetle (To). To overhang, to threaten, to jut over (Anglo-Saxon, bent-int, to menace). Hence beetle or beetled brow.

"Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff,
That beetle over has leaped into the sea." (Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 4).

Beetle-cruisher. A large, flat foot. The expression was first used in Punch, in one of Leech’s caricatures. Those who know London know how it is overrun with cockroaches, wrongly called black-beetles.

Befana. The good fairy of Italian children, who is supposed to fill their stockings with toys when they go to bed on Twelfth Night. Some one enters the children’s bedroom for the purpose, and the wakeful youngsters cry out, “Ecco la Befana.” According to legend, Befana was too busy with house affairs to look after the Magi when they went to offer their gifts, and said she would wait to see them on their return; but they went another way, and Befana, every Twelfth Night, watches to see them. The name is a corruption of Epiphania.

Before the Lights, in theatrical parlance, means on the stage, before the foot-lights.

Before the Mast. To serve before the mast. To be one of the common sailors, whose quarters are in the forward part of the ship. The half-deck is the sanctum of the second mate, and, in Greenland fishers, of the spikeoneer, harpooneers, Beggar. A beggar may sing before a pickpocket. (In Latin, "Cantebit vacus coram latrone vatori.") A beggar may sing before a highwayman because he has nothing in his pocket to lose.

Set a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the de'il. There is no one so proud and arrogant as a beggar who has suddenly grown rich.

"Such is the sad effect of wealth—rank pride—Mount but a beggar, how the rogue will rule!"

Ister Finder: Epistle to Lord Loselade.

Latin: "Asperius nihil est humilii cum surgit in altum."

French: "Il n'est orgueil que de pauvre enrichi."

Italian: "Il vilan nobilitado non conosce il parentado" (A beggar ennobled does not know his own kinsmen).

Spanish: "Quando el villano está en el mulo, non conoce a dios, ni al mundo" (when a beggar is mounted on a mule, he knows neither gods nor men).

Beggars should not be choosers. Beggars should take what is given them, and not dictate to the giver what they like best. They must accept and be thankful.

Beggars’ Barn. The thick foam which collects on the surface of ponds, brooks, and other pieces of water where the current meets stoppage. It looks like harm or yeast, but, being unfit for use, is only beggarly barn at best.

Beggars’ Bullets. Stones.

Beggars’ Bush. To go by beggar’s bush, or Go home by beggar’s bush—i.e. to go to ruin. Beggar’s bush is the name of a tree which once stood on the left hand of the London road from Huntingdon to Caxton: so called because it was a noted rendezvous for beggars. These punning phrases and proverbs are very common.

Beggars’ Daughter. Bessee, the beggar’s daughter of Bednall Green. Bessee was very beautiful, and was courted by four suitors at once—a knight, a gentleman of fortune, a London merchant, and the son of the innkeeper at Romford. She told them that they must obtain the consent of her father, the poor blind beggar of Bethnal Green. When they heard that, they all slunk off except the knight, who went to ask the beggar’s leave to wed the “pretty Bessee.” The beggar gave her £3,000 for her dower, and £100 to buy her wedding gown. At the wedding feast he explained to the guests that he was Henry, son and heir of Sir Simon de Montfort. At the battle of Evesham the barons were routed, Montfort slain, and himself left on the field for dead. A baron’s daughter discovered him, nursed him with care, and married him; the fruit of this marriage was “pretty Bessee.” Henry de Montfort assumed the garb and semblance of a beggar to escape the vigilance of King Henry’s spies. (Pevry: Reliques.)

Begging Hermits were of the Augustine order; they renounced all property, and lived on the voluntary alms of “the faithful.”

* Begging Friars were restricted to four orders: Franciscans (Grey Friars), Augustines (Black Friars), Carmelites (White Friars), and Dominicans (Preaching Friars).

Begging the Question. Assuming a proposition which, in reality, involves the conclusion. Thus, to say that parallel lines will never meet because they are parallel, is simply to assume as a fact the very thing you profess to prove. The phrase is a translation of the Latin term, petitio principii, and was first used by Aristotle.

Beghards. A brotherhood which rose in the Low Countries in the twelfth century, and was so called from Lambert Bègue. The male society were Beghards, the female, Béguins. They took no vows, and were free to leave the society when they liked. In the seventeenth century, those who survived the persecutions of the popes and inquisition joined the Tertiari of the Franciscans. (See Béguins.)

Begtasha. A religious order in the Ottoman Empire, which had its origin in the fourteenth century. The word is derived from Hadji Begtash, a dervish, its founder.

Béguin. This is a really happy phrase for one whose wits are gone wool-gathering; he is a man of “stammering understanding.”

Béguines. A sisterhood instituted in the twelfth century, founded by Lambert Bègue or Lambert le Bègue. The members of the male society were called Beghards (q.v.). The Béguins were at liberty to quit the cloister, if they chose, and marry. The cap called a béguin was named from this sisterhood.

"Secta quaedam postera illorum qui Bequini vulgatissimi appellantur, qui se Fratres Pauperes de terra ordine S. Franciscicommunitatem nominant, ex aliquibus pluribus tamen tamen haereticorum condonant et consulant." — Bernard Guesu: Life of John, xxi.

Begum. A lady, princess, or woman of high rank in India; the wife of a ruler. (Boy or Beg, governor of a Turkish province, a title of honour.)

Behemoth (Hebrew). The hippopotamus: once thought to be the rhinoceros. (See Job xl. 15.)

"Behold : in plated mail, Behemoth rears his head."

Thomson: Summer, 708, 710.

2. The word is generally, but incorrectly, pronounced Behemoth; but Milton, like Thomson, places the accent on the second syllable.

"Scarce from his mold
Behemoth, great born of earth, upheaved.

Behmenists. A sect of visionary religiousists, so called from Jacob Behmen (Bohme), their founder. (1575-1625.)

Behram. The most holy kind of fire, according to Parseesem. (See Adam.)

Bejan. A freshman or greenhorn. This term is employed in the French and Scotch universities, and is evidently a corruption of bejaume (yellow heak), a French expression to designate a nestling or unfledged bird. In the university of Vienna the freshman is termed bejanus, and in France footmoney is bejuanis.

"His grandmother yielded, and Robert was straightway a bejan or yellow-beak." — Lockwood: R. Falconer.

Bel-a-faire-pour. A handsome, daredevil of a fellow.

Bel Esprit (French). A vivacious wit: a man or woman of quick and lively parts, ready at repartee. (Plural, beurs esprits.)

Belch. Sir Toby Belch. A reckless, roistering, jolly knight of the Elizabethan period. (Shakespeare: Twelfth Night.)

Belcher. A pocket-handkerchief—properly, a blue ground with white spots; so called from Jim Belcher, the pugilist, who adopted it.

Beldam. An old woman; literally, a grandmother. The French also use belage for old age.

"Old men and beldames in the streets
Do prophesy upon it dangerously." — Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

Belesees (3 syl.). A Chaldean soothsayer and Assyrian satrap, who told Arba'ees, governor of Med'ia, that he would one day sit on the throne of Sar'dana-pilus, the king of Nineveh and Assyria. His prophecy was verified, and he was rewarded by Arba'ees with the government of Babylon. (Byron: Sardanapalus.)

Belfast Regiment (The). The 35th Foot, which was raised in Belfast in 1701. There is no such regiment now in the British Army. What used to be called No. 35 is now called the 1st battalion of the Royal Sussex, the 2nd battalion being the old No. 107.

Bel-fires. Between Bel's two fires. Scylla on one side and Charybdis on the other. In Irish, Ilter dha toiseabhchadh, in a dilemma. The reference is to the two fires kindled on May Eve in every village, between which all men and beasts devoted to sacrifice were compelled to pass.

Belford. A friend of Lovelace's Clarissa Harlowe. These "friends" made a covenant to pardon every sort of liberty which they took with each other.

Belfry. A military tower, pushed by besiegers against the wall of a besieged city, that missiles may be thrown more easily against the defenders. Probably a church steeple is called a belfry from its resemblance to these towers, and not because bells are hung in it. (French, beffroi, a watch-tower, Old French, belfre, belfrey, from German, borg-frei, borgen, to protect, frit [fride], a place fenced in for security.)

"Apart, and warn the fire wide,
The white owl in the bell's skies." — Tetseynor: The Owl, stanza 1.

Belial (Hebrew). The worthless or lawless one, i.e. the devil. Milton, in his pandemonium, makes him a very high and distinguished prince of darkness. (Paradise Lost.)

"What concord hath Christ with Belial?"—2 Cor. vi. 15.

"Belial came last—thain whom a spirit more lewd Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love Vire for it else." — Milton: Paradise Lost, book ii. 400-2.

Sons of Belial. Lawless, worthless, rebellious people. (See above.)

"Now the sons of Eli were sons of Belial."—1 Sam. ii. 12.
Belinda. The heroine of Pope's satirical poem, entitled the Rape of the Lock. The poem is based on a real incident:—Lord Petre cut off a lock of Miss Fermor's hair, and this liberty gave rise to a bitter feud between the two noble families. The poet says that Belinda wore on her neck two curls, one of which the baron cut off with a pair of scissors borrowed of Clarissa. Belinda, in anger, demanded back the ringlet; but it had flown to the skies and became a meteor, which "shot through liquid air, and drew behind a radiant trail of hair." (See Berenice.)

Belinunxia. A herb sacred to Belis, with the juice of which the Gauls used to poison their arrows.

Belisarius. Belisarius begging for an obolus. Belisarius, the greatest of Justinian's generals, being accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, was deprived of all his property; and his eyes being put out, he lived a beggar in Constantinople. The tale is that he fastened a bag to his road-side hut, and had inscribed over it, "Give an obolus to poor old Belisarius." This tradition is of no historic value.

Bell. Acton, Curry, and Ellis. Assumed names of Anne, Charlotte, and Emily Brontë.

Bell. As the bell clinks, so the fool thinks, or, As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks. The tale says when Whittington ran away from his master, and had got as far as Hounslow Heath, he was hungry, tired, and wished to return. Bow Bells began to ring, and Whittington fancied they said, "Turn again, Whittington, Lord Mayor of London." The bells clinked in response to the boy's thoughts. "Les gens de peu de jugement sont comme les cloches, a qui l'ouf fait dire tout ce que l'ouf veut." Dickens has the same idea in his Christmas Chimes.

The Passing Bell is the hallowed bell which used to be rung when persons were in extremis, to scare away evil spirits which were supposed to lurk about the dying, to pounce on the soul while "passing from the body to its resting-place." A secondary object was to announce to the neighbourhood the fact that all good Christians might offer up a prayer for the safe passage of the dying person into Paradise. We now call the bell rung at a person's decease the "passing bell."

The Athenians used to beat on brassen kettles at the moment of a decease to scare away the Furies.

Ringing the hallowed bell. Bells were believed to disperse storms and pestilence, drive away devils, and extinguish fire. In France it is still by no means unusual to ring church bells to ward off the effects of lightning. Next is this peculiar to France, for even in 1852 the Bishop of Malta ordered the church bells to be rung for an hour to "lay a gale of wind." Of course, the supposed efficacy of a bell resides in its having been consecrated.

"Pu'men placuo, ful'gura frango, sa'bita pa'ngo, Ex'cito lenitos, dis'sipuo ventos, pace cru'ento".

(Death's tale I tell, the winds dispeel, ill-feeling quell; The stifful shake, the storm-clouds break, the Sabbath wake. E. T. B.)

(See RINGING THE BELL BACKWARDS.)

Sound as a bell. (See SIMILES.)

Tolling the bell (for church). A relic of the Avô Bell, which, before the Reformation, was tolled before service to invite worshippers to a preparatory prayer to the Virgin.

To hear the bell. To be first fiddle: to carry off the palm; to be the best. Before cups were presented to winners of horse-races, etc., a little gold or silver bell used to be given for the prize.

"Jockey and his horse were by their masters sent To put in for the bell... They are to run and cannot miss the bell."

North: Forest of Varieties.

"It does not refer to bell-wethers, or the leading horse of a team, but "bear" means bear or carry off.

Who is to bell the cat? Who will risk his own life to save his neighbours? Any one who encounters great personal hazard for the sake of others undertakes to "bell the cat." The allusion is to the fable of the cunning old mouse, who suggested that they should hang a bell on the cat's neck to give notice to all mice of her approach. "Excellent," said a wise young mouse, "but who is to undertake the job?" (See BELL-THE-CAT.)

"Is there a man in all Spain able and willing to bell the cat [i.e., persuade the queen to abdicate]?"

—The Times.

Bells. The Koran says that bells hang on the trees of Paradise, and are set in motion by wind from the throne of God, as often as the blessed wish for music. (Sale.)

"Bells as musical"

As those that, on the golden-leafed trees
Of Eden, shook by the eternal breeze.

T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, part I.
At three bells, at five bells, etc. A term on board ship pretty nearly tantamount to our expression o'clock. Five out of the seven watches last four hours, and each half-hour is marked by a bell, which gives a number of strokes corresponding to the number of half-hours passed. Thus, "three bells" denotes the third half-hour of the watch, "five bells" the fifth half-hour of the watch, and so on. The two short watches, which last only two hours each, are from four to six and six to eight in the afternoon. At eight bells a new watch begins. (See Watch.)

"Do you there hear? Clean shut and a shave for muster at six bells."—Dundie Hall.

I'll not hang all my bells on one horse. I'll not leave all my property to one son. The illusion is manifest.

Give her the bells and let her fly. Don't throw good money after bad; make the best of the matter, but do not attempt to bolster it up. When a hawk was worthless, the bells were taken off, and the bird was suffered to escape, but the advice given above is to "leave the bells" and let the hawk go.

Ringing the bells backwards, is ringing a muffled peal. Backwards is often used to denote "in a contrary direction" (tout le contraire), as, "I hear you are grown rich." "Yes, backwards." To ring a muffled peal, is to ring a peal of sorrow, not of joy.

In olden times bells were rung backwards as a tocsin, or notice of danger.

"Reasons were lighted upon cares and enemies; the bells were rung backwards in the churches; and the general summons to arm announced an extremity of danger."—Sir W. Scott: The Bardsted, chap. iii.

Like sweet bells jangled, out of tune and harsh (Hamlet, iii. 1). A most exquisite metaphor for a distressed man, such as that of Don Quixote.

Warwick shakes his bells. Beware of danger, for Warwick is in the field. Trojans beware, Achilles has donned his armour. The bells mean the bells of a hawk, the hawk shakes his balls.

"Neither the king, but he that loveth him best, Dares stir a wing, if Warwick shakes his bells."—Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI., i. 1.

Bell, Book, and Candle. A ceremony in the greater excommunication introduced into the Catholic Church in the eight century. After reading the sentence a bell is rung, a book closed, and a candle extinguished. From that moment the excommunicated person is excluded from the sacraments and even divine worship. "Bell, book, and candle shall not drive me back."—Shakespeare: King John, iii. 3.

In spite of bell, book, and candle, i.e. in spite of all the opposition which the Christian hierarchy can offer. (See Cursing.)

Bell of Patrick's Will (cloch an endlauchta Phatraic) is six inches high, five broad, and four deep. It certainly was in existence in the sixth century. In the eleventh century a shrine was made for it of gold and silver filigree, adorned with jewels.

Bell Savage, or La Belle Sauvage.—Pocahontas. According to one derivation it is a contraction of Isabelle Savage, who originally kept the inn. It is somewhat remarkable that the sign of the inn was a pun on the Christian name, a "bell on the Hope" (hoop), as may be seen in the Close Roll of 1463. The hoop seems to have formed a garter or frame to most signs. The site of the inn is now occupied by the premises of Messrs. Cassell & Co.

"They now returned to their inn, the famous Bell Savage."—Scott: Kenilworth, iii.

Bell-the-Cat. Archibald Douglas, Earl of Angus, was so called. James III. made favourites of architects and masons. One mason, named Cochran, he created Earl of Mar. The Scotch nobles held a council in the church of Tauldr for the purpose of putting down these upstarts, when Lord Gray asked, "Who will bell the cat?" "That will I," said Douglas, and he fearlessly puts to death, in the king's presence, the obnoxious minions. (See Bell.)

Bell-wawering. Vacillating, swaying from side to side like a bell. A man whose mind jangles out of tune from delirium, drunkenness, or temporary insanity, is said to have his wits gone bell-wawering.

"I doubt me his wits have gone bell-wawering by the road."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. vii.

Belladonna (Italian, beautiful lady). This name was given to the Deadly Nightshade, from a practice once common among ladies of touching their eyes with it to make the pupils large and lustrous.

Bellarmine (A). A large Flemish potche, i.e. a corpulent beer-jug of some strong wine, originally made in Flanders in ridicule of Cardinal Bellarmine, the great persecutor of the reformed party there. These jugs had at the neck a rude likeness of the cardinal with his large, square, ecclesiastical board.

"like a larger jug, that some man call A bellarmine."... Whereas the lower hand of pagan workmen, over the proud ambitious head, hath carved An idol large, with beard episcopal; Making the vessel look like tyrant Eulog." Carrolls: The Ordinary.

"One of the Fellows of Exeter (College), when Dr Pridanx was rector, sent his servant, after nine o'clock one night, with a large bottle to fetch some ale from the alehouse. When he was coming home with it under his gown the proctor met him, and asked him what he did out so late, and what had he under his gown? The man answered that his master had sent him to the stationers to borrow Bellarmine, which book he had under his arm; and so he went home. Whence a bottle with a jug belly is called a Bellarmine to this day, 1867." Oxonian, vol. i, p. 342.

Bellaston (Lady). A profligate, whose conduct and conversation are a life-like photograph of the court be" usages of Louis XV. (Fielding: Tom Jones.)

Belle. A beauty. The Belle of the room. The most beautiful lady in the room (French).

La belle France. A common French phrase applied to France, as "Merry England," is to our own country.

Belle. Lettres. Polite literature (French); similarly, Beaux arts. the fine arts.

Bellefontaine (Benedict). The most wealthy farmer of Grand Pré (Nova Scotia), and father of Evangeline. When the inhabitants of his village were exiled, and he was about to embark, he died of a broken heart, and was buried on the sea-shore. (Longfellow: Evangeline.)

Bellerophon. One of the ships which took part in the Battle of the Nile, and was called by the English sailors "the Bully-rufran," or "Belly-rufron."

"Why, she and the Belly-rufron seem to have pretty well shared and shared alike."—Captain Marryat: Poor Jack, chap. xiii.

Bellerophon. The Joseph of Greek mythology: Antea, the wife of Pre" tos, being the "Potiphar's wife" who tempted him, and afterwards falsely accused him. Being successful in various enterprises, he attempted to fly to heaven on the winged horse Peg'son, but Zeus sent a gad-fly to sting the horse, and the rider was overthrown.

Letters of Bellerophon. Letters or other documents either dangerous or prejudicial to the bearer. Pre"tos sent Bellerophon with a letter to the King of Lydia, his wife's father, recounting the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death.

Pausanias, the Spartan, sent messen"ers from time to time to King Xerxes, with similar letters; the discovery by one of the bearers proved the ruin of the traitor.

David's letter sent by Uriah (2 Sam. xi. 14) was of a similar treacherous character; hence the phrase, "Letters of Uriah."

Bellerus. Beller'sium is the Land's End, Cornwall, the fabled land of the giant Bellerus.

"Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus old." Milton: Lycidas, 100.

Bellicent. Daughter of Gormoise and Igera. According to Tennyson, she was the wife of Lot, King of Orkney; but in La Mort d'Arthur Margause is called Lot's wife.

Bellin. The ram, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Bellisant. Sister to King Pepin of France, wife of Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. Being accused of infidelity, the emperor banished her, and she became the mother of Valentine and Orson. (Valentine and Orson.)

Bellman. Before the new police force was established, watchmen or bellmen used to parade the streets at night, and at Easter a copy of verses was left at the chief houses in the hope of obtaining an offering. These verses were the reliefs of the old incantations sung or said by the bellman to keep off elves and hobgoblins. The town crier.

Bello. Goddess of war and wife of Mars. (Roman mythology.)

"Her features, late so exquisitely lovely, inf"amed with the fury of frenzy, resembled those of a Belloam."—Sir Walter Scott.

Bellowa. The pit of the stomach. To knock a man on the "bellowa" takes his "wind (breath) away." Níng old rose and burn the bellows. (See Sng.)

Bellwether of the Flock. A jocose and rather deprecating term applied to the leader of a party. Of course the allusion is to the wether or sheep which leads the flock with a bell fastened to its neck.

Belly. The belly and its members. The fable of Menenius Agrippa to the Roman people when they seceded to the Sacred Mount: "Once on a time the members refused to work for the lazy belly; but, as the supply of food was thus stopped, they found there was a necessary and mutual dependence between them." Shakespeare introduces the fable in his Coriolanus, i. 1.

The belly has no ears. A hungry man will not listen to advice or arguments. The Romans had the same proverb, l'enter non habet aures; and in French, l'entre affamé n'a point d'oreilles.

Belly-timber. Food.

"And now, Dame F Fever, to dinner, to dinner. The old fox must have his belly-timber, though the hounds have been after him the whole day." —Sir W. Scott: F Fever of the Peak, chap. 48.

Belomancy (Greek). Divination by arrows. Labels being attached to a given number of arrows, the archers let them fly, and the advice on the label of the arrow which flies farthest is accepted and acted on. This practice is common with the Arabs.

Beloved Disciple. St. John. (John xiii. 23, etc.)

Below the Belt. (See Belt.)

Belphégor. A nasty, licentious, obscene fellow. Bel-Phegor was a Moabite deity, whose rites were celebrated on Mount Phegor, and were noted for their obscenity. The Standard, speaking of certain museums in London, says: "When will men cease to be deluded by these unscrupulous Bel-phéorgs?" (meaning "quacks").

* Phegor, Phogor, or Poer, a famous mountain beyond the Jordan. Nebi and Pisgah were neighbouring mountains. Beth-Peor is referred to in Deut. iii. 29.

Belphoebe, meant for Queen Elizabeth. She was sister of Amalric, Equally chaste, but of the Diams and Minerva type. Cold as an icicle, passionless, immovable. She is a white flower without perfume, and her only tender passion is that of chivalry. Like a moonbeam, she is light without warmth. You admire her as you admire a marble statue. (Spencer: Féeerie Queree, book iii.)

Belt. To hit below the belt. To strike unfairly. It is prohibited in prize-fighting to hit below the waist-belt.

To call men knaves and fools, to charge a man with nepotism, to make a slanderous report which is not actionable, indeed to take away a man's character in any way where self-defence is impossible, is "hitting him below the belt."

"Lord Salisbury hits hard, but never hits below the belt." —Daily Telegraph, November, 1883.

To hold the belt. To be the champion. In pugilism, etc., a belt is passed on to the champion.

Beltane (3 syl.). A festival observed in Ireland on June 21st, and in some parts of Scotland on May Day. A fire is kindled on the hill, and the young people dance round it, and feast on cakes made of milk and eggs. It is supposed to be a relic of the worship of Baal. The word is Gaelic, and means Bel's fire; and the cakes are called beltane-cakes.

Belted Knight. The right of wearing belt and spurs. Even to the present day knights of the shire are "girt with a belt and sword," when the declaration of their election is officially made.

Belted Will. Lord William Howard, warden of the western marches (1563-1640).

"His Bilboa blade, by marchmen felt, Hung in a broad and studious belt; Hence, in rude phrase, the border's still Called noble Howard Belted Will." —Scott.

Beltenebros. Amadis of Gaul so calls himself after he retires to the Poor Rock. His lady-love is Oriana. (.Amadis of Gaul, ii. 6.)

Belvawney (Miss), of the Portsmouth theatre. She always took the part of a page, and wore tights and silk stockings. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby, 1838.)

Belvedere [bel-ve-dear]. A sort of pleasure-house or look-out on the top of a house. The word is Italian, and means a fine prospect.

Belvidera (in Otway's Vereire Preserved). Sir Walter Scott says, "More tears have been shed for the sorrows of Belvedera and Monimia than for those of Juliet and Desdemona."

"And Belvidera pours her soul in love." —Thomson: Winter.

Bemuse (2 syl.). To get into a dreamy, half-intoxicated state.

"Bemusing himself with beer." —Sala: Gaslight and Daylight.

Ben. The Neptune of the Saxons.

Ben (a theatrical word). Benefit. "A big ben," a good or bumping benefit.

Big Ben of Westminster. A name given to the large bell, which weighs 13 tons 10 cwt., and is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, the Chief Commissioner of Works when the bell was cast. (1856.)
Ben Jochanan, in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Rev. Samuel Johnson, who suffered much persecution for his defence of the right of private judgment.

"A Jew [Englishman] of humble parentage was he;
In trade a Levite [clergyman], though of low degree."
Part II. 354, 355.

Ben trovato (Italian). Well found; a happy discovery or invention.

Benai'ah (3 syl.), in the satire of Absalom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for George Edward Sackville, called General Sackville, a gentleman of family, and a zealous partisan of the Duke of York. Benai'ah was captain in David's army, and was made by Solomon generalissimo. (I Kings ii. 35.)

"Nor can Benai'ah's worth forgotten be.
Of publick arts, when publick storms were high:
Whose conduct, while the Moon's fierce unrests made Secured at once our honour and our trade."
Part II. 820-23.

Benares (3 syl.). One of the "most holy" cities of the Hindus, revered by them as much as Mecca is by the Mohammedans.

Benbow (Admiral), in an engagement with the French near St. Malo, on the Spanish coast, in 1701, had his legs and thighs shivered into splinters by a chain-shot, but, supported in a wooden frame, he remained on the quarter-deck till morning, when Du Casse bore away. Already, the Portuguese governor of India, in his engagement with the united fleet of Cambay's and Egypt, had his legs and thighs shattered in a similar manner; but, instead of retreating, had himself bound to the ship's mast, where he "waved his sword to cheer on the combatants," till he died from loss of blood. (See Cynoegeros, Jaffee, etc.)

"Whirled by the cannon's rave, in shivers torn,
His thighs far shattered over the waves are worn.
Bound to the mast the god-like hero stands,
Waves his proud sword and cheers his woeful lands.
Though winds and seas their wonted aid deny,
To yield he knows not, but he knows to die."
Camoes: Lusiad, book x.

Benbow. A sort, generous, free, idle, and always hanging about the ale-house. He inherited a good estate, spent it all, and ended life in the workhouse. The tale is in Crabbe's Borough.

Bench. The seat of a judge in the law courts; the office of judge.

To be raised to the bench. To be made a judge.

The King's [queen's] bench. The Supreme Court of Common Law; so called because at one time the sovereign presided in this court, and the court followed the sovereign when he moved from one place to another. Now a division of the High Court of Judicature.

Bench of bishops. The whole body of English prelates, who sit together on a bench in the House of Lords.

To be raised to the Episcopal bench. To be made a bishop.

Bench and Bar. Judges and pleaders. The bench is the seat on which a judge sits. The bar was formerly a wooden barrier, to separate the counsel from the audience. Now, silk gowns (q.r.) sit nearer the judge, and their juniors behind them. (See Barristers.)

Bencher. Senior members of the Inns of Court; so called from the bench on which they used to sit. They exercise the function of calling students to the bar, and have the right of expelling the obnoxious. (See Bar, page 94, col. 1.)

"He was made successively, Barrister, Outer Barrister, Bench, and Reader."—Wood.

Bend, meaning power, as Beyond my bend, i.e. my means or power. The allusion is to a bow or spring; if strained beyond its bending power, it breaks. (See Bent.)

Bend sinister. He has a bend sinister. He was not born in lawful weallock. In heraldry, a band running from the upper right-hand corner to the lower left-hand corner (as the shield appears before you on paper) is called a bend sinister, and is popularly, but erroneously, supposed to indicate bastardy.

Ben'demee. A river that flows near the ruins of Chilmiror or Istachar, in the province of Chusistan in Persia.

"There's a lower of roses by Ben'demee's stream,
And the nightingale sings round it all the day long."—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh, Part I.

Bender. Sixpence.

Ben'digo. A rough fur cap, named from a noted pugilist, William Thompson; so nicknamed from his birthplace in Australia.
Bendy (Old). The devil, who is willing to bend to anyone's inclination. The way of sin is so broad that every shade of error can be admitted without obstruction.

Benedictus (5 syl.). "Bless you:" a benediction used in the Roman Catholic Church; also the canticle.

Benedick. A sworn bachelor caught in the wiles of matrimony, like Benedick in Shakespeare's comedy of Much Ado about Nothing.

"Let our worthy Cantah be bachelor or Benedick, what concern is it of ours."—Mrs. Edwards; A Gilton Girl, chap. xli.

Benediction and Benedict are used indiscriminately, but the distinction should be observed.

Benedict. A bachelor, not necessarily one pledged to celibacy, but simply a man of marriageable age, not married. St. Benedict was a most uncompromising stickler for celibacy.

"Is it not a pun? There is an old saying, 'Needles and pins; when a man marries his trouble begins.' If so, the unmarried man is beneficent.—Life on the West.

Benedictines (4 syl.). Monks who follow the rule of St. Benedict, viz. implicit obedience, celibacy; abstaining from laughter, spare diet, poverty, the exercise of hospitality, and unremitting industry.

Benefice (3 syl.). Under the Romans certain grants of lands made to veteran soldiers were called beneficia, and in the Middle Ages an estate held ex mero beneficio of the donor was called "a benefice." When the popes assumed the power of the feudal lords with reference to ecclesiastical patronage, a "living" was termed by them a benefice held under the pope as superior lord. This assumption roused the jealousy of France and England, and was stoutly resisted.

Benefit of Clergy. Exemption of the clerical order from civil punishment, based on the text, "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." (1 Chron. xvi. 22). In time it comprehended not only the ordained clergy, but all who being able to write and read, were capable of entering into holy orders. This law was abolished in the reign of George IV. (1827).

Ben' en gerel. (See Hamet.)

Benet (French). A simpleton, so called because they were supposed to be, in a special way, the objects of God's care. (French, beni, Old French, beneit, from Latin, benedictus.) We call an idiot an "innocent" (q.v.).

Benevolence. A "forced" gratuity, under the excuse of a loan, exacted by some of the Plantagenet kings. First enforced in 1473, it was declared illegal by the Bill of Rights in 1689.

"Royal benevolences were encroaching more and more on the right of parliamentary taxation."—Green; History of the English People, Vol. ii. book vi. chap. i. p. 107.

Benevolus, in Cowper's Task, is John Courtney Throckmorton of Weston Underwood.

Bengal Tigers. The old 17th Foot, whose badge, a royal tiger, was granted them for their services in India (1802-23). Now the Leicester Regiment.

Bengalese (3 syl.) for Beng'ali or Bengalees. Natives of Bengal. (Singular, Beng'ali or Bengalee.)

Bengodi. A wonderful country where they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have the giblets given into the bargain. In this place there is a mountain of Parmesan cheese, and people's employment is making cheesecakes and macaroons. There is also a river which runs Malmsey wine of the very best quality. (Boccaccio: Eighth Day, Novella iii.)

Benicia Boy. John C. Heenan, the American pugilist, who challenged and fought Tom Sayers for "the belt" in 1860; so called from Benicia in California, his birthplace.

Benjamin. The pet, the youngest. Queensland is the Benjamin of our colonial possessions. The allusion is to Benjamin, the youngest son of Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 18).

Benjamin. A smart overcoat; so called from a tailor of the name, and rendered popular by its association with Joseph's "coat of many colours."

Benjamin's Mess. The largest share. The allusion is to the banquet given by Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, to his brethren. "Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs." (Gen. xliii. 34).

Bennakkar. A wealthy merchant and magician of Delhi, in Ridley's Tales of the Genii.

"Like the jeweller of Delhi, in the house of the magician Bennakkar. I at length reached a vaulted room dedicated to secrecy and silence."—Sir W. Scott.

Benshee, Ben'shee (see Banshee). The Scotch Bodach Glay, or Grey Spectre, is a similar superstition; and the Pari-Banou (Nymph of the Air) of the Arabian Nights is also a sort of Benehve.

"How oft has the Benehve cried!" [How busy death has been of late with our nobilities].—J. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. II.

Bent. Inclination; talent for something. Out of my bent, not in my way, not in the range of my talent. Bent on it, inclined to it. As a thing bent is inclined, so a bent is an inclination or bias. Genius or talent is a bent or bias.

"Wherever is done best, is done from the natural bent and disposition of the mind."—Hesiod: Table Talk.

They fool me to the top of my bent, i.e. as far as the bow can be bent without snapping. (Hamlet, iii. 2.) (See BEND.)

Benvolio. Nephew to Montague, a testy, litigious gentleman, who would "quarrel with a man that had a hair more or a hair less in his beard than he had." Mercutio says to him, "Thou hast quarrelled with a man for coughing in the street, because he hath wakened thy dog that hath lain asleep in the sun." (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 1.)

Beppo. The contraction of Giuseppe, and therefore equal to our Joe. Husband of Laura, a Venetian lady. He was taken captive in Troy, turned Turk, joined a band of pirates, grew rich, and, after several years' absence, returned to his native land, where he discovered his wife at a carnival ball with her cavaliere servente. He made himself known to her, and they lived together again as man and wife. (Byron: Beppo.)

Berchta [the white lady]. This fairy, in Southern Germany, answers to Hulda (the gracious lady) of Northern Germany; but after the introduction of Christianity, when pagan deities were represented as demons, Berchta lost her former character, and became a bogie to frighten children.

Beroeans (3 syr.). The followers of the Rev. John Burdall, of Kincardineshire (1773). They believe that all we know of God is from revelation; that all the Psalms refer to Christ; that assurance is the proof of faith; and that unbelief is the unpardonable sin. They took their name from the Bereans, mentioned in the Book of the Acts (xvii. 11), who "received the Word with all readiness of mind, and searched the Scriptures daily."

Berecythian Hero. Midas, the Phrygian king; so called from Mount Berecythus, in Phrygia.

Berengarians. Followers of Berenger, archdeacon of Angers, the learned opponent of Lanfranc (eleventh century). He said that the bread by consecration did not become the very body of Christ "generated on earth so many years before, but becomes to the faithful, nevertheless, the blessed body of Christ."

Berevet (4 syr.). The sister-wife of Ptolemy III., who vowed to sacrifice her hair to the gods, if her husband returned home the vanquisher of Asia. She suspended her hair in the temple of the war-god, but it was stolen the first night, and Conon of Samos told the king that the winds had wafted it to heaven, where it still forms the seven stars near the tail of Leo, called Coma Berenices.

Pope, in his Rape of the Lock, converts the purloined ringlet into a star or meteor, "which drew behind a radiant trail of hair." (Canto v.)

Berg Folk. Pagan spirits doomed to live on the Scandinavian hills till the day of redemption. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bergaen (4). A great liar; so called from Antiphanes Berga.

Bergamir. A frost-giant, father of the Jötuns, or second dynasty of giants. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Berger. L'heure du Berger (French). The shepherd's hour, i.e. the swain's or lover's hour; the happy hour of treat; the critical moment.

Bergomask. A clown or merry-andrew; a native of Bergamo. Compare, a gasconader; a Boctian.

Berkley (Mr.). An Englishman of fortune, good-humoured, and humane. He is a bachelor and somewhat eccentric, but sound common sense is a silver thread which is never lost. (Longfellow: Hyperion [a romance], 1839.)

Berkshire (Saxon, Bearene - seire, forest-shire), a name peculiarly appropriate to this county, which contains the forest districts of Wimseor and Bagshot.

Berlin Decree. A decree issued at Berlin by Napoleon I., forbidding any of the nations of Europe to trade with Great Britain (1806). This mad fancy was the first step to the great man's fall.

Berlin Time. The new Berlin Observatory is 44° 14' east of Paris, and 53° 30' east of Greenwich. The Berlin day begins at noon, but our civil day begins the midnight preceding.
Berliner. The people of Berlin, in Prussia.

Berroja. Insula de la Torre, from which Amadis of Gaul starts when he goes in quest of the Enchantress-Damsel, daughter of Fin'etor the necromancer.

Bermoothes. An hypothetical island feigned by Shakespeare to be enchanted, and inhabited by witches and devils. Supposed by some to be Bermudas; but a correspondent in Notes and Queries (January 23rd, 1886, p. 72) utterly denies this, and favours the suggestion that the island meant was Lampedusa.

"From the still-versed Bermoothes, there she's hid."—Shakespeare: The Tempest, i. 2.

Bermudas. To live in the Bermudas, i.e. in some out-of-the-way place for cheapness. The shabby gentile hires a knocker in some West-end square, where letters may be left for them, but live in the Bermudas, or narrow passages north of the Strand, near Covent Garden.

Bernard (St.). Abbot of the monastery of Clairvaux in the twelfth century. His fame for wisdom was very great, and few church matters were undertaken without his being consulted.

Petit Bernard. Solomon Bernard, engraver of Lyons. (Sixteenth century.)

Poor Bernard. Claude Bernard, of Dijon, philanthropist (1588-1641).

Bernard. Bonus Bernardus non videt omnia (see above). We are all apt to forget sometimes; events do not always turn out as they are planned beforehand.

"Poor Peter was to win honours at Shrewsbury school, and carry them thence to Cambridge; and after that a living awaited him, the gift of his benevolent sepulchred Peter Arley, into the Bermudas non videt omnia, and Poor Peter's lot in life was very different to what his friends had planned."—Mrs. Gaskell Cranford, chap. vi.

Bernard Soup (St.). (See Stone Soup.)

Bernardo, in Dibdin's Bibliomaniac (a romance), is meant for Joseph Havelock, antiquary and critic (1811).

Bernardo del Carpio. One of the most favourite subjects of the Spanish minstrels; the other two being the Cid and Lara's seven infants.

Bernard's Inn. Formerly called Mackworth Inn, from Dean Mackworth, who died 1454.

"This house was, in the thirty-first year of the reign of Henry VI, a place belonging to Dr. John Mackworth, dean of the cathedral church of Lincoln, and at that time in the holding of one Lionel Bernard ... and it hath ever since retained the name of Bernard's Inn."—Harleian MSS. No. 1104.

Berner or Barnes (Juliana). Priores of Sopewell nunnery, near St. Albars, reputed authoress of the Boyle of Hawking and Hunting (1486). Generally called "Dame Berner." Another book ascribed to her is the Boyle of the Blazing of Arms (1485).

Bernese (2 syl.). A native of Bern, in Switzerland.

Berneseque Poetry. Scrio-comic poetry: so called from Francesco Berni, of Tuscany, who greatly excelled in it. (1490-1536.)

Bernouilli's Numbers or the properties of numbers first discovered by James Bernoulli, professor of mathematics at Basle (1654-1705).

Berserker. Grandson of the eight-handed Starkaeder and the beautiful Alfhilde, called her-serve (bure of mail) because he went into battle unarmoured. Hence, any man with the fighting fever on him.

"You say that I am berserker. And ... bare I go to-morrow to the war."—Rev. G. Kingsley: Berserker the Wake.

Berth. He has tumbled into a nice berth. A nice situation or fortune. The place in which a ship is anchored is called its berth, and the sailors call it a good or bad berth as they think it favourable or otherwise. The space also allotted to a seaman for his hammock is called his berth. (Norman, berth, a cradle.)

To give a wide berth. Not to come near a person; to keep a person at a distance. The place where a ship lies in harbour is called her berth: hence, to give a "wide berth" is to give a ship plenty of room to swing at anchor.

Bertha. The betrothed of John of Leyden, but, being a vassal of Count Oberthal, she was unable to marry without her lord's consent. When she went with her mother to ask permission of marriage, the count, struck with her beauty, determined to make her his mistress. She afterwards makes her escape from the castle, and, fancying that the "prophet" had caused the death of her lover, goes to Munster, fully resolved to compass his death by setting fire to the palace. She is apprehended, and, being brought before the prophet-king, recognises her lover in—him, saying, "I loved thee once; but now my love is turned to hate," and stabs herself. (Meyerbeer's opera, Le Prophète.)

Bertha. The blind daughter of Caleb Plummer in Dickens's Cricket on the Hearth (a Christmas story), 1845.

Bertha (Frau). A German impersonation of the Epiphany, corresponding to the Italian Befana. Represented as a white lady, who steals softly into nurseries and rocks infants asleep in the absence of negligent nurses; she is, however, the terror of all naughty children. Her feet are very large, and she has an iron nose. (See Befana.)

Berthes [Stock Exchange term]. The London, Brighton, & South Coast Railway Deferred Stock.

Berthe au Grand Pied. Mother of Charlemagne, and great-granddaughter of Charles Martel; so called because she had a club-foot.

Bertolde [Baw-told]. Imperturbable as Bertolde, i.e. not to be taken by surprise, thrown off your guard, or disconcerted at anything. Bertolde is the hero of a little jeu d'esprit in Italian prose, J. Cesare Croce. He is a comedian by profession, whom nothing astonishes, and is as much at his ease with kings and queens as with persons of his own rank and vocation.

Bertram. One of the conspirators against the Republic of Venice "in whom there was a hesitating softness fatal to a great enterprise." He betrayed the conspiracy to the senate. (Byron: Marino Faliero.)

Bertram (Henry), in Sir W. Scott's novel of Guy Mannering, was suggested by James Annesley, Esq., rightful heir of the earldom of Anglesey, of which he was dispossessed by his uncle Richard. He died in 1743.

Bertram, Count of Rousillon, beloved by Helena, the hero of Shakespeare's comedy, All's Well That Ends Well.

"I cannot reconcile my heart to Bertram, a man noble without generosity, and young without truth; who marries Helena as a coward, and leaves her as a profligate."—Dr. Johnson.

Bertram Risingham. The vassal of Philip of Mortham. Oswald Wycliffe induced him to shoot his lord at Murston Moor, and for this vile deed the vassal demanded of him all the gold and movables of his late master. Oswald, being a villain, tried to outwit Bertram, and even murder him; but in the end it turns out that Mortham was not killed, neither was Oswald his heir, for Redmond O'Neale, the page of Rokeby, is found to be Mortham's son. (Scott: Rokeby.)

Bertram o. The send-father of Robert le Diable. After alluring his son to gamble away all his possessions, he meets him near the rocks St. Ire'nè, and Hel'ena seduces him in the "Dance of Love." When Bertram at last comes to claim his victim, he is resisted by Alice, the foster-sister of the duke, who reads to him his mother's will, and angels come to celebrate the triumph of good over evil. (Meyerbeer's opera Roberto il Diavolo.

Berwicks [Stock Exchange term], meaning the North-Eastern Railway shares. The line runs to Berwick.

Beryl Molosane (3 syl.). The lady beloved by George Geith; a laughing, loving beauty, all sunshine and artlessness; tender, frank, full of innocent chatter; helping everyone and loving everyone. Her lot is painfully unhappy, and she dies. (F. G. Trafford [J. H. Riddell]: George Geith.)

Bieszak ([the interval]. The space between death and the resurrection. (The Koran.)

Bessal. A great grandfather (French, biamneul). This word should be restored.

Besants or Besanta. Circular pieces of bullion without any impression, supposed to represent the old coinage of Byzantium, and to have been brought to Europe by the Crusaders.

Beside the Cushion. Beside the question; not to the point; not pertinent to the matter in hand. French, hors de propos; Latin, nihil ad rhombum. It was Judge Jeffreys who used the phrase, "Besides [sic] the cushion."

Besom. To hang out the besom. To have a fling when your wife is gone on a visit. To be a quasi bachelor once more. Taking this in connection with the following phrase, it evidently means, holding the marriage service in abeyance.

"This is French argot. Beris le balai (to burn the besom) means to live the life of a hobo, whence balard. Paris slang for a hobo-line. Probably our phrase, "burn the belows," is pretty much the same as roir le balai.

Jumping the besom. Omitting the marriage service after the publication of banns, and living together as man and wife. In Southern Scotch, a street-walker is called a bevon, and in French balai (a besom) means the life of a libertine, as Edité le balai; Il ont bien rôti le balai ensemble, where balai means a bunch or something worse. No further explanation can be needed or could be given.

Bess. Good Queen Bess. Queen Elizabeth (1533, 1558-1603).

Bess o' Bedlam. A female lunatic vagrant. Bedlam is a common name for a madhouse, and Bess is a national name for a woman, especially of the lower order. The male lunatic is a Tom o' Bedlam.

Bess of Hardwicke. Elizabeth, Countess of Shrewsbury, to whose charge, in 1572, Mary Queen of Scots was committed. The countess treated the captive queen with great harshness, being jealous of the earl her husband. Bess of Hardwicke married four times: Alexander Barley (when she was only fourteen years of age); William Cavendish; Sir William St. Lo. Captain of Queen Elizabeth's Guard; and lastly, George, Earl of Shrewsbury. She built Hardwicke Hall, and founded the wealth and dignity of the Cavendish family.

Bessemor Iron. Pig-iron refined, and converted into steel or malleable iron by passing currents of air through the molten metal, according to a process discovered by Sir H. Bessemer, and patented in 1853.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray. A ballad. The tale is that these two young ladies, natives of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retired to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, about a mile from Lynedock, the residence of Mary Gray. A young man, in love with both, carried them provisions. Both ladies died of the plague, and were buried at Dornock Hough.

Besseus. A cowardly, bragging captain, a sort of Bobbaldil (q.v.). (Broumont and Fletcher: A King and no King.)

Best. At best or At the very best. Look at the matter in the most favourable light. Making every allowance.

"Life at best is but a mangled yarn."

At one's best. At the highest or best point attainable by the person referred to. For the best. With the best of motives; with the view of obtaining the best results.

I must make the best of my way home.

It is getting late and I must use my utmost diligence to get home as soon as possible.

To have the best of it, or, To have the best of the bargain. To have the advantage or best of a transaction.

To make the best of the matter. To submit to ill-luck with the best grace in your power.

Best Man (at a wedding). The bridegroom's chosen friend who waits on him, as the bride's maids wait on the bride.

Best Things (The Eight), according to Scandinavian mythology:—

1. The ash Yggdrasil is the best of trees;
2. Skildbladnir, of ships;
3. Odin, of the Æsir;
4. Sleipnir, of steeds;
5. Bifrost, of bridges;
6. Bragi, of bards;
7. Habrok, of hawks
8. Garm, of hounds.

Bestiaries or Bestials. Books very popular in the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth centuries, containing the pictures of animals and their symbolisms.

"The unicorn has but one horn in the middle of its forehead. It is the only animal that ventures to attack the elephant; and so alert is the neck of its feet, that with one blow it can rip the belly of that beast. Hunters can catch the unicorn only by placing a young virgin in its haunt. No sooner doe he see the damsel, than he runs towards her, and lies down at her feet, and so suffers himself to be captured by the hunters. The unicorn represents Jesus Christ, who took on Him our nature in the virgin's womb, was bestowed to the Jews, and delivered into the hands of Pontius Pilate. Its one horn signifies the Gospel of Truth."—Le Bestiarie Dit de Calumain, écrit de Normandy 11th century.

Bête. Morte la bête, mort le venin. Dead men tell no tales; dead dogs don't bite. When one is dead his power of mischief is over. Literally, if the beast is dead, its poison is dead also.

Quand Jean-Bête est mort, il à laissé bien des héritiers. Casimir Delavigne says to the same effect, Les sots depuis Adam sont en majorité. Jean-Bête means a fool or dolt.

Bête Noire. The thorn in the side, the bitter in the cup, the spoke in the wheel, the black sheep, the object of aversion. A black sheep has always been considered an eyesore in a flock, and its wool is really less valuable. In times of superstition it was looked on as bearing the devil's mark.

"The Dutch sale of tin is the bête noire of the Cornish miners."—The Times.

Beth Gelert, or the Grave of the Greyhound. A ballad by the Hon. William Robert Spencer. The tale is that one day Llewellyn returned from hunting; when his favourite hound, covered with gore, ran to meet him. The chief-tain ran to see if anything had happened to his infant son, found the cradle overturned, and all around was sprinkled with gore and blood. Thinking the hound had eaten the child, he stabbed it to the heart. Afterwards he found the babe quite safe, and a huge wolf under the bed, quite dead. Gélfert had killed the wolf and saved the child.

Bethlemenites (4 syll.) Followers of John Huss, so called because he used to preach in the church called Bethlehems of Prague.

Betrothed (The). One of the Tales of the Crusaders, by Sir Walter Scott, 1832. Lady Eveline Berenger is the betrothed of Sir Damian de Lacy, whom she marries.

Better. My better half. A courteous way of saying my wife. As the twain are one, each is half. Horace calls his friend animae dissidium nesci. (1 Odes iii. 8.)

To be better than his word. To do more than he promised. To think better of the matter. To give it further consideration; to form a more correct opinion respecting it.

Better kind Friend, etc. Better kind friend than friend kind. Friend is a corruption of frend, meaning a stranger. Better [a] kind stranger than a kinsman who makes himself a stranger, or an estranged kinsman.

Better off. In more easy circumstances.

Bettina. A mascot who always brought good luck wherever she went. Though a mere peasant, she is taken to the Prince of Fiombino's palace of Laurent, to avert his ill-luck; but by marrying Pippo (a shepherd) she loses her gift. However, the prince is reminded that the children of a mascot are hereditary mascots, and makes Bettina promise that her first child shall be adopted by the prince. (See Mascotte.)

Bettina. The name under which Elizabeth Brentano translated into English Goethe’s Letters to a Child in 1835. She was the wife of Ludwig Achim von Arnim, and it was her correspondence with Goethe which were the Letters to a Child referred to. Elizabeth Brentano was born 1785.

Betty. A name of contempt given to a man who interferes with the duties of female servants, or occupies himself in female pursuits; also called a "Molly."

Betty. A skeleton key: the servant of a picklock. Burglars call their short crowbars for forcing locks Jennie and Jemmy. "Jenny" is a "small engine," i.e. 'ginie, and Jemmy is merely a variant.

Betzibuzz. Dumfries, or the Cape of St. Andrew, in Scotland.

"The north-initiated tempest foams O’er Griz’s and Bethizibuzz’s highest peak."

Betwixt and Betwixen Neither one nor the other, but somewhere between the two. Thus, grey is neither white nor black, but betwixt and between the two.

Beurre. Avoir beurre ou la tête. To be covered with crimes. Taken from a Jewish saying, "If you have butter on your head (i.e. have stolen butter and put it in your cap), don’t go into the sun." (Vidocq: Volcurs, vol. i. p. 16.)
Beuves (1 syl.), or Buvo'ro of Agyre'mont. The father of Malagigi, and uncle of Rinaldo. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Bever. A "drink" between meals (Italian, bereve, to drink—our beverage; Latin, bibere—our imbib.) At Eton they used to have "Bever days," when extra beer and bread were served during the afternoon in the College Hall to scholars, and any friends whom they might bring in.

"He . . . will devour three breakfasts . . . without prejudice to his bevers."—Beaumont and Fletcher: Women Hater, 1.3.

"Whate'er can deck mankind,
Or charm the heart, in sequent Bevi showed."—Thomson: Winter, 631-5.

Bevisa. The horse of Lord Marnion. (Sir Walter Scott.) (See Horse.)

Bever of Southampton. A knight of romance, whose exploits are recounted in Dryden's Polytollon. The French call him Beuves de Hunton.

Bevoriasius, whose Commentary on the Generations of Adam is referred to by Sterne in the Sentimental Journey, was Johannes Bevoricius, physician and senator, author of a large number of books. The Commentary will be found at fol. 1 (1632).

Bevy. A bevy of ladies. A throng or company; properly applied to redbucks, quails, and pheasants. Timid gregarious animals, in self-defence, go down to a river to drink in bevy or small companies. Ladies, from their timidity, are placed in the same category (Italian, bereve, to drink).

"And upon her deck what a bevy of human flowers—young women, how lovely!—swept o'er, how noble!"—De Quincey: Dream-フォー.

Ben'diel, in the satire of Abulom and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for the Marquis of Worcester, afterwards Duke of Beaufort.

"Benedict with each grace and virtue fraught,
Serene his looks, serene his life and thought;
On whom so largely Nature heaped her store,
There scarce remained for arts to give him more."—Part II. 947-50.

Bezon'ian. A new recruit; applied originally in derision, to young soldiers sent from Spain to Italy, who landed both ill-acquainted and in want of everything (Ital. besognio, from bisogno, need; French besoin).

"Beso and perving besognios and marauders."—Sir W. Scott: Monastery, xvi.

"Great men oft die by a sile bezonians."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., act iv. 1.

"Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die" (2 Hen. IV., act v. 3). Choose your leader or take the consequences—Cesar or Pompey? "Speak or die."

Bheem or Bhima. One of the five Pandus, or brotherhoods of Indian demi-gods, famous for his strength. He slew the giant Kinchick, and dragged his body from the hills, thereby making the Kinchick ravine.

Bisum, in rhetoric, means converting the proof into a disproof. As thus: That you were the murderer is proved by your being on the spot at the time. Reply: Just the contrary, if I had been the guilty person most certainly I should have run away. (Greek, biaion.)

Bianca. Wife of Fazio. When Fazio became rich, and got entangled with the Marchioness Aldabella, she accused him to the Duke of Florence of being privy to the death of Bartoldo, an old miser. Fazio was arrested and condemned to death. Bianca now repented of her jealous rashness, and tried to save her husband, but failing in her endeavours, went mad, and died of a broken heart. (Dean Milman: Fazio.)

N. B.—The name is employed by Shakespeare both in his TAMING of the Shrew and also in Othello.

Bianchi. (See Nerl.)

Bias. The weight in bowls which makes them deviate from the straight line; hence any favourite idea or pursuit, or whatever predisposes the mind in a particular direction.

Bowls are not now loaded, but the bias depends on the shape of the bowls. They are flattened on one side, and therefore roll obliquely.

"Your stomach makes your fabric roll,
Just as the bias rules the bowl."—Prior: Althin, iii. line 120.
Biberius Calidus Nero. The punning nickname of Tiberius Claudius Nero. Biberius [Tiberius], drink-loving, Calidus Nero [Claudius Nero], by metathesis for calidus nero, hot with wine.

The Bible means simply a book, but is now exclusively confined to the "Book of Books." (Greek, bibles, a book.)

The headings of the chapters were prefixed by Miles Smith, Bishop of Gloucester, one of the translators.

(i) Bibles named from errors of type, or from archaic words:

The Breaches Bible. So called because Genesis iii. 7 was rendered, "The eyes of them both were opened . . . and they sowed figge-tree leaves together, and made themselves breaches." By Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson, 1579.

The Idle Bible, 1509. In which the "idole shepherd" (Zech. xi. 17) is printed "the idle shepherd."

The Bug Bible, 1551. So called because Psalm cxii. 5 is translated, "Thou shalt not be afraid of bugges [bogies] by nighte."

The Great Bible. The same as Matthew Parker's Bible (q.v.).

The Place-maker's Bible. So called from a printer's error in Matt. v 9, "Blessed are the placemakers [peace-makers], for they shall be called the children of God."

The Princes Bible makes David pathetically complain that "the printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause" (Ps. cxix. 161).

The Tragical Bible, 1549 (Beck's Bible), in which the word "halm" is rendered "treacle." The Bishops' Bible has tragele in Jer. iii. 28; xlvi. 11; and in Ezek. xxvii. 17.

The Unrighhteous Bible, 1652 (Cambridge Press). So called from the printer's error, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the Kingdom of God?" (1 Cor. vi. 9).

The Vinegar Bible. So called because the heading to Luke xx. is given as "The parable of the Vinegar" (instead of Vineyard). Printed at the Clarendon Press in 1571.

The Wicked Bible. So called because the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it, "Thou shalt commit adultery." Printed by Barker and Lucas, 1632.

To these may be added: the Discharge Bible, the Esa to Bar Bible, Rebecca's Camele Bible, the Bilbok Bible, the Standing Fishes Bible, and some others.

(ii) Bibles named from proper names, or dignities.

Bishop's Bible. The revised edition of Archbishop Parker's version. Published 1568.

Coverdale's Bible, 1535. Translated by Miles Coverdale, afterwards Bishop of Exeter. This was the first Bible sanctioned by royal authority.

Cranmer's Bible, 1539. This is Coverdale's Bible corrected by Archbishop Cranmer. It was printed in 1540, and in 1549 every parish church was enjoined to have a copy under a penalty of 40s. a month.

The Douay Bible, 1581. A translation made by the professors of the Douay College for the use of English boys designed for the Catholic priesthood.

The Geneva Bible. The Bible translated by the English exiles at Geneva, the same as the "Breeches Bible" (q.v.).

King James's Bible. The Authorised Version; so called because it was undertaken by command of James I. Published 1611.

Matthew Parker's Bible, or "The Great Bible," published in the reign of Henry VIII. under the care of Archbishop Parker and his staff (1530-1541). In 1572 several prolegomena were added.

Matthew's Bible is Tindal's version. It was so called by John Rogers, superintendent of the English churches in Germany, and was published with notes under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthews, 1537.

The Mazarine Bible. The earliest book printed in movable metal type. It contains no date. Copies have been recently sold from £2,300 to £5,000. Called the Mazarin Bible from the Bibliothèque Mazarine, founded in Paris by Cardinal Mazarine in 1648.

Sacy's Bible. So called from Isaac Louis Sacy (Le-maistre), director of the Port Royal Monastery. He was imprisoned for three years in the Bastille for his Jansenist opinions, and translated the Bible during his captivity (1666-1670).

Tyndale's Bible. William Tyndale, or Tindal, having embraced the Reformed religion, retired to Antwerp, where he printed an English translation of the Scriptures. All the copies were bought up, whereupon Tyndale printed a revised edition. The book excited the rancour of the Catholics, who strangled the "heretic" and burnt his body near Antwerp in 1536.

Wykoff's Bible, 1380, but first printed in 1580.
Bible-backed

Bickerstaff

(in) Versions.
The Authorised Version, 1611. (See KING JAMES'S BIBLE.)

The Revised Version. Published in May, 1886. The work was begun in June, 1870, by twenty-five scholars, ten of whom died before the version was completed, the eighty-five sessions extending over fourteen years. The Apocrypha was issued in 1895.

Bible-backed. Round-shouldered, like one who is always poring over a book.

Bible-carrier (A.). A pogram; creak-shoes; or saint, in a scornful sense.

"Of all books, they least respect the Bible. Many will leave statute books, coronals, you play-books, and such-like topish pamphlets, but not a bible in their house or hands... Some use to carry other books with them to church... to draw away their minds from hearing the word; and if it is read and preached to them, some goe yet further, and will not suffer their wives, children, or other of their household to read the Word. And some again, at such time, as to carry the scriptures with them to church, terming them in reproach bible-carriers."—Gouge: Whole Armour of God, p. 316 (1616).

Bible Christians. A Protestant sect founded in 1815 by William O'Bryan, a Wesleyan, of Cornwall; also called Byrantites (3 syl.).

Bible-Clerk. A sizar of the Oxford university; a student who gets certain pecuniary advantages for reading the Bible aloud at chapel. The office is almost a sinecure now, but the emolument is given, in some colleges, to the sons of poor gentlemen, either as a free gift, or as the reward of merit tested by examination.

Smallest chapter: Psalms xlviii.
Longest chapter: Psalms cxix.
Ezra vii. 21 contains all the letters of the alphabet except K.
2 Kings xxviii. and Isaiah xxxvi. are exactly alike.
The last two verses of 2 Chron. and the opening verses of Ezra are alike.
Ezra ii. and Nehemiah vii. are alike.
The word and occurs in the Old Testament 1,454 times.
The word occurs in the New Testament 7,000 times.
The word Jesu occurs 5,000 times.
The letter Mem in the Hebrew text occurs 77.18 times.
The letter Yaw in the Hebrew text occurs 72.37 times. (These are the most frequent.)
The letter Teth occurs 11.56 times. (These are the least frequent.)

The Bible was divided into chapters by Cardinal Hugo de Sancto-Carlo, about 1230.
The Old Testament was divided into verses by Rabbi Meordea Nathan; and the New Testament, in 1544, by R. Stephens, a French printer, it is read, while on horseback.

Of the 5,000 languages and dialects on the earth, the Bible has been translated into 100.
The Septuagint, a translation into Greek, was made in 422 p. 256 n.c.
The first complete English translation was by Wyclif, A.D. 1320; the first French translation, in 1192; the first German, in 1450; the first American edition was printed at Boston in 1722.
The oldest MS. of the Bible in the British Museum is the "Codex Alexandrinus." Parts of the New Testament are omitted. The "Codex Vaticanus" is the oldest in the Vatican Library at Rome.

Bible Pauperum (the poor man's Bible). Some forty or fifty pictures of Bible subjects used in the Middle Ages, when few could read, to teach the leading events of Scripture history. (See MIRROR OF HUMAN SALVATION.)

Biblomancy. Forecasting future events by the Bible. The plan was to open the sacred volume at random, and lay your finger on a passage without looking at it. The text thus pointed out was supposed to be applicable to the person who pointed it out. (Greek, biblia, Bible; manteia, prophecy.) (See SORTES.)

Another process was to weigh a person suspected of magic against a Bible. If the Bible bore down the other scale, the accused was acquitted.

Bibulus. Colleague of Julius Caesar, a mere cipher in office, whence his name has become proverbial for one in office who is a mere fitiuent.

Biceps. Muscular strength of the arm; properly, the prominent muscles of the upper arm; so called because they have two heads. (Lat., biceps, two heads.)

Biceps Parthenius (Pers., Ivol. 2), i.e. Parthenius with two heads or tops (his caput).

"Nec fonte luna prodit calamino, Nec in lucublitate somniumse Parthenius. Amen, in secretis arc media prudente, Persae: Notitia prologue.

Bickerstaff (Isaac). A name assumed by Dean Swift in a satirical pamphlet against Partridge, the almanack-maker. This produced a paper war so diverting that Steele issued the Tatler under the editorial name of "Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq., Astrologer." (1709)
Bicorn. An hypothetical beast supposed to devour all men under petty-coat government. It is described as very fat and well liking. There was another beast called Chichevache, which fed on obedient wives, but the famished beast was thinner than the most rascal of Pharaoh’s lean kine, for its food always fell short. Of course, bi-corn (two-horns) contains an allusion familiar to all readers of our early literature.

Bid. To bid fair. To seem likely: as “He bids fair to do well”; “It bids fair to be a fine day.” (Anglo-Saxon, bidan or beidan, to promise, to offer.)

To bid for [votes]. To promise to support in Parliament certain measures, in order to obtain votes.

To bid against one. To offer or promise a higher price for an article at auction.

I bid him defiance. I offer him defiance; I defy him.

Bid. I bid you good night. I wish you good night, or I pray that you may have a good night. This is the Anglo-Saxon bidan, to ask, pray, or intreat. Whence “beads-men” (q.v.), “bidding prayer” (q.v.). “Bid him welcome.”

Neither be not God-speed. —2 John 10, 11.

To bid the [marriage] beaus. To ask if anyone objects to the marriage of the persons named. “Si quis” (q.v.).

To bid to the wedding. In the New Testament is to ask to the wedding feast.

Bid-ale. An invitation of friends to assemble at the house of a poor man to drink ale, and thus to raise alms for his relief.

The ordinary amusements in country parishes (in 1530) were church-bails, clerk-ales, and bid-ales, . . . consisting of drinking and sports, particularly dice-ee. —F. Short, Di. History of the Church of England, p. 322.

Bidding Beads. Telling off prayers by beads (Anglo-Saxon, biddan, to ask, to pray).

Bidding-Prayer. The prayer for the souls of benefactors said before the sermon; a relic of this remains in the prayer used in cathedrals, university churches, etc. Bidding is from bead or bide. (Anglo-Saxon, biddan, to pray for the souls of benefactors.) (See BEADMAN.)

Biddy (i.e. Bridget). A generic name for an Irish servant-maid, as Mike is for an Irish labourer. These generic names are very common: e.g. Tom Tag, a waterman; Jack Pudding, a buffoon; Cousin Jonathan, an American of the United States; Cousin Michel, a German; John Bull, an Englishman; Moll and Becky, English female servants of the lower order; John Chinaman, a Chinese; Colin Tompion, a Swiss; Nic Frog, a Dutchman; Mossou, a Frenchman; and many others.

In Arbuthnot’s John Bull Nic Frog is certainly a Dutchman; and Frogs are called “Dutch Nightingales.” The French sometimes serve kid frog’s at table as a great delicacy, and this has caused the word to be transferred to the French; but, properly, Nic Frog is a Dutchman.

Bideford Postman. Edward Capern, the post (born 1819), so called because at one time he was a letter-carrier at Bideford. He died in 1894.

Bifocal. [See Pilpail.]

Biforked Letter of the Greeks. The capital U, made thus Y, which resembles a bird flying.

*[The birds] flying, write upon the sky
The biforked letter of the Greeks.*

Bifrost, in Scandinavian mythology, is the name of the bridge between heaven and earth; the rainbow may be considered to be this bridge, and its various colours are the reflections of its precious stones. (Icelandic, bifa, tremble, and rost, path.)

The keeper of the bridge is Heimdall. It leads to Doonstead, the palace of the Norns or Fates.

Big. To look big. To assume a consequential air.

To talk big. To boast or brag.

Big Bird. To get the big bird (i.e. the goose). To be hissed on the stage. A theatrical expression.

Big-endians. A religious party in the empire of Lilliput, who made it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end; they were looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who broke theirs at the small end. The Big-endians are the Catholics, and the Little-endians the Protestants.

Big Gooseberry Season (The). The time when Parliament is not assembled.
Big-wig (A). A person in authority, a "nob." Of course, the term arises from the custom of judges, bishops, and so on, wearing large wigs. Bishops no longer wear them.

Bigaroon. Incorrectly spelt Bien-voon. A white-heart cherry. (French, bigarrue; Latin, bigarella; i.e. bis var-ellos, double-varied, red and white mixed. The French word, bigarrue, means party-colour, bigarrer.)

Big, Bigas (pron. bee). jewels, female ornaments. (Also written bie.)

She is all in her bigas to-day—i.e. in full fig, in excellent spirits, in good humour.

Big. To hook the big—i.e. to get entangled. The big is the bend or doubled part of a rope, and when the rope of one anchor gets into the "big" of another, it gets "hooked."

Bigorne (2 syl.). A corruption of "Biicorn" (q.v.).

Big'ot means simply a worshipper (Anglo-Saxon, bigas, to worship; German, bigots). Various explanations have been given from time to time, but none are well supported.

Bigot and his Castle of Bungay. (See Castle, etc.)

Bilbo. A rapier or sword. So called from Esso, in Spain, once famous for its finely-tempered blades. Fulstaff says to Ford:

"I suffered the pang of three several deaths; first, an intolerable fright, to be detected at last, to be compassed, like a good bilbo, hot to point, heel to head; and then . . . .—Meredyth West, ill. a.

Bilboes. A bar of iron with fetters annexed to it, by which mutinous sailors are linked together. The word is derived from Bilboa, in Spain, where they were first made. Some of the bilboes taken from the Spanish Armada are still kept in the Tower of London.

Bille. It raises my bile. It makes me angry or indignant. In Latin, biliosus (a bilious man) meant a choleric one. According to the ancient theory, bile is one of the humours of the body, and when excited abnormally it produces cholera or rage.

"It raised my bile to see him so reflect their great acts. —Hoot: Pte. of Midsummer Fairies, stanza 54.

"Black bile is melancholy."

Bilge Water. Filthy drainings. The bilge is the lowest part of a ship, and, as the rain or sea-water which trickles down to this part is hard to get at, it is apt to become foul and very offensive.

Bilk. To cheat, to obtain goods and decamp without paying for them.

"The landlord explained it by saying that 'a bilk' is a man who never misses a meal and never pays a cent."—A. E. McClure: Rocky Mountains, letter xxi. p. 211.

"To 'bilk' in cribbage is to spoil your adversaries' score; to balk him. Perhaps the two words are mere variants.

Bilker (A). A person who gives a cabman less than his fare, and, when remonstrated with, gives a false name and address. Sometimes a "bilker" gets out and says, "Cabby, I shall be back in a minute," turns the corner and is no more seen.

"The time for taking out a summons expires in seven days, and it often takes longer than that to hunt a 'bilker' down."—Nineteenth Century (March, 1863, p. 177).

Also a cabman who does not pay the owner for the cab.

Bill (The). The nose, also called the beak. Hence, "Billy" is slang for a pocket-handkerchief.

"Lastly came Winter, clothed all in frize. Chattering his teeth, for cold that did him chill. Whiles on his brow he heard his breath did freeze. And the dull drops that from his purple bill flowed. As from a humbeck, did down a distill." — Spenser: Faerie Queene, canto vii.

A public bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament affecting the general public. A private bill is the draft of an Act of Parliament for the granting of something to a company, corporation, or certain individuals.

A true bill. I confess what you say is true. The case against the accused is first submitted to the grand jury. If they think the charge has a fair colour, they write on the declaration "A true bill," and the case is submitted to the petty jury. Otherwise, they write "No true bill," or "Not found," and the case is at once dismissed or "ignored."

To ignore a bill is to write on it ignoramus.

"Ignoramus" is the word properly used by the Grand Enquest . . . and written upon the bill."—Cowell.
Bills payable. Bills of exchange, promissory notes, or other documents promising to pay a sum of money.

Bills receivable. Promissory notes, bills of exchange, or other acceptances held by a person to whom the money stated is payable.

Bill of Fare (A). A list of the menu provided, or which may be ordered, at a restaurant.

Bill of Health. A clean bill of health. A document, duly signed by the proper authorities, to certify that when the ship set sail no infectious disorder existed in the place.

A foul bill of health is a document to show that the place was suffering from some infection when the ship set sail. If a captain cannot show a clean bill, he is supposed to have a foul one.

Bill of Lading. A document signed by the master of a ship in acknowledgment of goods laden in his vessel. In this document he binds himself to deliver the articles in good condition to the persons named in the bill, certain exceptions being duly provided for. These bills are generally in triplicate—one for the sender, one for the receiver, and one for the master of the vessel.

Bill of Pains and Penalties (.J). A legislative act imposing punishment (less than capital) upon a person charged with treason or other high crimes.

Bill of Quantities. An abstract of the probable cost of a building.

Bill of Rights. The declaration delivered to the Prince of Orange on his election to the British throne, confirming the rights and privileges of the people. (Feb. 13th, 1689.)

Bill of Sale. When a person borrows money and delivers goods as security, he gives him a bill of sale, that is, permission to sell the goods if the money is not returned on a stated day.

Bills of Mortality took their rise in 1592, when a great pestilence broke out, which continued till 1595. The term is now used for those abstracts from parish registers which show the births, deaths, and baptisms of the district. Within the Bills of Mortality = within the district.

Bills of Parcels. An itemised statement of articles purchased. These bills are itemised by the seller.

Bilbee' (Little). The youngest of "Three sailors of Bristol city," who "took a boat and went to sea."

"There was gorging Jack, and guzzling Jimmy, And the youngest—he was little Billee. Now, when they got as far as the equator, They had nothing left but one split pea. To gorging Jack says guzzling Jimmy, "We've nothing left, we must eat we." —Thackeray.

[They decide to eat Little Billee, but he contrives to escape.]

Billet-doux [pronounce billy doo]. French, a love-letter, a sweet or affectionate letter.

Billiards. A corrupt form of the French billiard. "Antrefois, le bédou arce legué ou poussaï les billes"; then "in table vinte sa bagulles ou june"; and, lastly, the "game itself."

Similar plural forms are the games called bowls, cards, dominoes, draughts, marbles, quoits, skittles, tops, etc.

Billings (Josh). The mon de plun: of H. W. Shaw, an American humorist, who died 1885. His Book of Sayings was published in 1866.

Billingsgate (London). Gate—quay, and bellua is to hawl or hellow. This quay is so called from the shouting of the fishermen in trying to attract attention and vend their fish.

That's Billingsgate. Vulgar and coarse, like the manners and language of Billingsgate fish-fags.

To talk Billingsgate, i.e. to slang, to scold in a vulgar, coarse style.

You are no better than a Billingsgate fish-fag, i.e. you are as rude and ill-mannered as the women of Billingsgate fish-market. The French say "Maubert:" instead of Billingsgate, as Your compliments are like those of the Place Maubert, i.e. no compliments at all, but vulgar dirt-flinging. The "Place Maubert" has long been noted for its market.

Billy. A policeman's staff, which is a little bill or billet.

A pocket-handkerchief. "A blue billy" is a handkerchief with blue ground and white spots.

Billy Barlow. A street droll, a merry Andrew; so called from a half-idiot of the name, who fancied himself "some great personage." He was well known in the East of London, and died in Whitechapel workhouse. Some of his Billycock Hats. First used by Billy Coke (Mr. William Coke) at the great shooting parties at Holkham. The old-established hatmakers in the West End still call them "Coke hats."

Bi-metallism. The employment of two metals, silver and gold, of fixed relative value. Now gold is the only standard metal in England and some other countries. Silver coins are mere tokens, like copper coins; and if given in payment of large sums are estimated at the market value, so much an ounce; but a gold sovereign is always of one fixed legal value.

Binary Arithmetic. Arithmetic in which the base of the notation is 2 instead of 10. The unit followed by a cipher signifies two, by another unit it signifies three, by two ciphers it signifies four, and so on. Thus, 10 signifies two, 100 signifies four; while 11 signifies 3, etc.

Binary Theory. A theory which supposes that all definite chemical salts are combinations of two radicles or elements, one of which is electro-positive (basic), and the other electro-negative (acid).

Bingham's Dandies. The 17th Lancers; so called from their colonel, the Earl of Lucan, formerly Lord Bingham. The uniform is noted for its admirable fit and smartness. Now called "The Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers."

Bird. An endearing name for girl.

And by my word, your homely bird
In danger shall not tarry:
And those white feet and wings are getting white,
I'll row you over the ferry:
Campbell: Lord Ullin's Daughter.

Bird is the Anglo-Saxon bried, the young of any animal, hence bride, verb, beran, to bring forth.

A bird of ill-omen. A person who is regarded as unlucky; one who is in the habit of bringing ill-news. The ancients thought that some birds indicated good luck, and others evil. Even to the present day many look upon owls, crows, and ravens as unlucky birds; swallows and storks as lucky ones.

Havens, by their acute sense of smell, discern the savour of dying bodies, and, under the hope of preying on them, light on chimney-tops or flutter about sick rooms; hence the raven indicates death. Owls screech when bad weather is at hand, and as foul weather often precedes sickness, so the owl is looked on as a funeral bird.

A bird of passage. A person who shifts from place to place; a temporary visitant, like a cuckoo, the swallows, starlings, etc.

A jail-bird. (See Jail.)
The bird of Juno. The peacock.

V Minerva's bird is either the cock or the owl; that of Venus is the dove.
The bird of Washington. The American or bald-headed eagle.

"The well-known latti-headed eagle, sometimes called the Bird of Washington."—Wood.
The Arabian bird. The phoenix.
The green bird tells everything a person wishes to know. (Cherry and Fairstar.)
The talking bird spoke with a human voice, and could bid all other birds join in concert. (Arabian Nights.)

Old birds are not to be sought with chaff. Experience teaches wisdom.

One beats the bush, and another takes the bird. The workman does the work, the master makes the money.

'Tis the early bird that catches the worm.

Early to bed and early to rise,

Makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise.

A little bird told me so. From Eccles.

x. 20: "Curse not the king, no not in thy thought. . . . for a bird of the air shall carry the voice, and that which hath wings shall tell the matter."

Bird in the hand. A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush. Possession is better than expectation.

Italian: "E meglio aver oggi un nov" che dimandar una gailina."

French: "Il vaut mieux avoir l'œuf aujourd'hui, que la poule demain." (Turkish:)

"I'usien yant mieux que deux en l'arme."

Un sou, quand il est assuré, vaut mieux que cin dix cent."

German: "Ein vogel in der hand ist besser als zehn über land."

"Passing through Birkin Lane amidst a camp of hose and doubts, I took . . . reason to slip into a captain's suit—a valiant buff doublet stuffed with plushes and a pair of velvet shoes secured thick with lace."—Addison: Black Book (1804).

Birchin Lane. I must send you to Birchin Lane, i.e. whip you. The play is on birth (a rod).

A suit in Birchin Lane. Birchin Lane was once famous for all sorts of apparel; references to second-hand clothes in Birchin Lane are common enough in Elizabethan books.
Bird in thy Bosom 137

"Beser ein spatz der hand, als ein storch auf der schlacht."

Latiou: "Ego spem pretio non emam."

English: "A pound in the purse is worth two in the book."

On the other side we have: "Qui ne s'aventure, a ni cheval ni mule." "Nothing ventures, nothing have." "Give a spat to catch a mackerel." "Chi non s'arrischia, non guadagna."

Bird in thy Bosom. Thou hast kept well the bird in thy bosom. Thou hast remained faithful to thy allegiance or faith. The expression was used by Sir Ralph Percy (slain in the battle of Hadgley Moor in 1464) to express his having preserved unstained his fidelity to the House of Lancaster.

Bird of Estè. The white eagle, the cognisance of the house.

"His dazzling way
The bird of Estè soars beyond the solar ray."

Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered, x.

Birds. Birds of a feather flock together. Persons associate with those of a similar taste and station as themselves. Qui se ressemble s'assemble. Cicero says, "Similes similibus gaudent, parecum paribus facillime congregantur." "Ne nous associons qu'avec nos égales." (La Fontaine.)

To kill two birds with one stone. To effect two objects with one outlay of trouble.

Birds (protected by superstitions).

Choughs are protected in Cornwall, because the soul of King Arthur migrated into a chough.

The Hawk is held sacred by the Egyptians, because it is the form assumed by Ra or Horus.

The Ibis is sacred in Egypt, and to kill one was at one time a capital offence. It is said that the god Thoth escaped (as an Ibis) from the pursuit of Typhon.

Mother Carey's Chickens, or Storm Petrels are protected by sailors, from a superstition that they are the living forms of the souls of deceased sailors.

The Robin is protected, both from Christian tradition and nursery legend. (See Horns and Hips.)

The Stork is a sacred bird in Sweden, from the legend that it flew round the cross, crying Styrka, Styrka, when Jesus was crucified. (See Stork.)

Saucus are superstitioneously protected in Ireland from the legend of the Fianna (daughter of Lir), who was metamorphosed into a swan and condemned to wander in lakes and rivers till Christianity was introduced. (See Irish Melodies, Silent O'Moyle.)

The hog (a winged animal) was regarded by the Caribs as a good augur, which protected their dwellings at night; and it was accounted mortifying to kill one.

Bird's-eye View. A mode of perspective drawing in which the artist is supposed to be over the objects delineated, in which case he beholds them as a bird in the air would see them. A general view.

Birdcage Walk (St. James's Park, London); so called from an aviary.

Birmingham Poet. John Freeth, who died at the age of seventy-eight in 1808. He was wit, poet, and publican, who not only wrote the words and tunes of songs, but sang them also, and sang them well.

Birthday Suit. He was in his birthday suit. Quite nude, as when first born.

Bis. Bis dat, qui cito dat (he gives twice who gives promptly)—i.e. prompt relief will do as much good as twice the sum at a future period (Publius Syrus Proverbs.)

Purple and bis, i.e. purple and fine linen (Latin, byssus, fine flax). The spelling is sometimes bias, bys, etc.

Biscuit (French-Latin, bis, twice; cit, baked). So called because it was originally twice ovened. The Romans had a bread of this kind.

In pottery, earthenware or porcelain, after it has been hardened in the fire, but has not yet been glazed, is so called.

Bise. A wind that acts notably on the nervous system. It is prevalent in those valleys of Savoy that open to the north.

"The Bise blew cold."

Roger: Italy, part 1, div. II. stanza 4.

Bishop (Évêque), the same word, episcopus; whence episc, evens, evang, evéque; also évêcop, bishop.

Bishop, Cardinal, Pope (as beverages):

Bishop is made by pouring red wine (such as claret or burgundy), either hot or cold, on ripe bitter oranges. The liquor is then sugared and spiced to taste. In Germany, "bishop" is a mixture of wine, sugar, nutmeg, and orange or lemon. It is sometimes called "Purple Wine," and has received its name of bishop from its colour.

Cardinal is made by using white wine instead of red.

Pope is made by using tokay.

"When I was at college, Cup was added to ale; Bishop was "cup" with wine (properly claret or burgundy) added; Cardinal was "cup" with brandy added. All were served with a hedge-bug (i.e. a whole lemon or orange basting.
Bishop Barnaby. The May-bug, lady-bird, etc.

Bishop in Partibus. (See in Partibus.)

Bishop of Hippo. St. Augustine (354-430) is often so referred to. He held the See for many years.

Bishop’s Apron represents the short cassock which, by the 74th canon, all clergymen were enjoined to wear.

Bishop’s Bible (The). (See under Bible, page 131, col. 2.)

Bishop’s Mitre. Dean Stanley tells us that the cleft of a bishop’s mitre represents the mark of the crescent of the moon, when folded and carried under the arm, like an opera hat. (Christian Institutions, p. 153.)

Bissextile. Leap-year. We add a day to February in leap-year, but the Romans counted the 24th of February twice. Now, the 24th of February was called by them “dies biseructus” (sermo calendas Martias), the sextile or sixth day before March 1st; and this day being reckoned twice (bis) in leap-year, was called “annus biseructus.”

Bisson or Bisen [blind] is the Anglo-Saxon bizen, Shakespeare (Hamlet, ii. 2) speaks of bison rheum (blinding tears), and in Coriolanus, ii. 1, “What harm can your bisson compulsurities gleam out of this character?”

Biston’ians. The Thracians; so called from Biston, son of Mars, who built Bistoria on the Lake Bistonis.

Bixtonian race: a mouldering term, exult and revel on the Thracian plain With milk their bloody banquet they array, Or from the lion tead the quailing prey, On some abandoned savages fiercely th. Scene, tear, devour, and think it luxury.” Put: Statius, Book ii.

Bit. A piece.

Bit of my mind, as I’ll tell him a bit of my mind,” I’ll reprove him. Some word we, bite, meaning a piece bitten off, hence a piece generally. (Anglo-Saxon, bitan, to bite.)

Bit by bit. A little at a time; piece-meal.

Not a bit, or Not the least bit. Not at all; not the least likely. This may be not a morsel, or not a jot, rap, or sou. “Bit” used to be a small Jamaica coin. We still talk of a threepenny-bit. Bit, of course, is the substantive of bite, as morsel (French morceau) of murder.

Bit (of a horse). To take the bit in (or between) his teeth. To be obstinately self-willed; to make up one’s mind not to yield. When a horse has a mind to run away, he catches the bit between his teeth, and the driver has no longer control over him.

Mr. X. will not yield. He has taken the bit between his teeth, and is resolved to carry out his original measure.—Newspaper paragraph, April 1, 1869.

Bit. Money. The word is used in the West Indies for a half pistareen (fivepence). In Jamaica, a bit is worth sixpence, English; in America, 12½ cents; in Ireland, tenpence.

The word is still thieves’ slang for money generally, and coiners are called bit-makers.

In English we use the word for a coin which is a fraction of a unit. Thus, a shilling being a unit, we have a sixpenny bit and threepenny bit (or not in bits but in divers pieces). So, taking a sovereign for a unit, we had seven-shilling bits, etc.

Bite. A cheat; one who bites us. “The bitter bite” explains the origin. We say “a man was bitten” when he “burns his fingers” meddling with something which promised well but turned out a failure.

To bite the dust, as “Their enemies shall bite the dust,” i.e. be slain in battle.

Bite. To bite one’s thumb at another. To insult; to provoke to a quarrel.

“Gregory, I will shew as I pass by; and let them take it as they list.”

“Saw you, Nay, as they dare. I will bite my thumb at them, which is a disgrace to them, if they bear it.”—Shakespeare: Henry and John. i. 1.

To bite the lip, indicative of suppressed chagrin, passion, or annoyance.

“She had to bite her lip till the blood came in order to keep down the angry words that would use in her heart.” Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, chap. xi.

To bite upon the bridle. To chomp the bit, like an impatient or restless horse.

Bit’elias. Sister of Fairlimb, and daughter of Rukenaw, the ape, in the story of Reynard the Fox. (Akinvar.)

Bites and Bams. Hoaxes and quizzes; humbuggery.

“[His] humble efforts at pecularity were chiefly confined to... bites and bams.”—Sir W. Scott: Guy Fawkes, chap. 3.
Biting Remark (A). A remark more biting than Zeno’s. Nearchoz ordered Zeno the ‘philosopher to be pounded to death in a mortar. When he had been pounded some time, he told Nearchoz he had an important secret to communicate to him; but, when the tyrant bent over the mortar to hear what Zeno had to say, the dying man bit off his ear.

“That would have been a biting jest.”
Shakespeare: Richard III., act ii. 4.

Bitt. To bitt the cable is to fasten it round the “bitt” or frame made for the purpose, and placed in the fore part of the vessel.

Bitten. Imposed upon, let in, made to suffer loss. “I was terribly bitten in that affair.” I suffered great loss. To bite is to cheat or suffer retaliation. Thus, Pope says, “The rogue was bit,” he intended to cheat, but was himself taken in. “The biter bit” is the moral of Aesop’s fable called The Viper and The File; and Goldsmith’s mad dog, which, “for some private ends, went mad and bit a man,” but the biter was bit, for “The man recovered of the bite, the dog it was that died.”

Bitter End (The). A sentence: with relentless hostility; also applied to affliction, as, “she bore it to the bitter end,” meaning to the last stroke of adverse fortune. “All Thy waves have gone over me, but I have borne up under them to the bitter end.” Here “bitter end” means the end of the rope. The “bitter-end” is a sea term meaning “that part of the cable which is “abase the bitt.” When there is no windlass the cables are fastened to bits, that is, pieces of timber so called; and when a rope is payed out to the bitter-end, or to these pieces of timber, all of it is let out, and no more remains. However, we read in Prov. vi. 4, “Her end is bitter as wormwood,” which, after all, may be the origin of the phrase.

Bitter as Gall, as soot, as wormwood. Absinthe is made of wormwood. (See Similes.)

Bittock. A little bit; -ock as a diminutive is preserved in bull-ock, hill-ock, butt-ock, etc. “A mile and a bittock” is a mile and a little bit. (Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, i.)

Biz, in theatrical slang, means “business.” Good biz means full houses; but an actor’s “biz” is quite another thing, meaning by-play. Thus, Hamlet trifling with Ophelia’s fan, Lord Dundreary’s hop, and so on, are the special “business” of the actor of the part. As a rule, the “business” is invented by the actor who creates the part, and is handed down by tradition.

Black for mourning was a Roman custom (Juvenal, x. 216) borrowed from the Egyptians.

Black, in blazonry, means constancy, wisdom, and prudence.

Black, in several of the Oriental nations, is a badge of servitude, slavery, and low birth. Our word blackguard seems to point to this meaning. The Latin niger meant bad, unpropitious. (See Blackguard.)

Black. (See under Colours for its symbolism, etc.)

-Black as a Crow (or as a raven); “as a raven’s wing;” as ink; as hell, i.e., hades (2 syl.), meaning death or the grave; as your hat, etc. (See Similes.)

Black as a Newgate Knocker. A Newgate knocker is the fringe or lock of hair which costermongers and thieves twist back towards the ear.

Black in the Face. Extremely angry. The face discoloured with passion or distress.

“Mr. Winkle pulled . . . till he was black in the face.”—Dickens: Pickwick Papers.

“He swore himself black in the face.”—Peter Pindar, Wolcott.

Black is White. (See Swear.) Beaten black and blue. So that the skin is black and blue with the marks of the beating.

I must have it in black and white, i.e., in plain writing; the paper being white and the ink black.

To say black’s his eye, i.e., to vituperate, to blame. The expression, Black’s the white of his eye, is a modern corruption. To say the eye is black or evil, is to accuse a person of an evil heart or great ignorance. The Latin niger also meant evil. (See Black Prince.)

“A fool may do all things, and no man say black’s his eye”—The Tell Tale.

Black Act. 9 Geo. I. c. 22 is so called, because it was directed against the Waltham deer-stealers, who blackened their faces for disguise, and, under the name of Blacks, appeared in Epping Forest. This Act was repealed in 1827.

Black Acts. Acts of the Scottish Parliament between the accession of James I. and the year 1587; so called because they were printed in black characters.
Black Art. The art practised by conjurors, wizards, and others, who professed to have dealings with the devil. Black here means diabolical or wicked. Some derive it from sigrromancy, a corruption of necromancy.

Black Assize. July 6th, 1577, when a putrid pestilence broke out at Oxford during the time of assize.

Black-balled. Not admitted to a club; the candidate proposed is not accepted as a member. In voting by ballot, those who accept the person proposed drop a white or red ball into the box, but those who would exclude the candidate drop into it a black one. It is now more usually done by two compartments, for "yes" and "no" respectively.

Black Book. A book exposing abuses in Church and State, which furnished much material for political reform in the early part of the present century. (See BLACK BOOKS.)

* Amherst speaks of the Proctor's black book, and tells us that no one can proceed to a degree whose name is found there. (1728.) It also appears that each regiment kept a black book or record of ill-behaviour.

Black Book of the Admiralty. An old navy code, said to have been compiled in the reign of Edward III.

Black Books. To be in my black books. In bad odour; in disgrace; out of favour. The black books were those compiled in the reign of Henry VIII. to set forth the scandalous proceedings of the English monasteries, and were so called from the colour of their binding. We have similarly the Blue Book, the Red Book, and so on.

Black Books of the Exchequer. An official account of the royal revenues, payments, perquisites, etc., in the reign of Henry II. Its cover was black leather. There are two of them preserved in the Public Record Office.

Black Brunswickers. A corps of 700 volunteer lancers under the command of Frederick William, Duke of Brunswick, who had been forbidden by Napoleon to succeed to his father's dukedom. They were called "Black" because they wore mourning for the deceased Duke. Frederick William fell at Quatre-Bras, 1813. One of Millais's best pictures is called "The Black Brunswicker."

Black Cap, or the Judgment Cap, worn by a judge when he passes sentence of death on a prisoner. This cap is part of the judge's full dress. The judges wear their black caps on November 9th, when the Lord Mayor is presented in the Court of Exchequer. Covering the head was a sign of mourning among the Israelites, Greeks, Romans, and Anglo-Saxons. (2 Sam. xv. 30.)

Black Cattle. Oxen for slaughter; so called because black is their prevailing colour, at least in the north.

Black Cattle. Negro slaves.

"She was chartered for the West Coast of Africa to trade with the natives, but not in black cattle, for slavery was never our line of business." — J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. i.

Black Death. A putrid typhus, in which the body turned black with rapid putrefaction. It occurred in 1348, and carried off twenty-five millions in Europe alone, while in Asia and Africa the mortality was even greater.

Black Diamonds. Coals; also cleft felons of the lower orders. Coals and diamonds are both carbon.

Black Dog. A fiend still dreaded in many country places. (See DOG.)

Black Doll. The sign of a marine store shop. The doll was a dummy dressed to indicate that cast-off garments were bought.

Black Flag. A pirate, and is called the "Jolly Roger."

Black Flags. Moslem soldiers. The banner of the Abbasides (3 syl.) is black; that of the Fatimites (3 syl.) green; and that of the Ommiades (3 syl.) white. Hence the banner of the Khalif of Baghdad is black, but that of the Sultan of Damascus is green. (Gibbon, chap. iii.)

Black Flags. Pirates of the Chinese Sea who opposed the French in Tonquin, etc.

Black-foot. There is a powerful and numerous tribe of North American Indians called Black-foot. A black-foot is an intermediary in love affairs; but if perfidious to the wooer he was called a white-foot.

Blackfoot (The). One of the many Irish factions which disturbed the peace. in the first half of the nineteenth century.

"And the Blackfoot, who courted each foeman's catch! 'tis hot-foot [speedily] he'd fly from the stout Father Roach."

Black Friars. The Dominicans were formerly so called in England.

Black Friday. December 6th, 1745, the day on which the news arrived in London that the Pretender had reached

Derby.

Black Game. Heath-fowl; in contra-distinction to red game, as grouse. The male bird is called a blackcock.

Black Genevan (A). A black preaching gown; once used in some Anglican churches, and still used by some Dissenters in the pulpit. So called from Geneva, where Calvin preached in such a robe.

"The Nonconformist divine leaves his vestry in his black Genevan, tumbled by his deacons and elders." — Newspaper paragraph, July 18th, 1865 (on Sunday bands).

Black-guards. Those horse-boys and unmilitary folk, such as cooks with their pots, pans, and other kitchen utensils, which travel with an army, and greatly impede its march.

Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says: "In all great houses there were a number of dirty dependents, whose office

it was to attend the wool-yards, scull-eries, etc. Of these the most forlorn were selected to carry coals to the kitchen. They rode with the pots and pans, and were in derision called the black-guards."

In the Lord Steward's office a proclamation (May 7th, 1683) begins thus:

"Whereas...a sort of vicious, idle, and masterless boys and rogues, commonly called the Black-guard, with divers other lewd and loose fellows...

do usually haunt and follow the court.

... Wee do hereby strictly charge...

all those so called...with all other loose, idle...men...who have in-truded themselves into His Majesty's court and stables...to depart upon pain of imprisonment."

Black Hole of Calcutta. A dark cell in a prison into which Surenja Dow-lah thrust 146 British prisoners. Next morning only twenty-three were found alive (1756).

The punishment cell or lock-up in barracks.

Black Horse. The 7th Dragoon

Guards, or "the Princess Royal's D. G."

Their "facings" are black. Also called

"Strawboots," "The Blacks."

Black Jack. Black Jack rides a good horse (Cornish). The miners call blende or sulphide of zinc "Black Jack," the occurrence of which is considered by them a favourable indication. The blende rides upon a lode of good ore.

Black Jack (A). A large leather gotch for beer and ale, so called from the outside being tarred.

Black Joke. An old tune, now called The Spur of Shillelagh. Tom

Moore has adapted words to the tune, beginning, "Sublime was the warning which Liberty spoke."

Black Leg. A swindler, especially in cards and races. Also, one who works for less than trade-union wages;

a non-union workman.

"Pleading the strikers not to return to work so long as a single Black-leg was retained in the 543.*

Black Letter. The Gothic or German type. So called because of its black appearance. The initial items of this book are now called "black letter," sometimes called "Clarendon type."

Black Letter Day. An unlucky day; one to be recalled with regret.

The Romans marked their unlucky days with a piece of black charcoal, and their lucky ones with white chalk.

Black-letter dogs. Literary antiquaries who poke and pry into every hole and corner to find out black-letter copies of books.

"By fell black-letter dogs...

That from GothicKennels eager strait." —

Matthew: Prose of Literature.

Black Lists. Lists of insolvency and bankruptcy, for the private guidance of the mercantile community. (See Black Books.)

Black Looks. Looks of displeasure.

To look black. To look displeased. The

foul weather.

Black Mail. Money given to freebooters by way of exempting property from depredation. (Anglo-Saxon, mal,

"rent-tax;" French, mance, an old coin worth .083 farthing). Grass mail was rent paid for pasturage. Mails and duties (Scotch) are rents of an estate in money or otherwise. "Black" in this phrase does not mean wicked or wrongful, but is the Gaelic, to cherish or protect.

Black mail was a rent paid to Free Companies for protecting the property paid

Black Man

for, from the depredations of freebooters, etc.

To levy black mail now means to exact exorbitant charges; thus the cabs and omnibuses during the Great Exhibition years "levied black mail" on the public.

Black Maria. The Evil One.

Black Maria. The black van which conveys prisoners from the police courts to jail. The French call a mud-barge a "Marie-salope." The tradition is that the van referred to was so called from Maria Lee, a negress, who kept a sailors' boarding house in Boston. She was a woman of such great size and strength that the unruly stood in dread of her, and when constables required help, it was a common thing to send for Black Maria, who so collared the refractory and led them to the lock-up. So a prison-van was called a "Black Maria."

Black Monday. Easter Monday, April 14th, 1860, was so called. Edward III. was with his army lying before Paris, and the day was so dark, with mist and hail, so bitterly cold and so windy, that many of his horses and men died. Monday after Easter holidays is called "Black Monday," in allusion to this fatal day. Launcelot says:

"It was not for nothing that my nose fell a-bleeding on Black Monday last, at six o'clock in the morning."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 5.

February 27th, 1865, was so called in Melbourne from a terrible sirocco from the N.W., which produced dreadful havoc between Sandhurst and Castlemaine.

Black Monday. In schoolboy phraseology is the first Monday after the holidays are over, when lessons begin again.

Black Money. Base coin brought to England by foreigners, and prohibited by Edward III.

Black Ox. The black ox has trod on his foot—i.e. misfortune has come to him. Black oxen were sacrificed to Pluto and other infernal deities.

Black Prince. Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Edward III. Froissart says he was "styled black by terror of his arms" (c. 169). Strutt confirms this saying: "for his martial deeds sur-named Black the Prince" (Antiquaries). Meyrick says there is not the slightest proof that Edward, Prince of Wales, ever wore black armour (vol. ii.); indeed, we have much indirect proof against the supposition. Thus Shaw (vol. i. plate 31) gives a facsimile from a picture on the wall of St. Stephen's Chapel, Westminster, in which the prince is clad in gilt armour. Stothard says "the effigy is of copper gilt." In the British Museum is an illumination of Edward III. granting to his son the duchy of Aquitaine, in which both figures are represented in silver armour with gilt joints. The first mention of the term "Black Prince" occurs in a parliamentary paper of the second year of Richard II.; so that Shakespeare has good reason for the use of the word in his tragedy of that king:

"Brave Gaunt, thy father and myself

Rescued the Black Prince, that young Mars of men,

From forth the ranks of many thousand French."—Richard II., ii. 3.

"That black name, Edward, black Prince of Wales."—Henry V., i. 4.

Black Republicans. The Republicans were so called by the pro-slavery party of the States, because they resisted the introduction of slavery into any State where it was not already recognised.

Black Rod, i.e. "Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod," so called from his staff of office—a black wand surmounted by a lion.

Black Rood of Scotland. The "piece of the true cross" or rood, set in an ebony crucifix, which Margaret, the wife of King Malcolm, left at death to the Scottish nation. It passed into various hands, but was lost at the Reformation.

Black Russia. Central and Southern Russia is so called from its black soil.

"The winter crops in the whole of European Russia are very good, especially in the black-earth regions. In the government of Northern Russia the condition is less favourable."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1921.

Black Saturday. August 4th, 1021; so called in Scotland, because a violent storm occurred at the very moment the Parliament was sitting to enforce episcopacy on the people.

Black Sea. So called from the abounding black rock in the extensive coal-fields between the Bosporus and Heraclea.

Black Sheep [Körd-Koin-oo]. A tribe of Turkomans, so called from their standards. This tribe was extirpated by the White Sheep (g.v.).

A Black Sheep. A disgrace to the family; a mauvais sujet; a workman who will not join in a strike. Black sheep are looked on with dislike by shepherds, and are not so valuable as white ones.

Black Standard. The dress, turbans, and standards of the Abbasside caliphs were all black. (D’Herbelot.)

Black Strap. Bad port wine. A sailor’s name for any bad liquor. In North America, “Black-strap” is a mixture of rum and molasses, sometimes vinegar is added.

“The soothing black strap was pronounced ready for use.”—Pinkerton: Molly Magurues, chap. xvii. p. 174.

Black Swan. (See Rara Avis.)

Black-thorn Winter (The). The cold weather which frequently occurs when the black-thorn is in blossom. (See Borrowed Days.)

Black Thursday. February 6th, 1831; so called in the colony of Victoria, from a terrible bush-fire which then occurred.

Black Tom. The Earl of Ormonde, Lord Deputy of Ireland in the reign of Elizabeth; so called from his ungracious ways and “black looks.”

“He being very stately in apparel, and erect in port, despite his great age, yet with a dark, frowning, and menacing look upon his face, so that all who met his gaze seemed to quaking before the same.”—Hon. Emily Lawless: With Essex in Ireland, p 106.

Black Watch. Companies employed to watch the Islands of Scotland. They dressed in a “black” or dark tartan (1725). Subsequently they were enrolled into the 42nd regiment, under the Earl of Crawford, in 1737. Their tartan is still called “The Black Watch Tartan.” The regiment is now called “The Royal Highlanders.”

Black-White. To swear black is white. To persist in an obvious untruth. The French location, Ni cons la dites blane, il viendra now, means, He will contradict what you say point blank.

Blacks. Mutes at funerals, who wore a black cloak; sometimes called the Black Guards.

“I do pray ye To give me leave to live a little longer. You stand about me like my Blacks.”—Dumas and Fletcher: Mons. Thomas, iii. 1.

Blacks (The), or The 7th Dragoon Guards, or “The Princess Royal’s D. G.” Called blacks from the facings. Nicknames: “The Virgin Mary’s Guard,” “Straw boots,” “Longoniers,” etc.

Blackmore (Widow). The best of Wycherley’s comic characters; she is a masculine, litigious, pettifogging, headstrong woman. (The Plain Dealer.)

Blackamoor. Washing the blackamoor white—i.e., engaged upon a hopeless and useless task. The allusion is to one of Aesop’s fables so entitled.

Blackness. All faces shall gather blackness (Joel ii. 6)—i.e., be downcast in consequence of trouble.

Blacksmith. The learned blacksmith. Elihu Burritt, U.S. (1811-1879.)

Blad’maur. The friend of Par’idel in Sponsor’s Æneid. The poet had his eye upon the Earl of Northumberland, one of the leaders in the northern insurrection of 1569. (See Par’idel.)

Blade. A knowing blade, a sharp fellow; a regular blade, a buck or top. (Anglo-Saxon, blad or bleed, a branch or sprig.)

“Blad = “branch,” whence “fruit, prosperity, glory.”” etc. The compound, Bleed-deg = a prosperous day; bleed-gift, a glory-giver, i.e. a king, a “regular blade.”

Bladud. A mythical king of England, and father of King Lear. He built the city of Bath, and dedicated the medicinal springs to Minerva. Bladud studied magic, and, attempting to fly, fell into the temple of Apollo and was dashed to pieces. (Grayfitt of Moomouth.)

“Imexhittible as Bladud’s well.”—Thackeray.

Blanche fleur. The heroine of Boccaccio’s prose romance called Il Filocolo. Her lover, Flores, is Boccaccio himself, and Blanchefleur was a young lady passionately beloved by him, the natural daughter of King Robert. The story of Blanchefleur and Flores is substantially the same as that of Dorigen and Aurelius by Chaucer, and that of Diane and Ansalado in the Æneid. (See Dianora and Dorigen.)

Blainman. The faithful manservant of Sir Bellissant (q.v.), who attended her when she was divorced. (Valentine and Orson.)

Blaney. A wealthy heir, ruined by dissipation, in Crabbe’s Borough.

“Merry and mirth are blended in its face, Much innate strength and some outward grace: The serpent’s cunning and the sinner’s fall.”—Letter xiv.

Blank Cartridge. Cartridge with powder only, that is, without shot, bullet, or ball. Used in drill and in saluting. Figuratively, empty threats.
Blank Cheque. A cheque duly signed, but without specifying any sum of money; the amount to be filled in by the payee.

Blank Practice. Shooting for practice with blank cartridges.

Blank Verse. English verse without rhyme.

Blanket. The wrong side of the blanket. A love-child is said to come of the wrong side of the blanket.

“He grew up to be a fine waif, a fellow, like money one that comes o’ the wrong side o’ the blanket.”—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxiv.

A wet blanket. A discouragement, a marplot. A person is a wet blanket who discourages a proposed scheme. “Treated with a wet blanket,” discouraged. “A wet blanket influence,” etc. A wet blanket is used to smother fire, or to prevent one escaping from a fire from being burnt.

Blanketeers. The Coxeyites were so called in 1894. “General” Coxey of the United States induced 50,000 persons to undertake a 700 miles’ march to Washington, with blankets on their backs, to terrify Congress into finding work for the unemployed.

Previous to this, the word had been applied to some 5,000 Radical operatives who assembled on St. Peter’s Field, near Manchester, March 10, 1817. They provided themselves with blankets and rugs, intending to march to London, to lay before the Prince Regent a petition of grievances. Only six got as far as Asbourne Bridge, when the expedition collapsed.

“The Americans have no royal dukes, no bench of bishops, no House of Lords, no effete monarchy; but they have a Home Rule, one man one vote, and Coxey with his blanketeers.”—Liberty Review, May 24, 1894, p. 254.

Blasé. To cry with a great noise, like a child in a trickly temper; to bellow. (Latin, plorare, to weep with noise.)

Blarney. None of your blarney. Soft, wheedling speeches to gain some end; sugar-words. Cormack MacCarthy held the castle of Blarney in 1602, and concluded an armistice with Carew, the Lord President, on condition of surrendering the fort to the English garrison. Day after day his lordship looked for the fulfillment of the terms, but received nothing except protocols and soft speeches, till he became the laughing-stock of Elizabeth’s ministers, and the dupe of the Lord of Blarney.

To kiss the Blarney Stone. Whoever does this shall be able to persuade to anything. The Blarney Stone is triangular, lowered from the north angle of the castle, about twenty feet from the top, and containing this inscription: "Cormac MacCarthy fortis me fieri fecit, A.D. 1446." Blarney is near Cork.

Blasé (pronounce blast-zay). Surfeited with pleasure. A man bläzé is one who has had full swing to all the pleasures of life, and has no longer any appetite for any of them. A worn out débauché (French, blaser, to exhaust with enjoyment).

Blasphemous Balfour. Sir James Balfour, the Scottish judge, was so called because of his apostasy. He died 1593.

Blast. In full blast. In the extreme. In America will be heard such a sentence as this: “When she came to the meeting in her yellow hat and feathers, wasn’t she in full blast?” A metaphor from the blast furnace in full operation.

Blasé. To strike by lightning; to make to wither. The "blasé oak." This is the sense in which the word is used as an exclamation.

“If it the [ghost] assume my noble father’s person, I’ll cross it, though it blast me.”
Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 1.

Blasé (The). “A dreadful fiend of gods and men, yirdad,” type of “Common Rumour” or “Slander.” He has 100 tongues and a sting; with his tongue he speaks things “most shameful, most unrighteous, most untrue;” and with his sting “steeps them in poison.” Sir Calidore muzzled the monster, and drew him with a chain to Faerie Land. After a time the beast broke his chain and regained his liberty.
(Saxon, blætan, to bellow.) (Spenser: Faerie Queene, books v. vi.)

Blaney’s Bloodhounds. The old 89th Foot; so called because of their unrererring certainty, and unerring perseverance in hunting down the Irish rebels in 1798, when the corps was commanded by Lord Blaney.

This regiment is now called “the Second Battalion of the Princess Victoria’s Irish Fusiliers.” The first battalion is the old 87th Foot.

Blaze. A white mark in the forehead of a horse. (Icelandic, blei, a white star on the forehead of a horse; German, blasz, pale.)
Blaze. A star is a sort of white diamond in the forehead. A blaze is an elongated star or dash of white.

To blaze a path. To notch trees as a clue. Trees so notched are called in America "blazed trees," and the white wood shown by the notch is called "a blaze." (See above.)

"Guided by the blazed trees . . . they came to the snout."—Goulding: The Young Marooners, 118.

"They buried him where he lay, a blazed tree marking his last resting-place."—Adventures in Alaska, and p. 118.

Blaze (7b). To blaze abroad. To noise abroad is the German verb bläsen, to blow or sound. Shakespeare uses the noun blason:

"But this eternal blason must not be To ears of flesh and blood."—Hamlet, i. 5.

Blaser (A). A boatman’s jacket. Properly and originally applied to the Johnian crew (Camb.), whose boat jackets are the brightest possible scarlet.

"A blaser is the red flannel boating jacket worn by Lady Margaret, St. John’s College, Cambridge, Boat Club."—Daily News, August 22nd, 1898.

Blason [Blazonry]. To blason is to announce with a trumpet, hence the Ghost in Hamlet says, "But this eternal blason must not be to ears of flesh and blood, i.e. this babbling about eternal things, or things of the other world, must not be made to persons still in the flesh. Knights were wont to be announced by the blast of a trumpet on their entrance into the lists; the flourish was answered by the heralds, who described aloud the arms and devices borne by the knight; hence, to blazon came to signify to "describe the charges borne"; and blazonry is "the science of describing or deciphering arms." (German, blasen, to blow.)

Blé. Manger son blé en herbe (French), to eat the calf before it is cast; to spend your fortune before it comes to you; to spend your income in advance. Literally, to feed off your green wheat.

Blear-eyed (The). Aurelius Brandolini, the Italian poet, called Il Lippo (1440-1497).

Bled. To make a man bled is to make him pay dearly for something; to victimise him. Money is the life-blood of commerce. It makes my heart bleed. It makes me very sorrowful.

"She found them indeed, but it made her heart bleed."—Little Bo-Peep.

Bleeding of a Dead Body (The). It was at one time believed that, at the approach of a murderer, the blood of the murdered body gushed out. If in a dead body the slightest change was observable in the eyes, mouth, feet, or hands, the murderer was supposed to be present. The notion still survives in some places.

Blefuscu. An island severed from Lilliput by a channel 800 yards wide, inhabited by pigmies. Swift meant it for France. (Gulliver’s Travels.)

Bleiddablik [cast splendour]. The abode of Baldur, the Scandinavian Apollo.

Blemmyses (of Africa). Men said to have no head, their eyes and mouth being placed in the breast. (See Achra- lites; Caora.)

Blenheim Dog. A small spaniel; so called from Blenheim Palace in Oxfordshire, where the breed has been preserved ever since the palace was built.

Blenheim House (Oxfordshire). The house given by the nation to the Duke of Marlborough, for his victory over the French at Blenheim, in Bavaria, in the reign of Queen Anne (1704).

"When Europe freed confessed the saving power Of Marlborough’s hand, Britain who sent him forth, Chief of confederate hosts, to fight the cause Of liberty and justice, grateful raised This palace, sacred to the leader’s fame."—Littledon: Blenheim.

Blenheim Steps. Once noted for an anatomical school, over which Sir Astley Cooper presided. "Here resurrectionists" were sure to find a ready mart for their gruesome wares, for which they received sums of money varying from £3 to £10, and sometimes more. Such phrases as "going to Blenheim Steps," meant going to be dissected, or unearthed from one’s grave.

"The body-snatchers, they have come, And made a snatch at me; They’re very hard-temper’d kind of men Won’t let a body be. They cock it crow—1 must be gone— My William, we must part; But I’ll be yours in death although Sir Astley has my heart."—Hood: Mary’s Ghost.

Bless. He has not a [suggestion] to bless himself with, i.e. in his possession; wherewith to make himself happy. This expression may probably be traced to the time when coined were sharked with a deeply-indented cross. Cf. To keep the devil out of one’s pocket.

Blessing with three fingers is symbolic of the Trinity, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost.
Blest. I'll be blest if I do it. I am resolved not to do it. A euphemism for curse.

Blixtandbäbel [splendid misery]. The canopy of the goddess Hel or Hela (q.v.).

Blumber (Miss). A blue- stocking, who knows the dead languages, and wears learned spectacles. She is the daughter of Dr. Blumber, a fossil schoolmaster of the high and dry grammatical type. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Blind. That's a mere blind. A pretense; something ostensible to conceal a covert design. The metaphor is from window-blinds, which prevent outsiders from seeing into a room.

Blind as a bat. A bat is not blind, but when it enters a room well lighted, it cannot see, and blunders about. It sees best, like a cat, in the dusk. (See SIMILES.)

Blind as a beetle. Beetles are not blind, but the dor-beetle or hedge-chafer, in its rapid flight, will occasionally bump against one as if it could not see.

Blind as a mole. Moles are not blind, but as they work underground, their eyes are very small. There is a mole found in the south of Europe, the eyes of which are covered by membranes, and probably this is the animal to which Aristotle refers when he says, "the mole is blind." (See SIMILES.)

Blind as an owl. Owls are not blind, but being night birds, they see better in partial darkness than in the full light of day. (See SIMILES.)

You came on his blind side. His soft or tender-hearted side. Said of persons who wheedle some favour out of another. He yielded because he was not wide awake to his own interest.

"Lincoln wrote to the same friend that the nomination took the democrats on the blind side."—Nicolay and Hay: Abraham Lincoln, vol. i. chap. x. p. 272.

Blind leaders of the blind. The allusion is to a sect of the Pharisees, who were wont to shut their eyes when they walked abroad,(176,896),(844,911)

Blind Alley (A). A "cul de sac," an alley with no outlet. It is blind because it has no "eye" or passage through it.

Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green (The). A public-house sign in the Whitechapel Road. (Hotten: History of Sign-Boards.) (See BEGGAR.)

Blind Department (The). In Post Office parlance, means that department where letters with incoherent, insufficient, or illegible addresses are examined, and, if possible, put upon the proper track for delivery. The clerk so employed is called "The Blind Man."

"One of these addresses was "Santling, Hilsowde, St. Helen's, Isle of Wight." I myself, had one from France addressed, 'A Mons. E. Cougham, brasueur, Angletierre,' and it reached me. Another address was "Haselfinch in no fant-shere" (Hazelbeach, Northamptonshire).

Blind Ditch (A). One which cannot be seen. Here blind means obscure, as a blind village.

Blind Harper (The). John Parry, who died 1739.

Blind Hedge (A). A hawthorn hedge, not easily seen. Milton uses the word blind for concealed, as "In the blind mazes of this tangled wood." (Comus, line 181.)

Blind old Man of Scio's rocky Isle. Homer is so called by Byron in his Bride of Abydos.

Blind Magistrate (The). Sir John Fielding, knighted in 1761, was born blind. He was in the commission of the Peace for Middlesex, Surrey, Essex, and the liberties of Westminster.

Blindman's Holiday. The hour of dusk, when it is too dark to work, and too soon to light candles.

Blindman's Lantern (The), or "Eyes to the Blind." A walking stick with which a blind man guides his way. In French argot bongie means a walking stick.

Blindmen's Dinner (The). A dinner unpaid for. A dinner in which the landlord is made the victim. Eulenspiegel being asked for alms by twelve blind men, said, "Go to the inn; eat, drink, and be merry, my men; and here are twenty florins to pay the fare." The blind men thanked him; each supposing one of the others had received the money. Reaching the inn, they told the landlord of their luck, and were at once provided with food and drink to the amount of twenty florins. On asking for payment, they all said, "Let him who received the money pay for the dinner;" but none had received a penny.

Blinkers. Spectacles; the allusion is to a horse's blinkers.

Block. To block a Bill. In parliamentary language means to postpone or prevent the passage of a Bill by giving notice of opposition, and thus preventing its being taken after half-past twelve at night.

"By blocking the Bill [he] denied to two million persons the right of saving votes."—Contemporary Review, August, 1894, p. 171.

Blockheads. A stupid person; one without brains. The allusion is to a wig-maker's dummy or tête à perruque, on which he fits his wigs.

"Your wit will not so soon out in another man's will; 'tis strongly wedged up in a block-head."—Shakespeare: Coriolanus, ii. 3.

Blood. A buck, an aristocratic rowdy. A term taken from blood horses.

"A blood or dandy about town."—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, chap. x. p. 40.

Blood. Family descent.

Blood thicker than water. Relationship has a claim which is generally acknowledged. It is better to seek kindness from a kinsman than from a stranger. Water soon evaporates and leaves no mark behind; not so blood. So the interest we take in a stranger is thinner and more evanescent than that which we take in a blood relation.

"Well! blame's thicker than water. She's welcome to the cheeses and the loaves just the same."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering.

A Prince of the Blood. One of the Royal Family.

Bad blood. Anger, quarrels; as, It stirs up bad blood. It provokes to ill-feeling and contention.

Blue blood. (See under BLUE.)

Young blood. Fresh members; as, To bring young blood into the concern.

In cold blood. Deliberately; not in the excitement of passion or of battle.

It makes one's blood boil. It provokes indignation and anger.

It runs in the blood. It is inherited or exists in the family race.

"It runs in the blood of our family."—Sheridan: The Rivals, iv. 2.

My own flesh and blood. My own children, brothers, sisters, or other near kindred.

Laws written in blood. Dema'des said that the laws of Draco were written in blood, because every offence was punished by death.

The field of blood. Aceldama (Acts i. 19), the piece of ground purchased with the blood-money of our Saviour, and set apart for the burial of strangers.

The field of the battle of Canae, where Hannibal defeated the Romans, b.c. 216.

Blood of our Saviour. An order of knighthood in Mantua; so called because their special office was to guard the drops of the Saviour's blood preserved in St. Andrew's church, Mantua.

Blood and iron policy—i.e. war policy. No explanation needed.

Blood-guiltiness. The guilt of murder.

Blood-horse (A). A thorough-bred.

Bloodhound. Figuratively, one who follows up an enemy with pertinacity. Bloodhounds used to be employed for tracking wounded game by the blood spilt; subsequently they were employed for tracking criminals and slaves who had made their escape, and were hunters of blood, not hunters by blood. The most noted breeds are the African, Cuban, and English.

Blood Money. Money paid to a person for giving such evidence as shall lead to the conviction of another; money paid to the next of kin to induce him to forego his "right" of seeking blood for blood; money paid to a person for betraying another, as Judas was paid blood-money for showing the band the place where Jesus might be found.

Blood Relation (A). One in direct descent from the same father or mother; one of the same family stock.

Blood-thirsty. Eager for shedding blood.

Blood of the Grogmans (The). Taffety gentility; make-believe aristocratic blood. Grogman is a coarse silk taffety stiffened with gum (French, gron-grain).

"Our first tragedian was always boasting of his being 'an old actor,' and was full of the 'blood of the Grogmans.'"—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 230.

Bloody, used as an expletive in such phrases as "A bloody fool," "Bloody drunk," etc., arose from associating folly and drunkenness, etc., with what are called "Bloods," or aristocratic rowdies. Similar to "Drunk as a lord."
"It was bloody hot walking to-day."—Swift: Journal to Stella, letter xxii.

Bloody (The). Otho II., Emperor of Germany. (955, 973-983.)
The Bloody Eleventh. The old 11th Foot was so called from their having been several times nearly annihilated, as at Almansa, Fontenoy, Roucoux, Os- tend; and Salamanca (1812), in capturing a French standard. Now called "The Devonshire Regiment."

Bloody Assizes. The infamous assizes held by Judge Jeffreys in 1685. Three hundred were executed, more whipped or imprisoned, and a thousand sent to the plantations for taking part in Monmouth's rebellion.

Bloody Bill. The 31 Henry VIII., c. 14, which denounced death, by hanging or burning, on all who denied the doctrine of transubstantiation.

Bloody Bones. A hagobolin; generally "Raw-head and Bloody-Bones."

Bloody Butcher. (See Butcher.)

Bloody Hand. A man whose hand was bloody, and was therefore presumed to be the person guilty of killing the deer shot or otherwise slain. (Cf. Red Hand.) Also the badge of a baronet.

Bloody Wedding. St. Bartholomew's slaughter in 1572 is so called because it took place during the marriage feast of Henri (afterwards Henri IV.) and Marguerite (daughter of Catharine de Medici).

Bloody Week (The). The week ending on Sunday, May 28th, 1871, when Paris was burning, being set on fire by the Communists in hundreds of places. The destruction was frightful, but Notre Dame, the Hôtel Dieu, and the magnificent collection of pictures in the Louvre, happily escaped demolition.

Bloom. From bloom to bloom. A floral rent. The Lord of the Manor received a red rose or gillyflower, on the Feast of John the Baptist, yearly (July 6th, O. S.). (See Notes and Queries, Feb. 13th, 1886, p. 135.)

Bloomerism. A female costume: so called from Mrs. Amelia Bloomer, of New York, who tried in 1849 to introduce the fashion. The dress consisted of a short skirt and loose trousers gathered closely round the ankles—becoming enough to young ladies in their teens, but ridiculous for "the fat and forty."

Blount (Charles). Author of some deistical writings in the time of Charles II. (1654-1693.)
"He heard of Blount, etc."—Craike: Borough.

"A garment called blaint or blaiats, which appears to have been another name for a surcoat... in this blaint we may discover the modern French blouson, n. . . , smock-frock."—Planché: British Costume.

1. Blow (To). As the wind blows; or to blow with the breath. (Anglo-Saxon, bluan, to blow or breathe.)
It will soon blow over. It will soon be no longer talked about; it will soon come to an end, as a gale or storm blows over or ceases.
*T. To blow off is another form of the same phrase.
To blow great guns. The wind blows so violently that its noise resembles the roar of artillery.
To blow hot and cold, (or) To blow hot and cold with the same breath. To be inconsistent. The allusion is to the fable of a traveller who was entertained by a satyr. Being cold, the traveller blew his fingers to warm them, and afterwards blew his hot broth to cool it. The satyr, in great indignation, turned him out of doors, because he blew both hot and cold with the same breath.
To blow off the steam. To get rid of superfluous energy. The allusion is to the forcible escape of superfluous steam no longer required.

2. Blow (To). To sound a trumpet.
"But when the blast of war blows in our ears, Let us be tigers in our fierce department."—Shakespeare: Henry V., iii. 1.
To blow. To inform against a companion; to "peach." The reference is to the announcing of knights by blast of trumpet.

3. Blow (To). To blast with gunpowder.
I will blow him up sky high. Give him a good scolding. A regular blowing up is a thorough jobation. The metaphor is from blasting by gunpowder.
But to blow up a bladder, etc., means to inflate it.

4. Blow. A stroke. (German, blähen, to beat or strike.)
At one blow. By one stroke.
The first blow is half the battle. Well begun is half done. Pythagoras used to Blow a Cloud. To smoke a cigar or pipe. This term was in use in Queen Elizabeth’s reign.

Blow Me (an oath). You be blewed (an oath), a play on the word Dash me, which is a euphemism for a more offensive oath.

Blow Out (A). A “tuck in,” or feast which swells out the paunch.

Blow-point. A game similar to our pea-puffing, only instead of peas small wooden skewers or bits of pointed wood were puffed through the tubs. The game is alluded to by Floro, Strutt, and several other authors.

Blown, in the phrase “fly-blown,” has nothing to do with the verb to blow (as the wind blows). It means that flies have deposited their eggs and tainted the article. In French, déposer des œufs de moncher sur . . . a fly-blown is un œuf de moncher. The word seems to be connected with blot, the egg of a moth or other insect.

Blown Herring are bloated herrings. The French bouffi (blown) is analogous to both expressions. Blown herrings are herrings bloated, swollen, or cured by smoking.

Blown upon. Made the subject of a scandal. His reputation has been blown upon, means has been the subject of talk wherein something derogatory was hinted at or even asserted. Blown upon by the breath of slander.

Blowzelling’d. A country maiden in Gay’s pastoral called The Shepherd’s Week.

Blowzy. Course, red-faced, bloated: applied to women. The word is allied to blush, blaze, etc. (Dutch, blozen and blazen; Danish, blusse; to blaze.)

Blubber. To cry like a child, with noise and slavering. Connected with sloffer, swayer.

Blubber Cheeks. Fat, flabby cheeks, like whale's blubber. “The blubber cheeks of my friend the baronet.”

Blue. Blue or Azur is the symbol of Divine eternity and human immortality. Consequently, it is a mortuary colour—hence its use in covering the coffins of young persons. When used for the garment of an angel, it signifies faith and fidelity. As the dress of the Virgin, it indicates modesty. In blazonry, it signifies chastity, loyalty, fidelity, and a spotless reputation.

The Cornishmen wore blue as their badge, in opposition to the scarlet of royalty. They based their choice on Numb. xv. 38, “Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments . . . and that they put upon the fringe . . . a ribbon of blue.”

(See COLOURS for its symbolisms.)

Blue (A), or a “staunch blue,” descriptive of political opinions, for the most part means a Tory, for in most counties the Conservative colour is blue.

(See TRUX BLUE.)

True blue. This was a blue demonstration, a gathering of the Conservative elements.”—Holme Lee.

A blue. (See BLUE STOCKING.)

A dark blue. An Oxford man or Harrow boy.

A light blue. A Cambridge man or Eton boy.

An old blue. One who has pulled in a University boat-race, or taken part in any of their athletic contests.

There were fine old blues playing.”—Standard, May 4th, 1863.

True blue. This is a Spanish phrase, and refers to the notion that the veins shown in the skin of aristocratic families are more blue than that of inferior persons.

(See SANG.)

True blue will never stain. A really noble heart will never disgrace itself. The reference is to blue aprons and blouses worn by butchers, which do not show blood-stains.

True as Coventry blue. The reference is to a blue cloth and blue thread made at Coventry, noted for its permanent dye.

Texas Presbyterian true blue (Hudibras, i, 1). The allusion is to the blue apron which some of the Presbyterian preachers used to throw over their preaching-tub before they began to address the people. In one of the Rump songs we read of a person going to hear a lecture, and the song says—

"Where is a tub did view,
Rung with an apron blue,
Twas the preacher, I conjecture."

To look blue. To be disconcerted. He was blue in the face. Aghast with wonder. The effect of fear and wonder is to drive the colour from the cheeks, and give them a pale-bluish tinge.

Blue-apron Statesman (A). A lay politician, a tradesman who interferes with the affairs of the nation. The reference is to the blue apron once worn by almost all tradesmen, but now restricted to butchers, poulterers, fishmongers, and so on.

Blue Beans. Bullets. Load is blue.

"Many a valiant giant had no breakfast that morning but what the Germans call 'blue beans,' i.e., bullets."—W. M'each. My School Days, 1855.

Three blue beans in a blue bottle or bladder. (See under Beans.)

Bluebeard. A booby, a merciless tyrant, in Charles Perrault's Contes du Temps. The tale of Bluebeard (Chevalier Bagol) is known to every child, but many have speculated on the original of this despot. Some say it was a satire on Henry VIII., of wife-killing notoriety. Dr. C. Taylor thinks it is a type of the castle lords in the days of knight-errantry. Holinshed calls Giles de Hetz, Marquis de Laval, the original Bluebeard. This Giles or Gilles who lived at Machecoul, in Brittany, was accused of murdering six of his seven wives, and was ultimately strangled and burnt in 1440.

"The Bluebeard chamber of his mind, into which no eye but his own must look."—Cervantes.

Campbell has a Bluebeard story in his Tales of the Western Highlands, called The Widow and her Daughters. A similar one is No. 30 of Visenti's collection of Italian stories. So is No. 3 of Bernoni's collection.

Bluebeard's Key. When the blood stain of this key was rubbed out on one side, it appeared on the opposite side; so prodigality being overcome will appear in the form of meanness; and friends, over-fond, will often become enemies.

Blue Billy (A). A blue neckcloth with white spots, worn by William Mace. More likely the allusion is to the bill or nose. (See Billy.)

Blue Blood. (See page 149, True Blue.)

Blue Bear. A public-house sign; the cognizance of Richard III. In Leicester is a lane in the parish of St. Nicholas, called the Blue Bear Lane, because Richard slept there the night before the battle of Bosworth Field.

"The bristly bear, in infant gore, Wallows beneath the thorny shade."—Gray: The Bard.

Blue Bonnets (Th). The Scotch Highlanders; the Scotch generally. So called from the blue woolen cap at one time in very general use in Scotland, and still far from uncommon.

"England shall many a day see
Of the bloody fray;
When the blue bonnets came over the border."

Try W. Scott.

Blue Books. In England, parliamentary reports and official publications presented by the Crown to both Houses of Parliament. Each volume is in folio, and is covered with a blue wrapper.

"Short Acts of Parliament, etc., even without a wrapper, come under the same designation.

In America, the "Blue Books" (like our "Red Books") contain lists of those persons who hold government appointments. The official color of Spain is red, of Italy green, of France yellow, of Germany and Portugal white.

Blue Bottle. A beardsman, a policeman; so called from the color of his dress. Shakespeare makes Doll Tearsheet denominate the beard as a "blue-bottle rogue."

"You proud varlets, you need not be ashamed to wear blue, when your master is one of your fellows."—Dekker: The Honest Whore (1612).

"I'll have you soundly swung up for this, you blue-bottle rogue."—Shakespeare: 1 Hen. IV., act 1, sc. 4.

Blue Caps or Blue Bonnets. The Scotch.

"He is there, too,... and a thousand blue caps more."—Shakespeare: 1 Hen. IV., ii. 4.

Blue-coat School. Christ's Hospital is so called because the boys there wear a long blue coat girded at the loins with a leather belt. Some who attend the mathematical school are termed King's boys, and those who constitute the highest class are Seniors.

Founded by Edward VI. in the year of his death. There are several other blue-coat schools in England besides Christ's Hospital.

Blue Devils, or A fit of the blues. A fit of spleen, low spirits. Roach and Esquirol affirm, from observation, that indigo dyers are especially subject to melancholy; and that those who dye Blue-eyed Maid (The). Minerva, the goddess of wisdom, is so called by Homer.

"Now Prudence gently pulled the poet's ear, And thus the daughter of the Blue-eyed Maid, In flattery's soothing sounds, divinely said, "O Peter, eldest-born of Ephesus, hear.""

Peter Pindar: A Satirical Poet.

Blue Fish (The). The shark, technically called Carcharias glauca, the upper parts of which are blue.

Blue Flag. He has hoisted the blue flag. He has turned publican or fishmonger, in allusion to the blue apron at one time worn by publicans, and still worn by fishmongers.

Blue Gown (A). A harlot. Nares tells us that "a blue gown was a dress of ignominy for a harlot in the House of Correction. (See below.)"

Blue-gowns. The bedesmen, to whom the kings of Scotland distributed certain aims. Their dress was a cloak or gown of coarse blue cloth, with a pewter badge. The number of these bedesmen was equal to that of the king's years, so that an extra one was added every returning birthday. These paupers were privileged to ask alms through the whole realm of Scotland. No new member has been added since 1833. (See GABER-LUNZIE.)

Blue Guards (The). So the Oxford Blues, now called the Royal Horse Guards, were called during the campaign in Flanders (1742-1749).

Blue Hen. Captain Caldwell used to say that no cock could be truly game whose mother was not a blue hen. As Caldwell commanded the 1st Delaware regiment in the war, the State of Delaware was nicknamed Blue Hen.

Your mother was a blue hen, no doubt. A reproof given to a braggart. (See above.)

Blue-jackets. Sailors; so called because the colour of their jackets is blue.

Blue John (A). A petrefaction of blue fluor-spar, found in the Blue John mine of Tre Cliff, Derbyshire; and so called to distinguish it from the Black Jack, an ore of zinc. Called John from John Kirk, a miner, who first noticed it.

Blue Laws (The). These were puritanical laws enacted in 1732, at New Haven, Connecticut, in the United States of America. Their object was to stamp out "hereay, and enforce a strict observance of the Sunday. Many persons insist that they are apocryphal; but in October, 1891, the German American Lincoln Club protested against their enforcement by a democratic judge, and resolved—

"To call upon all right-thinking citizens to assist in an effort to have the laws repealed, by supporting and voting only for such candidates for the legislature as would pledge themselves to vote for their repeal."

Blue-light Federalists. A name given to those Americans who were believed to have made friendly ("blue-light") signals to British ships in the war. (1812.)

Blue-man. The English pursuivant at arms is so called from his official robe.

Blue Monday. The Monday before Lent, spent in dissipation. (German, der bläue Montag.) It is said that dissipation gives everything a blue tinge. Hence "blue" means tipsy. (See BLUE DEVILS.)

"Drink till all is blue, Cracking bottles till all is blue."

From a Magazine, xvii. (1888.)

Blue Moon. Once in a blue moon. Very rarely indeed.

* On December 10th, 1883, we had a "blue moon." The winter was unusually mild.

Blue Mould. Applied to cheese which has become the bed of a fungus, technically called Aspergillus glaucus. The blue mould of bread, paste, jams, etc., is the fungus called Mucor Macedo.

Blue Murder. To shout blue murder. Indicative of more of terror or alarm than of real danger. It appears to be a play on the French exclamation bordel, there may also be a distinct allusion to the common phrase "blue ruin."

Blue-noses. The Nova Scotians.

"Pray, sir," said one of my fellow-passengers, "can you tell me the reason why the Nova Scotians are called "Blue-noses"?"

"It is the name of a potato, said I, "which they produce in the greatest perfection, and boast to be the best in the world. The Americans have, in consequence, given them the nickname Blue Noses." — Holland's: Sam Stock.

Blue Peter. A flag with a blue ground and white square in the centre, hoisted as a signal that the ship is about to sail. Peter is a corruption of the

...
French partir (leave or notice of departure). The flag is hoisted to give notice to the town that any person having a money-claim may make it before the ship starts, and that all about to sail are to come on board.

According to Falconer, it is a corruption of the "blue repeater."

In whist, it is a "call for trumps"; that is, laying on your partner's card a higher one than is required.

To hoist the blue Peter. To leave.

"When are you going to sail?"
"I cannot soon say. Our ship's bound for America next voyage... but I've got to go to the Isle of Man first. And I may have to hoist the blue Peter any day."—Mrs. Gaskell: Mary Barton, chap. xiii.

Blue-pigeon Flyer. A man who steals the lead off of a house or church. "Bluey" is slang for lead, so called from its colour. To "pigeon" is to pull, cheat, or fob. Hence, blue-pigeon, one who cheats another of his lead, or fubs his lead. "Flyer," of course, is one who flies off with the stolen lead.

Blue Ribbon (The). "To be adorned with the blue ribbon," to be made knight of the garter, or adorned with a blue ribbon at the knee. Blue ribbon is also a temperance badge. (See Cordon Bleu.)

"Lord Lansdown is to be made Knight of the Garter... though there is no vacancy. Lord Derby received the Blue Ribbon in 1880, although there was no vacancy."—Trilby: March, 1891.

The Blue Ribbon of the Turf. The Derby. Lord George Bentinck sold his stud, and found to his vexation that one of the horses sold won the Derby a few months afterwards. Bawling his ill-luck, he said to Disraeli, "Ah! you don't know what the Derby is." "Yes, I do," replied Disraeli; "it is the blue ribbon of the turf," alluding to the term cordon bleu (q.v.); or else to the blue garter, the highest of all orders.

"The blue ribbon of the profession" is the highest point of honour attainable therein. The blue ribbon of the Church is the Archbishop of Canterbury, that in law is the office of Lord Chancellor.

Blue Ribbon (1). A wail from a blow. A bruise turns the skin blue.

"Do you want a blue ribbon round those white sides of yours? You monkey! answered Orestes; because, if you do, the Hippocampus hides himself ready outside."—Kingsley: Hypatia, chap. iv.

Blue Ruin. Gin. Called blue from its tint, and ruin from its effects.

Blue Squadron (The). One of the three divisions of the British Fleet in the seventeenth century. (See Admiral of the Blue.)

Blue Stocking. A female pedant. In 1490 a society of ladies and gentlemen was formed at Venice, distinguished by the colour of their stockings, and called della calza. It lasted till 1590, when it appeared in Paris and was the rage among the lady servantes. From France it came to England in 1780, when Mrs. Montague displayed the badge of the Bas-blau club at her evening assemblies. Mr. Benjamin Stillingsfleet was a constant attendant of the soirées. The last of the clique was Miss Monckton, afterwards Countess of Cork, who died 1840.

"You need to be fond enough of books... a regular blue-stocking. Mr. Blount called you."—K. S. Pack: The Gates Ajar, chap. iv.

Blue Talk. Indecent conversation, from the French, Bibliothèque Bleu. (Harlots are called "Blues" from the blue gown they were once compelled to wear in the House of Correction.)

Blue Wonder (A). The German Blaues Wunder, which means "a queer story," as In sollst dein blauen wunder schen, You will be filled with amazement, at the queer story I have to relate. A "blue wonder" is a cock and bull story, an improbable tale, something to make one stare. The French, contes bleus.

Blue and Red, in public-house signs, are heraldic colours, as the Blue Pig, the Blue Cow, the Red Lion, the Red Hart, etc.

Blue and Yellow (The). The Edinbrough Revue; so called from its yellow and blue cover. The back is yellow, the rest of the cover is blue.

Blues (The), applied to troops.

The Oxford Blues. The Royal Horse Guards were so called in 1690, from the Earl of Oxford their commander and the blue facings. Wellington, in one of his despatches, writes:—"I have been appointed colonel of the Blues."

"It was also known as the Blue Guards during the campaign in Flanders (1742-1743)."—Trench: Reminiscences of the British Army.

Bluff (Tu), in the game called Poker, is to stake on a bad hand. This is a dodge resorted to by players to lead an adversary to throw up his cards and forfeit his stake rather than risk them against the "bluffer."

"The game proceeded. George, although he affected no ignorance of the ordinary principles of poker, played like a novice—that is to say, he bluffed extravagantly on absurdly low hands."—Truth: Queer Stories, Sept. 3rd, 1885.
From this name comes our bogie, a hobgoblin or little Bo. Gifford Castle is called Bo Hall, being said to have been constructed by bogies or magic. Compare Greek, boi, bah! verbi, boab, to shout out; Latin, bo-, to bellow like a bull (boe). (See BOGIE.)

You cannot say Bo! to a goose—i.e. you are a coward who dare not say bo! even to a fool. When Ben Jonson was introduced to a nobleman, the peer was so struck with his homely appearance that he exclaimed, "What! are you Ben Jonson? Why, you look as if you could not say Bo! to a goose." "Bo!" exclaimed the witty dramatist, turning to the peer and making his bow. (Latin, bo-vere; Greek, boa-in, to cry aloud.)

Bo-tree. A corruption of bodhi or bodhivina (the tree of wisdom), under which Sakyamuni used to sit when he conceived the system called Buddhism.

Boa. Pliny says the word is from bos (a cow), and arose from the supposition that the boa sucked the milk of cows.

Boanerges (sons of thunder). A name given to James and John, the sons of Ze 'boden, because they wanted to call down "fire from heaven" to consume the Samaritans for not "receiving" the Lord Jesus. (Luke ix. 54; see Mark iii. 17.)

Boar. The Boar. Richard III.; so called from his cognizance, "The armed, aolly, and piercing boar That spoiled your summer fields and fruitful vine..." "This foul sueue... lies now... Near to the town of Leicestre, as we learn." Shakespeare: Richard III., v. 3.

The bristled Baptist boar. So Dryden denominates the Anabaptists in his Hind and Panther. "The bristled Baptist boar, impure as he [the ape],

But whitered with the fame of sanctity,

With fat pollutions filled the sacred place,

And mountains levelled in his furious race." Part 1, 45-6.

The wild boar of Ardennes [Le sanglier des Ardenes]. Guillaume, Comte de la Marche, so called because he was fierce as the wild boar, which he delighted to hunt. Introduced by Sir Walter Scott as William, Count of la Marche, in Quentin Durward.

Boar (The), eaten every evening in Valhalla by the Æsir, was named S.E.H.-RIMNIR. It was eaten every evening and next morning was restored whole again.

Boar's Flesh. Buddha died from a meal of dried boar's flesh. Mr. Sinnett
Boar's Head

Boar's Head. [The Christmas dish.] Freyr, the Scandinavian god of peace and plenty, used to ride on the boar Gullinbursti; his festival was held at Yuletide (winter solstice), when a boar was sacrificed to his honour.

The Boar's Head. This tavern, made immortal by Shakespeare, used to stand in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV. It was the cognisance of the Gordons, the progenitor of which clan slew, in the forest of Huntley, a wild boar, the terror of all the Merse (1093).

Board. A council which sits at a board or table; as "Board of Directors," "Board of Guardians," "School Board," "Board of Trade," etc. (Anglo-Saxon, bord, a board, table, etc.)

Boast. (The). The vainglory, the ostentation, that which a person boasts of, or is proud of.

"The boast of heraldry, the pomp of power, Await ye all alike the inevitable hour."

Boast of England. (The). Thomas Thumb or Tom-a-lin. Richard Johnson, in 1599, published a "History of this ever-renowned soldier, the Red Rose Knight, surnamed The Boast of England, showing his honorable victories in foreign countries, with his strange fortunes in Fairy Land, and how he married the fair Angiltira, daughter of Preste John. . . ."

Boat. Both in the same boat. Both treated alike; both placed in the same conditions. The reference is to the boat launched when a ship is wrecked.

To be represented in a boat is the ordinary symbol of apotheosis. Many sovereigns are so represented on coins.

Boatswain. The officer who has charge of the boats, sails, rigging, anchors, cordage, cables, and colours.

Swain is the Saxon swain (a boy, servant), Swedish serv. Hence, a shepherd is a swain, and a sweetheart is a woman's servant or swain.

Boatman. The name of Byron's favourite dog, buried in Newstead Abbey garden.

Boas and Jachin. The names of the two brazen pillars set up by Solomon at the entrance of his temple—Boaz (strength) on the left hand, and Jachin (stability) on the right. (1 Kings vii. 21.)

"Two pillars raising by their skill profound.
Boaz and Jachin, thro' the East renowned."

Crockett: "Borough."
force, at least into Ireland. (See Phlebi.)

"But oh! for the grip of the hussy's hand Upon his neck that day." (Punch: July 25, 1884.)

Bocurus (King). A kind of Solomon, who not only drank strong poison "in the name of the Trinity" without hurt; but also answered questions of wisdom, morality, and natural science. (The History of King Bocurus and Sydrach, from the French.)

Bockland or Bookland. Land severed from the folkland, and converted into a private estate of perpetual inheritance by a short and simple deed or bock.

Bod. The divinity invoked by Indian women who desire fecundity. Children born after an invocation to Bod must be redeemed, or else serve in the temple of the goddess. (Indian mythology.)

Boden-See. The Lake of Constance; so called because it lies in the Boden, or low country at the foot of the Alps. (Latin, Senus Bodanum.)

Bodies. Compound bodies, in chemical phraseology, mean those which have two or more simple bodies or elements in their composition, as water. Simple bodies, in chemical phraseology, mean the elements. The heavenly bodies. The sun, moon, stars, and so on.

The seven bodies (of alchemists). The seven metals supposed to correspond with the seven "planets."

Bobadill. A military braggart of the first water. Captain Bobadill is a character in Ben Jonson's comedy of Every Man in His Humour. This name was probably suggested by Bobadilla, first governor of Cuba, who sent Columbus home in chains. (See Vincent.)

"Bobadill is the author's best invention, and is worthy to march in the same regiment with Buenes and Pisador, Paroles, and the Copper (captain)" (q. b.)—B. W. Procter.

Bobadill. See all these names in their proper places.

Bobbery, as "Kicking up a bobbery," making a squabble or tumult, kicking up a shindy. It is much used in India, and Colonel Yule says it is of Indian origin.

Bobbish. Pretty bobbish. Pretty well (in spirits and health), from bob, brisk. (See above.) A very ancient expression.

Bobbit. If it isn't weel bobbit we'll bob it again. If it is not done well enough, we will try again. To bob is to dance, literally the proverb means, "If it is not well danced, we will dance over again."

Bobby. A policeman; so called because Sir Robert Peel introduced the little body, which may be squeezed into a small space.

"If you can hodkin the sweet creature into the cloak."—Gibbon.

"There is hardly room between Jem and Miss Sharp, who are on the front seat; Mr. Osborne sitting hodkin opposite, between Captain Dobida and Amelia."—Thackeray: Vanity Fair.

Bodle. A Scotch coin, worth the sixth of a penny; so called from Bothwell, a mint-master.

"Fair play, he car'd na dula a boddie."—Burns: Tam o' Shanter, line 110.

To care not a bodle = our English phrase, "Not to care a farthing."

Bodle'tan Library (Oxford). So called because it was restored by Sir Thomas Bodley in 1597.

Body. (Anglo-Saxon, bodig.)

A regular body, in geometry, means one of the five regular solids, called "Platonic" because first suggested by Plato. (See Platonic Bodies.)

To body forth. To give mental shape to an ideal form.

"Imagination bodies forth The forms of things unknown."

Body and Soul. To keep body and soul together. To sustain life; from the notion that the soul gives life. The Latin anima, and the Greek psyche, mean both soul and life; and, according to Homeric mythology, the departed soul retains the shape and semblance of the body, hence the notion of ghosts. Indeed, if the soul is the "principle of life," it must of necessity be the fac-simile of every living atom of the body. (See Astral Body.)

Body-colour (A). Is a paint containing a body or consistency. In water-colours it is mixed with white lead and laid on thickly.

Body Corporate (A). An aggregate of individuals legally united into a corporation.

Body Politic (A). A whole nation considered as a political corporation; the state. In Latin, totum corpus reipublicae.

Body-snatcher (A). One who snatches or purloins bodies, newly buried, to sell them to surgeons for dissection. By a play on the words, a bum-bailiff was so called, because his duty was to snatch or capture the body of a delinquent.

The first instance of body-snatching on record was in 1777. It was the body of Mrs. Jane Sainsbury from the burial ground near Gray's Inn Lane. The men, being convicted, were imprisoned for six months.

Bog. The Christian King of Antioch, who tried to teach his subjects arts, laws, and religion. Pyrrhus delivered to him a fort, by which Antioch was taken by the Christians after an eight months' siege. Bogemond and Roger were two brothers, the sons of Roberto Guiscardo, of the Norman race. (Tasso: Jerusalem Delivered.)

Boe'tia. According to fable it is so-called because Cadmus was conducted by an ox (Greek boe'n) to the spot where he built Thebes; but, according to fact, it was so called because it abounded in cattle. (Greek, Bo'tis.)

Boe'ti'an. A rude, unlettered person, a dull blockhead. The ancient Boeotians loved agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so the Athenians used to say they were dull and thick as their own atmosphere; yet Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Plutarch, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, were all Boeotians.

Boe'ti'an Ears. Ears unable to appreciate music or rhetoric.

"Well, friend, I assure thee thou hast not got Boeotian ears [because you can appreciate the beauty of my sermons]."—Le Sage: Gil Blas, ii. 3.

Boo'thisus. Last of the Latin authors, properly so called (470–524). Alfred the Great translated his De Consolatione Philosophiae into Anglo-Saxon.

Bogie. A scarecrow, a goblin. (Bulgarian, boy, a god; Slavonic, bagu; Welsh, huyg, a goblin, our bugbear.)

The Assyrian mothers used to scare their children with the name of Narakas (Gibbon): the Syrians with that of Richard Coeur de Lion; the Dutch with Boh, the Gothic general (Warton); the Jews with Lilith; the Turks with Mathius Corvinus, the Hungarian king; and the English with the name of Lusinfort (q.v.). (See Bo.)

Bogio (in Orlando Furioso). One of the allies of Charlemagne. He promised his wife to return within six moons, but was slain by Dardinello.

Bogio Swindle. A gigantic swindle conceived in Paris by fourteen persons, who expected to net at least a million sterling. It was exposed in the Times.

Bogomil'i. A religious sect of the twelfth century, whose chief seat was Thrace. So called from their constant repetition of the words, "Lord, have mercy upon us," which, in Bulgarian, is boy (Lord), milui (have mercy).

Bogtrotters. Irish tramps; so called from their skill in crossing the Irish bogs, from tussock to tussock, either as guides or to escape pursuit.

Bogus. Bogus currency. Forged or sham bills. Bogus transactions. Fraudulent transactions. The word is by some connected with bogie.

Lowell (ibidem Papers) says, "I more than suspect the word to be a corruption of the French bogue." In French it is another word (bogue), the sound of a green chestnut, or case of a watch; a bogus chestnut or watch.

Bohème (La). A Bohemian, that is, one living on his wits, such as a penny-a-liner, journalist, politician, artist, dancer, or in fact any chevalier of unsettled habits and no settled home. From the French, Bohemin, a gypsy.

Une maison de Bohême means a house where no regularity is observed, but all things are at sixes and sevens.

Bohemia. The Queen of Bohemia. A public-house sign in honour of Lady Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I., who was married to Frederick, elector palatine, for whom Bohemia was raised into a separate kingdom. It is through this lady that the Brunswick family succeeded to the throne of Great Britain.

Bohemian. A gipsy, an impostor. The first gipsies that entered France came from Bohemia, and appeared before Paris in 1427. They were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle St. Denis.

A slang term applied to literary men and artists of loose and irregular habits, living by what they can pick up by their brains.

"Never was there an editor with less about him or the literary Bohemian. A strange contrast to his unhappy contemporary, Chatterton." Fortnightly Review: Preston Letter.

Bohemian Brethren. A religious sect formed out of the remnants of the Hussites. They arose at Prague in the fifteenth century, and were nicknamed "Caro-dwellers," because they lurked in caves to avoid persecution.

Bohemian Life (A). An irregular, restless way of living, like that of a gipsy.

Bohert (Sir). A knight of Arthur's Round Table, brother of Sir Lionel, and nephew of Lancelet of the Lake. Also called Sir Bora.

Bolles (2 syl.). Priests of the savages of Florida. Each priest has his special idol, which must be invoked by the fumes of tobacco. (American Indian mythology.)

Bolling-point. He was at boiling-point. Very angry indeed. Properly the point of heat at which water, under ordinary conditions, boils. (212° Fahrenheit, 100° Centigrade, 80° Réaumur.)

Bolley or Bolley. Bread soaked in water. A word used in baby-farming establishments (French, boulier). (Rail Mail Budget, Aug. 22, 1889.)

Boisserie's an Collection. A collection at Stuttgart of the early specimens of German art, made by the three brothers Boisserie.

Bold or Boley. The giant which the Indians say conquered heaven, earth, and the inferno. (Indian mythology.)

Bol. Bold or Beauchamp (Bechum). It is said that Thomas Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, with one squire and six archers, overthrew 100 armed men at Hogges, in Normandy, in 1346.

This exploit is not more incredible than that attributed to Captal-de-Buch, who, with forty followers, cleared Meaux of the insurgents called "La Jaquerie," 7,000 of whom were slain by this little band, or trampled to death in the narrow streets as they fled panic-struck (1358).

Bold as brass. Downright impudent; without modesty. Similarly, we say "brazen-faced."

I make bold to say. I take the liberty of saying; I venture to say.

Boletium Promontory. The Land's End.

Bolero. A Spanish dance; so called from the name of the inventor.

Bolingbroke. Henry IV. of England; so called from Bolingbroke, in Lincolnshire, where he was born. (1368, 1399-1413.)

Bollandists. Editors of the Acta Sanctorum begun by John Bolland (1596-1665); the sixty-first folio volume was published in 1778.

Bollen. Swollen. (Anglo-Saxon, bolla, a bowl.) Hence "joints holebig" (Galing); and "bole in pride" (Thayer). The seed capsule or pod of flax is called a "boll."

"The barley was in the ear, and the flax was bolling."—Exod. ix. 31.

Bologna Stone. A variety of barite, found in masses near Bologna. After being heated, powdered, and exposed to the light it becomes phosphorescent in the dark.

Bolognese School. There were three periods to the Bolognese School in painting—the Early, the Roman, and the Eclectic. The first was founded by Bolt. An arrow, a shaft (Anglo-Saxon, bolt; Danish, bolt; Greek, ballon, to cast; Latin, pello, to drive). A door bolt is a shaft of wood or iron, which may be shot or driven forward to secure a door. A thunderbolt is an hypothetical shaft cast from the clouds; an aerolite. Cupid’s bolt is Cupid’s arrow.

The foot’s bolt is soon spent. A foolish archer shoots all his arrows so heedlessly that he leaves himself no resources in case of need.

I must bolt. Be off like an arrow.

To bolt food. To swallow it quickly without waiting to chew it.

To bolt out the truth. To blurt it out; also To bolt out, to exclude or shut out by bolting the door.

To bolt. To silt, as flour is bolted. This has a different derivation to the above (Low Latin, builtella, a boulter, from an Old French word for coarse cloth).

"I cannot bolt this matter to the Iran,
As Bradwarden and holy Austin can."

Dryden’s version of the Cock and Fox.

Bolt from the blue (A). There fell a bolt from the blue. A sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe or event occurred, like a "thunderbolt" from the blue sky, or flash of lightning without warning and wholly unexpected.

"Namque Despater ignis coruscus multa dividit,
Pliurens, per purum tumultus
Et ensis fulgurante cursum."

Horace; 1. Ode xxxiv. 5, etc.

"On Monday, Dec. 22nd [1803], there fell a bolt from the blue. The morning papers announced that the men were out [on strike]."—Nineteenth Century, February, 1891, p. 230.

In this phrase the word "bolt" is used in the popular sense for lightning, the Latin fulmen, the French foudre and tonnerre, in English sometimes for an aerolite. Of course, in scientific language, a flash of lightning is not a thunderbolt. Metaphorically, it means a sudden and wholly unexpected catastrophe, like a thunderbolt [flash of lightning] from a blue or serene sky.

German: Wie ein Blitzstrahl aus blauer Aether. Italian: Comune un fulmine a cielo sereno. Latin: Audet et celit gentoris de parte serena latetnulli invitus. (Virgil: Aenid, 1. 580.)

Bolt in Tun, a public-house sign, is heraldic. In heraldry it is applied to a bird-bolt, in pale, piercing through a tun. The punning crest of Serjeant Bolton, who died 1787, was "on a wreath a tun erect proper, transpierced by an arrow fesseways or." Another family of the same name has for crest "a tun with a bird-bolt through it proper." A third, harping on the same string, has "a bolt gules in a tun or." The public-house sign distinguished by this device or name adopted it in honour of some family claiming one of the devices mentioned above.

Bolt Upright. Straight as an arrow. A bolt is an arrow with a round knob at the end, used for shooting at rocks, etc.

Bolted. Bolted out. Either ran off suddenly, or being barred out of the house.

The horse bolted. The horse shot off like a bolt or arrow.

Bolted Arrow. A blunt arrow for shooting young rooks with a cross-bow; called "bolting rooks." A gun would not do, and an arrow would mangle the little things too much.

Bolton. The Bolton Ars. This creature is said to have chewed tobacco and taken snuff. (Dr. Doran.)

Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton. Give me some advantage. What you say must be qualified, as it is too strong. Ray says that a collection of proverbs were once presented to the Virgin Queen, with the assurance that it contained all the proverbs in the language; but the Queen rebuked the boaster with the proverb, "Bate me an ace, quoth Bolton," a proverb omitted in the compilation. John Bolton was one of the courtiers who used to play cards and dice with Henry VIII., and flattered the king by asking him to allow him an ace or some advantage in the game.

Boulus. An apothecary. Apothecaries are so called because they administer balsae. Similarly Mrs. Suds is a washerwoman; Boots is the shoeblack of an inn, etc.

George Colman adopts the name for his apothecary, who wrote his labels in rhyme, one of which was—

"When taken,
To be well shaken;"

but the patient being shaken, instead of the mixture, died.

Bomb. A shell filled with gunpowder.

(Greek, bombos; Latin, bombus, any Bomba

Bomba. King Bomba. A nickname given to Ferdinand II., King of Naples, in consequence of his cruel bombardment of Messina in 1848, in which the slaughter and destruction of property was most wanton.

Bomba II. was the nickname given to his son Francis II. for bombarding Palermo in 1860. He was also called Bombayno (Little Bomba).

Another meaning equally applicable is Vox et praeter ea nihil, Bomba being the explosion made by puffing out the cheeks, and causing them suddenly to collapse. Liar, break-promise, worthless.

Bombast literally means the produce of the bombyx (Middle Latin bombax, Greek bombix), and applied to cotton-wool used for padding. The head of the cotton plant was called "bombast" or "bombase" in the sixteenth century. Bombast was much used in the reign of Henry VIII. for padding, and hence inflated language was so called.

"We have received your letters full of love, . . . And in our matters council rated them . . . As bombast and as laining to the tune." Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Bombastes Furioso. One who talks big and uses long sesquipedalian words; the ideal of bombast. He is the hero of a burlesque opera so called, by William Barnes Rhodes. (1790.)

Bombastus. The family name of Aureolus Paracelsus (1493-1541). He is said to have kept a small devil prisoner in the pommel of his sword.

"Bombastus kept a devil's bird
Shut in the pommel of his sword
That taught him all the cunning pranks
Of past and future mountebanks.

S. Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Bon Gaultier Ballads. Parodies of modern poetry by W. E. Aytoun and Theodore Martin (Sir).

Bon gré mal gré. Willing or unwilling, willy nilly, velens velens.

Bon Mot (French). A good or witty saying; a pun; a clever repartee.

Bon Ton (French). Good manners, or manners accredited by good society.

Bon Vivant (French). A free liver; one who indulges in the "good things of the table."

Bona Fide. Without subterfuge or deception; really and truly. Literally, in good faith (Latin).

Bone

Bona-ro'ba. A courtesan (Italian); so called from the smartness of their robes or dresses.

"We knew where the bona-roba were."
Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., iii. 2.

Bonduca. Bona dea. (Fletcher's Tragedy, 1647.)

Bone in my Throat. I have a bone in my throat. I cannot talk; I cannot answer your question.

"I have a bone in my leg. An excuse given to children for not moving from one's seat. Similarly, "I have a bone in my arm," and must be excused using it for the present.

Bone of Contention. A disputed point; a point not yet settled. The metaphor is taken from the proverb about "Two dogs fighting for a bone," etc.

Bones. Duca'li'on, after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother, i.e. the stones of mother earth. Those thrown by Duca'li'on became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women.

Pinular suggests that lava, a stone, is a pun on lava, the people. Both words, in the genitive case singular, are alike lava.

Bone to pick. (4.) A sop to Cerberus. A lucrative appointment given to a troublesome opponent in order to silence him. Thus Chisholm Anstey was sent to Hong-Kong as a judge to keep him away from the House of Commons. Of course the allusion is to throwing a bone to a dog barking at you.

"In those days the usual plan to get rid of an oratorical patriot in the House was to give him a bone to pick."—Anthony Collins.

I have a bone to pick with you. An unpleasant matter to settle with you. At the marriage banquet of the Sicilian poor, the bride's father, after the meal, used to hand the bridegroom a bone, saying, "Pick this bone, for you have taken in hand a much harder task."

Bone. (See Albada'na; Luz; Os Sacrum.)

Bone (76). To filch, as, I boned it. Shakespeare (2 Henry IV., act i. 3) says, "By these ten bones, my lord . . ." meaning his ten fingers; and (Hamlet, iii. 2) calls the fingers "pickers and stealers." Putting the two together, there can be no doubt that "to bone"
Bone-grubber means to finger, that is, "to pick and steal."

"You thought that I was buried deep,
Quite deceitful and sly,
But from her grave in Mary-bone,
They've come and boned your Mary!"

Hood: Mary's Ghost.

Bone-grubber (A). A person who grubs about dust-bins, gutters, etc., for refuse bones, which he sells to bone-grinders, and other dealers in such stores.

Bone-lace. Lace woven on bobbins made of trotter-bones.

Bone-shaker (A). A four-wheel cab; also an old bicycle.

"A good swift hansom is worth twice as much as a 'bone-shaker' any day."—Nineteenth Century, March, 1880, p. 475.

Boned. I boned him. Caught or seized him. (See above, To Bone.)

Bones. The man who rattles or plays the bones in mugger troupe.

To make no bones about the matter, i.e. no difficulty, no scruple. Dice are called bones, and the French, flatterie le do (to mince the matter), is the opposite of our expression. To make no bones of a thing is not to flatter, or "make much of," or humour the dice in order to show favour.

Napier's bones. (See under Napier.)

Without more bones. Without further scruple or objection. (See above, "Make no bones, etc.")

Bonesee (2 syl.). The inhabitants of Bo'ni, one of the Celebès.

Bonfire. Ignis ovation. The Athenaeum shows that the word means a fire made of bones; one quotation runs thus, "In the worship of St. John, the people... made three manner of fires: one was of clean bones and no wood, and that is called a bonfire; another of clean wood and no bones, and that is called a woodfire... and the third is made of wood and bones, and is called "St. John's fire."" (Quintus Serviaeus, 1499). Certainly bone (Scotch, bone) is the more common form of spelling. The first syllable of the word is pronunced as a short "bonfire" is really "boon-fire."

"In some parts of Lincolnshire... they make fires in the public streets... with bones of oxen, sheep... in heaps together. These came the origin of bonfires."—Leisure, etc.

Whatever the origin of the word, it has long been used to signify either a beacon fire, or a boon fire, i.e. a fire expressive of joy. We often find the word spelt "bone-fire," where bone may mean "bone" or beacon. Welsh bau, lofty; allied to the Norwegian baum, a beacon or cresset.

Bon'homie. Kindness, good nature; free and easy manners; cordial benevolence. (French.)

"I never knew a more prepossessing man. His bonhommie was infectious."—C. D. Warner: Little Journey, chap. 1.

Bonhomme (U). A good man; according to Dr. Young's line, "What is mere good nature, but a fool?" The word, divided into two, is used in a good sense, as Enfin un bon homme. Jacques Bonhomme means a peasant.

Jacques Bonhomme (French). A peasant who ventures to interfere in politics. Hence, the peasants' rebellion in 1358 was called La Jacquerie. The term means "James Goodfellow"; we also often address the poor as "My good fellow."

Boniface. A sleek, good-tempered, jolly landlord, from Farquhar's comedy of The Beaux' Stratagem.

"A regular British Boniface."—The John Bull.

St. Boniface. The apostle of Germany, an Anglo-Saxon whose original name was Winfried or Winfrith. (680-750.)

St. Boniface's cup. An extra cup of wine (to the health of the Pope). Pope Boniface, we are told in the Eriugena Encyclopaedia, instituted an indignation to those who drank his good health after grace, or the health of the Pope of the time being. An excuse for an extra glass.

Bonne (French). A nursery governess.

Bonne Bouche (A). A delicious morsel; a tit-bit (tid-bit).

"Now I'll give you a real bonne-bouche. This is a battle of the famous comet port of 1811."—The Erewhon.

Bonnet. A pretended player at a gaming-table, or bidder at an auction, to allure others to play; so called because he blinds the eyes of his dupes, just as if he had struck their bonnet over their eyes.

"A man who sits at a gaming table, and appears to be playing against the table; when a stranger appears the Bonnet generally wins."—The Times.

Bonnet. Bruaid Bonnet. The old Scotch cap, made of milled woollen, without seam or lining.

Glenisarry Bonnet. The Highland bonnet, which rises to a point in front.

He has a green bonnet. Has failed in trade. In France it used to be customary, even in the seventeenth century, for bankrupts to wear a green bonnet (cloth cap).

He has a bee in his bonnet. (See Bee.)
Bonnet Lairds. Local magnates of Scotland, who wore the Braid Bonnet.

Bonnet-piece. A gold coin of James V. of Scotland, the king’s head on which wears a bonnet.

Bonnet Rouge. The red cap of Liberty worn by the leaders of the French revolution. It is the emblem of Red Republicanism.

Bonnyclabber. A drink made of beer and buttermilk. (Irish, bainne, milk; claba, thick or thickened.)

"With beer and buttermilk, mingled together, . . . To drink such . . . bonny-clapper."

Ben Jonson: The New Inn, 1, 3.

Bone Johnny. John Bull is so called in the East Indies.

Bontemps. Roger Bontemps (French). The personification of “Never say die.” The phrase is from Béranger.

"Vos premes, plens d'orsico; Vous riches, deureux; Vous, dont le monstre divine Apres un cours heureux; Vous, qui perdrez peut-être
Des lurs éternels.
Eh! gai! prenez pour maître
Le gros Roger Bontemps.” Bér. 1. 24.

Ye poor, with envy Reloaded;
Ye rich, for more who long;
Ye who by fortune loaded
Find all things wrong;
Ye who by some disaster
See all your cables break;
From henceforth for your master
Blurt Roger Bontemps take.

E. G. B.

Bonos. A bounty over and above the interest of a share in any company. (Latin, bonus quæstus, a good profit or bounty. The interest or fruit of money put out in an investment was by the Romans called the "quæstus").

Bonos Homœus. (See Homer.)

Bonzes (sing. Bonzer). Indian priests. In China they are the priests of the Pohists; their number is 50,000, and they are represented as idle and dissolute. In Japan they are men of rank and family. In Tonquing every yugoda has at least two bonzes, and some as many as fifty.

Booby. A spiritless fool, who suffers himself to be imposed upon. In England, the Solan goose is called a booby or noddy. (Spanish, bobo; German, büb.)

"A booby will never make a buck. The bird called the booby, that allows itself to be fleeced by other birds, will never become a bird of prey itself."
exactness. To speak literally, according to what is in the book.
To speak like a book. To speak with great precision and accuracy; to be full of information.
To speak without book. Without authority; from memory only, without consulting or referring to the book.
Bell, book, and candle. (See under Bell.)

Book of Books (The). The Bible.

Book of Life (The). In Bible language, is a register of the names of those who are to inherit eternal life. (Phil. iv. 3; Rev. xx. 12.)

Books.
He is in my books, or in my good books. The former is the older form; both mean to be in favour. The word book was at one time used more widely, a single sheet, or even a list being called a book. To be in my books is to be on my list of friends.

"I was so much in his books, that at his decease he left me his lamp."—Addison.
"If you want to keep in her good books, don't call her 'the old lady.'"—Dickens.

He is in my black (or bad) books. In disfavour. (See Black Books.)
On the books. On the list of a club, on the list of candidates, on the list of voters, etc. At Cambridge university they say "on the boards."
Out of my books. Not in favour; no longer in my list of friends.
The battle of the books. The Boyle controversy (q.v.). (See Battle.)
To take one's name off the books. To withdraw from a club. In the passive voice it means to be excluded, or no longer admissible to enjoy the benefits of the institution. The Cambridge university phrase is "to take my name off the boards," etc.

Book-keeper. One who borrows books, but does not return them.

Book-keeping. The system of keeping the debtor and creditor accounts of merchants in books provided for the purpose, either by single or by double entry.
Waste-book. A book in which items are not posted under heads, but are left at random, as each transaction occurred.
Day-book. A book in which are set down the debits and credits which occur day by day. These are ultimately sorted into the ledger.
Ledger (Dutch, leggen, to lay). The book which is laid up in counting-houses. In the ledger the different items are regularly sorted according to the system in use. (Ledger-entries.)
By single entry. Book-keeping in which each debit or credit is entered only once into the ledger, either as a debit or credit item, under the customer's or salesman's name.
By double entry. By which each item is entered twice into the ledger, once on the debit and once on the credit side.

Bookworm. One always poring over his books; so called in allusion to the insect that eats holes in books, and lives both in and on its leaves.

Boom. A sudden and great demand of a thing, with a corresponding rise in its price. The rush of a ship under press of sail. The word arises from the sound of booming or rushing water.
"The boom was something wonderful. Everybody bought, everybody sold."—Mark Twain: Life on the Mississippi, chap. 51.

Boom-Passenger (A). A convict on board ship, who was chained to the boom when made to take his daily exercise.

Boon Companion (A). A convivial companion. A bon vivant is one fond of good living. "Who leads a good life is sure to live well." (French, bon, good.)

Boot. I will give you that to boot, i.e. in addition. The Anglo-Saxon boot or bōt means "compensation." (Gothic, bōta, profit.)
"As anyone shall be more powerful... or higher in degree, shall he the more deeply make boot for sin, and pay for every misconduct."—Laws of King Ethelred.

Boot-jack. (See under Jack.)

Boots. Seven-leagued boots. The boots worn by the giant in the fairy tale, called The Seven-leagued Boots. These boots would stride over seven leagues at a pace.
I measure fire feet ten inches without my boots. The allusion is to the chopine or high-heeled boot, worn at one time to increase the stature. Hamlet says of the lady actress, "You are nearer heaven than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine." (ii. 2.)

Boots (an instrument of torture). They were made of four pieces of narrow board nailed together, of a competent length to fit the leg. The leg being placed therein, wedges were inserted till the sufferer confessed or fainted.
"All your empircs could never do the like cure upon the gout as the rack in England or your Scotch boots."—Marston: The Malcontent.
Boots. "The youngest bishop of the House of Lords, whose duty it is to read prayers; so called because he walks into the house in a dead man’s shoes or boots, i.e. he was not in the house till some bishop there died, and left a vacancy."

Boots. To go to bed in his boots. To be very tipy.

Boots at an Inn. A servant whose duty it is to clean the boots. The Boots of the Holly-tree Inn, a Christmas tale by Charles Dickens (1855).

Bootless Errand. An unprofitable or futile message. The Saxon bot means "reparation"—"overplus to profit"; as "I will give you that to boot"; "what boots it me?" (what does it profit me?).

"I sent him
Bootless home and weather-beaten back."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. i.

Bootes (Bo-0-teez), or the ox-driver, a constellation. According to ancient mythology, Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it "the wagoner."

"Wide o’er the spacious regions of the north,
That see Boötes over his tardy way."

Booth. Husband of Amelia. (Fielding: Amelia.)

Boozy. Partly intoxicated. (Russian, buzz, millet-beer; Latin, buza, from buo, to fill; Welsh, bozi; Old Dutch, biiijen, to tippie; Coptic, bouta, intoxicating drink.)

"In Egypt there is a beer called 'Boozer,' which is intoxicating."—Morning Chronicle, Aug. 27th, 1822.

Bor (in Norfolk) is a familiar term of address to a lad or young man; as, "Well, bor, I saw the mother you spoke of"—i.e., "Well, sir, I saw the lass..." "Bor" is the Dutch boer, a farmer; and "mor" the Dutch more, a female.

Borach’o. A drunkard. From the Spanish borach’o or borrack’o, a bottle made of pig’s skin, with the hair inside, dressed with resin and pitch to keep the wine sweet. (Mansheu.)

Borachio. A follower of Don John, in Much Ado About Nothing, who thus plays upon his own name:—

"I will, like a true drunkard [borachio], utter all to thee."—Act iii. 5.

Bor’ak or Al Borak (the lightning). The animal brought by Gabriel to carry Mahomet to the seventh heaven. It had the face of a man, but the cheeks of a horse; its eyes were like jacinths, but brilliant as the stars; it had the wings of an eagle, spoke with the voice of a man, and glittered all over with radiant light. This creature was received into Paradise. (See ANIMALS, CAMEL.)

Bord Halfpenny. A toll paid by the Saxons to the lord for the privilege of having a bord or bench at some fair for the sale of articles.

Bordarii or Bordmen. A class of agriculturists superior to the Villa’ni, who paid their rent by supplying the lord’s board with eggs and poultry. (Domesday Book.)

Border (Th). The frontier of England and Scotland, which, from the eleventh to the fifteenth century, was the field of constant forays, and a most fertile source of ill blood between North and South Britain.

"March, march, Ettrick and Teviotdale:
Why the devil dinna ye march forward in order?
March, march, Eskdale and Liddesdale—
All the blue bonnets are bound for the border."
—Sir Walter Scott: The Monastery.

Border Minstrel. Sir Walter Scott, because he sang of the border. (1771-1832.)

Border States (Th). The five "slave" states (Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, and Missouri) which lay next to the "free states" were so called in the Civil War, 1861-1865. . . .

Bordlands. Lands kept by lords in Saxon times for the supply of their own board or table. (Anglo-Saxon, bord, a table.)

Bordlode. Service paid for the land.

Bore (A). A person who bestows his tidiness on you; one who wares you with his prate, his company, or his solicitations. Verb bear, bore, borne, to endure. A bore is someone we bore with or endured.

"At this instant
He bore me with some trick."
—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., 1.1.

Bore. A tidal wave. The most celebrated bores are those of the Brahmaputra, Ganges, Hooghly, Indus, and Tsutung (in China). Bores occur regularly in the Bristol Channel and Solway Frith; occasionally (in high tides), in the Clyde, Dee (Cheshire), Dornoch Frith, Lune, Severn, Trent (syne), and Wye. The bore of the Bay of Fundy is caused by the collision of the tides. (Icelandic bora, a wave or bellow.)

Bore (in pugilistic language) is one who bears or presses on a man so as to force him to the ropes of the ring by his physical weight; figuratively, one who bears or presses on you by his pertinacity.

"All beggars are liable to rehums, with the certainty besides of being considered borses."—Prince Albert, 1st.

Boreal. Northern.

"In radiant streams, Bright over Europe, burns the Boreal man."—Thoría: Adam, 18.

Boreas. The north wind. According to mythology, he was the son of Astraus, a Titan, and Eos, the morning, and lived in a cave on Mount Haemoës, in Thracia. (Greek, boreas, voracious; Boreas, the north wind; Russian, bora, storm.)

"Omnia putes haurit saxa vorax."—Lucan.

Borghese (Bor-ga-zy). The Princess Borghese pulled down a church contiguous to her palace, because the incense turned her sick and the organ made her head uneasy.

Borgia. (See Lucrezia.)

Born. Not born yesterday. Not to be taken in; worldly wise.

Born Days. In my born days. Ever since I was born.

Born in the Purple (a translation of porphyrogentus). The infant of royal parents in opposition to born in the gutter, or child of beggars. This has nothing to do with the purple robes of royalty. It refers to the chamber lined with porphyry by one of the Byzantine empresses for her approach. (See Nineteenth Century, March, 1894, p. 510.)

"Zoe, the fourth wife of Leo VI, gave birth to the future Emperor Constantine Porphyrogenitus in the purple chamber of the imperial palace."—Pringle: History of the Byzantine and Greek Empire, vol. i.

Born with a Silver Spoon, or Born with a silver spoon in one's mouth. Born to good luck; born with hereditary wealth. The reference is to the usual gift of a silver spoon by the godfather or godmother of a child. The lucky child does not need to wait for the gift, for it is born with it in its mouth or inherits it from infancy.

Borough English is where the youngest son inherits instead of the oldest. It is of Saxon origin, and is so called to distinguish it from the Norman custom.

"The custom of Borough English abounds in Kent, Sussex, Surrey, the neighbourhood of London, and some sect. In the Midlands it is rare, and north of the Humber... it does not seem to occur."—F. Pollock: Macaulay’s Magazine, Nov. 1859.

Borrow. St. George to borrow, i.e. St. George being surety. (Danish, borg, bail; Swedish, borga, a giving of bail.)

Borr. Son of Ymer, and father of Odin, Ve, and Hertha or Earth. The Celtic priests claimed descent from this deity. (Celtic mythology.)

Borrow. To borrow is to take something which we pledge ourselves to return. (Anglo-Saxon, borg, a loan or pledge; verb borg-i-an.

"Ye may remain as I borrow your two priests."—Scott: Ivanhoe, chap. xxxiii.

Borrowed days of February. (The). 12th, 13th, and 14th of February, said to be borrowed from January. If these days prove stormy, the year will be favoured with good weather; but if fine, the year will be foul and unfavourable. These three days are called by the Scotch Faulditch, and hence the word fouldich means execrable weather.

Borrowed days of March. The last three days of March are said to be "borrowed from April."

March said to April.

I see a hogget (sheep) upon a hill;
And if you'll lend me days 2
I'll find a way to make them deep in the trees.
The first of them was wind and west,
The second of them was snow and stake,
The third of them was ice and freeze.
It froze the birds' nests to the trees.
When the days were past and gone,
The sheep's horns came birching [limping] on the ground.

Bortell. The bull, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Heinrich von Alkmam.)

Bos[ei] in lingua. He is bribed to silence; he has a coin (marked with a bull's head) on his tongue. Adalardus, in Statuts Abbatis Cordensiens (bk. i. c. 8), seems to refer to the bos as a coin.

"Bores et religium pernium habeat... unde et ipse et omnis familia eys exerpoet" (i.e. plenty of gold and silver...). Plautus, however, distinctly says (Persa. ii. 5, 16), "Bores bui hu sunt in crumina" (Two bulls in a purse.) The Greeks had the phrase, ΒΟΣΕΣ ζητεῖ θεάμα. Servius tells us that even the Romans had a coin with a bull stamped on it. (See Pliny, 18, 3.) Presuming that there was no such coin, there cannot be a doubt that the word Bos was used as the equivalent of the price of an ox.
Bosh. A Persian word meaning nonsensel. It was popularised in 1824 by James Morier in his Adventures of Hajji Baba of Ispahan, a Persian romance. (Turkish, bokh lakerdi, silly talk.)

"I always like to read old Darwin's Loves of the Plants: bosh as it is in a scientific point of view."—Kingsley: Two Years Ago (chap. x.).

Bosky. On the verge of drunkenness. University slang, from boskô, to pasture, to feed. Everyone will remember how Sir John Falstaff made sack his meat and drink.

Bosom Friend. A very dear friend. Nathan says, "It lay in his bosom, and was unto him as a daughter." (2 Sam. xii. 3.) Bosom friend, amie du cœur. St. John is represented in the New Testament as the "bosom friend" of Jesus.

Bosom Sermons. Written sermons, not extemporary ones or from notes. Does it not mean committed to memory or learnt by heart?

"The preaching from bosom sermons, or from writing, being considered a lifeless practice before the Reformation."—Blair: Reformations in England, p. 179.

Bosphorus—Oxford. The Thracian Bosphorus, or Bosporus, unites the Sea of Marmora with the Euxine (2 syl.) or Black Sea. According to Greek fable, Zeus (Jupiter) greatly loved Io, and changed her into a white cow or heifer from fear of Hera or Juno; to flee from whom she swam across the strait, which was thence called bos porov, the passage of the cow. Hera discovered the trick, and sent a gadfly to torment Io, who was made to wander, in a state of phrenzy, from land to land. The wanderings of Io were a favourite subject of story with the ancients. Ultimately, the persecuted Argive princess found rest on the banks of the Nile.

Dionysius of Halicarnassus and Valerius Flaccus give this account, but Aristotle says it was a ship, with the prow of an ox, sent by some Thracians through the straits, that gave name to this passage.

Boss, a master, is the Dutch baas, head of the household. Hence the great man, chief, a master, a swell.

"Mr. Sted calls Mr. O'Connor the 'Boss of the House'."

Bossom. One of the two chief deities of the negroes on the Gold Coast, the other being Demonic. Bossum, the principle of good, is said to be white; and Demonic, the principle of evil, black. (African mythology.)

Bosstal or Borstall. A narrow roadway up the steep ascent of hills or downs. ( Anglo-Saxon biroh, a hill; stige, a rising path; our stile.)

Botanomancy. Divination by leaves. Words were written on leaves which were exposed to the wind. The leaves left contained the response. (See BOTANY.)

Botany means a treatise on fodder (Greek, botânê, fodder, from boskrín, to feed). The science of plants would be phyton-logos (plant-treatise).

Botch. A patch. Botch and patch are the same word; the older form was bodge, whence boggle. (Italian pezzo, pronounced pazzo.)

Bother, i.e. pother (Hibernian). Halliwell gives us bother, which he says means to chatter idly.

"Th' Irish bhdhir (brushy, trouble), or its cognate verb, to deafen, seems to be the original word.

Botchian System. The Scotch system of building, like a barricade, all the outhouses of a farmstead, as the byres, stables, barns, etc. The farm servants live here. (Gaelic, bothy, a cot or hut; our both.)

"The botchian system prevails, more or less, in the eastern and north-eastern districts."—E. Long, p. 11.

Botley Assizes. The joke is to ask a Botley man, "When the assizes are coming on?" and an innuendo is supposed to be implied to the tradition that the men of Botley once hanged a man because he could not drink so deep as his neighbours.

Bottes. A propos de bottes. By the by, thus: M'sieu, Mons., à propos de bottes, comment se porte madame votre mère?

"That venerable personage [the Chaldeman Comon] not only gives valuable instructions how to regain his health, but tells him, somewhat of a princes des bottes, ... the long story of his perilous adventure."—Nineteenth Century, June, 1861, p. 117.

Bottle. Looking for a needle in a bottle of hay. Looking for a very small article amidst a mass of other things. Bottle is a diminutive of the French boute, a bundle; as botte de joi, a bundle of hay.

Hang me in a bottle. (See CAT.)

Bottle-chart. A chart of ocean surface currents to show the track of sealed bottles thrown from ships into the sea.
Bottle-holder. One who gives moral but not material support. The allusion is to boxing or prize-fighting, where each combatant has a bottle-holder to wipe off blood, refresh with water, and do other services to encourage his man to persevere and win.

"Lord Palmerston considered himself the bottle-holder of the American States. He was the steadfast partisan of constitutional liberty in every part of the world."—The Times.

Bottle-imps. The Hebrew word for familiar spirits is aboth, leather bottles, to indicate that the magicians were wont to imprison in bottles those spirits which their spells had subdued.

Bottle-washer (Head). Chief agent; the principal man employed by another; a factotum. Head waiter or butler (botteller).

Bottled Beer is said to have been discovered by Dean Nowell as a most excellent beverage. The Dean was very fond of fishing, and took a bottle of beer with him in his excursions. One day, being disturbed, he buried his bottle under the grass, and when he disinterred it some ten days afterwards, found it so greatly improved that he ever after drank bottled beer.

Bottled Moonshine. Social and benevolent schemes, such as Utopia, Coleridge’s Pantisocracy, the dreams of Owen, Fourier, St. Simon, the New Republic, and so on.

Gold! Has it! Coleridge! Where now are their ‘soul philosophy and systems’ Bottled moonshine, which does not improve by keeping?"—Birrell: Outer Dorta, p. 148 (1883).

Bottom. A ship’s bottom is that part which is used for freight or stowage. Goods imported in British bottoms are those which come in our own vessels. Goods imported in foreign bottoms are those which come in foreign ships. A full bottom is where the lower half of the hull is so disposed as to allow large stowage. A sharp bottom is when a ship is capable of speed. At bottom. Radically, fundamentally: as, the young prodigal lived a riotous life, but was good at bottom, or below the surface. At the bottom. At the base or root.

"Pride is at the bottom of all great mistakes."—Bacon: True and Beautiful, p. 439.

From the bottom of my heart. Without reservation. (Imo corde.)

"If one of the parties ... be content to forgive from the bottom of his heart all that the other has trespassed against him."—Common Prayer Book.

He was at the bottom of it. He really instigated it, or prompted it.

Never venture all in one bottom—i.e., one ship. "Do not pull all your eggs into one basket."

"My ventures are not in one bottom trusted."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

To have no bottom. To be unfathomable.

To get to the bottom of the matter. To ascertain the entire truth; to bolt a matter to its bran.

To stand on one’s own bottom. To be independent. "Every tub must stand on its own bottom."

To touch bottom. To reach the lowest depth.

A horse of good bottom means of good stamina, good foundation.

Bottom (Nick), the weaver. A man who fancies he can do everything, and do it better than anyone else. Shakespeare has drawn him as profoundly ignorant, brawny, mock heroic, and with an overflow of self-conceit. He is in one part of Midsummer Night’s Dream represented with an ass’s head, and Titania, queen of the fairies, under a spell, caresses him as an Adonis.

"The name is very appropriate, as the word bottom means a ball of thread used in weaving, etc. Thus in Clark’s Heraldry we read, "The coat of Badland is argent, three bottoms in fess gules, the thread or."

"When Goldsmith, jealous of the attention which a dancing monkey attracted, said, ‘I can do that;’ he was but playing Bottom."—W. G. What.

Bottomless. The bottomless pit. An allusion to William Pitt, who was remarkably thin.

Botty. Conceived. The frog that tried to look as big as an ox was a "botty" frog (Norfolk). A similar word is "swell," though not identical in meaning. "Bumpkin" and "bumptious" are of similar construction. (Welsh, bot, a round body, our bottle; both, the boss of a shield; boteth, a rotundity.)

Boucan. Donner un boucan. To give a dance. Boucan or Bocan was a musician and dancing master in the middle of the seventeenth century. He was alive in 1645.

"Thibault se dit entre Mercure."

Et l’orgueilleux Colin nous jure
Qu’il est aussi bien Apollon Que Bocan est bon violon."

Sieur de St. Amant (1601).

"Les musiciens qui jouent au ballet du roi sont appelés ‘disciples de Bocan.’"—Histoire Comique de France (1630).
Bouders or Boudons. A tribe of giants and evil genii, the guard of Shiva. (Indian mythology.)

Boudoir, properly speaking, is the room to which a lady retires when she is in the suleks. (French, boudoir, to pout or suck.)

The first boudoirs were those of the mistresses of Louis XV. (See Bower.)

Bones de St. Amand (Lis). The mud baths of St. Amand (that is, St. Amand-lez-Eaux, near Valenciennes, famous for its mineral waters). These mud-baths are a "sauce de limon qui se trouve près des eaux minérales." By a figure of speech, one says, by way of reproof, to an insolent, foul-mouthed fellow, "I see you have been to the mud-baths of St. Amand."

Bought and Sold, or Bought, sold, and done for. Ruined, done for, out-witted.

"Jacky of Norfolk, he not too bold. For Diccon, thy follower, is bought and sold."—Shakespeare: Richard III., act v. 3.

"It would make a man mad as a buck to be so bought and sold."—Comedy of Errors, ii. 1.

Bougule. A wax candle; so called from Bougias, in Algiers, whence the wax was imported. A medical instrument used for dilating strictures or removing obstructions.

Boule or Boule-work (not Buhl). A kind of marquetry; so called from André Charles Boule, a cabinetmaker, to whom Louis XIV. gave apartments in the Louvre. (1642-1732)

Boul'jannus. An idol worshipped at Nantes, in ancient Gaul. An inscription was found to this god in 1592. (Vellé mythology.)

Bouncer. That's a bouncer. A gross exaggeration, a braggart's lie. (Dutch, bon; verb bonzen, to bouncer or thump. A bouncer lie is a thumping lie, and a bouncer is a thumper.)—Shakespeare: King John, ii. 2.

Bounty. Queen Anne's Bounty. The produce of the first-fruits and tithes due to the Crown, made over by Queen Anne to a corporation established in the year 1704, for the purpose of augmenting church livings under £50 a year.

Boquet. French for nosegay.

"Mr. Disswell was able to make a financial statement burst into a bouquet of bowens."—McCARTHY: Our Own Times, vol. ii. chap. xxx. p. 11.

The bouquet of wine, also called its nosegay, is its aroma.

Bourbon. So named from the castle and seigniory of Bourbon, in the old province of Bourbonnais. The Bourbon family is a branch of the Capet stock, through the brother of Philippe le Bel.

Bourgeois (French), our burgess. The class between the "gentleman" and the peasantry. It includes all merchants, shopkeepers, and what we call the "middle class."

Bourgeoisie (French). The merchants, manufacturers, and master-tradesmen considered as a class. Citoyen is a freeman, a citizen of the State; bourgeois, an individual of the Bourgeoisie class. Molière has a comedy entitled Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.

"The commoners of England, the Tiers-État of France, the bourgeoisie of the Continent generally, are the descendants of this class [aristocracy] generally."—MINI: Political Economy (Prelim. p. 12).

Bouse. (See Boozy.)

Boustrapa. Napoleon III. The word is compounded of the first syllables Bou-logne, Stra-bourg, Par-is, and alludes to his escapades in 1836 and 1840.

Boustraphedon. A method of writing or printing, alternately from right to left and left to right, like the path of oxen in ploughing. (Greek, boux-strapho, ox-turning.)

Bouts-rimes [rhymed-endings]. A person writes a line and gives the last word to another person, who writes a second to rhyme with it, and so on. Dean Swift employs the term for a poem, each stanza of which terminates with the same word. He has given a poem of nine verses, each of which ends with Domitilla, to which, of course, he finds nine rhymes. (Frouch.)

Bovey Coal. A lignite found at Bovey Tracy, in Devonshire.

Bow (to rhyme with flow). (Anglo-Saxon, boga; verb, bogian, to arch.)

Draw not thy bow till your arrow is fixed. Have everything ready before you begin.

He has a famous bow up at the castle. Said of a braggart or pretender.

He has two strings to his bow. Two means of accomplishing his object; if one fails, he can try the other. The allusion is to the custom of the British bowmen carrying a reserve string in case of accident.

To draw a bow at a venture. To attack with a random remark; to make a random remark which may hit the truth.

"A certain man drew a bow at a venture and smote the king of Israel."—1 Kings xxi. 34.
To draw the long bow. To exaggerate. The long-bow was the famous English weapon till gunpowder was introduced, and it is said that a good archer could hit between the fingers of a man's hand at a considerable distance, and could propel his arrow a mile. The tales told about long-bow adventures are so wonderful that they fully justify the phrase given above.

To unsting the bow will not heal the wound (Italian). René of Anjou, king of Sicily, on the death of his wife, Isabeau of Lorraine, adopted the emblem of a bow with the string broken, and with the words given above for the motto, by which he meant, "Lamentation for the loss of his wife was but poor satisfaction."

Bow (to rhyme with now). The fore-end of a boat or ship. (Danish and Norwegian, bor or bow, a shoulder; Icelandic, bör.)

On the bow. Within a range of 45° on one side or the other of the prow.

Bow Bells. Born within sound of Bow bells. A true cockney. St. Mary-le-Bow has long had one of the most celebrated bell-peals in London. John Dun, mercer, gave in 1472 two tene-ments to maintain the ringing of Bow bell every night at nine o'clock, to direct travellers on the road to town; and in 1520 William Copland gave a bigger bell for the purpose of "sounding a retreat from work." Bow church is nearly the centre of the City. (This bow rhymes with bow.)

Bow-catcher. A corruption of "Beau Catcher," a love-curl, termed by the French an acrocceau clos. A love-curl worn by a man is a Bell-rope, i.e. a rope to pull the bellies with.

Bow-hand. The left hand; the hand which holds bow. (This bow rhymes with bow.)

To be too much of the bow-hand. To fail in a design; not be sufficiently dexterous.

Bow-street Runners. Detectives who scour the country to find criminals, before the introduction of the police force. Bow Street, near Covent Garden, London, is where the principal police-court stands. (This bow rhymes with bow.)

Bow-window in Front (A). A big corporation.

"He was a very large man... with what is termed a considerable bow-window in front."—Capt. Marryat: Poor Jack, 1.

Bow-wow Word. A word in imitation of the sound made, as hiss, cackle, murmur, cuckoo, whip-poor-will, etc. (Max Müller.)

Bowden. Not every man can be victor of Bowden. Not everyone can occupy the first place. Bowden is one of the best livings in Cheshire. (Cheshire proverb.)

Bowdlerise (To). To expurgate a book in editing it. Thomas Bowdler, in 1818, gave to the world an expurgated edition of Shakespeare's works. We have also Bowdlerism, Bowdlerisation, Bowdlerisation, &c. (See GRANGERISE.)

Bowels of Mercy. Compassion, sympathy. The affections were at one time supposed to be the outcome of certain secretions or organs, as the bile, the kidneys, the heart, the head, the liver, the bowels, the spleen, and so on. Hence such words and phrases as melan- choly (black bile); the Psalmist says that his reins, or kidneys, instructed him (Psa. x. 7), meaning his inward conviction; the head is the seat of understanding; the heart of affection and memory (hence "learning by heart"), the bowels of mercy, the spleen of passion or anger, etc.

His bowels yearned over him (upon or towards him). He felt a secret affection for him.

"Joseph made haste, for his bowels did yearn upon his brother." Gen. xiii. 30; see also 1 Kings xiii. 26.

Bower. A lady's private room. (Anglo-Saxon, bur, a chamber.) (To rhyme with flower.) (See BOUDOIR.)

"By a back stairs was she slipped to her own bower."—Bun Chirie: Thankful Blossoms, 1872.

Bower Anchor. An anchor carried at the bow of a ship. There are two of them, called the bower bow and the other the small bow. (To rhyme with flower.)

"Startboard being the best bow, and port the small bow."—Smith: Sailor's Word-book.

Bower-woman. A lady's maid and companion. The attendants were admitted to considerable freedom of speech, and were treated with familiarity and kindness. (“Bower” to rhyme with flower.)

"Thus hidden," replied Evaine, "is my bower-woman, and acquainted with my most inward thoughts. I beseech you to permit her presence at our conference."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. xi.

Bower of Bliss, in Wandering Island, the enchanted residence of Acra-sia, destroyed by Sir Guyon. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book ii.) ("Bower" to rhyme with flower.)
Bowie Knife. A long, stout knife, carried by hunters in the Western States of America. So called from Colonel James Bowie, one of the most daring characters of the States. Born in Logan, co. Kentucky. A bowie knife has a horn handle, and the curved blade is 15 in. long, and 1½ wide at the hilt. ("Bowie" to rhyme with showy.)

Bowling. We uncover the head when we wish to salute anyone with respect; but the Jews, Turks, Siamese, etc., uncover their feet. The reason is this: With us the chief act of investiture is crowning or placing a cap on the head; but in the East it is putting on the slippers. To take off our symbol of honour is to confess we are but "the humble servant" of the person whom we thus salute. ("Bowling" to rhyme with ploughing or plowing.)

Bowed. He was bowed out. A term in cricket. (Pronounce bold.)

Bowling. Tom Bowling. The type of a model sailor in Smollett's Roderick Random. (To rhyme with rolling.)

7. The Tom Bowling referred to in Dibdin's famous sea-song was Capt. Thomas Dibdin, brother of Charles Dibdin, who wrote the song, and father of Dr. Dibdin, the bibliomaniac.

"Here a she'er hulk has popp Tom Bowling,
The darling of the crew." — Dibdin.

Bowls. They who play bowls must expect to meet with rubbers. Those who touch pitch must expect to defile their fingers. Those who enter upon affairs of chance, adventure, or dangerous hazard must make up their minds to encounter crosses, losses, or difficulties. Those who play with edged instruments must expect to get cut. Soldiers in battle must look out for wounds, gamblers for losses, libertines for diseases.

"Bowls" to rhyme with rolls.

Bowse. (See Browse.)

Bower God. The same as the "archer god," meaning Cupid. ("Bower" to rhyme with corner.)

Box. I've got into the wrong box. I am out of my element. Lord Lyttelton used to say he ought to have been brought up to some business: that whenever he went to Vauxhall and heard the mirth of his neighbours, he used to fancy pleasure was in every box but his own. Wherever he went for happiness, he somehow always got into the wrong box. (See Christmas Box.)

Box and Cox. The two chief characters in John M. Morton's farce, usually called Box and Cox.

Box the Compass. Repeat in order the 32 points. (Spanish, boxar; to sail round.)

Box Days. Two days in spring and autumn, and one at Christmas, during vacation, in which pleadings may be filed. This custom was established in 1690, for the purpose of expediting business. Each judge has a private box with a slit, into which informations may be placed on box days, and the judge, who alone has the key, examines the papers in private.

Box Harry (7b), among commercial travellers, is to shirk the table d'hôte and take something substantial for tea, in order to save expense. Halliwell says, "to take care after having been extravagant." To box a tree is to cut the bark to procure the sap, and these travellers drain the landlord by having a cheap tea instead of an expensive dinner. To "box the fox" is to rob an orchard.

Boxing-Day. (See Christmas Box.)

Boy in sailor language has no reference to age, but only to experience in seamanship. A boy may be fifty or any other age. A crew is divided into able seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys or greenhorns. A "boy" is not required to know anything about the practical working of the vessel, but an "able seaman" must know all his duties and be able to perform them.

"A boy does not ship to know anything."

Boy Bachelor. William Warren, D.D., was admitted at St. Catherine's Hall before he was ten, and took his B.A. when he was twelve and a half. (1666-1726.)

Boy Bishop. St. Nicholas. From his cradle he is said to have manifested marvellous indications of piety, and was therefore selected for the patron saint of boys. (Fourth century.)

Boy Bishop. The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir, etc., on St. Nicholas Day (December 6th), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honour for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died during the time of his prelacy, he was buried in pontificals. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the Temple among the doctors while He was a boy. The Boycott was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII.

Boycott (To). To boycott a person is to refuse to deal with him, to take any notice of him, or even to sell to him. The term arose in 1881, when Captain Boycott, an Irish landlord, was thus ostracised by the Irish agrarian insurgents. The custom of ostracising is of very old standing. St. Paul exhorts Christians to "boycott" idolaters (2 Cor. vi. 17); and the Jews "boycotted" the Samaritans. The French phrases, Demeure une boutique and Demeure une ville, convey the same idea; and the Catholic Church anathematizes and interdicts freely.

"One word as to the way in which a man should be boycotted. When any man has taken a farm from which a tenant has been evicted, or is a grabber, let everyone in the parish turn his back on him; have no communication with him; have no dealings with him. You need never say an unkind word to him, but never say anything at all to him. If you must meet him in fair, walk away from him silently. Do him no violence, but have no dealings with him. Let every man's door be closed against him; and make him feel himself a stranger and a cuspidor in his own neighbourhood." — J. Dillon, M.P. (Speech to the Land League, Feb. 26, 1880.)

Boyle Controversy. A book-battle between the Hon. Charles Boyle, third Earl of Orrery, and the famous Bentley, respecting the Epistles of Phalaris. Charles Boyle edited the Epistles of Phalaris in 1695. Two years later Bentley published his celebrated Dissertation, to prove that the epistles were not written till the second century after Christ instead of six centuries before that epoch. In 1699 he published another rejoinder, and utterly annihilated the Boyleists.

Boyle's Law. "The volume of a gas is inversely as the pressure." If we double the pressure on a gas, its volume is reduced to one-half; if we quadruple the pressure, it will be reduced to one-fourth; and so on; so called from the Hon. Robert Boyle. (1627-1691.)

Boyle Lectures. Eight sermons a year in defence of Christianity, founded by the Hon. Robert Boyle.

Boz. Charles Dickens (1812-1870).

"For, my signature in the Morning Chronicle," he tells us, "was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Boz; in honour of the View of Wakefield, which, being pronounced Boze, got shortened into Boz."

"Who the dickens 'Boz' could be Puzzled man; a learned elf; I'm not time revealed the mystery, For 'Boz' appeared as Dickens' self." — Epigrams in the Carthusian.

Bozzy. James Boswell, the biographer of Dr. Johnson (1740-1795).

Brag. A game at cards; so called because the players brag of their cards to induce the company to make bets. The principal sport of the game is occasioned by any player bragging that he holds a better hand than the rest of the party, which is declared by saying "I brag," and staking a sum of money on the issue. (Boyle.)

Brag is a good dog, but Holdfast is a better. Talking is all very well, but doing is far better.

Jack Brag. A vulgar, pretentious braggart, who gets into aristocratic society, where his vulgarity stands out in strong relief. The character is in Theodore Hook's novel of the same name.

"He was a sort of literary Jack Brag." — T. D. Burton.
Braggadocio. A bragget. One who is very valiant with his tongue, but a great coward at heart. A barking dog that bites not. The character is from Spenser’s Faerie Queene, and a type of the "Intemperance of the Tongue." After a time, like the jackdaw in borrowed plumes, Braggadocio is stripped of all his "glories"; his shield is claimed by Sir Marinel; his lady is proved by the golden girdle to be the false Florimel; his horse is claimed by Sir Guyon; Talus shaves off his beard and scourges his squire; and the pretender sneaks off amidst the jeers of everyone. It is thought that the poet had Felipe of Spain in his eye when he drew this character. (Faerie Queene, iii. 8, 30; v. 3.)

Bragi. Son of Odin and Frigg. According to Scandinavian mythology, he was the inventor of poetry; but, unlike Apollo, he is always represented as an old man with a long white beard. His wife was Iduna.

Bragi’s Apple. An instant cure of weariness, decay of power, ill temper, and failing health. These apples were inexhaustible, for immediately one was eaten its place was supplied by another.

Bragi’s Story. Always enchanting, but never coming to an end.

"But I have made my story long enough; if I say more, you may fancy that it is Bragi who has come among you, and that he has entered on his endless story."—Keightley: Heroes of Asgard, p. 274.

Bragsmardo. When Gargantua took the bells of Notre Dame de Paris to hang about the neck of his horse, the citizens sent Bragsmardo to him with a remonstrance. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel).

Brahma (Indian). The self-existing and invisible Creator of the universe; represented with four heads looking to the four corners of the world. The divine triad is Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva.

Brahma. One of the three beings created by God to assist in the creation of the world. The Brahmns claim him as the founder of their religious system.

"What’er in India holds the sacred name Of poet, or lore, the Brahmns claim; In endless prattle, vain and painful, last. Brahma, their founder, as a poet they boast."—Cowper: Lauda, book vii.

Brahmi. One of the three goddessdaughters of Vishnu, representing "creative energy."

Brahmin. A worshipper of Brahma, the highest caste in the system of Hinduism, and of the priestly order.

Bramble (Matthew). A testy, gouty, benevolent, country squire, in Smollett’s novel of Humphrey Clinker. Colman has introduced the same character as Sir Robert Bramble in his Poor Gentleman. Sheridan’s "Sir Anthony Absolute" is of the same type.

"Ain’t I a baronet? Sir Robert Bramble at Blackberry Hall, is the county of Kent: The time you should know it, for you have been my client, two-handed valet-de-chambre these thirty years."—The Poor Gentleman, iii. 1.

Bran. If not Bran, it is Bran’s brother. If not the real “Simon Pure,” it is just as good. A complimentary expression. Bran was Fingal’s dog, a mighty favourite.

Brand. The Ciequot brand, etc., the best brand, etc. That is the merchant’s or excuse mark branded on the article itself, the vessel which contains the article, the wrapper which covers it, the cork of the bottle, etc., to guarantee its being genuine, etc. Madame Ciequot, of champagne notoriety, died in 1806. He has the brand of villain in his looks. It was once customary to brand the cheeks of felons with an F. The custom was abolished by law in 1822.

Brandenburg. Confession of Brandenburg. A formulary or confession of faith drawn up in the city of Brandenburg, by order of the elector, with the view of reconciling the tenets of Luther with those of Calvin, and to put an end to the disputes occasioned by the concession of Augsburg.

Brandomart, in Orlando Furioso, is Orlando’s brother-in-law.

Brandon. The juggler, lived in the reign of Henry VIII.

Brandons. Lighted torches. Dominga de brandsonis (St. Valentine’s Day), when boys used to carry about brandons (Cupid’s torches).

Brandy is Latin for Goose. Here is a pun between anser, a goose, and answer, to reply. What is the Latin for Brandy Nan. Queen Anne, who was very fond of brandy (1664, 1702-1714). On the statue of Queen Anne in St. Paul’s Churchyard a wit wrote—“Brandy Nan, Brandy Nan, left in the lurch,

Her face to the gin-shop, her back to the church.”

A “gin palace” used to stand at the south corner of St. Paul’s Churchyard.

Brighthorne (The). Vulgar, malicious, jealous women. The characters are taken from Miss Burnet’s novel called Evelina. One of the brothers is a Cockney snob.

Brank. A gag for scolds. (Dutch, prang, a fetter; German, pranger, Gaelic, brawees, a kind of pillory.)

Brasensce (Oxford). Over the gate is a brass nose, the arms of the college; but the word is a corruption of brasen-knisk, a brasserie or brewhouse. (Latin, brazenum.)

Brass. Impudence. A lawyer said to a troublesome witness, “Why, man, you have brass enough in your head to make a teakettle.” “And you, sir,” replied the witness, “have water enough in yours to fill it.”

Nimsow Brass. A knavish attorney; servile, affecting sympathy, but making his clients his lawful prey. (Dickens: Old Curiosity Shop.)

Brat. A child; so called from the Welsh, brat, a child’s pin-safore; and brat is a contraction of brattach, a cloth, also a standard.

“Every man must repair to the brattach of his tribe.”—Scott.

O Israel! O household of the Lord!
O Abram’s brat! O head of blessed seed!”

Gosoung: De Prognosis.

Brave. The Brave. Alfonso IV. of Portugal (1290, 1324-1357).

John Andr. van der Marsch, patriot, The brave Fleming (1734-1792).

Bravery. Finery is the French braverie. The French for courage is bravoure.

“What woman in the city do I name
When I say the city woman bears
The cost of puppetry unworthy should we?
Who can come in and say that I mean her?

The what is that is of the same function
That says his bravery is not of my cost.”

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Bravest of the Brave. Marshal Ney. So called by the troops of Friedland (1807), on account of his fearless bravery. Napoleon said of him, “That man is a lion.” (1769-1815.)

Brave. The test of the brown’s head. A little boy one day came to the court of King Arthur, and, drawing his wand over a boar’s head, declared, “There’s never a cuckold’s knife can carve this head of brown.” No knight in the court except Sir Cradock was able to accomplish the feat. (Percy’s Reliques.)

Bray. (See Vicar.)

Braven Age. The age of war and violence. It followed the silver age.

“To this next came in course the brazen age;
A warlike offspring, prompt to bloody race.
Not impious yet. Hard steel succeeded then,
And stubborn as the metal were the men.”

Dryden: Metamorphoses, i.

Brassen-faced. Bold (in a bad sense), without shame.

“What a brazen-faced varlet art thou;”
Shakespeare: King Lear, ii. 2.

Brassen Head. The following are noted:—One by Albertus Magnus, which cost him thirty years’ labour, and was broken into a thousand pieces by Thomas Aquinas, his disciple. One by Friar Bacon.

“Bacon trembled for his brazen head.”
Pope: Dunciad, iii. 194.

“Out he, My head’s not made of brass,
As Friar Bacon’s Jupiter was.”
S. Butler: Hudibras, ii. 2.

The brazen head of the Marquis de Villeuén, of Spain. Another by a Poleander, a disciple of Escotillo, an Italian.

“Y It was said if Bacon heard his head speak he would succeed; if not, he would fail. Miles was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the Head spoke thrice: “Time is”; half an hour later it said, “Time was.” In another half-hour it said, “Time’s past,” fell down, and was broken to atoms. Byron refers to this legend.

“Like Friar Bacon’s brazen head, I’ve spoken,
‘Time is,’ ‘Tim es was,’ ‘Time’s past.’”

Job, i. 217.

Braven Head. A gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Ferragus, of Portugal. It was omniscient, and told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, past, present, or to come. (Valentine and Orson.)

Braven out (7th). To stick to an assertion knowing it to be wrong; to outface in a shameless manner; to disregard public opinion.

Breaches, meaning creeks or small bays, is to be found in Judges v. 17: Deborah, complaining of the tribes who refused to assist her in her war with Sisera, says Reuben continued in his sheepfolds, Gilgal remained beyond

"They continued . . . in breaking of bread, and in prayers."—Acts ii. 42; and again verse 46.

Bread. He took bread and salt, i.e. he took his oath. Bread and salt were formerly eaten when an oath was taken.

Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days (Eccles. xi. 1). When the Nile overflows its banks the weeds perish and the soil is disintegrated. The rice-seed being cast into the water takes root, and is found in due time growing in healthful vigour. Don't quarrel with your bread and butter. Don't foolishly give up the pursuit by which you earn your living.

To know which side one's bread is buttered. To be mindful of one's own interest.

To take the bread out of one's mouth. To forestall another; to say something which another was on the point of saying; to take away another's livelihood. (See under BUTTER.)

Bread-basket (One's). The stomach.

Bread and Cheese. The barest necessities of life.

Break (To). To become a bankrupt. (See BANKRUPT.)

To break a bond. To dishonour it.

To break a journey. To stop before the journey is accomplished.

To break a matter to a person. To be the first to impart it, and to do so cautiously and by piecemeal.

To break bread. To partake of the Lord's Supper.

"Upon the first day of the week, when the disciples came together to break bread, Paul preached to them."—Acts xx. 7.

To break one's fast. To take food after long abstinence; to eat one's breakfast after the night's fast.

To break one's neck. To dislocate the bones of one's neck.

To break on the wheel. To torture one on a "wheel" by breaking the long bones with an iron bar. (cf. COUR N de GRACE.)

To break a butterfly on a wheel. To employ superabundant effort in the accomplishment of a small matter.

"Nature or sense, alas! canスポーツ feel. Who breaks a butterfly upon a wheel"

Pope: Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot, 307-s.

To break out of bounds. To go beyond the prescribed limits.

Break Cover (To). To start forth from a hiding-place.

Break Down (To). To lose all control of one's feelings.

Break Faith (To). To violate one's word or pledge.

Break Ground (To). To commence a new project. As a settler does.

Break In (To). To interpose a remark. To train a horse to the saddle or to harness.

"At break of day I will come to thee again." Wordsworth: Pet Lamb, stanza 15.

Break the Ice (To). To prepare the way; to cause the stiffness and reserve of intercourse with a stranger to relax; to impart to another bit by bit distressing news or a delicate subject.

Break your Back (To). Make you bankrupt. The metaphor is from carrying burdens on the back.

Break up Housekeeping (To). To discontinue keeping a separate house.

Break with One (To). To cease from intercourse.

"What came last I given him to break with me?"—Florence Maryaat.

Breakers Ahead. Hidden danger at hand. Breakers in the open sea always announce sunken rocks, sandbanks, etc.

Breaking a Stick. Part of the marriage ceremony of the American Indians, as breaking a wine-glass is part of the marriage ceremony of the Jews. (Lady Augusta Hamilton: Marriage Rules, etc., 292, 298.

In one of Raphael's pictures we see an unsuccessful suitor of the Virgin Mary breaking his stick. This alludes to the legend that the several suitors were each to bring an almond stick, which was to be laid up in the sanctuary over-night, and the owner of the stick which budded was to be accounted the suitor which God approved of. It was thus that Joseph became the husband of Mary. (Pseudo-Matthew's Gospel, 40, 41.)

In Florence is a picture in which the rejected suitors break their sticks on Joseph's back.

Breast. To make a clean breast of it. To make a full confession; concealing nothing.

Breath. All in a breath. Without taking breath. (Latin, continentur spiritus.)
Breathe. To breathe one's last. To die.

Breche de Roland. A deep defile in the crest of the Pyrenees, some three hundred feet in width, between two precipitous rocks. The legend is that Roland, the paladin, cleft the rock in two with his sword Durandal, when he was set upon by the Gascons at Roncesvalles.

Breches. To wear the breches. Said of a woman who usurps the prerogative of her husband. Similar to The grey mare is the better horse. (See GREY.)

The phrase is common to the French, Dutch, Germans, etc., as Elle porte les breches. Die erwöhn die hoseen anhaben. Sie hat die Häsen.

Breches Bible. (See BIBLE.)

Breese. House-sweepings, as fluff, dust, ashes, and so on, thrown as refuse into the dust-bin. We generally limit the meaning now to small ashes and cinders used for coals in burning bricks. The word is a corruption of the French, débris (rubbish, or rather the part broken or rubbed off by wear, tear, and stress of weather). The French, breise, older form brees, means small coke or charcoal.

The Breese-fly. The gad-fly; so called from its sting. (Anglo-Saxon, bryor; Gothic, bry, a sting.)

Breese. A gentle wind or gale. (French, brise, a breeze.) Figuratively, a slight quarrel.

Brestableik [wide-shining]. The palace of Baldur, which stood in the Milky Way. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Brenna. A Latin form of the Kymric word Brenhin (a war-chief). In times of danger the Druids appointed a bren to lead the confederate tribes to battle.

Breent. Without a wrinkle. Burns says of John Anderson, in his prime of life, his "locks were like the raven," and his "bonnie brow was breent" (without a wrinkle).

Breent-goose (A). Properly a brent-goose, the branta berniolo, a brownish-grey goose of the genus branta.

"For the people of the village saw the duck of brent with wonder." Longfellow: Hiawatha, part xvi.

Brent-hill means the eyebrows. Looking or gazing from under brent-hill. In Devonshire means "frowning at one;" and in West Cornwall to brent means to wrinkle the brow. It is very remarkable that the word should have such opposite meanings.

Brentford. Like the two kings of Brentford swelling at one nosegay. Said of persons who were once rivals, but have become reconciled. The allusion is to an old farce called The Rehearsal, by the Duke of Buckingham. "The two kings of Brentford enter hand in hand," and the actors, to heighten the absurdity, used to make them enter "smelling at one nosegay" (act ii. s. 2).

Bressommer, or Brent-summer. (French, sommer, a lintel or bressumer.) A beam supporting the whole weight of the building above it; as, the beam over a shop-front, the beam extending over an opening through a wall when a communication between two contiguous rooms is required. Sometimes these beams support a large superstructure. (The word bres, breit, or breast, in carpentry, means a rafter, and the German breit = a plank.)

Bretwalds (ruler of Brittain). The chief of the kings of the heptarchy who exercised a certain undefined power over the other rulers; something like that of Hugues Capet over his peers.

"The office of Bretwalds, a kind of elective chief-thumain of all Brittain, was held by several Northumbrian kings, in succession."—Earl: English Tongue, p. 20.

Brevet Rank is rank one degree higher than your pay. Thus, a brevet-major has the title of major, but the Breviary

Braies or Ægeon. A giant with fifty heads and a hundred hands. Homer says the gods called him Braies, but men called him Ægeon. (IIiad, i. 403.)

"Not he who brandished in his hundred hands
His fifty swords and fifty shields in fight, Could have surpassed the fierce Argantes' might."

faso: Jerusalem Breviary, book vi.

The Braies of languages. Cardinal Messofanti, who knew fifty-eight different tongues. Byron called him "a walking polyglot; a monster of languages; a Braies of parts of speech."

(1774 -1849.) Generally pronounced Bri-a-suce.

Bold Braies. Handel (1685-1759).

Brier-root Pipes. A pipe made from the root-wood of the large heath (brygere, which grows in the south of France.

Briocci. Inhabitants of part of Berkshire and the adjacent counties referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Brique. Odd and ends of curiosities. In French, a marchand de braie-a-briac is a seller of rubbish, as old nails, old screws, old hinges, and other odds and ends of small value; but we employ the phrase for odds and ends of vertu. (Brieuler in archaic French means faire toute espoire de mettre, to be Jack of all trades. Braic is the richeot of becue, as fiddle-faddle and scores of other double words in English.)

"A man with a passion for brique-brac is always stumbling over antique brooms, truncheons, and other remains of the time of Brennus or Celini."

-Aldrich. Miss Mole's FBow, chap. ii.

Brick. A regular brick. A jolly good fellow. (Compare περιπατός αὐτή: "square"; and "four-square to all the winds that blow."

"A fellow like nobody else, and, in fine, a brick." -George Bick: Daniel De Anda, book ii, chap. 16.

Brick-and-mortar Franchise. A Chartist phrase for the £10 household system, now abolished.

Brick-dusts. The 53rd Foot; so called from the brick-dust-red colour of their facings. Also called Fire-and-threepennies, a play on the number and daily pay of the ensigns.

Now called the 1st battalion of the "King's Shropshire Light Infantry." The 2nd battalion is the old 53th.

Brick-tea. The inferior leaves of the tea-plant mixed with sheep's blood and... pressed into cubes; the ordinary drink of the common people south of Moscow.

"The Tartars swell a horrible gruel, thick and slob, of brick-tea, sour, salt, pepper, and sugar, boiled in a chaidron [pot]."—The Daily Telegraph, Friday, October 18th, 1891.

Bride. The bridal wreath is a relic of the corona nuptialis used by the Greeks and Romans to indicate triumph.

Bride Cake. A relic of the Roman Confrarastio, a mode of marriage practiced by the highest class in Rome. It was performed before ten witnesses by the Pontifex Maximus, and the contracting parties mutually partook of a cake made of salt, water, and flour (far). Only those born in such wedlock were eligible for the high sacred offices.

Bride or Wedding Favours represent the true lover's knot, and symbolise union.

Bride of Aby'dos. Zuleika, daughter of Guflir, Pacha of Aby'dos. As she was never wed, she should be called the affianced or betrothed. (Byron.)

Bride of Lammermoor. Lucy Ashton. (Scott: Bride of Lammermoor.)

Bride of the Sea. Venice; so called from the ancient ceremony of the Doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic, saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination."

Bridgroom is the old Dutch gom (a young man). Thus, Groom of the Stole is the young man over the wardrobes. Groom, an ostler, is quite another word, being the Persian gurna (a keeper of horses), unless, indeed, it is a contracted form of stabro-groom (stable-boy). The Anglo-Saxon Brytt-guma (guma = man) confused with groom, a lad.

Bridgroom's Man. In the Roman marriage by confrarastio, the bride was led to the Pontifex Maximus by bachelors, but was conducted home by married men. Polydore Virgil says that a married man preceded the bride on her return, bearing a vessel of gold and silver. (Sc: Bride Cake.)

Bridewell. The city Bridewell, Bridge Street, Blackfriars, was built over a holy well of medical water, called St. Bride's Well, where was founded a hospital for the poor. After the Reformation, Edward VI. chartered this hospital to the city. Christ Church was given to the education of the young; St. Thomas's Hospital to the cure of the sick; and Bridewell was made a penitentiary for unruly apprentices and vagrants.

Bridge of Gold. According to a German tradition, Charlemagne's spirit crosses the Rhine on a golden bridge at Bingen, in seasons of plenty, to bless the vineyards and cornfields.

"Thou steedst, like imperial Charlemagne, Upon thy bridge of gold."—Longfellow: Autumn.

Made a bridge of gold for him; i.e. enabling a man to retire from a false position without loss of dignity.

Bridge of Jehennam. (See SERAT.)

Bridge of Sighs, which connects the palace of the Doge with the state prisons of Venice. Over this bridge the state prisoners were conveyed from the judgment-hall to the place of execution.

"I stood in Venice, on the Bridge of Sighs, A palace and a prison on each hand."—Byron: Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, iv. 1.

Waterloo Bridge, in London, used some years ago, when suicides were frequent there, to be called The Bridge of Sighs.

Bridgewater Treaties. Instituted by the Rev. Francis Henry Egerton, Earl of Bridgewater, in 1825. He left the interest of £8,000 to be given to the author of the best treatise on "The power, wisdom, and goodness of God, as manifested in creation." Eight are published by the following gentlemen:—

(1) The Rev. Dr. Chalmers, (2) Dr. John Kidd, (3) the Rev. Dr. Whewell, (4) Sir Charles Bell, (5) Dr. Peter M. Roget, (6) the Rev. Dr. Buckland, (7) the Rev. W. Kirby, and (8) Dr. William Prout.

Bridie. To bite on the bridle is to suffer great hardships. The bridie was an instrument for punishing a stock; to bite on the bridle is to suffer this punishment.

Bridie Road or Way. A way for a riding-horse, but not for a horse and cart.

Bridle up (To). In French, se renouer; to draw in the chin and toss the head back in scorn or pride. The metaphor is to a horse pulled up suddenly and sharply.

Bridiegooze (Judge), or Bridoie, who decided the cases brought to him by the throw of dice. (Rabelais: Gargantua and Pantagruel, iii. 39.)

Bridport. Stabbed with a Bridport dygger, i.e. hanged. Bridport, in Dorsetshire, was once famous for its hempen goods, and monopolized the manufacture of ropes, cables, and tackled for the British navy. The hangman's rope being made at Bridport gave birth to the proverb. (Fuller: Worthies.)
Brigadore (3 syl.). (See Horse.)

Brigand properly means a seditious fellow. The Brigands were light-armed, irregular troops, like the Bashi-Bazouks, and like them were addicted to marauding. The Free Companies of France were Brigands. (Italian, brigante, seditious; briga, variance.)

Brigandine. The armour of a brigand, consisting of small plates of iron on quilted linen, and covered with leather, hemp, or something of the kind.

Brigantine (3 syl.) or Hermaphrodite Brig. A two-masted vessel with a brig’s forecast and a schooner’s mainmast. (Dana’s Seaman’s Manual.) A pirate vessel.

Bright’s Disease. A degeneration of the tissues of the kidneys into fat, first investigated by Dr. Bright. The patient under this disease has a flabby, bloodless appearance, is always drowsy, and easily fatigued.

Brigians. The Castilians; so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix or Brigus, said by monkish fabulists to be the grandson of Noah.

“Edward and Pedro, emblems of fame, Thro’ the fierce Brunswick leaped their bloody way, Till in a cold embrace the striplings lay.”

Camoeus: Lusitania.

Brigado’ro. (See Horse.)

Brilliant Madman (The), Charles XII. of Sweden. (1682-1697-1718.)

“Macedonia’s madman or the Swede.”

Johnson: Vanity of Human Wishes.

Briney or Briny. I’m on the briny. The sea, which is salt like brine.

Bring About (To). To cause a thing to be done.

Bring Down the House (To). To cause rapturous applause in a theatre.

Bring into Play (To). To cause to act, to set in motion.

Bring Round (To). To restore to consciousness or health; to cause one to recover [from a fit, etc.].

Bring To (To). To restore to consciousness; to resuscitate. Many other meanings.

“I’ll bring her to, said the driver, with a brutal grin; ’I’ll give her something better than calmness.” — Mrs. Stoner: Circle Tom’s Cuban Bring to Boar (To). To cause to happen successfully.

Bring to Book (To). To cause to happen in a mistake.

Bring to Pass (To). To cause to happen.

Brisk

Bring to the Hammer (To). To offer or sell by public auction.

Bring Under (To). To bring into subjection.

Bring Up (To). To rear from birth or an early age. Also numerous other meanings.

 Briooche (2 syl.). A sort of bun or cake common in France, and now pretty generally sold in England. When Marie Antoinette was talking about the bread riots of Paris during the 5th and 6th October, 1789, the Duchesse de Polignac naively exclaimed, “How is it that these silly people are so clamorous for bread, when they can buy such nice brioches for a few sous?” This was in spirit not unlike the remark of our own Princess Charlotte, who avowed “that she would for her part rather eat beef than stare.” and wondered that the people should be so obstinate as to insist upon having bread when it was so scarce.

Bris. Il conte di San Bris, governor of the Louvre, was father of Valentinus, and leader of the St. Bartholomew massacre. (Meyerbeer’s Opera: Gli Ugolotti.)

Brises (3 syl.). The patronymic name of Hippodamus, daughter of Briseus (2 syl.). A concubine of Achilles, to whom he was greatly attached. When Agamemnon was compelled to give up his own concubine, who was the daughter of a priest of Apollo, he took Brises away from Achilles. This so annoyed the hero that he refused any longer to go to battle, and the Greeks lost ground daily. Ultimately, Achilles sent his friend Patroclus to supply his place. Patroclus was slain, and Achilles, towering with rage, rushed to battle, slew Hector, and Troy fell.

Brisingamen. Freyja’s necklace made by the fairies. Freyja left her husband Odin in order to obtain this necklace; and Odin deserted her because her love was changed into vanity. It is not possible to love Brisingamen and Odin too, for no one can serve two masters.

As a moral tale this is excellent. If Freyja personifies “the beauty of the year,” then the necklace means the rich autumn tints and flowers, which (soon as Freyja puts on) her husband leaves her—that is, the fertility of the genial year is gone away, and winter is at hand.

Brisk as a Bee. (See Similes.)
Brissotins. A nickname given to the advocates of reform in the French Revolution, because they were "led by the nose" by Jean Pierre Brissot. The party was subsequently called the Girondists.

Bristol Board. A stiff drawing-paper, originally manufactured at Bristol.

Bristol Boy (The). Thomas Chatterton, the poet (1752-1770).

"The marvellous boy,
The sleepless soul that perished in his pride." Wordsworth: Revolution and Independence.

Bristol Diamonds. Brilliant crystals of colourless quartz found in St. Vincent's Rock, Clifton, near Bristol.

Bristol Fashion (In). Methodical and orderly. More generally "Ship-shape and Bristol fashion."

"In the great mass meeting, October 10th, 1861, a route of above three miles was observed in one unbroken line. No cheering disturbed the steady solemnity; no one ran to give any direction; no noise of any kind was heard; but on, in one unbroken line, steady and stately, marched the throng in Bristol fashion."—Daily News, October 22nd, 1861.

Bristol Milk. Sherry sack, at one time given by the Bristol people to their friends.

"This metaphorical milk, whereby Xeres or sherry-sack is supplied."—Keller: Worthies.

Bristol Waters. Mineral waters of Clifton, near Bristol, with a temperature not exceeding 74°; formerly celebrated in cases of pulmonary consumption. They are very rarely used now.

Britain. By far the most probable derivation of this word is that given by Bochart, from the Phenician Barateau (country of the), contracted into B'ratan. The Greek Cassiterides (tin islands) is a translation of Baratanic, once applied to the tin-mining group, but now restricted to the Scilly Isles. Aristotle, who lived some 800 years before the Christian era, calls the island Britannie, which is so close to B'ratanic that the suggestion of Bochart can scarcely admit of a doubt. (De Mundo, sec. 3.)

Pliny says, "Opposite to Celtiberia is a number of islands which the Greeks called 'Cassiterides'" (evidently he means the British group). Strabo says the Cassiterides are situated about the same latitude as Britain.

Great Britain consists of "Britannia prima" (England), "Britannia secunda" (Wales), and "North Britain" (Scotland), united under one sway.

Greater Britain. The whole British empire.

Britannia. The first known representation of Britannia as a female figure sitting on a globe, leaning with one arm on a shield, and grasping a spear in the other hand, is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died A.D. 161. The figure reappeared on our copper coin in the reign of Charles II., 1665, and the model was Miss Stewart, afterwards Duchess of Richmond. The engraver was Philip Roetzer, 1665. In 1825 W. Wyon made a new design.

"The King's new medal, where, as little there is in Mrs. Stewart's face, . . . and a pretty thing it is, that he should choose her face to represent Britannia by."—Pepe's Diary (25 Feb.).

British Lion (The). The pugnacity of the British nation, as opposed to the John Bull, which symbolises the substantiality, solidity, and obstinacy of the people, with all their prejudices and national peculiarities.

To rouse the British Lion is to flourish a red flag in the face of John Bull; to provoke him to resistance even to the point of war.

"To twist the lion's tail" is a favourite phrase and favourite policy with some rival unfriendly powers.

Britomart [sweet maid] (see below). Daughter of King Ryence of Walc, whose desire was to be a heroine. She is the impersonation of saintly chastity and purity of mind. She encounters the "savage, fierce bandit and mountaineer" without injury; is assailed by "hag and ugly, goblin, and sweet fairy of the mine," but "dashes their brute violence into sudden adoration and blank awe." Britomart is not the impersonation of celibacy, as she is in love with an unknown hero, but of "virgin purity." (Spencer: Faerie Queen, book iii. Her marriage, book v. 6.)

"She charmed at once and tamed the heart, incomparable Britomart."—Scott.

Britomartis. A Cretan nymph, very fond of the chase. King Minos fell in love with her, and persisted in his advances for nine months, when she threw herself into the sea. (Cretan, Britomartis, sweet maiden.)

Briton (Like a). Vigorously, perseveringly. "To fight like a Briton" is to fight with indomitable courage. "To work like a Briton" is to work hard and perseveringly. Certainly, without the slightest flattery, dogged courage and perseverance are the strong characteristics of John Bull. A similar phrase is "To fight like a Trojan."

Brittany. The duchy of Brittany, Eleanora, daughter of Geoffrey, second son of Henry II., King of England and Duke of Brittany. At the death of Broach

Prince Arthur she was the real heir to the crown, but John confined her in the castle of Bristol till death (1241).

Broach. To broach a new subject. To start one in conversation. The allusion is to beer tubs. If one is flat, another must be tapped. A broach is a peg or pin, and to broach a cask is to bore a hole in the top for the vent-peg.

"I did broach this business to your highness."
Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 4.

Broad as Long. 'Tis about as broad as it is long. One way or the other would bring about the same result.

Broad Arrow on Government stores. It was the cognisance of Henry, Viscount Sydney, Earl of Romney, master-general of the ordnance. (1093-1702.)

"It seems like a symbol of the Trinity, and Wharton says, "It was used by the Kelt to signify holiness and royalty."

Broad Bottom Ministry (1741). Formed by a coalition of parties: Pelham retained the lead; Pitt supported the Government: Bubb Doddington was treasurer of the navy.

Broadcloth. The best cloth for men's clothes. So called from its great breadth. It required two weavers, side by side, to fling the shuttle across it. Originally two yards wide, now about fifty-four inches; but the word is now used to signify the best quality of (black) cloth.

Brodside. Printed matter spread over an entire sheet of paper. The whole must be in one type and one measure, i.e., must not be divided into columns. A foolscap is when the sheet is folded, in which case a page occupies only half the sheet.

"Manuscripts and broadsides were scattered right and left."—Pike: American History, chap. vii, p. 311.

In naval language, a broadside means the whole side of a ship; and to "open a broadside on the enemy" is to discharge all the guns on one side at the same moment.

Brobdignag. The country of gigantic giants, to whom Gulliver was a pigmy "not half so big as a round little worm plucked from the lazy finger of a maid."

"You high church steeple, you cawky star,
Your husband must come from Brobdignag."
*Kane V [Haran]: Moses.

Brobdignagian. Colossal; tall as a church steeple. (See above.)

"Titans of Brobdignagian proportions."—The Star.

Brooken. The spectre of the Brooken. This is the shadow of men and other objects greatly magnified and reflected in the mist and cloud of the mountain opposite. The Brooken is the highest summit of the Harz range.

Brockenhouse (The Rev. Robert). A Calvinistic clergyman, the son of Naomi Brocklehurst of Brocklehurst Hall, part founder of Lowood Institution, where young ladies were boarded, clothed, and taught for £15 a year, subsidised by private subscriptions. The Rev. Robert Brocklehurst was treasurer, and half starved the inmates in order to augment his own income, and scared the children by talking to them of hell-fire, and making capital out of their young faults or supposed shortcomings. He and his family fared sumptuously every day, but made the inmates of his institution deny themselves and carry the cross of vexation and want. (C. Brontë: Jane Eyre.)

Brogue (1 syl.) properly means the Irish bróg, or shoe of rough hide. The application of brog to the dialect or manner of speaking is similar to that of buskin to tragedy and sock to comedy.

"And put my clouted brogues from off my feet."
Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iv. 2.

Brogues (1 syl.). Trousers. From the Irish bróg, resembling those still worn by some of the French cavalry, in which trousers and boots are all one garment.

Broken Feather (A). A broken feather in his wing. A scandal connected with one's character.

"If an angel were to walk about, Mrs. Sum Where he came from; and perhaps whether he had a broken feather in his wing."—Mrs. Thelphus: Phoebe.

Broken Music. A "consort" consisted of six viols, usually kept in one case. When the six were played together it was called a "whole consort," when less than the six were played it was called "a broken consort." Sometimes applied to open chords or arpeggios.

"Here is sound broken music."
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1

"Lord Bacon in his Sylva Sylvarum gives a different explanation: he says certain instruments agree together and produce concordant music, but others (as the virginal and lute, the Welsh and Irish harps) do not accord.

Broken on the Wheel. (See Break.

Broker. Properly speaking, is one who sells refuse. In German, called müllers, that is, "sellers of damaged Brontës. (Teutonic, brak or wrek, refuse, allied with German brauchen.)

"Generally some special word is prefixed: as bill-broker, cotton-broker, ship-broker, stock-broker, etc.

Brontës (2 syl.). A blacksmith personified; one of the Cyclops. The name signifies Thunder.

"Not with such weight to frame the forkied brand. The ponderous hammer falls from Brontës’ hand."

—Poole: Jerusalem Delivered, book xx.

Bronzomat-te. (See Horse.)

Brook (Master). The name assumed by Ford when he visits Sir John Falstaff. The amorous knight tells Master Brook all about his amour with Mrs. Ford, and how he duped her husband by being stowed into a basket of dirty linen.

"Ford. I’ll give you a pottle of burnt sack to give me recourse to him, and tell him my name is Brook, only for just.

"Ho! My hand, bully. Thou shalt have repose and repose, . . . and thy name shall be Brook."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

Brooks of Sheffield. An imaginary individual mentioned in David Copperfield. (See Harris, Mrs.)

Broom. A broom is hung at the mast-head of ships about to be sold, to indicate that they are to be swept away. The idea is popularly taken from Admiral Tromp; but probably this allusion is more witty than true. The custom of hanging up something to attract notice seems very common. Thus an old piece of carpet from a window indicates household furniture for sale; a wisps of straw indicates oysters for sale; a bush means wise for sale; an old broom, ships to sell, etc. etc. (See Pennant.)

A new broom. One fresh in office.

New brooms sweep clean. Those newly appointed to an office find fault and want to sweep away old customs.

Brothel. Eating out of house and home. At Eton, when a dame keeps an unusually bad table, the boys agree together on a day to sat, pocket, or waste everything eatable in the house. The censure is well understood, and the hint is generally effective. (Greek, braco, to eat.)

Brother or Frère. A friar not in orders. (See Father.)

Brother (So-and-so). A fellow-burriste.

Brother Benedict. A married man. (See Benedict.)

Brother Birch. A fellow-schoolmaster.

Brother Blad. A fellow-soldier, properly; but now anyone of the same calling as yourself.

Brother Brush. A fellow-painter.

Brother Bung. A fellow-tapster.

Brother Buskin. A fellow-comediar or actor.

Brother Chip. A fellow-carpenter.

Brother Clergyman. A fellow-clergyman.

Brother Crespin. A fellow-shoemaker.

Brother Mason. A fellow-Freemason.

Brother Quill. A fellow-author.

Brother Salt. A fellow-seaman or sailor.

Brother Shuttle. A fellow-weaver.

Brother Stitch. A fellow-tailor.

Brother String. A fellow-violinist.

Brother Whip. A fellow-coachman.

Brother German. A real brother. (Latin, germanus, of the same stock; germen, a bud or sprout.)

"Te in germani fratria dixi locum."—Terence: Andria, i. 3. 56.

A uterine brother is a brother by the mother’s side only. (Latin, uterinus, born of the same mother, as “frater uterinus,” uterus.)

Brother Jonathan. When Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. “We must consult brother Jonathan,” said the general, meaning his excellence, Jonathan Trumbull, the elder governor of the State of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. To consult brother Jonathan then became a set phrase, and brother Jonathan grew to be the John Bull of the United States. (J. R. Bartlett; Dictionary of Americanisms.)

Brother Sam. The brother of Lord Dundreary (q.v.), the hero of a comedy based on a German drama, by John Oxenford, with additions and alterations by E. A. Sothern and T. B. Buckstone. (Supplied by T. B. Buckstone, Esq.)

Browbeat. To beat or put a man down by knitting the brows.

Brown. A copper coin, a penny; so called from its colour. Similarly a soveraign is a “yellow boy.” (See Blunt.)

To be done brown. To be roasted, deceived, taken in.

Brown as a Berry. (See Similes.)

Brown, Jones, and Robinson. Three Englishmen who travel together. Their adventures were published in Brown Bess and were the production of Richard Doyle. They typify the middle-class English abroad; and hold up to ridicule their gaucherie and contracted notions, their vulgarity and extravag-gance, their conceit and snobbism.

Brown Bess means brown barrel.
The barrels were browned to keep them from rusting. (Dutch, bus, a gun-barrel;
Low German, bisse; Swedish, byssa.
Our arquebus, blunderbuss.) In 1808 a process of browning was introduced, but this has, of course, nothing to do with the distinctive epithet. Probably Bess is a companion word to Bill. (See below.)

Brown Bill. A kind of halberd used by English foot-soldiers before muskets were employed. We find in the medieval ballads the expressions, “brown brand,” “brown sword,” “brown blade,” etc. Sometimes the word rusty is substituted for brown, as in Chaucer: “And in his side he had a rusty blade”; which, being the god Mars, cannot mean a bad one. Keeping the weapons bright is a modern fashion; our forefathers preferred the honour of blood stains.
Some say the weapons were varnished with a brown varnish to prevent rust, and some affirm that one Brown was a famous maker of these instruments, and that Brown Bill is a phrase similar to Armstrong gun and Colt’s revolver.
(See above.)

“Such a way of browning and of naming Brown's bills and targeters.”
Maritimes: Edward II, (1377.)

Brown also means shining (Dutch, brown), hence, “My bonnie brown sword,” “brown as glass,” etc., so that a “brown bill” might refer to the shining steel, and “brown Bess” to the bright barrel.

Brown Study. Absence of mind; apparent thought, but real vacuity.
The corresponding French expression explains it—sombre réverie. Sombre and brun both mean sad, melancholy, gloomy, dull.

“Insomnious slumbers, his brain grows muddy.
And black despair suceeds brown study...”
Congreve: An Impossible Thing.

Browns. To astonish the Browns. To do or say something regardless of the annoyance it may cause or the shock it may give to Mrs. Grundy.

Anne Boleyn had a whole host of Browns, or “country cousins,” who were welcomed at Court in the reign of Elizabeth. The queen, however, was quick to see what was gaucho, and did not scruple to reprove the Browns if she noticed anything in their conduct not comme il faut. Her bluntness of speech often “astonished the Browns.”

Brownie. The house spirit in Scott-tish superstition. He is called in England Robin Goodfellow. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favourite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair or elegant ones. (See FAIRIES.)

“...it is not long since every family of considerable substance was haunted by a spirit they called Browny, which did several sorts of work; and this was the reason why they gave him offerings
... on what they called ‘Browny’s stone.’”
Martin: Scotland.

Brownists. Followers of Robert Brown, of Ruthinshire, a violent opponent of the Established Church in the time of Queen Elizabeth. The present “Independents” hold pretty well the same religious tenets as the Brownists.
Sir Andrew Agaschoek says:

“...I'd as lief be a Brownist as a politician.”
Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ili. 2.

Brows his Jib (To). A sailor’s phrase, meaning to drink till the face is flushed and swollen. The jib means the face, and to browse here means “to fatten.”

...The only correct form of the phrase, however, is “to bowse his jib.” To browse the jib means to haul the sail tuant; and as a metaphor signifies that a man is “tight.”

Bruel. The goose, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. The word means little-roarer.

Bruin. One of the leaders arrayed against Hudibras. He was Talgol, a Newgate butcher, who obtained a captain’s commission for valor at Naseby.
He marched next Orsin (Joshua Golding, landlord of the bear-gardens at Southwark).

Sir Bruin. The name of the bear in the famous German beast-epic, called Reynard the Fox (Dutch for brown).

Brumaire. The celebrated 18th
Brumaire (Nov. 9th, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brumagem. Worthless or very inferior metallic articles made in imitation of better ones. Birmingham is the great mart and manufactury of gilt toys, cheap jewellery, imitation gems, mosaic gold, and such-like. Birmingham was called by the Romans "Bremennium."

Brums. In Stock Exchange phraseology this means the “London and Brunshild (3 syl.) or Brunhilda. Daughter of the King of Iceland, beloved by Günther, one of the two great chieftains of the Nibelungenlied or Teutonic Iliad. She was to be carried off by force, and Günther asked his friend Siegfried to help him. Siegfried contrived the matter by snatching from her the talisman which was her protector, but she never forgave him for his treachery. (Old German, brum, coat of mail; hilt, battle.)

Brunello (in Orlando Furioso). A deformed dwarf of Biserta, to whom King Agramant gave a ring which had the virtue to withstand the power of magic (book ii.). He was leader of the Tingita/unians in the Samacan army. He also figures, in Bojardo's Orlando Innamorato.

Brunswick. A native of Brunswick. (See BLACK BRUNSWICKER.)

Brunt. To bear the brunt. To bear the stress, the heat, and collision. The same word as "burn." (Icelandic, brun, burning heat, brun; Anglo-Saxon, brenning, burning.) The "brunt of a battle" is the hottest part of the fight. (Compare "fire-brand".)

Brue, The tail of a fox or squirrel, which is brusky.

Brush. To bear the stress, the heat, and collision. The same word as "burn." (Icelandic, brun, burning heat, brun; Anglo-Saxon, brenning, burning.) The "brunt of a battle" is the hottest part of the fight. (Compare "fire-brand".)

Brush off. Move on.

He brushed me. He just touched me as he went quickly past. Hence also brush, a slight skirmish.

All these are metaphors from brushing with a brush.

Give it another brush. A little more attention; bestow a little more labour on it; return it to the file for a little more polish.

Brush up (7%). To renovate or revive; to bring again into use what has been neglected, as, "I must brush up my French." When a fire is slack we brush up the hearth and then sweep clean the lower bars of the stove and stir the sleepy coals into activity.

Brut. A rhyming chronicle, as the Brut d'Angleterre and Le Roman de Brut; by Wace (twelfth century). Brut is the Romance word bruit (a rumour, hence a tradition, or a chronicle based on tradition). It is by mere accident that the word resembles "Brute" or "Brutus," the traditional king. (See next column.)

Brutus,

Brut d'Angleterre. A chronicle of the achievements of King Arthur and his Knights of the Round Table. Arthur is described as the natural son of Uther, Pendragon (or chief) of the ancient Britons. He succeeded his father, in 516, by the aid of Merlin, who gave him a magic sword, with which he conquered the Saxons, Picts, Scots, and Irish. Besides the Brut referred to, several other romances record the exploits of this heroic king. (See ARTHUR.)

Brute, in Cambridge University slang, is a man who has not yet matriculated. The play is evident. A "man," in college phrase, is a collegian; and, as matriculation is the sign and seal of acceptance, a scholar before that ceremony is not a "man," and therefore only a "biped brute."

Brute (Sir John). A coarse, potvaliant knight, ignobly noted for his absurdities. (Vanbrugh, The Provoked Wife.)

Brute or Brutus, in the historical history of England, the first king of the Britons, was son of Silius (grandson of Ascanius and great-grandson of Æneas). Having inadvertently killed his father, he first took refuge in Greece and then in Britain. In remembrance of Troy, he called the capital of his kingdom Troy-Novant (New Troy), now London.

Brutum Fulmanum (Latin). A noisy but harmless threatening; an innocuous thunderbolt.

Brutus (Julius), the first consul of Rome. Hecondemned to death his own two sons for joining a conspiracy to restore to the throne the banished Tarquin.

"The public father [Brutus], who the private quelled.
And on the dread tribunal stately sat."

Thomson: WINTER.

The Spanish Brutus, Alphonso Perez de Guzman (1258-1320). While he was governor, Castile was besieged by Don Juan, who had revolted from his brother, Sancho IV. Juan, who held in captivity one of the sons of Guzman, threatened to cut his throat unless Guzman surrendered the city. Guzman replied, "Sooner than be a traitor, I would myself lend you a sword to slay him," and he threw a sword over the city wall. The son, we are told, was slain by the father's sword before his eyes.

Brutus (Marcus). Caesar's friend, joined the conspirators to murder him, because he made himself a king.

"And thou, unhappy Brutus, kind of heart, Whose steady arm, by awful virtue urged, Laid the Roman yoke against thy friend."—Thomson: Winter, 224-48.

Et tu, Brutus. What! does my own familiar friend lift up his heel against me? The reference is to that Marcus Brutus whose "bastard hand stabbed Julius Caesar." (Suetonius.)

Bruxellois. The inhabitants of Brussels or Bruxelles.

Brydport Dagger. (See Brindport.)

Bub. Drink. (Connected with bubble—Latin, bubo, to drink; our imbibe.) (See Gumb.)

"Drunk with Helicon's waters and double-brewed bub."—Prior: To a Person who wrote ill.

Bubastis. The Diana of Egyptian mythology; the daughter of Isis and sister of Horus.

Bubble (A). A scheme of so sterling worth and of very ephemeral duration—as worthless and frail as a bubble.

"The whole scheme (the Fenian raid on British America) was a collapsed bubble."—The Times.

The Bubble Act, 6 George I., cap. 18; published 1719, and repealed July 5th, 1823. Its object was to punish the promoters of bubble schemes.

A bubble company. A company whose object is to enrich themselves at the expense of subscribers to their scheme.

A bubble scheme. A project for getting money from subscribers to a scheme of no value.

Bubble and Squeak. Cold boiled meat and greens fried. They first bubbled in water when boiled, and afterwards hissed or squeaked in the frying-pan.

Something pretentious, but of no real value, such as "rank and title," or a bit of ribbon in one's button hole.

Bucea. A Goblin of the wind, supposed by the ancient inhabitants of Cornwall to foretell shipwrecks.

Buc'caneer means sellers of smoke-dried meat, from the Caribbean word boucan, smoke-dried meat. The term was first given to the French settlers in Hayti, whose business it was to hunt animals for their skins. The flesh they smoke-dried and sold, chiefly to the Dutch.

When the Spaniards laid claim to all America, many English and French adventurers lived by "bucaneering," and hunted Spaniards as lawful prey. After the peace of Ryswick this was no longer tolerated, and the term was then applied to any desperate, lawless, piratical adventurer.

Bucephalus [bull-headed]. A horse. Strictly speaking, the charger of Alexander the Great, bought of a Thessalian for thirteen talents (£3,500).

Buchanites (3 syl.). A sect of fanatics who appeared in the west of Scotland in 1763. They were named after Mrs. or Lucky Buchan, their founder, who called herself "Friend Mother in the Lord," claiming to be the woman mentioned in Rev. xi., and maintaining that the Rev. Hugh White, a convert, was the "man-child."

"I never heard of aewife that turned preacher, except Lucky Buchan in the West."—Scott: St. Roman's Well, c. ii.

Buck. A dandy. (See below.)

"A most tremendous buck he was, as he sat there grave, in state, driving his greyas."—Thackeray: Vanity Fair, chap. vi.

Buck-basket. A linen-basket. To buck is to wash clothes in lye; and a buck is one whose clothes are buck, or nicely got up. When Cade says his mother was "descended from the Lascies," two men overheard him, and say, "She was a pedlar's daughter, but not being able to travel with her furled pack, she washes bucks here at home."

(2 Henry IV., iv. 2.) (German, brechen, to steep clothes in lye; breche, clothes so steeped. However, compare "bucket," a diminutive of the Anglo-Saxon brec.)

Buck-bean. A corruption of bog-bean, a native of wet bog-lands.

Buck-ri'der (A). A dummy fare who enables a cabman to pass police-constables who prevent empty cabs loitering at places where cabs will be likely to be required, as at theatres, music-halls, and large hotels. A cabman who wants to get at such a place under hope of picking up a fare gives a "buck" a shilling to get into his cab that he may seem to have a fare, and so pass the police.

"Constables are stationed at certain points to spot the pretentious "buck-rider.""—Nineteenth Century (March, 1868, p. 679).
Buck-tooth. A large projecting front-tooth. (See Bunter Tooth.)

Buckwheat. A corruption of ber German, buchre, bee-ch-cet; it is so called because it is triangular, like beechnust. The botanical name is Fagopyrum (bee-ch-cet).

"The buckwheat
Whitened broad acres, sweetening with its flowers

Buckhorse. A severe blow or slap on the face. So called from a boxer of that name.

Buckingham. (Saxon, boxen-ham, beechn-tree village.) Fuller, in his Worthies, speaks of the beechn-trees as the most characteristic feature of this county.

Bucklaw, or rather Frank Hayston, lord of Bucklaw, a wealthy nobleman, who marries Lucia di Lammermoor (Lucy Ashton), who had pledged her troth to Edgar, master of Ravenswood. On the Bride of Lammermoor.)

Buckle. I can't buckle to. I can't give my mind to work. The allusion is to buckling on one's armour or belt.

To cut the buckle. To caper about, to heel and toe it in dancing. In jigs the two feet buckle or twist into each other with great rapidity.

"Thro'th, it wouldn't have a laugh in you to see the person dancein' down the road on his way home, and the minister and methodist preacher cuttin' the buckle as they went along." - W. B. Yeats: Fairy Tales of the Irish Peasantry, p. 96 (see also p. 100).

To put into buckle. To put into pawn at the rate of 40 per cent. interest.

To talk buckle. To talk about marriage.

"I took a girl to dinner who talked buckle to me." - Penn, 154.

Buckler. (See SHIELD.)

Bucklersbury (London) was at one time the noted street for druggists and herbalists; hence Falstaff says---

"I cannot cog, and say them art this and that, like a many of these buckler-bawbathes that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklersbury in simple tune." - Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, III. 3.

Buckmaster's Light Infantry. The 3rd West India Regiment was so called from Buckmaster, the tailor, who used to issue "Light Infantry uniforms" to the officers of the corps without any authority from the Commander-in-Chief.

Buckra. Superior, excellent. That's buckra. A buckra coat is a smart coat; a buckra man, a man of consequence.

This word among the West Indians does the service of burra among the Anglo-Indians: as burra wob (great master, i.e. white man), burra khana (a magnificent spread or dinner).

Buckshish or Bakhshish. A gratuity, pour boire. A term common to India, Persia, and indeed all the East.

Buddha means the Wise One. From the Indian word budh, to know. The title was given to Prince Siddhartha, generally called Saky'a-muni, the founder of Buddhism. His wife's name was Gopa.

Buddhism. A system of religion established in India in the third century. The general outline of the system is that the world is a transient reflex of deity; that the soul is a "vital spark" of deity; and that after death it will be bound to matter again till its "weaver" has, by divine contemplation, so purified and purified it that it is fit to be absorbed into the divine essence.

Buddhist. One whose system of religion is Buddhism.

Budo or Gurney Light. The latter is the name of the inventor, and the former the place of his abode. (Goldsworth Gurney, of Budo, Cornwall.)

Budge is lambskin with the wool dressed outwards, worn on the edge of capes, bachelors' hoods, and so on. Budge Row, Cannon Street, is so-called because it was chiefly occupied by budge-makers.

"O foolishness of men that lend their ears
To those budge-druggers of the stoke fur." - Milton: Comus, 266 and 267.

Budge (7b) is the French bouger, to stir.

Budge Bachelors. A company of men clothed in long gowns lined with budge or lambs' wool, who used to accompany the Lord Mayor of London at his inauguration.

Budget. The statement which the Chancellor of the Exchequer lays before the House of Commons every session, respecting the national income and expenditure, taxes and salaries. The word is the old French bougette, a bag, and the present use arose from the custom of bringing to the House the papers pertaining to these matters in a leather bag, and laying them on the table. Hence, to open the budget or bag, i.e. to take the papers from the bag and submit them to the House.

A budget of news is a bagful of news, a large stock of news.
Cry Budget. A watchword or shibboleth. Thus Slender says to Shallow—

"We have a word to know one another. I come to her in white and cry war; she cries "budget" and by that we know one another."—Shakespeare; Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 2.

Buff. Buff is a contraction of buffer or buffalo; and buff skin is the skin of the buffalo prepared. "To stand in buff" is to stand without clothing in one’s bare skin. "To strip to the buff" is to strip to the skin. The French for "buff" is buffle, which also means a buffalo.

To stand buff, also written bluff, meaning firm, without flinching. Sheridan, in his School for Scandal, ii. 3, says, "That he should have stood buff to old bachelor so long, and sink into a husband at last." It is a nautical term; a "buff shore" is one with a bold and almost perpendicular front. The word buff, a blow or buffet, may have got conjoined with bluff, but without doubt numerous instances of "buff" can be adduced.

And for the good old cause stood buff,
Gaining many a bitter kick and cuff."

"I must ever stand buff and outface him."—Fielding.

Buff in "Blind-man’s buff," the well-known game, is an allusion to the three buffes or pats which the "blindman" gets when he has caught a player. (Norman-French, buffer, a blow; Welsh, paff, verb, paffo, to thump; our buffet is a little slap.)

Buffalo Bill. Colonel Cody.

Buffalo Robe. The skin of a bison dressed without removing the hair, and used as a travelling rug. The word "robe" is often omitted.

"The large and roomy sleigh was decked with buffalo robes, red-brown, and furnished with新疆 eyes and ears."—The Upper Ten Thousand, p. 4.

"Leaving all hands under their buffaloes."—Kane: Arctic Expedition.

Buff of a railway carriage is an apparatus to rebuff or deaden the force of collision.

Buffy (A). A chap. The French buffer (older form, buffier) meant to eat, as il buffera tout seul. If this is the basis of the word, a buffer is one who eats with us, called a Commomur in our universities.

"I always said the old buffer would."—Miss Braddon: Lady Audley's Secret.

Buffoon means one who puffs out his cheeks, and makes a ridiculous explosion by causing them suddenly to collapse. This being a standing trick with clowns, caused the name to be applied to low jesters. The Italian buffone is "to puff out the cheeks for the purpose of making an explosion;" our puff. (Italian buffone, a buffoon; French bourdon.)

Buffoons. Names synonymous with Buffoon:—

Galinafré. A contemporary and rival of the former.

Tabarin. (Of the seventeenth century.)

Grimault. (1770-1837.) (See Scaramouch.)

Buff. The old 3rd regiment of foot soldiers. The men’s coats were lined and faced with buff; they also wore buff waistcoats, buff breeches, and buff stockings. These are the "Old Buffs," raised in 1688.

At one time called the Buff Hawards, from Howard (their colonel) (1737-1740). The "Young Buffs" are the old 1st Foot raised in 1751; now called the Huntingdonshire Regiment, whose present uniform is scarlet with buff facings.

The Rothshire Buffs. The old 78th, now the second battalion of the Seaforth Highlanders.

Bugaboo. A monster, or goblin, introduced into the tales of the old Italian romancers. (See below.)

Bugbear. A scarecrow. Bug is the Welsh bwyg, a hobgoblin, called in Russian buka. Spenser says, "A ghastly bug doth greatly them Affear" (book ii. canto 3); and Hamlet has "bugs and goblins" (v. 2).

"Warwick was a bug that feared us all."—Shakespeare; Henry IV. ii. 3.

"To the world no bugbear is so great." As want of Bug and a small estate."—Pope: Nat. XI. 67-68.

* The latter half of this word is somewhat doubtful. The Welsh bar-ir, fury, wrath, whence burgh, spiteful, seems probable.

Buggy. A light vehicle without a hood, drawn by one horse. (Hindustani, baugh.)

Buhl-work. Cabinet-work, inlaid with brass; so called from Signor Boule, the inventor, who settled in Paris during the reign of Louis XIV. (The word should be spelt BOULER-WORK.)

Build, for make, as, A man of strong build, a man of robust make. The metaphor is evident.

Build. Applied to dress. Not so bad a build after all, not badly made.
Builder's Square. Emblematic of St. Thomas, patron of architects.

"Twas like the notes, half-courtly, half-mourn, The bull's utterer." Moore: Lalla Rookh (Veiled Prophet, part 1, stanza 14).

Bulla, metamorphosed into a drake; and his son, Egyptios, into a vulture.

Bull. One of the twelve signs of the Zodiac (April 20 to May 21). The time for ploughing, which in Egypt was performed by oxen or bulls.
"At last from Aries rolls the bounteous sun, And the bright bull receives him." Thomson: Spring, 26, 27.

Bull. A blunder, or inadvertent contradiction of terms, for which the Irish are proverbial. The British Apollo, 1740, says the term is derived from one Obadiah Bull, an Irish lawyer of London, in the reign of Henry VII., whose blundering in this way was notorious.
"Bull is a five-shilling piece. "Half a bull" is half-a-crown. From bulla, a great leaden seal. Hood, in one of his comic sketches, speaks of a squire who, being apprehended, "swallowed three hogs (shillings) and a bull."

The pope's bull. So called from the bulla or capsule of the seal appended to the document. Subsequently the seal was called the bulla, and then the document itself.

The edict of the Emperor Charles IV. (1356) had a golden bulla, and was therefore called the golden bull. (See Golden Bull.)

Bull. A public-house sign, the cognizance of the house of Clare. The bull and the boar were signs used by the partisans of Clare, and Richard, Duke of Gloucester (Richard III.).

Bull. A bull in a china shop. A maladroit hand interfering with a delicate business; one who produces reckless destruction.
A brazen bull. An instrument of torture. (See Phalaris.)
He may bear a bull that hath borne a calf (Erasmius: Proverbs)—"He that accustomed himself to lytle thynges, by lytle and lytle shalbe able to go a way with greater thynges (Tavener)."
To take the bull by the horns. To attack or encounter a threatened danger fearlessly; to go forth boldly to meet a difficulty. The figure is taken from bull-fights, in which a strong and skilful matador will grasp the horns of a bull about to toss him and hold it prisoner.

John Bull. An Englishman. Applied to a native of England in Arbuthnot's ludicrous History of Europe. This history is sometimes erroneously ascribed to Dean Swift. In this satire the French are called Lewis Baboon, and the Dutch Nicholas Frog.
"One would think, in personifying itself, a nation would . . . picture something grand, heroic, and imposing, but it is characteristic of the peculiar humour of the English, and of their love for what is blunt, comic, and familiar, that they have embodied their national oddities in the figure of a sturdy, corpulent old fellow . . . with red waistcoat, leather breeches and a stent oxen cured . . . with whom they call John Bull."—Washington Irving.

Bull-dog. A man of relentless, savage disposition is sometimes so called. A "bull-dog courage" is one that flinches from no danger. The "bull-dog" was the dog formerly used in bull-baiting.

Bull-dogs, in University slang, are the two myrmidons of the proctor, who attend his heels like dogs, and are ready to spring on any offending undergraduate like bull-dogs. (See MYRMIDONS.)

Bull-necked. The Bull-necked Forger. Cagiostro, the huge impostor, was so called. (1743-1795.)

Bull-ring. (See Mayor of the Bull-ring.)

Bull's Eye. A small cloud suddenly appearing, seemingly in violent motion, and growing out of itself. It soon covers the entire vault of heaven, producing a tumult of wind and rain. (1 Kings xviii. 44.)

Bull's Eye. The inner disc of a target.
A little way from the centre there is a spot where the shots are thickly gathered; some few have hit the bull's-eye."—Finke: Examinations, etc., chap. 11. p. 178.

To make a bull's eye. To gain some signal advantage; a successful coup. To fire or shoot an arrow right into the centre disc of the target.

Bulls, in Stock Exchange phraseology, means those dealers who "bull," or try to raise the price of stock, with the view of effecting sales. A bull-account is a speculation made under the hope that the stock purchased will rise before the day of settlement. (See Bear.)

Bullet. Every bullet has its billet. Nothing happens by chance, and no act is altogether without some effect. "There is a divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we will." Another meaning is this: an arrow or bullet is not discharged at random, but at some mark, or for some deliberate purpose. "Let the arrow fly that has a mark."—Cesar Bomba, chap. ii.

Bulletin. French for a certificate. An official report of an officer to his superior, or of medical attendants respecting the health of persons of notoriety; so called because they were authenticated by an official bullet or seal. (Spanish, boletin, a warrant; Italian, bulletina, a roll.)

Bulling the Barrel is pouring water into a rum cask, when it is nearly empty, to prevent its leaking. The water, which gets impregnated with the spirit and is very intoxicating, is called bull.

Seamen talk of bulling the teapot (making a second brew), bulling the coffee, etc.

Bullion properly means the mint where bulla, little round coins, are made. Subsequently the metal in the mint.

Bully. To overbear with words. A bully is a blustering menacer. (Anglo-Saxon, bullgan, to bellow like a bull.)

It is often used, without any mixture of reproach, as a term of endearment, as:

"O sweet bully Bottom."—Midsummer Night's Dream, iv. 4.

"Here thee, bully doctor."—Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

Bully-boy (A). A jolly companion, a "brick." (German, bulb, a lover; bulker, a gallant.)

"We be three poor matters
   Newly come from the sea,
   We spend our lives in jeopacy,
   While others live at ease;
   Shall we go dance the round, the round,
   Shall we go dance the round?
   And he that is a bully boy
   Come pledge me on this ground!"

In Alexander. (1621)

Bully-rook. A blustering cheat. Like bully, it is sometimes used without any offensive meaning. Thus the Host, in The Merry Wives of Windsor, addresses Sir John Falstaff, Ford, and Page, etc., as bully-rook—"How now, my bully-rook?"—equal to "my fine fellow."

"A bully rake is "one who fights for fighting's sake." To bully-rag is to intimidate; bully-ragging is abuse of intimidation. According to Halliwell, a rag is a scold, and hence a "ragging" means a scolding. Connected with rage.

Bum-bailiff. The French pousse-cul seems to favour the notion that bum-bailiff is no corruption. These officers are frequently referred to as buns.

"Scout me for him at the corner of the orchard, Like a bum-bailiff."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Bum-boat. A small wide boat to carry provisions to vessels lying off shore. Also called "dirt-boats," being used for removing filth from ships lying in the Thames. (Dutch, bumboat, a wide fishing boat. In Canada a punt is called a bum. A bun is a receptacle for keeping fish alive.)

Bumble. A beadle. So called from the officious, overbearing beadle in Dickens's Oliver Twist.

Bummledom. The dominion of an overbearing parish officer, the arrogance of parish authorities, the conceit of parish dignity. (See above.)

Bummaroes. A class of middlemen or fish-jobbers in Billingsgate Market, who get a living by bummaroeing, i.e. buying parcels of fish from the salesmen, and then retailing them. A corruption of bonne marée, good fresh fish, or the seller thereof. According to the Dictionary de l'Académie, marée means "toute sorte de poisson de mer que n'est pas salé." Bonne marée, marée fraîche.

Bumper. A full glass, generally connected with a "toast." Dr. Aru says a bumper is when the surface of the wine bumps up in the middle. (French, bumerer, to render convex, to bulge or swell out.)

A fancied mention with bump, a swelling, has not only influenced the form of the word, but (least added at first) altered its meaning. Bummaroeing D

Bumpkin. A loutish person. (Dutch, bunnicken, a sprout, a fool.) This word very closely resembles the word "chit." (See Chitty.)

Bumptious. Arrogant, full of mighty airs and graces; apt to take offence at presumed slights. A corruption of presumptuous, first into "sumptious," then to bumptious.

Bun. A small cake. (Irish, boinnog, Scotch, bannock.)

"In regard to "hot cross buns" on Good Friday, it may be stated that the Greeks offered to Apollo, Diana, Hecate, and the Moon, cakes with "horns." Such a cake was called a bone, and (it is said) never grew mouldy. The "cross" symbolised the four quarters of the moon.

"Good Friday comes this month: the old woman runs
   With one penny, two a penny: hot cross buns,
Bunch

Whose virtue is, if you believe what’s said, They’ll not grow mouldy like the common bread.”
—Poor Robin: Alamance, 1731.

Bunch of Fives. A slang term for the hand or fist.

Bunole (John). “A prodigious hand at matrimony; divinity, a song, and a peck.” He marries seven wives, loses all in the flower of their age, is inconsolable for two or three days, then resigns himself to the decrees of Providence, and marries again. (The Life and Opinions of John Bunole, Esq., by Thomas Amory.)

“John is a kind of innocent Henry VIII. of private life.”—Laugh Hunt.

Bundle. Bundle off. Get away. To bundle a person off, is to send him away unceremoniously. Similar to pack off. The allusion is obvious.

Bundle of Sticks. Aesop, in one of his fables, shows that sticks one by one may be readily broken; not so when several are bound together in a bundle. The lesson taught is, that “Union gives strength.”

“They now lay to heart the lesson of the bundle of sticks.”—The Times.

Bundschaft [highly]. An insurrection of the peasants of Germany in the sixteenth century. So called from the highloos or clouted shoon of the insurgents.

Bung. A cant term for a toper. “Away . . . you filthy bung,” says Doll to Pistol. (2 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Brother Bung. A cant term for a publican.

Bung up. Close up, as a bung closes a cask.

Bungalow (Indian). The house of a European in India, generally a ground floor with a verandah all round it, and the roof thatched to keep off the hot rays of the sun. There are English bungalows at Birchington and on the Norfolk coast near Cromer. A dák-bungálo is a caravansary or house built by the Government for the use of travellers. (Hindustani, bangálo.)

Bungay. “Go to Bungay with you!”—i.e. get away and don’t bother me, or don’t talk such stuff. Bungay, in Suffolk, used to be famous for the manufacture of leather breeches, once very fashionable. Persons who required new ones, or to have their old ones new-seated, went or sent to Bungay for that purpose. Hence rose the cant saying, “Go to Bungay, and get your breeches mended,” shortened into “Go to Bungay with you!”

Bungay. My castle of Bungay. (See under Castle.)

Bunkum. Claptrap. A representative at Washington being asked why he made such a florid and angry speech, so wholly uncalled for, made answer, “I was not speaking to the House, but to Bungcombe,” which he represented (North Carolina).

“America, too, will find that caucuses, stump-atory, and speeches to Bungcombe will not carry men to the immortal spots.”—Carlyle: Latter-day Pamphlets (Parliament, p. 93).”

Bunny. A rabbit. So called from the provincial word bun, a tail. The Scot’sh say of the hare, “She cooks her bun.” Bunny, a diminutive of bun, applied to a rabbit, means the animal with the little tail.”

“Bunny, lying in the grass, Saw the slanty column pass.”
—Bret Harte: Battle Bunny, stanza 1.

Bunswick (Jack). Captain Cattle’s friend; a Sir Oracle of his neighbours; profoundly mysterious, and keeping his eye always fixed upon invisible dreamland somewhere beyond the limits of infinite space. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Bunting. In Somersetshire bunting means sifting flour. Sieves were at one time made of a strong gauzy woollen cloth, which being tough and capable of resisting wear, was found suitable for flags, and now has changed its reference from sieves to flags. A “bunt-mill” is a machine for sifting corn.

“Not unlike . . . . a baker’s hunt, when he separates the flour from the bran.”—Stedman.

Buphagos. Panonias (viii. 24) tells us that the son of Japhet was called Buphagos (glutton), as Hercules was called Adeptthus, because on one occasion he ate a whole ox (Athenaeus x). The French call the English “Beefeaters,” because they are eaters of large joints of meat, and not of delicate, well-dressed viands. Neither of these has any relation to our Yeomen of the Guard. (Snr Beefeaters, page 115.)

Burbon. A knight assailed by a rabble rout, who batter his shield to pieces, and compel him to cast it aside. Talus renders him assistance, and is informed by the rescued knight that Fourde lis, his own true love, had been enticed away from him by Grantorto. When the rabble is dispersed, and Fourde lis recovered, Burbon places her on his steed, and rides off as fast as possible. Burbon is Henri IV. of France; Fourde lis, the kingdom of France; the rabble rout, the Roman Catholic party that tried to set him aside; the shield he is compelled to abandon is Protestantism; his carrying off Foulard is his obtaining the kingdom by a coup after his renunciation of the Protestant cause. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. 11.)

Burchardise. To speak ex cathedra; to speak with authority. Burchard (who died 1026) compiled a volume of canons of such undisputed authority, that any sentence it gave was beyond appeal.

Burchell (Mr.). A baronet who passes himself off as a poor man, his real name and title being Sir William Thornhill. His favourite cant word is “Fudge.” (Goldsmith: Vicar of Wakefield.)

Burd (Helen). The Scotch female impersonation of the French pronounce or prud'homme, with this difference, that she is discreet, rather than brave and wise.

Burden of a Song. The words repeated in each verse, the chorus or refrain. It is the French bourdon, the big drone of a bagpipe, or double-diapason of an organ, used in forté parts and choruses.

Burden of Isaiah. The “measurer” of a prophecy announcing a calamity, or a denunciation of hardships on those against whom the burden is uttered. (Isa. xiii. 1, etc.)

The burden of proof. The obligation to prove something.

“...the burden of proof is on the party holding the affirmative” (because no one can prove a negative, except by reductio ad absurdum).—Graham: On Evidence (vol. i., part 2, chap. iii., p. 100.)

Burr (2 syl.). The first woman, and sister of Borr, the father of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Bureaucracy. A system of government in which the business is carried on in bureaux or departments. The French bureau means not only the office of a public functionary, but also the whole staff of officers attached to the department. As a word of reproach, bureaucracy has nearly the same meaning as Dickens’ word, red-tapeism (q.v.).

Burglar [burg-lar’en]. The robber of a burgh, castle, or house. Burglary is called, in ancient law-books, hund-scorden or hant-scorn, house-violation.

Burgundyan. A Burgundyean blow, i.e. decapitation. The Duc de Biron, who was put to death for treason by Henri IV., was told in his youth, by a fortune-teller, “to beware of a Burgundyan blow.” When going to execution, he asked who was to be his executioner, and was told he was a man from Burgundy.

Burial of an Ass. No burial at all.

“...he shall be buried with the burial of an ass, drawn and cast forth beyond the gates of Jerusalem.”—Jer. xxix. 16.

Burdian’s Ass. A man of indecision; like one “on double business bound, who stands in pause where he should first begin, and both neglect.” Burdian the scholastic said: “If a hungry ass were placed exactly between two hay-stacks in every respect equal, it would starve to death, because there would be no motive why it should go to one rather than to the other.”

Burke. To murder by placing something over the mouth of the person attacked to prevent his giving alarm. So called from Burke, an Irishman, who used to suffocate his victims and murder them for the sole purpose of selling the dead bodies to surgeons for dissection. Hanged at Edinburgh, 1829.

To burke a question. To strangle it in its birth. The publication was burked: suppressed before it was circulated.

Burkers. Body-snatchers; those who kill by burking.

Burl, Burler. In Cumberland, a burler is the master of the revels at a bidden-wedding, who is to see that the guests are well furnished with drink. To burl is to carouse or pour out liquor. (Anglo-Saxon, byrth.)

Mr. H. called for a quart of beer. ... He told me to burn out the beer, as he was in a hurry, and I boiled out the glass and gave it to him.—The Times: Law Reports.

Burlaw or Byrlaw. A sort of Lynch-law in the rural districts of Scotland. The inhabitants of a district used to make certain laws to their own observance, and appoint one of their neighbours, called the Burlaw-man, to carry out the pains and penalties. The word is a corrupt form of byr-law, byr= a burgh, common in such names as Berwick, the burgh on the Derwent; Grimsby (q.v.), Grims-town.

Burlesque. Father of burlesque poetry. Hippo’ax of Ephesus. (Sixth century B.C.)

Burlond. A giant whose legs Sir Tryamour cut off. (Romance of Sir Tryamour.)

Burn. His money burns a hole in his pocket. He cannot keep it in his pocket, or forbear spending it.
To burn one's boats. To cut oneself off from all means or hope of retreat. The allusion is to Julius Caesar and other generals, who burned their boats or ships when they invaded a foreign country, in order that their soldiers might feel that they must either conquer the country or die, as retreat would be impossible.

To burn one's fingers. To suffer loss by speculation or interference. The allusion is to taking chestnuts from the fire.

"He has been bolstering up these rotten ironworks. I told him he would burn his fingers." — Mrs. Lyman Eaton.

You cannot burn the candle at both ends. You cannot do two opposite things at one and the same time; you cannot exhaust your energies in one direction, and yet reserve them unimpaired for something else. If you go to bed late you cannot get up early. You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot serve God and Mammon. You cannot serve two masters. — Louis de Rouvroy, marquis de Louvois, (La Fontaine.)

Simul orbivm et flave non possis. We burn daylight. We waste time in talk instead of action. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.)

Burn, a stream. A variant of bourn (Anglo-Saxon, burne, a brook, as in Winterbourne, Burnham, Swinburne, etc.).

Burning Crown. A crown of red-hot iron set on the head of recidives.

"He was adjudged to have his head scarred with a burning crown." — Tragedy of Hoffmann. (1821.)

Burnt. The burnt child dreads the fire. Once caught, twice shy. "What! wouldst thou have a serpent sting thee twice?"

Burnt Candlemas Day. Feb. 2, 1355-6, when Edward III., marched through the Lothians with fire and sword. He burnt to the ground Edinburgh and Haddington, and then retreated from want of provisions. The Scots call the period "Burnt Candlemas." (See "Epochs of History," England under the Plantagenets; and Macmillan's series, Little History of Scotland, edited by Prof. Freeman.)

Burnt (a bull's hide). So the citadel of Carthage was called. The tale is that when Dido came to Africa she bought of the natives "as much land as could be encompassed by a bull's hide." The agreement was made, and Dido cut the hide into thongs, so as to enclose a space sufficient for a citadel.

The following is a similar story: The Yakutaks granted to the Russian explorers as much land as they could encompass with a cow's hide; but the Russians, cutting the hide into strips, obtained land enough for the port and town of Yakutsk.

The Indians have a somewhat similar tradition. The fifth incarnation of Vishnu was in the form of a dwarf called Vamun. Vamun, presenting himself before the giant Baly, asked as a reward for services as much land as he could measure in three paces to build a hut on. Baly laughed at the request, and freely granted it. Whereupon the dwarf grew so prodigiously large that, with three paces, he straddled over the whole world. (Somervil: Voyages, vol. i. p. 24.)

Burst. To inform against an accomplice. Slang variety of "split" (turn king's evidence, impeach). The person who does this splits or breaks up the whole concern.

Bury the Hatchet. Let by-gones be by-gones. The "Great Spirit" commanded the North American Indians, when they smoked the calumet or peace-pipe, to bury their hatchet, scalping-knives, and war-clubs in the ground, that all thought of hostility might be buried out of sight.

"It is much to be regretted that the American government, having brought the great war to a conclusion, did not bury the hatchet altogether." — The Times.

"Buried was the bloody hatchet; Buried were all warlike weapons, And the war-cry was forgotten; Then was peace among the nations." — Langfellow: Hiawatha, xiil.

Burying, Exhumation. The Parsees neither bury or burn their dead, because they will not defile the elements (fire and earth). So they carry their dead to the Tower of Silence, and leave the body there to be devoured by vultures. (See Nineteenth Century, October, 1893, p. 61.)

Burying at Cross Roads. (See Cross-Roads.)

Bus. A contraction of Omnibus. Of course, Omnibii, as a plural, though sometimes used, is quite absurd.

Busby. A frizzled wig. Doctor Busby, master of Westminster school, did not wear a frizzled wig, but a close cap, somewhat like a Welsh wig. (See Wigs.)

Busby. The tail cap of a hussar, artillery-man, etc., which hangs from the top over the right shoulder.
Bush. One beats the bush, but another has the hare, i.e., one does the work, but another reaps the profit. The Latins said, Si esos non vobis. The allusion is to beating the bush to start game. (See BEATING.)

Good wine needs no bush. A good article will make itself known without being puffed. The booths in fairs used to be dressed with ivy, to indicate that wine was sold there, ivy being sacred to Bacchus. An ivy-bush was once the common sign of taverns, and especially of private houses where beer or wine could be obtained by travellers. In France, a peasant who sells his vineyard has to put a green bush over his door.

The proverb is Latin, and shows that the Romans introduced the custom into Europe. "Vino vendibilis hec est opus est" (Columella). It was also common to France. "Un vin qui se vend bien, il ne faut point de lierre." (Harley: As You Like It, Epilogue).

To take to the bush. To become bush-rangers, like runaway convicts who live by plunder. The bush in this case means what the Dutch call bosch, the uncleared land as opposed to towns and clearings.

"Everything being much cheaper in Toronto than away in the bush."—Geddes: Life in the Woods.

Bushel. To measure other people's corn by one's own bushel. To make oneself the standard of right and wrong; to appraise everything as it accords or disagree with one's own habits of thought and preconceived opinions; to be extremely bigoted and self-opinionated.

Under a bushel. Secretly; in order to hide it.

"Do men light a candle and put it under a bushel?"—Matt. v. 12.

Bushman (Dutch, Boschjesman). Natives of South Africa who live in the "bush"; the aborigines of the Cape; dwellers in the Australian "bush"; a bush farmer.

"Bushmen...are the only nomades in the country. They never cultivate the soil, nor rear any domestic animal, save wretched dogs."—Lubbocke: Travels, chap. ii. p. 53.

Bushrangers. Escaped convicts who have taken refuge in the Australian "bush," and subsist by plunder.

"The bushrangers at first were absentee [i.e., escaped convicts] who were run down or driven to theft and violence. So early as 1820 they had, by the same robberies, excited feelings of alarm."—West: Tasmania.

Business, Busy. Saxon, bysgian, the verb, bysig (busy); Dutch, bezigen; German, besorgen (care, management); sorge (care); Saxon, beogan (to see). From the German sorgen we get the French sougner (to look after something), souigne, and be-sogne (business, or that which is our care and concern), with be-soune (something looked after but not found, hence "want"); the Italian besognio (a beggar).

Business To-morrow. When the Spartans seized upon Thebes, they placed Archias over the garrison, Pelopidas, with eleven others, banded together to put Archias to the sword. A letter containing full details of the plot was given to the Spartan polemarch at the banquet table; but Archias thrust the letter under his cushion, saying, "Business to-morrow." But long ere that sun arose he was numbered with the dead.

Buistrone (3 syl.). An enchanter bound by Britomart. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii. 11, 12.)

Busiris. A king of Egypt, who used to immolate to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him; and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slew the inhospitable king.

Busiris, according to Milton, is the Pharaoh who was drowned in the Red Sea.

"Ye'ved the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew Busiris and his Memphian chivalry."—Paradise Lost, book i. 306, 307.

Buskin. Tragedy. The Greek tragic actors used to wear a sandal some two or three inches thick, to elevate their stature. To this sole was attached a very elegant buskin, and the whole was called coturnus. (See Sock.)

"Or what (though rare) of later age

Ennobled hath the buskin stage.

Buss. To kiss. (Welsh, bus, the human lip; Gaelic, bus, the mouth; French, baiser, a kiss.)

"You towers, whose wanton tops do thrust the clouds, Must kiss their own feet."—Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iv. 5.

Bustard. A German goal. His idol may still be seen at Sondrehauz, the castle of Schwartzenburg.

Busy as a Bee. The equivalent Latin phrase is "Satagit tamquaiae in matella." (See SIMILES.)

Butcher. The Butcher. Ahmed Pasha was called djazar (the butcher), and is said to have whipped off the heads of his seven wives. He is famous for his defence of Acre against Napoleon I.

The Butcher. John, ninth lord Clifford, also called The Black, died 1401.
The Bloody Butcher. The Duke of Cumberland, second son of George II. So called from his barbarities in suppressing the rebellion of the young Pretender.

The Royalist Butcher. Blaise de Montluc, distinguished for his cruelties to the Protestants in the reign of Charles IX. of France (1562-1572).

Butcher Boots. The black boots worn en petite tenue in the hunting field.

Butter. Soft soap, soft solder (pron. saw-dor), "wiping down" with winning words. Punch expressively calls it "the milk of human kindness churned into butter." (Anglo-Saxon, butere or butyrw, Latin, butyrum, Greek, bouteiron, i.e. butyros, cow-cheese, as distinguished from goat- or ewe-butter.)

Soft words butter no parsnips. Saying "Be thou fed," will not feed a hungry man. Mere words will not find salt to our porridge, or butter to our parsnips.

"Fine words, as in a happy old proverb, butter no parsnips,"—Lowell.

He looks as if butter would not melt in his mouth. He looks like a dolt. He looks quite harmless and expressly made to be played upon. Yet beware, and "touch not a cat but a glove."

"She smiles and banishes, you'd think that butter would not melt in her mouth."—Thackeray: Pendennis, ix.

He knows on which side his bread is buttered. He knows his own interest. Seit uti foro.

He that has good store of butter may lay it thick on his bread. Cui multi sunt et magna et sublimia insignias.

"To butter one's bread on both sides. To be wastefully extravagant and luxurious.

Butter-fingers. Said of a person who lets things fall out of his hand. His fingers are slippery, and things slip from them as if they were greased with butter. Often heard on the cricket field.

"I never was a butter-fingers, though a bad batsman."—H. Kingley.

Butter-tooth (A). A wide front tooth. (See BUCK-TOOTH.)

Buttered Ale. A beverage made of ale or beer (without hops) mixed with butter, sugar, and cinnamon.

Buttercups. So called because they were once supposed to increase the butter of milk. No doubt those cows give the best milk that pasture in fields where buttercups abound, not because these flowers produce butter, but because they grow only on sound, dry, old pastures, which afford the best food. Miller, in his Gardener's Dictionary, says they were so called "under the notion that the yellow colour of butter is owing to these plants."

Butterflies, in the cab trade, are those drivers who take to the occupation only in summer-time, and at the best of the season. At other times they follow some other occupation.

"The feeling of the regular drivers against these "butterflies" is very strong."—Nineteenth Century (March, 1883, p. 177).

Butterfly Kiss (A). A kiss with one's eyelashes, that is, stroking the cheek with one's eyelashes.

Button. A decoy in an auction-room; so called because he buttons or ties the unwary to bargains offered for sale. The button fastens or fixes what else would slip away.

The button of the cap. The tip-top. Thus, in Hamlet, Guildenstern says: "On fortune's cap we are not the very button" (act ii. sc. 2), i.e. the most highly favoured. The button on the cap was a mark of honour. Thus, in China to the present hour, the first grade of literary honour is the privilege of adding a gold button to the cap, a custom adopted in several collegiate schools of England. This gives the expression quoted a further force. Also, the several grades of mandarins are distinguished by a different coloured button on the top of their cap.

Button (of a foil). The piece of cork fixed to the end of a foil to protect the point and prevent injury in fencing.

Buttons. The two buttons on the back of a coat, in the fall of the back, are a survival of the buttons on the back of riding-coats and military frocks of the eighteenth century, occasionally used to button back the coat-tails.

A boy in buttons. A page, whose jacket in front is remarkable for a display of small round buttons, as close as they can be inserted, from chin to waist.

The letter (single) of an electric bell brought a large fat buttons, with a stage effect of being dressed to look small."—Howell: History of New Fortunes, 1761, p. 560.

He has not all his buttons. He is half-silly: "not all there"; he is "a button short."

Dash my buttons. Here, "buttons" means lot or destiny, and "dash" is a euphemistic form of a more offensive word.

The buttons came off the foil. Figuratively, the courtesies of controversy are neglected.

Familiarity with controversy... will have accustomed him to the misadventures which arise when, as sometimes will happen in the heat of fence, the buttons come off the foil."—Nineteenth Century (June, 1881, p. 925).
To buy over a person’s head. To outbid another.

Buy Up (To). To purchase stock to such an amount as to obtain a virtual monopoly, and thus command the market; to make a corner, as “to buy up corn,” etc.

Buying a Pig in a Poke. (See Pig, etc.)

Buzz (Serjeant). A driving, chaffing, masculine bar orator, who twits “Chops and Tomato Sauce” into a declaration of love. (Dickens: Pickwick Papers.)

Buzz. Empty the bottle. A corruption of boozc (to drink).

“In hunting a hunt ‘twas his gift to excel, And of all jolly cupers he bore off the bell.”

(See Boozy.)

Buzz (A). A rumour, a whispered report.

“ ‘Yes, that, on every dream, Each buzz, each fancy . . . . He may unguard his doughty.”

Shakespeare: King Lear, i. 4.

Buzzard (The) is meant for Dr. Burnett, whose figure was lumpy.

“The noble Buzzard ever pleased me best.”

Dryden: Hudibras, part iii. 112.

Buzzard called hawk by courtesy. It is a euphemism—a brevet rank—a complimentary title.

“Of small renown, ’tis true; for, not to lie, We call your buzzard’ hawk” by courtesy.”

Dryden: Hudibras, part iii. 112-15.

Between hawk and buzzard. Not quite a lady or gentleman, nor quite a servant. Applied to tutors in private houses, bear-leaders, and other grown-up persons who are allowed to come down to dessert, but not to be guests at the dinner-table.

By. Meaning against. “I know nothing by myself, yet am I not thereby justified.” (1 Cor. iv. 4.)

By-and-by now means a little time hence, but when the Bible was translated it meant instantly. “When persecution ariseth . . . by-and-by he is offended” (Matt. xiii. 21); rendered in Mark iv. 17 by the word “immediately.” Our presently means in a little time hence, but in French présentement means now, directly. Thus in France we see, These apartments to be let presently, meaning now—a phrase which would in English signify by-and-by.

Bygones. Let bygones be bygones. Let old grievances be forgotten and never brought to mind.
By-laws. Local laws. From by, a borough. Properly, laws by a Town Council, and bearing only on the borough or company over which it has jurisdiction.

By-road (A). Not a main road; a local road.

By-the-by. En passant, laterally connected with the main subject. "By-play" is side or secondary play; "By-lanes and streets" are those which branch out of the main thoroughfare. The first "by" means passing from one to another, as in the phrase "Day by day." Thus "By-the-by" is passing from the main subject to a by or secondary one.

By-the-way is an incidental remark thrown in, and tending the same way as the discourse itself.

Byron. The Polish Byron. Adam Mickiewicz (1798-1855).

Byrsa. (See page 191, col. 1, BURBA.)

Byzantine Art. That symbolical system which was developed by the early Greek or Byzantine artists out of the Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, dome, and round arch; and its chief symbols the lily, cross, vesica, and nimbus. St. Sophia, at Constantinople, and St. Mark, at Venice, are excellent examples.

Byzantine Empire (The). The Eastern or Greek Empire from 395 to 1463.

Byzantine Historians. Certain Greek historians who lived under the Eastern empire between the sixth and fifteenth centuries. They may be divided into three groups:—(1) Those whose works form a continuous history of the Byzantine empire, from the fourth century to the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks; (2) general chroniclers who wrote histories of the world from the oldest period; and (3) writers on Roman antiquities, statistics, and customs.

Byzantines (3 syl.). Coins of the Byzantine empire, generally called Byzants.

C.

C. This letter is the outline of the hollow of the hand, and is called in Hebrew כף (the hollow of the hand).

C. The French c, when it is to be sounded like s, has a mark under it (ç); this mark is called a cedilla. (A diminutive of z; called ceta in Greek, cede in Spanish.)

C. There is more than one poem written of which every word begins with C. For example:

(1) One composed by Huyard in honour of Charles le Chauve. It is in Latin hexameters and runs to somewhat more than a hundred lines, the last two of which are

"Conveniet claris clausulis componere cannas Complicior clarus carmen cantabile calvis."

(2) One by HAMONTIUS, called "Certamen catholicum cum Calviniis."

(3) One by HENRY HARDKIRCH, of 100 lines in Latin, on "Cats," entitled:

"Canum cum Catis certamen carmine
Compositione currente calamo C. Catuli Caninii." The first line is—

"Catarum caninum certamina clara canumque."

"Cats" canine cataracta, contendit canum.

See M and P for other examples.

Ca ira (it will go). Called emphatically Le Carillon National of the French Revolution (1790). It went to the tune of the Carillon National, which Marie Antoinette was for ever strumming on her harpsichord.

"Ça ira" was the rallying cry borrowed by the Federalists from Dr. Franklin of America, who used to say, in reference to the American revolution, "Ah! ah! ça ira, ça ira!" ("twill be sure to do). The refrain of the carillon is—

Ha! ha! It will speed, it will speed; Resistance in vain, we are sure to succeed.

Caaba (3 syl.). The shrine of Mecca, said by the Arabs to be built on the exact spot of the tabernacle let down from heaven at the prayer of repentant Adam. Adam had been a wanderer for 200 years, and here received pardon. The shrine was built, according to Arab tradition, by Ishmael, assisted by his father Abraham, who inserted in the walls a black stone "presented to him by the angel Gabriel."

Cab. A contraction of cabriole (a little carperen), a small carriage that scamper along like a kid.

Cabal. A juncto or council of intriguers. One of the Ministries of Charles II. was called a cabal (1670), because the initial letters of its members formed this acrostic: Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale. This acerb may have popularised the word, but, without doubt, we borrowed it from the French cabale, "an intriguing faction,” and Hebrew cabala, “secret knowledge.” A junta is merely an assembly; Spanish, justa, a council. (See Notaricia; Tammany Ring.)

“in dark cabala and mighty junta met.”

Thomson

“Those ministers were emphatically called the Cabal, and they soon made the appellation so infamous that it has never since . . . been used except as a term of reproach.” — Macaulay: England, vol. i. chap. ii. p. 165.

Cab'ala. The oral law of the Jews delivered down from father to son by word of mouth. Some of the rabbins say that the angel Raziel instructed Adam in it, the angel Japhiel instructed Shem, and the angel Zedekiel instructed Abraham; but the more usual belief is that God instructed Moses, and Moses his brother Aaron, and so on from age to age.

N.B.—The promises held out by the cabala are: the abolition of sin and sickness, abundant provision of all things needful for our well-being during life, familiar intercourse with deity and angels, the gift of languages and prophecy, the power of transmuting metals, and also of working miracles.

Cabalist. A Jewish doctor who professed the study of the Cabala, a mysterious science said to have been delivered to the Jews by revelation, and transmitted by oral tradition. This science consisted mainly in understanding the combination of certain letters, words, and numbers, said to be significant.

Cabalistico. Mystic word-juggling. (See Cabalist.)

Caballero. A Spanish dance, grave and stately; so called from the ballad-music to which it was danced. The ballad begins—

“Esta noche le mataron al caballero.”

Cabbage. It is said that no sort of food causes so much thirst as cabbage, especially that called colewort. Pausanias tells us it first sprang from the sweat of Jupiter, some drops of which fell on the earth. Collius, Rhodiginus, Ovid, Suidas, and others repeat the same fable.

Cabbage (76°). To filch. Sometimes a tailor is called “cabbage,” from his pilfering cloth given him to make up. Thus in Motteux’s Rabelais, iv. 52, we read of “Poor Cabbage’s hair.” (Old French, cabas, theft, verb cabasser; Dutch, kabbassen; Swedish, grabba; Danish, griber, our grab.)

“Your tailor, instead of shreds, cabbages whole yards of cloth.” —Drake’s John Bull.

Cabbage is also a common schoolboy term for a literary crib, or other petty theft.

Cabinet Ministers. The chief officers of state in whom the administrative government is vested. It contains the First Lord of the Treasury (the Premier), the Lord High Chancellor, Lord President of the Council, Lord Privy Seal, Chancellor of the Exchequer, six Secretaries of State, the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Lieutenant and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, President of the Board of Trade, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, the President of the Board of Agriculture. These Secretaries of State are those of the Home Department, Foreign Affairs, Colonies, War, India, and Chief-Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. Sometimes other members of the Government are included, and sometimes one or two of the above left out of the Cabinet. These Ministers are privileged to consult the Sovereign in the private cabinet of the palace.

Cabriri. Mystic divinities worshipped in ancient Egypt, Phoenicia, Asia Minor, and Greece. They were inferior to the supreme gods. (Phoenician, kabir, powerful.)

Cable’s Length. 100 fathoms.

* Some think to avoid a difficulty by rendering Matthew xix. 24 “It is easier for a cable to go through the eye of a needle . . . .”, but the word is ακαθήλος, and the whole force of the passage rests on the “impossibility” of the thing, as it is distinctly stated in Mark x. 24.

“How hard is it for them that trust in [their] riches, εἰς τοὺς χρυσαύγ. . . .” It is impossible by the virtue of money or by bribes to enter the kingdom of heaven. (See page 205, col. 1, Camel.)

Cabochoon (Fr.). Uncut, but only polished; applied to emeralds, rubies, and other precious stones. (French, cabochoon.)

Cachoose Bell. A bell rung at funerals, when the pall was thrown over the coffin. (French, cache corps, cover over the body.)

Ca'chet (pron. ca'kay). Lettres de cachet (letters sealed). Under the old French régime, carte-blanche warrants, sealed with the king’s seal, might be obtained for a consideration, and the Cacodemon. An evil spirit. Astrologers give this name to the Twelfth House of Heaven, from which only evil prognostics proceed. (Greek, kakos deimon.)

"Nesthe to hell for shame, and leave the world, Thou cacodemon." Shakespeare: Richard III., i. 3.

Socotothes (Greek). A "bad habit." Socootes loquendi. A passion for making speeches or for talking. Socootes scribendi. The love of rushing into print; a mania for authorship.

Cacas. A famous robber, represented as three-headed, and vomiting flames. He lived in Italy, and was in league with Hercules. Sancho Panza says of the Lord Rinaldo and his friends: "They are greater thieves than Cacus." (Dona Quixote.)

Cad. A low, vulgar fellow; an omnibus conductor. Either from cadet, or a contraction of cadger (a packman). The etymology of cad, caduceus, is only a pun. "N.B.—The Scotch cadie or cadier (a little servant, or errand-boy, or carrier of a sedan-chair), without the diminutive, offers a plausible suggestion."

"All Edinburgh men and boys know that when sedan-chairs were discontinued, the old cadies sank into ruinous poverty, and became synonymous with toughs. The word was brought to London by James Hanney, who frequently used it."—M. Pringle.

Caddies or Caddis. Worsted gallon, crewel. (Welsh, cades, brocade; cadach, a karchief; Irish, cadan.)

"He hath rhymbes of all the colours f' the rainbow. They caddises, cambrics, lawns."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Cadger-garter. A servant, a man of minor rank. When garterers were worn in sight, the gentry used very expensive ones, but the base sort wore worsted gallon ones. Prince Henry calls Pains a "cadger-garter." (1 Henry IV., ii. 4.)

Caddy. A ghost, a bugbear. A caddis is a grub, a bait for anglers.

"Poor Mister Levathan Addis! a Lo! his grandeur so late a day
Is sinking (and fall to a caddy)."

Peter Pindar: Great Cry and Little Wool, epistle I.

Cade. Jack Cade legislation. Pressure from without. The allusion is to the insurrection of Jack Cade, an Irishman, who headed about 20,000 armed men, chiefly of Kent, "to procure redress of grievances" (1450).

"You that love the commons, follow me;
Now show yourselves men; 'tis for liberty.
We will not leave one lord, one gentleman:
Spare none but such as go in clouted shoon." Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iv. 2.

Cader Idris or Arthur's Seat. Of no man passes the night sitting on this "chair," he will be either a poet or a madman.

Cadessia (Battle of) gave the Arabs the monarchy of Persia. (A.D. 680.)

Cadet. Younger branches of noble families are called cadets, because their armorial shields are marked with a difference called a cadency.

Cadet is a student at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, or in one of her Majesty's training ships, the Excellent and the Britannia. From these places they are sent (after passing certain examinations) into the army as ensigns or second lieutenants, and into the navy as midshipmen. (French, cadet, junior member of a family.)

Cadger. One who carries butter, eggs, and poultry to market; a packman or huckster. From cadge (to carry). Hence the frame on which hawks were carried was called "a cadge," and the man who carried it, a "cadger." A man of low degree.

"Every cadger thinks himself as good as an earl."—McDonald: Malcolm, part ia., chap. xii., p. 161.

Cadi, among the Turks, Arabs, etc., is a town magistrate or inferior judge. "Cadi Lesker" is a superior cadi. The Spanish Alcaide is the Moorish at cadis. (Arabic, the judge.)

Cadman Letters (The).—The simple Greek letters introduced by Cadmus from Phœacia. (Greek myth.)

Cadman's Victory (Greek, Kadmeia nikè; Latin, Cadmus Victoria). A victory purchased with great loss. The allusion is to the armed men who sprang out of the ground from the teeth of the dragon sown by Cadmus. These men fell foul of each other, and only five of them escaped death.
Cadmians. The people of Carthage are called the Genus Cadnius, and so are the Thebans.

Cadmus having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dircé, in Boösis, sowed the teeth of the monster, when a number of armed men sprang up and surrounded Cadmus with intent to kill him. By the counsell of Minerva, he threw a precious stone among the armed men, who, striving for it, killed one another. The foundation of the fable is this: Cadmus having slain a famous free-booter that infested Boösis, his banditti set upon him to revenge their captain’s death; but Cadmus sent a bribe, for which they quarrelled and slew each other.

Cadogan (Ca-dug’-an). A club of hair worn by young French ladies: so called from the portrait of the first Earl of Cadogan, a print at one time very popular in France. The fashion was introduced at the court of Montbéliard by the Duchesse de Bourdon.

Caduceus (4 syl.). A white wand carried by Roman officers when they went to treat for peace. The Egyptians adorned the rod with a male and female serpent twisted about it, and kissing each other. From this use of the rod, it became the symbol of eloquence and also of office. In mythology, a caduceus with wings is placed in the hands of Mercury, the herald of the gods; and the poets feign that he could therewith give sleep to whomsoever he chose; wherefore Milton styles it “his opiate rod” in Paradise Lost, xi. 133.

“So with his dread caduceus Remus led
From the dark regions of the imprisoned dead;
Or drove in silent shun the lingering train
To Night’s still shore and Pluto’s dreary reign.”
Burton: Lives of the Poets, ii. 291.

Cadurci. The people of Aquitania. Cadours is the modern capital.

Cadmon. Cowherd of Whitby, the greatest poet of the Anglo-Saxons. In his wonderful romance we find the bold prototype of Milton’s Paradise Lost. The portions relating to the fall of the angels are most striking. The hero encounters, defeats, and finally slays Grendel, an evil being of supernatural powers.

Cæsarean Franchise (Thr.). The franchise of a Roman subject in a prefecture. These subjects had the right of self-government, and were registered by the Roman censor as tax-payers; but they enjoyed none of the privileges of a Roman citizen. Caries was the first community placed in this dependent position, whence the term Cæsarean franchise.

Cæstrianon, on the Usk, in Wales. The habitual residence of King Arthur, where he lived in splendid state, surrounded by hundreds of knights, twelve of whom he selected as Knights of the Round Table.

Cæsar was made by Hadrian a title, conferred on the heir presumptive to the throne (A.D. 136). Diocletian conferred the title on the two viceroys, calling the two emperors Augustus (sacred majesty). The German Emperor still assumes the title of Kaiser (q.v.).

“Thou art an emperor, Caesar, kaiser, and Pharaoh.”—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 3.

“No bending knees shall call thee Caesar now.”
Shakespeare: 3Henry VI., iii. 1.

Cæsar, as a title, was pretty nearly equivalent to our Prince of Wales, and the French dauphin.

Cæsar’s wife must be above suspicion. The name of Pomphoris having been mixed up with an accusation against P. Clodius, Cæsar divorced her; not, because he believed her guilty, but because the wife of Cæsar must not even be suspected of crime. (Suetonius: Julius Cæsar, 74.)

Cæsar. (See page 76, 2, AU CÆSAR.) Julius Cæsar’s sword. Cæsar won 320 triumphs.

Cæsarian Operation or Cæsarian Operation. The extraction of a child from the womb by cutting the abdomen (Latin, ceseo, cut from the womb). Julius Cæsar is said to have been thus brought into the world.

Cæsarianism. The absolute rule of man over man, with the recognition of no law divine or human beyond that of the ruler’s will. (See CHAUVINISM.)

Cæteris paribus (Latin). Other things being equal; presuming all other conditions to be equal.

Cæs (Mount). In Mohammedan mythology is that huge mountain in the middle of which the earth is sunk, as a night light is placed in a cup. Its foundation is the emerald Sulkrut, the reflection of which gives the azure hue to the sky.

Cætan. A garment worn in Turkey and other Eastern countries. It is a sort of under-garment or vest tied by a girdle at the waist.

“Picturesque mercenaries and their customers, no longer in the top trowsers of Egypt, but the long cætans and alba of Syria.”—R. Taylor: Lands of the Saracen, chap. 11. p. 12.
Cag Mag. Offal, bad meat; also a tough old goose; food which none can relish. (Gaelic and Welsh, cag magw.)

Cage. To whistle or sing in the cage. The cage is a jail, and to whistle in a cage is to turn Queen's evidence, or peach against a comrade.

Cagioastro. Conte de Cagioastro, or Giuseppe Balsamo of Palermo, a charlatan who offered everlasting youth to all who would pay him for his secret (1743-1795).

Cagots. A sort of gipsy race in Gascony and Bearne, supposed to be descendants of the Visigoths, and shunned as something loathsome. (See CAQUEUX, COLIBBERTS.)

Chahors. Ueuvriers de Chahors. In the thirteenth century there was a colony of Jewish money-lenders settled at Chahors, which was to France what Lombard Street was to London.

Calaphas. The country-house of Caiaphas, in which Judas concluded his bargain to betray his Master, stood on "The Hill of Evil Counsel."

Cain-coloured Beard. Yellow, symbolic of treason. In the ancient tapestries Cain and Judas are represented with yellow beards. (See YELLOW.)

"He hath but a little wee face, with a little yellow beard, a Cain-coloured beard."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 4.

Caineites (2 syl.). Disciples of Cain, a pseudo-Gnostic sect of the second century. They denounced the New Testament, and received instead The Gospel of Judas, which justified the false disciple and the crucifixion of Jesus. This sect maintained that heaven and earth were created by the evil principle, and that Cain with his descendants were the persecuted party.

Ca irds or Jockeys. Gipsy tribes. Halliwell tells us "Caird" in Northumberland = tinker, and gipsies are great mendes of pots and pans. (Irish, caird, a tinker; Welsh, cawd, art or craft.)

"Donald Caird's come again." Popular Song.

Caius (Dr.). A French physician in Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.

"The clipped English of Dr. Caius."—Maccanlay.

Caius College (Cambridge). Elevated by Dr. John Key (Caius), of Norwich, into a college, being previously only a hall called Gonville. Called Keys. (1587.)

Cake. A fool, a poor thing. (Cf. HALF-BAKED.)

Cake. To take the cake. To carry off the prize. The reference is to the prize-cake to the person who succeeded best in a given competition. In Notes and Queries (Feb. 27th, 1892, p. 176) a correspondent of New York tells us of a "cake walk" by the Southern negroes. It consists of walking round the prize cake in pairs, and umpires decide which pair walk the most gracefully. In ancient Greece a cake was the award of the toper who held out the longest.

In Ireland the best dancer in a dancing competition was rewarded, at one time, by a cake.

"A churn-dish stuck into the earth supported on its flat end a cake, which was to become the prize of the best dancer. . . . At length the competitors yielded their claims to a young man who, taking the cake, placed it gallantly in the lap of a pretty girl to whom . . . he was about to be married."—Bartlett and Cowe: Scenery and Antiquities of Ireland, vol. ii. p. 84.

You cannot eat your cake and have it too. You cannot spend your money and yet keep it. You cannot serve God and Mammon.

Your cake [or my cake] is dough. All my swans are turned to geese. Ociwa est res tua [or mea]. Mon affaire est manquée; my project has failed.

Cake...Dough. I wish my cake were dough again. I wish I had never married. Bellenden Ker says the proverb is a corruption of Ei s'hisweke my keke was d'how en gree, which he says is tantamount to "Something whispers within me—repetition; would that my marriage were set aside."

Cakes. Land of Cakes. Scotland, famous for its oatmeal cakes.

"Land o' cakes and burnie bents." Burns.

Cabalash. A drinking cup or water-holder; so called from the cabalash nut of which it is made.

Calamanco Cat (A). A tortoise-shell cat. Calamanco is a glossy woollen fabric, sometimes striped or variegated. It is the Spanish word Calamundo.

Calamity. The beating down of standing corn by wind or storm. The word is derived from the Latin calamum (a stalk of corn). Hence, Cicero calls a storm Calamitiose tempestas (a corn-levelling tempest).

"Another ill accident is drought, and the spoil- ing of the corn; inasmuch as the word calamity was first derived from calamum (a stalk), when the corn could not get out of the car."—Bacon.
Calandrino. A typical simpleton frequently introduced in Boccaccio’s Decameron; expressly made to befooled and played upon.

Calatrava (Red Cross Knights of). Instituted at Calatrava, in Spain, by Sancho III. of Castile in 1158: their badge is a red cross cut out in the form of illies, on the left breast of a white mantle.

Calauria. Pro Delo Calauria (Orid: Metamorphoses, vii. 384). Calauria was an island in the Sinus Saraconicus which Latona gave to Neptune in exchange for Delos. A quid pro quo.

Calceolaria. Little-shoe flowers; so called from their resemblance to fairy slippers. (Latin, calceolus.)

Calceus mutavit. He has changed his shoes, that is, has become a senator. Roman senators were distinguished by their shoes, which were sandaled across the instep and up the ankles.

Calculate is from the Latin calculi (pebbles), used by the Romans for counters. In the abacus, the round balls were called calculi, and it was by this instrument the Roman boys were taught to count and calculate. The Greeks voted by pebbles dropped into an urn—a method adopted both in ancient Egypt and Syria; counting these pebbles was “calculating” the number of voters. (See page 2, col. 1, ABACUS.)

I calculate. A peculiarity of expression common in the western states of North America. In the southern states the phrase is “I reckon,” in the middle states “I expect,” and in New England “I guess.” All were imported from the mother country by early settlers.

“Your aunt has two tables, I calculate; don’t she?”—Susan Warner: Querby (vol. i, chap. xix.)

Calculators (The). Alfragan, the Arabian astronomer. Died 820.

Jedediah Buxton, of Elmton, in Derbyshire. (1705-1773.)

George Bidder and Zerah Colburn (an American), who exhibited publicly.

“Buxton, being asked ‘How many cubic eights-of-an-inch there are in a body whose three sides are 23.143,760 yards, 8,545,782 yards, and 54,905 yards?’ replied correctly without setting down a figure.”

Colburn, being asked the square root of 100,929 and the cube root 209,330,125, replied before the audience had set the figures down.”—Price: Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 570.

Cale. [See KARE.]

Caleb. The enchantress who carried off St. George in infancy.

Caleb, in Dryden’s satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Lord Grey of Wark (Northumberland), one of the adherents of the Duke of Mommouth.

“And, therefore, in the name of dulness, he
The well-famed Balsam (Earl of Huntingdon) and old Caleb free.

Caleb Quotum. A parish clerk or jack-of-all-trades, in Colman’s play called The Review, or Wars of Windsor, which first appeared in 1808. Colman borrowed the character from a farce by Henry Lee (1798) entitled Throw Phylus to the Dogs.

“I resolved, like Caleb Quotum, to have a place at the review.”—Washington Irving.

Caledon. Scotland. (See next article.)

“Not thus, in ancient days of Caledon,
Was thy voice mute amidst the festive crowd.”

Sir W. Scott.

Caledonia. Scotland. A corruption of Celtic, a Celtic word meaning “a dweller in woods and forests.” The word Celt is itself a corruption of the same word (Celt), and means the same thing.

“Sees Caledonia in romantic view.”—Thomson.

“O Caledonia, stern and wild, Midst storms in the midst of the storm.”—Scott.

Calembour (French). A pun, a jest. From the “Jester of Kalenberg,” whose name was Wigand von Thesen; a character introduced in Tyll Eulenspiegel, a German tale. Eulenspiegel (a fool or jester) means Owl’s looking-glass, and may probably have suggested the title of the periodical called the Owl, the witty but satirical “looking-glass” of the passing follies of the day. The jester of Calembour visited Paris in the reign of Louis XV., and soon became noted for his blunders and puiss.

Calendar.

The Julian Calendar, introduced B.C. 46. It fixed the ordinary year to 365 days, with an extra day every fourth year (leap year). This is called “The Old Style.”

The Gregorian Year. A modification of the Julian Calendar, introduced in 1582 by Pope Gregory XIII., and adopted in Great Britain in 1752. This is called “the New Style.”

The Mohammedan Calendar, used in Mohammedan countries, dates from July 16th, 622, the day of the Hegira. It consists of 12 lunar months (29 days, 12 hours, 44 minutes). A cycle is 30 years. The Revolutionary Calendar was the work of Fabre d'Eglantine and Mons. Homme.

Calendar. A Newgate Calendar or "Malaefactors' Bloody Register," containing the biography, confessions, dying speeches, etc., of notorious criminals. Began in 1700.

Calendars (The Three) were three royal princes, disguised as beggar dervishes, the subjects of three tales in the Arabian Nights.

Calendar. The first of every month was so called by the Romans. Varro says the term originated in the practice of calling together or assembling the people on the first day of the month, when the pontifex informed them of the time of the new moon, the day of the nones, with the festivals and sacred days to be observed. The custom continued till a.d. c. 450, when the fasti or calendar was posted in public places. (See GREEK CALENDARS.)

Calcepin (A). A dictionary. (Italian. calcepino.) Ambrosio Calepino, of Calepio, in Italy, was the author of a dictionary, so that "my Calcepin," like my Echid, my Johnson, according to Cocke, etc., have become common nouns from proper names. Generally called Calcepin, but the subjoined quotation throws the accent on the le.

"Whom do you prefer For the best linguist? And I readily Said that I thought Calcepin's Dictionary." Dr. Donne: Fourth Satire.

Calceys (A Stock Exchange term). Caledonian Railway Ordinary Stock. A contraction of Calce-donians. (See STOCK EXCHANGE SLANG.)

Calif-love. Youthful fancy as opposed to lasting attachment.

"I thought it was a childish besotted son had for the man—a sort of calif-love."—Rhoda Broughton.

Calif-skin. Fools and jesters used to wear a calif-skin coat buttoned down the back. In allusion to this custom, Faulconbridge says insolently to the Archduke of Austria, who had acted most basely to Richard (Cuer-de-Lion)—

"Then wear a lion's hide! Doff it, for shame, And hang a calif-skin on those recant limbs."—Shakespeare: King John, iv. 1.

Caliban. Rude, uncouth, unknown; as a Caliban style, a Calikan language. The allusion is to Shakespeare's Caliban (The Tempest), in which character Lord Falkland, etc., said that Shakespeare had not only invented a new creature, but also a new language.

"Satam had not the pleasure, as Calibian, to use new phrases, and diction unknown."—Dr. Bentley.

Caledge says, "As in him [Calibian, as in some brute animals, this advance to the intellectual faculties, without the moral sense, is marked by the appearance of vice]."

(Caliban is the "musing lick" between brute animals and man.)

Calibre [ka-ber]. A mind of no calibre: of no capacity. A mind of great calibre: of large capacity. Calibre is the bore of a gun, and, figuratively, the bore or compass of one's intelligence.

"The enemy had generally new arms . . . of uniform calibre."—Grant: Memoirs, vol. i. chap. xxxix. p. 372.

"We meaure men's calibre by the broadest circle of achievements."—Chapin: Lessons of Judith, p. 10.

Caliburn. Same as Excalibur, King Arthur's well-known sword. (See SWORD.)

"Oward Arthur paced, with hand On Caliburn's reumless brand."—Scott: Bride of Triermain.

Calico. So called from Calicut, in Malabar, once the chief port and emporium of Hindustan.

Calidore (3 syl.). Sir Calidore is the type of courtesy, and hero of the sixth book of Spenser's Faerie Queene.

He is described as the most courteous of all knights, and is entitled the "all-boloved." The model of the poet was Sir Philip Sidney. His adventure is against the Blantast Beast, whom he muzzles, chains, and drags to Faerie Land.

"Sir Gawain was the Calidore of the Round Table."—Somethy.

Calligorant. An Egyptian giant and cannibal who used to entrap strangers with a hidden net. This net was made by Vulcan to catch Mars and Venus; Mercury stole it for the purpose of catching Chloris, and left it in the temple of Anubis; Caligorant stole it thence. At length Astolpho blew his magic horn, and the giant run affrighted into his own net, which dragged him to the ground. Whereupon Astolpho made the giant his captive, and deposed him of his net. This is an allegory. Calligorant was a great sophist and heretic in the days of Ariosto, who used to entangle people with his talk; but being converted by Astolpho to the true faith, was, as it were, caught in his own net, and both his sophistry and heresy were taken from him. (Ariosto: Orlando Furioso.)

Caligula. A Roman emperor; so called because he wore a military sandal called a caliga, which had no upper leather, and was used only by the common soldiers. (12. 37-41.)

"The word caliga, however, continued the Pravon . . . impots, in its primitive sense, Call of Abraham. The invitation, or command of God to Abraham, to leave his idolatrous country, under the promise of being made a great nation.

Call of God. An invitation, exhortation, or warning, by the dispensations of Providence (Isa. xxii. 12); divine influence on the mind to do or avoid something (Heb. iii. 1).

Call of the House. An imperative summons sent to every Member of Parliament to attend. This is done when the sense of the whole House is required. At the muster the names of the members are called over, and defaulters reported.

Call to Arms (To). To summon to prepare for battle. "Ad arma vocare."

Call to the Bar. The admission of a law student to the privileges of a barrister. The names of those qualified are called over. (See page 94, col. 1, BAR.)

Call to the Pastorate. An invitation to a minister by the members of a Presbyterian or Nonconformist church to preside over a certain congregation.

Call to the Unconverted. An invitation accompanied with promises and threats, to induce the unconverted to receive the gospel. Richard Baxter wrote a book so entitled.

Call (To). I call God to witness. I solemnly declare that what I state is true.

Call. To invite: us, the trumpet calls.

"If honour calls, where'er she points the way,
The sons of honour follow and obey."

To call [a man] out. To challenge him; to appeal to a man's honour to come forth and fight a duel.

To call in question. To doubt the truth of a statement; to challenge the truth of a statement. "In dubium vocare."

To call over the coals. (See COALS.)
To call to account. To demand an explanation; to reprove.

Called. He is called to his account. He is removed by death. Called to the judgment seat of God to give an account of his deeds, whether they be good, or whether they be evil. (See page 202, col. 1, CALLING.)

Calabre or Calaburr. A Calabrian fur. Du Cange says, "At Chichester the 'priest vicars' and at St. Paul's the 'minor canons' wore a calabre amyce;" and Bale, in his Image of Both Churches, alludes to the "fair rockets of Raines (Rennes), and costly grey amicoes of calabar and cats' tails."
"The Lord Mayor and the aldermen above the chair from, to have their coats furred with grey mink, and also with changable taffetas; and those below the chair with calabre and with green taffetas."—Hunton: New View of London.

Caller Herrings. Fresh herrings. Hence "caller air." (Anglo-Saxon, calian, to cool.)

Caligraphy (The art of). Writing very minutely and yet clearly. Peter Bale, in the sixteenth century, wrote in the compass of a silver penny the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, two Latin prayers, his own name, the day of the month and date of the year since the accession of Queen Elizabeth, and a motto. With a glass this writing could be read. By photography a sheet of the Times newspaper has been reduced to a smaller compass. (Greek, calos-grapho, I write beautifully.)

Callimachus. The Italian Callimachus. Filippo Buonaccorsi (1437-1496).

Calling. A vocation, trade, or profession. The allusion is to the calling of the apostles by Jesus Christ to follow him. In the legal profession persons must still be called to the bar before they can practice.

Effectual calling. An invitation to believe in Jesus, rendered effectual by the immediate operation of the Holy Ghost.

Calliope [Kal’-i-o-pe, 4 syl., Greek, kalos, ʃə, beautiful voice]. The muse of epic or heroic poetry. Her emblems are a stylus and wax tablets. The painting of her muse by Ercolana Brocchetti (1618-1687), and her statue by Clementi (who died in 1580) are very celebrated.

1. The Greek word is Kalliope, in which the i is short. erroneously called "Callipe."

Callipolida. A character in the Battle of Alcazar (1594) by George Peele. It is referred to by Pistol in 2 Henry IV., act ii. 4; and Sir W. Scott uses the word over and over again as the synonym of lady-love, sweetheart, charmer. Sir Walter always spells the word Callipolida, but Peele calls it Callipolis. The drunken Mike Lambourne says to Amy Robsart—

"Mark ye, most fair Callipolida, or most lovely countess of clouts, and divine duchess of dark corners."—Kentworth, chap. xxxii.

And the modest Roland Greene calls the beautiful Catherine his "most fair Callipolis." (The Abbot, chap. xi.)

Callippic Period. The correction of the Metonic cycle by Callippus. In four cycles, or seventy-six years, the Metonic calculation was seven and a-half in excess. Callippus proposed to quadruple the period of Meton, and deduct a day at the end of it: at the expiration of which period Callippus imagined that the new and full moons returned to the same day of the solar year.

Callirhoe (4 syl.). The lady-love of Charæas, in Chariton's Greek romance, entitled the Loves of Charæas and Callirhoe, written in the eighth century.

Cal'mol. Hooper says—

"This name, which means 'beautiful black,' was originally given to the Athenian mineral, or black sulphur of mercury. It was afterwards applied in a joke by Sir Theodore Mayerne to theabinet of mercury, in honour of a favorite negro servant whom he employed to prepare it. As calomel is a white powder, the name is merely a jocular miniemure."—Medical Dictionary.

Greek, kalos, beautiful, μάκας, black.

Caloyer. Monks in the Greek Church, who follow the rule of St. Basil. They are divided into monobites, who recite the offices from midnight to sunrise; anchorites, who live in hermitages; and recluses, who shut themselves up in caverns and live on alms. (Greek, kalos, and γέρον, beautiful old man.)

Calpe (2 syl.). Calpe and Abyla. The two pillars of Hercules. According to one account, these two were originally only one mountain, which Hercules tore asunder; but some say he piled up each mountain separately, and poured the sea between them.

"Heaves up huge Abyla on Afric's sand,
Crowns with much Calpe Europe's southern strand,
Crests with appearing towers the splendid scene,
And pours from arms immense the seas between."—Dryden: Eneid.

Cal'umet [the peace-pipe.] When the North American Indians make peace or form an alliance, the high contracting parties smoke together to ratify the arrangement.

The peace-pipe is about two and a-half feet long, the bowl is made of highly-polished red marble, and the stem of a reed, which is decorated with eagles' quills, women's hair, and so on.

"The Great Spirit at an ancient period called the Indian nations together, and standing on the precipice of the red pipe-stone rock, broke off a piece which he moulded into the bowl of a pipe, and sitting on it a long reed, filled the pipe with the bark of red willow, and smoked over them, turning to the four winds. He told them the red colour of the pipe represented their flesh, and when they smoked it they must bury their war-clubs and scalping-knives. At the last whiff the Great Spirit disappeared."
To present the calumet to a stranger is a mark of hospitality and good-will;
to refuse the offer is an act of hostile defiance.

"Wash the war-paint from your face.
Wash the war-stains from your fingers.
Bury your war-clubs and your weapons.
Smoke the calumet together.
And as brothers live henceforward."
Longfellow: Hiawatha.

Cal’vary [bare skull], Gol’gotha [skull]. The place of our Lord’s crucifixion; so called from some fanciful resemblance which it bore to a human skull. The present church of "the Holy Sepulchre" has no claim to be considered the site thereof; it is far more likely that the "mosque of Omar," or the dome of the rock, occupies the real site.

A Calvary. A representation of the successive scenes of the Passion of Christ in a series of pictures, etc., in a church. The shrine containing the representations.

Calvary Clover said to have sprung up in the track made by Pilate when he went to the cross to see his "title affixed" [Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews]. It is a common trefoil, probably a native of India or Turkey. Each of the three round leaves has a little carmine spot in the centre. In the daytime the three leaves of the trefoil form a sort of cross; and in the flowering season the plant bears a little yellow flower, like a "crown of thorns." Julian tells us that each of the three leaves had in his time a white cross in the centre, and that the centre cross lasts visible longer than the crosses of the other two leaves. (See Christian Traditions.)

Calvary Cross (A). A Latin cross mounted on three steps (or grises).

Calvert’s Entire. The 14th Foot Called Calvert from their colonel, Sir Harry Calvert (1806-1826), and entire, because three entire battalions were kept up for the good of Sir Harry, when adjutant-general. The term is, of course, a play on Calvert’s malt liquor. The regiment is now called The Prince of Wales’s Own (West Yorks. Regiment).

Calves. The inhabitants of the Isle of Wight are so called from a legendary joke which states that a calf once got its head firmly wedged in a wooden pale, and, instead of breaking up the pale, the farm-man cut off the calf’s head.

Calves gone to Grass (His). Said of a spindle-legged man. And another mocking taunt is, "Veal will be dear, because there are no calves."

Calves’ Head. There are many ways of dressing a calf’s head. Many ways of saying or doing a foolish thing; a simpleton has many ways of showing his folly; or, generally, if one way won’t do we must try another. The allusion is to the great Calves’ Head Club banquet, when the board was laden with calves’ heads cooked in sundry ways and divers fashions.

Calves’ Head Club. Instituted in ridicule of Charles I. The great annual banquet was held on the 30th January, and consisted of a cod’s head, to represent the person of Charles Stuart, independent of his kingly office; a pike with little ones in its mouth, an emblem of tyranny; a boar’s head with an apple in its mouth to represent the king preying on his subjects; and calves’ heads dressed in sundry ways to represent Charles in his regal capacity. After the banquet, the king’s book (Icon Basilisk) was burnt, and the parting cup was, "To those worthy patriots who killed the tyrant."

Calvinism. The five chief points of Calvinism are:
(1) Predestination, or particular election.
(2) Irresistible grace.
(3) Original sin, or the total depravity of the natural man, which renders it morally impossible to believe and turn to God of his own free will.
(4) Particular redemption.
(5) Final perseverance of the saints.

Calydon. A forest supposed, in the romances relating to King Arthur, to occupy the northern portion of England.

Calypso, in Fénelon’s Télémaque, is meant to represent Madame de Montespain. In fairy mythology, she was queen of the island Oggyia on which Ulysses was wrecked, and where he was detained for seven years.

Calypso’s Isle. Gozo, near Malta. Called in classic mythology Oggyia.

Cam and Isa. The universities of Cambridge and Oxford; so called from the rivers on which they stand.

"May you, my Cam and Isa, prosper long.
1 The right divinest of kings to you we pray.
"Pope: Dunciad, iv. 167.

Cam. The God of love and marriage in Indian mythology.

Cam’o’ho, "richest of men," makes grand preparations for his wedding with Camaldolites. A religious order of great rigidity of life, founded in the vale of Camaldoli in the Tuscan Aponines, by St. Romuald, a Benedictine. (Eleventh century.)

Camara'lsaman (Prince) fell in love with Badoura, Princess of China, the moment he saw her. (Arabian Nights: Prince Camara'lsaman.)

Camaria (Spanish). A clique; the confidants or private advisers of the sovereign. It literally means a small private chamber, and is in Spain applied to the room in which boys are flogged.

"Encircled with a dangerous camaria."—The Tempest.

Camaria. Ne mori'as Camarina (Don't meddle with Camaria). Camarina was a lake in Sicily, which, in time of drought, yielded a pestilential stench. The inhabitants consulted an oracle about draining it, and Apollo replied, "Don't meddle with it." Nevertheless, they drained it, and were long an enemy marched an army over the bed of the lake and plundered the city. The proverb is applied to those who remove one evil, but thus give place to a greater. The Channel may be an evil to those who sincerely wish to do good, but it is a million times better to endure this evil than to make it a high road to invaders. The application is very extensive, as: Don't kill the small birds, or you will be devoured by insects. One pest is a safeguard against a greater one.

"A similar Latin phrase is Anagyria moris." When the lord of Ellangowan drove the gipsies from the neighbourhood, though they had been allowed to remain there undisturbed hitherto, Domnic Sampson warned him of the danger by quoting the proverb "Ne mori'as Camarina."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. v.

Camel's King. Given him by his sister Canace. It had the virtue of healing wounds. (See Camele.) (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. iv.)

"Well might ye wonder how that noble knight, after he had an oft wounded heart, could stand on foot now to renew the fight..."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, v. 3.

Camel. Called by Chaucer, Camel; brother of Canace, a female parron. He challenged every suitor to his sister's hand, and overthrew all except Triamond, who married the lady. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv.) (See Canace.)

Cambria. The ancient name of Wales, the land of the Cimbri or Cymry. "Cambria's fatal day."—Gray: Bard.

Cambrian. Pertaining to Wales; Welsh. (See above.)

"The Cambrian mountains, like far clouds, That skirt the blue horizon, dusky rise."—Thomson: Spring, st. 61-62.

Camphisian. (in geology). The earliest fossiliferous rocks in North Wales. So named by Professor Sedgwick.

Cambria. A kind of very fine white linen cloth, so named from Cambray or Camery in Flanders, where it is still the chief manufacture.

"He bath risongs of all the colours of the rainbow; inkles, cadilles, cambrick, and laun."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iv. 8.

Cambuscan. King of Sarra, in the land of Tartary; the model of all royal virtues. His wife was Elfesta; his two sons, Aiwaraide and Cambale; and his daughter, Canace. On her birthday (October 15th) the King of Arabia and India sent Cambuscan a "steed of brasse, which, between sunset and sunrise, would carry his rider to any spot on the earth." All that was required was to whisper the name of the place in the horse's ear, mount upon his back, and turn a pin set in his ear. When the rider had arrived at the place required, he had to turn another pin, and the horse instantly descended, and, with another screw of the pin, vanished till it was again required. This story is told by Chaucer in the Squire's Tale, but was never finished. Milton (Il Penseroso) accepts the word Cambuscan.

"The story of Cambuscan bold."—Him that left half-heard...—Shakespeare: Henry IV, ii. 4.

Cambuscan (3 syl.). A pompous, ranting character in Preston's lamentable tragedy of that name.

"Give me a cup of sack, to make mine eyes look red: for I must speak in passion, and I will do it in King Camel's seat."—Shakespeare: Henry IV, ii. 4.
Camden Society, for the publication of early historic and literary remains, is named in honour of William Camden, the historian.

Camel. The name of Mahomet's favourite camel was Al Kaswa. The mosque at Koba covers the spot where it killed when Mahomet fled from Mecca. Mahomet considered the kneeling of the camel as a sign sent by God, and remained at Koba in safety for four days. The swiftest of his camels was Al Adha.

Camel. The prophet Mahomet's camel performed the whole journey from Jerusalem to Mecca in four bounds, for which service he had a place in heaven with Alborak (the prophet's "horse"), Balaam's ass, Tobit's dog, and Kestmir (the dog of the seven sleepers). (Curzon.)

Camel. "It is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle, than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of God" (Matt. xix. 24). In the Koran we find a similar expression: "The impious shall find the gates of heaven shut; nor shall he enter till a camel shall pass through the eye of a needle." In the Rabbinical writings we have a slight variety which goes to prove that the word "camel" should not be changed into "cable," as Thesleff conjectures: "Perhaps thou art one of the Pambeldhians, who can make an elephant pass through the eye of a needle." (See CLASS.)

Camellia. The technical name of a genus, and the popular name of the species of evergreen shrubs; so named in honour of G. J. Kamel (Latin Camellia), a Spanish Jesuit. Introduced into England in 1739.

Camelot (Somersetshire), where King Arthur held his court. (See Winchester.)

Camelote (2 syl.). Fustian, rubbish, trash. The cloth so called ought to be made of goats' hair, but is a mixture of wool and silk, wool and hair, or wool, silk, and hair, etc. (French, camelot; Arabic, camelat.) (See page 206, Camel.)

Camose. An anaglyph on a precious stone. The anaglyph is when the figure is raised in relief; an intaglio is when the figure is hollowed out. The word camose means an onyx, and the most famous cameo in the world is the onyx containing the apotheosis of Augustus. These precious stones have two layers of different colours, one serving for the figure, and the other for the ground.

Cam'eron Highlanders. The 79th Regiment of Infantry, raised by Allan Cameron, of Errock, in 1793. Now called "The Queen's Own Cameron Highlanders."

Cameronian Regiment. The 26th Infantry, which had its origin in a body of Cameronians (q.v.), in the Revolution of 1888. Now the 1st Battalion of the Scottish Rifles; the 2nd Battalion is the old No. 90.

Cameroonians. The strictest sect of Scotch Presbyterians, organised in 1880, by Richard Cameron, who was slain in battle at Aird's Moss in 1880. He objected to the alliance of Church and State. In 1876 most of the Cameroonians were merged in the Free Church. In history the Cameroonians are generally called the Covenanters.

Camilla. Virgin queen of the Volscians. Virgil (Aen., vii. 809) says she was so swift that she could run over a field of corn without bending a single blade, or make her way over the sea without even wetting her feet.

"Not so when swift Camilla accours the plain, Files over the unbounding corn and skims along the main." Pope: Essay on Criticism, 372-3.

Camillus, five times Dictator of Rome, was falsely accused of embezzlement, and went into voluntary exile; but when the Gauls besieged Rome, he returned and delivered his country.

"Camillus, only vengeance to his foes." Thomson: Winter.

Camisard. In French history, the Camisards are the Protestant insurgents of the Cevennes, who resisted the violence of the dragonnades, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes. Their leader was Cavalier, afterwards Governor of Jersey.

Camisade or Camisado. A night attack; so called because the attacking party wore a camise or peasant's smock over their armour, both to conceal it, and that they might the better recognise each other in the dark.

Camisele (3 syl.). A loose jacket worn by women when dressed in negligee (French).

Camisole de Force. A strait-waistcoat. Frequently mentioned in accounts of capital punishments in France.

Camian (Battle of Cornwall), which put an end to the Knights of the Round...
Camlet is not connected with the word camel; it is a fine cloth made of goats' hair, called Turkish yarn, and is from the Arabic word camel, which Littré says is so called from seil of camel (the Angora goat).

Cam'mock. As crooked as a cammock.
The cammock is a piece of timber bent for the knee of a ship; a hockey-stick; a skinny-club. (Anglo-Saxon.)

"Though the cammock the more it is bowed the better it is; yet the bow, the more it is bent the weaker it waxeth."—Lily.

Camorra. A secret society of Italy organised early in the nineteenth century. It claimed the right of settling disputes, etc.

Camorrist. One of the desperadoes belonging to the Camorra. "Camorrism," the gospel of the league.

Camp Candlestick (A.). A bottle, or a soldier's bayonet.

Camp-followers. Non-combatants (such as servants, carriers, hostlers, sutlers, laundresses, and so on), who follow an army. We are told that in 1859 as many as 85,000 camp-followers were in attendance on 15,000 combatants in a Bengal army.

Campaign Wig (A.), imported from France. It was made very full, was curled, and was eighteen inches in length in the front, with drop locks. In some cases the back part of the wig was put in a black silk bag. Of course the campaign referred to the victories of Marlborough. (Social Life in the Reign of Queen Anne, chap. xii.).

There were also campaign coats, campaign lace, campaign shoes, campaign shirts, campaign gowns, campaign waistcoats, etc.

Campania. Properly the Terra di Lavoro of Italy, i.e. the plain country about Capua.

"Disdainful of Campania's gentle plains."—Thomson: Summer.

Campane (3 syl.). A beautiful harlot, whom Alexander the Great handed over to Apelles. Apelles drew her in the nude.

"When Cupid and Campane played At cards for kisses, Cupid paid."—Lily.

Campbells are Coming (The). This soul-stirring song was composed in 1715, when the Earl of Mar raised the standard for the Stuarts against George I.

John Campbell was Commander-in-Chief of his Majesty's forces, and the rebellion was quashed. The main interest now attached to the famous song is connected with the siege of Lucknow in the Indian rebellion, 1857. Nana Sahib had massacred women and children most foully, and while the survivors were expecting instant death, a Scotch woman lying ill on the ground heard the pibroch, and exclaimed, "Dinnin' ye hear it? Dinning ye hear it? The pipes o' Havelock sound." And soon afterwards the rescue was accomplished.

The first verse runs thus:—

""The Campbells are coming, O-ho! O-ho! The Campbells are coming, O-ho! The Campbells are coming to bouste Loch Leven, The Campbells are coming, O-ho!"

Campbellite (3 syl.). A follower of John McLeod Campbell, who taught the universality of the atonement, for which, in 1831, he was deposed.

Campesiing. A ceiling sloping on one side from the vertical wall towards a plane surface in the middle. A corruption of can (twisted or bent) ceiling. (Halliwell gives cam, "awry.")

Campesaro (cam-pa'-do). The Cid (q.v.).

Canace (3 syl.). A paragon of women, the daughter of King Cambuscans; to whom the King of Arabia and India sent as a present a mirror and a ring. The mirror would tell the lady if any man on whom she set her heart would prove true or false, and the ring (which was to be worn on her thumb) would enable her to understand the language of birds and to converse with them. It would also give the wearer perfect knowledge of the medicinal properties of all roots. Chaucer never finished the tale, but probably he meant to marry Canace to some knight who would be able to overthrow her two brothers, Cambalo and Al'gursife, in the tournament. (Squire's Tale.) (See below.) Canace was courted by a crowd of suitors, but her brother, Cambalo or Cambel, gave out that anyone who pretended to her hand must encounter him in single combat and overthrow him. She ultimately married Triamond, son of the fairy Agape. (Spenser: Faerie Queen, bk. iv. 3.) (See CAMEL.)

Canache (3 syl.). One of Acteon's dogs. (Greek, "the clang of metal falling.")

Canada Balsam. Made from the Pinus balsamea, a native of Canada.

Canaille (French, can-naye). The mob; the rabble (Italian, canaglia, a pack of dogs, from Latin canis, a dog).

Canard. A hoax. Cornelissen, to try the gullibility of the public, reported in the papers that he had twenty ducks, one of which, he cut up and threw to the nineteen, who devoured it greedily. He then cut up another, then a third, and so on till nineteen were cut up; and as the nineteenth was gobbled up by the surviving duck, it followed that this one duck actually ate nineteen ducks—a wonderful proof of duck voracity. This tale had the run of all the papers, and gave a new word to the language. (French, canard, a duck.) (Quoted.)

Canary (A). Slang for "a guinea" or "sovereign." Gold coin is so called because, like a canary, it is yellow.

Canary-bird (A). A jail-bird. At one time certain desperate convicts were dressed in yellow; and jail was the cage of these "canaries."

Cancan. To dance the cancan. A free-and-easy way of dancing quadrilles invented by Rigoloché, and adopted in the public gardens, the opera comique, and the casinos of Paris. (Cancan familiarity, tittle-tattle.)

"They were going through a quadrille with all those supplementary gestures introduced by the great Rigoloché, a notorious danseur, to whom the notorious cancán owes its origin." — A. Edmond Hakl: Paris Originals (The Chafflower).

Cancel, to blot out,* is merely "to make lattice-work." This is done by making a cross over the part to be omitted. (Latin, cancellare, to make trellises.) (See Cross it out.)

Cancer (the Crab) appears when the sun has reached his highest northern limit, and begins to go backward towards the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways (June 21st to July 23rd).

According to fable, Cancer was the animal which Juno sent against Heracles, when he combated the Hydra of Lerné. Cancer bit the hero's foot, but Heracles killed the creature, and Juno took it up to heaven, and made it one of the twelve signs of the zodiac.

Candace (3 syl.). King of Lydia, who exposed the charms of his wife to Gygis; whereupon the queen compelled Gygis to assassinate her husband, after which she married the murderer, who became king, and reigned twenty-eight years. (716-678.)

Candidate (3 syl.) means "clothed in white." Those who solicited the office of consul, quaesitor, praetor, etc., among the Romans, arrayed themselves in a loose white robe. It was loose that they might show the people their scars, and white in sign of fidelity and humility. *(Latin, candidus, whence candidat, clothed in white, etc.)*

Canidate (2 syl.). The hero of Voltaire's novel so called. All sorts of misfortunes are heaped upon him, and he bears them all with cynical indifference.

Candle. (See page 120, col. 1, Bell, etc.)

"Fine (or Gay) as the king's candle." (Bariolé comme la chandelle des rois, in allusion to an ancient custom of presenting, on January 6th, a candle of various colours to the three kings of Cologne. It is generally applied to a woman overdressed, especially with gay ribbons and flowers. "Fine as five-pence."

The game is not worth the candle (Le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle). Not worth even the cost of the candle that lights the players.

To burn the candle at both ends. In French, "Brûler la chandelle par les deux bouts." To indulge in two or more expensive luxuries or dissipated habits at the same time; to hasten to rise up early and late take rest, eating the bread of carefulness.

To hold a candle to the devil. To aid or countenance that which is wrong. The allusion is to the practice of Roman Catholics, who burn candles before the image of a favourite saint, carry them in funeral processions, and place them on their altars.

"When Jessica (in the Merchant of Venice, ii. 6) says to Lorenzo: "What, must I hold a candle to my shame?" she means, Must I direct attention to this disguise, and blazon my folly abroad? Why, "Cupid himself would blush to see me thus transformed to a boy." She does not mean, Must I glory in my shame?"

To sell by the candle. A species of sale by auction. A pin is thrust through a candle about an inch from the top, and bidding goes on till the candle is burnt down to the pin, when the pin drops into the candlestick, and the last bidder is declared the purchaser. This sort of auction was employed in 1803, according to the Reading Mercury (Dec. 16), at Aldermaston, near Reading.

"The Council thinks it meet to propose the way of selling by 'inch of candle,' as being the most probable means to procure the true value of the goods." — Milton: Letters, etc.
Candle-holder

Figures of young persons of either sex bearing a basket on their head. (Latin, canophora, plural: singular, Greek, κανοφόρος.) The English singular is "canophor" (3 syl.).

Cannicular Days. The dog-days, corresponding with the overflow of the Nile. From the middle of July to the beginning of the second week in September. (Latin, canicular, diminutive of canis, a dog.)

Cannicular Period. A cycle of 1461 years or 1460 Julian years, called a "Sothic period." When it was supposed that any given day had passed through all the seasons of the year.

Cannicular Year. The ancient Egyptian year, computed from one heliacal rising of the Dog-star (Sirius) to the next.

Canidía. A sorceress, who could bring the moon from heaven. Alluded to by Horace. (Epodes, v.)

"Your ancient conjurers were wont / To make her (the moon) from her sphere descend / And to their incantations steep."

Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Canister. The head (pugilistic term). "To mill his canister" is to break his head. A "canister cap" is a covering for the head, whether hat or cap. A "canister" is a small coffer or box, and the head is the "canister" or coffer of man's brains.

Canker. The briar or dog-rose.

"Put down Richard, that sweet lovely rose. / And plant this thorn, this canker, Hollar's brook." —Shakespeare: Henry IV., 1. 3.

Cannes. The place where Hannibal defeated the Romans under L. Emmius Paulus. Any fatal battle that is the turning point of a great general's prosperity is called his Cannes. Thus, we say, "Moscow was the Cannes of Napoleon Bonaparte."

Cannel Coal. A corruption of candle coal, so called from the bright flame, unmixed with smoke, which it yields in combustion.

Cannibal. A word applied to those who eat human flesh. The usual derivation is Caribbe, corrupted into Canibbe, supposed to be man-eaters. Some of the tribes of these islands have no r.

"The natives live in great fear of the cannibals (i.e. Caribbe, or people of Caribbe.)"—Columbus.

Cannon (in billiards). A corruption of carrom, which is short for carrombole. A cannon is when the player's ball strikes the adversary's ball in such a way as to glance off and strike a second ball.

Canoe. (2 syll.) A boat. (Spanish, canoa, a canoe; Dutch, canoe; German, kahn, a boat; Old French, cane, a ship, and canot, a boat; Latin, canna, a hollow stem or reed; our can, can = a jug; cannon, canal, etc.)

Canon. The canons used to be those persons who resided in the buildings contiguous to the cathedral, employed either in the daily service, or in the education of the choristers. The word is Greek, and means a measuring rod, the beam of a balance; then, a roll or register containing the names of the clergy who are licensed to officiate in a cathedral church.

Canon. A divine or ecclesiastical law.

"Or that the Everlasting had not bled
His canon against self-slaughter."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.

 Canonical Law. A collection of ecclesiastical laws which serve as the rule of church government. (See below.)

Canonical. Canon is a Greek word, and means the index of a balance, hence a rule or law. (See above.) The sacred canon means the accepted books of Holy Scripture, which contain the inspired laws of salvation and morality; also called The Canonical Books.

Canonical Dress. The costume worn by the clergy according to the direction of the canon. Archdeacons, deans, and bishops wear canonical hats.

Canonical Epistles. The seven catholic epistles, i.e., one of James, two of Peter, three of John, and one of Jude. The epistles of Paul were addressed to specific churches or to individuals.

"The second and third epistles of John are certainly not catholic. One is to a specific lady and her children; and the other is to Gaius. If the word "canonical" in this phrase means appointed to be read in church, then the epistles of Paul are canonical. In fact there are only five canonical epistles.

Canonical Hours. The times within which the sacred offices may be performed. In the Roman Catholic Church they are seven—viz. matins, prime, tierce, sext, none, vespers, and compline. Prime, tierce, sext, and none are the first, third, sixth, and ninth hours of the day, counting from six in the morning. Compline is a corruption of completorium (that which completes the services of the day). The reason why there are seven canonical hours is that David says, "Seven times a day do I praise thee" (Psalm cxix. 164).

*In England the phrase means the time of the day within which persons can be legally married, i.e., from eight in the morning to three p.m.

Canonical Obedience. The obedience due by the inferior clergy to the superior clergy set over them. Even bishops owe canonical obedience to the archbishop of the same province.

Canonical Punishments are those punishments which the Church is authorised to inflict.

Canoins. The ponce on the gown of an M.D., designed for carrying drugs.

The coif of a sergeant-at-law, designed for concealing the tournure.

The lamb-skin on a B.A. hood, in imitation of the toga curulea of the Romans.

The strings of an Oxford undergraduate, to show the wearer is still in leading strings. At Cambridge, however, the strings are the mark of a graduate who has won his ribbons.

The tipett on a barrister's gown, meant for a wallet to carry briefs in.

The proctors' and pro-proctors' tipett, for papers—a sort of satchel.

Canopic Vases. Used by the Egyptian priests for the viscera of bodies embalmed, four vases being provided for each body. So called from Canopus, in Egypt, where they were first used.

Canopus. The Egyptian god of water. The Chaldeans worshipped fire, and sent all the other gods a challenge, which was accepted by a priest of Canopus. The Chaldeans lighted a vast fire round the god Canopus, when the Egyptian deity spouted out torrents of water and quenched the fire, thereby obtaining the triumph of water over fire.

Canopy properly means a grat curtain. Herodotus tells us (ii. 95) that the fishermen of the Nile used to lift their nets on a pole, and form thereby a rude sort of tent under which they slept securely, as grats will not pass through the meshes of a net. Subsequently the tester of a bed was so called, and lastly the canopy borne over kings. (Greek, κανών, a grat; κανωνίον, a grat-curtain; Latin, canōnium, a grat-curtain.)

Canossa. Canossa, in the duchy of Modena, is where (in the winter of 1076-7) Kaiser Heinrich IV. went to humble himself before Pope Gregory VII. (Hildebrand).
CANT 210

Cant. A whining manner of speech; class phraseology, especially of a religious nature (Latin, canto, to sing, whence chant). It is often derived from a proper name. We are told that Alexander and Andrew Cant maintained that all those who refused the "Covenant" ought to be excommunicated, and that those were cursed who made use of the prayer-book. These same Cants, in their grace before meat, used to "pray for all those who suffered persecution for their religious opinions." (Mercurius Publicus, No. ix., 1661.)

"The doctor here,
When he discourses of discretion,
Of cerna cavae and of cerna porta . . . .
What does he do but cant? Or if he run
To his judicial astrology,
And trawl out the trice, the quartile, and the sextile,
Does he not cant?"
Ben Jonson (1572-1637); Andrew Cant died 1694.

Cantabrian. The Bay of biscay. So called from the Cantabri who dwelt about the Biscayan shore. Sue-tonius tells us that a thunderbolt fell in the Cantabrian Lake (Spain) "in which twelve axes were found." (Gala, viii.)

"She her thundering army leads
To Calpe (Ostia Maritima) . . . . or the rough Cantabrian surge." (Aeschylus: Hypsia to the Naiades.)

Cantâdo Sunday. Fourth Sunday after Easter. So called from the first word of the introit of the mass: "Sing to the Lord." Similarly "Lentâdo Sunday" (the fourth after Lent) is so called from the first word of the mass.

Canteen. means properly a wine-cellar. Then a refreshment-house in a barrack for the use of the soldiers. Then a vessel, holding about three pints, for the use of soldiers on the march. (Italian, cantina, a cellar.)

Canterbury. Canterbury is the higher...ack, but Winchester the better manger. Canterbury is the higher see in rank, but Winchester the one which produces the most money. This was the reply of William Edington, Bishop of Winchester, when offered the archbishopric of Canterbury (1366). Now Canterbury is £15,000 a year, and Winchester £6,500.

Canterbury Tales. Chaucer supposed that he was in company with a party of pilgrims going to Canterbury to pay their devotions at the shrine of Thomas Becket. The party assembled at an inn in Southwark, called the Tabard, and there agreed to tell one tale each, both in going and returning. He who told the best tale was to be treated with a supper on the homeward journey. The work is incomplete, and we have none of the tales told on the way home. A Canterbury Tale. A cock-and-bull story; a romance. So called from Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales.

Canting Crew (The). Beggars, pinnies, and thieves, who use what is called the canting lingo.

Canvas means cloth made of hemp. To canvas a subject is to strain it through a hemp strainer, to sift it; and to canvass a borough is to sift the votes. (Latin, cannum, hemp.)

Canvas City. A military encampment.

"The Grand Master ascended, and they proceeded accordingly...avoiding the most inhabited part of the canvas city."—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. x.

"In 1851, during the gold rush, a town of tents, known as Canvas Town, rose into being on the St. Kilda Road, Melbourne. Several thousand inhabitants lived in this temporary settlement, which was laid out in streets and lasted for several months."—Cities of the World; Melbourne.

Ca’ora. A river, on the banks of which are a people whose heads grow beneath their shoulders. Their eyes are in their shoulders, and their mouths in the middle of their breasts. (Hakluyt: Voyages, 1598.) Raleigh, in his Description of Guiana, gives a similar account of a race of men. (See Blemmyes.)

"The Anthropophagi and men whose heads do grow beneath their shoulders." Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Cap.
Black cap. (See page 140, Black Cap.)
Cater cap. A square cap or mortar-board. (French, quartier.)
College cap. A treacher like the caps worn at the English Universities by students and bachelors of art, doctors of divinity, etc.
Fool’s cap. A cylindrical cap with feather and bells, such as licensed Fools used to wear.
Forked cap. A bishop’s mitre. For the paper so called, see Foolscap.
Cap

211

"A cap of black silk velvet, after the John Knox fashion."—Edinburgh University Calendar.

Monmouth cap (A). (See Monmouth.)

Phrygian cap (A). Cap of liberty (q.v.).

Scotch cap. A cloth cap worn commonly in Scotland.

Cap and bells. The insignia of a professional fool or jester.

A feather in one's cap. An achievement to be proud of; something creditable.

Square cap. A truncheon or "mortar-board," like the University cap.

Statute cap. A woollen cap ordered by statute to be worn on holidays by all citizens for the benefit of the woollen trade. To a similar end, persons were obliged to be buried at death in flannel.

"Well, better wits have worn plain statute caps."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour Lost, v. 2.

Truncheon cap, or mortar-board. A cap with a square board, generally covered with black cloth.

I must put on my considering cap. I must think about the matter before I give a final answer. The allusion is to a conjurer's cap.

If the cap fits, wear it. If the remark applies to you, apply it to yourself. Hats and caps differ very slightly in size and appearance, but everyone knows his own when he puts it on.

Setting her cap at him. Trying to catch him for a sweetheart or a husband. The lady puts on the most becoming of her caps, to attract the attention and admiration of the favoured gentleman.

To gain the cap. To obtain a bow from another out of respect.

"Such must be the cap of him that makes them wince, but keeps his hat uncrossed."—Shakespeare: Cymbeline, iii. 3.

To pull caps. To quarrel like two women, who pull each other's caps.

Your cap is all on one side. The French have the phrase Mettre son bonnet de travers, meaning "to be in an ill-humour." M. Hilaire le Gai explains it thus: "La plupart des tapageurs de profession portent ordinairement le chapiteau sur l'oreille." It is quite certain that workmen, when they are bothered, push their cap on one side of the head, generally over the right ear, because the right hand is occupied.

Cap (the verb).

I cap to that, i.e. assent to it. The allusion is to a custom observed in France amongst the judges in deliberation. Those who assent to the opinion stated by any of the bench signify it by lifting their toques from their heads.

To cap. To excel.

"Well, that caps the globe."—C. Brontë: Jane Eyre.

Cap Verses (To). Having the metre fixed and the last letter of the previous line given, to add a verse beginning with the given letter (of the same metre or not, according to prearrangement) thus:

"English."

The way was long, the wind was cold (D),

Dogs with their tongues their wounds do heal (L),

Like words congested in northern air (B),

Regions Caesar never knew (W),

With all a poet's ecstasy (Y),

You may deride my awkward pace, etc. etc.

"Latin."

Nim picta timidus navis pupillus (S),

Sunt quos curriculo puluere omnia (M),

Myrmoneus navimus sancta sectae mare (E),

Est qui nec vetera nec recentia (L),

Ilium, si proprium confidit burreo (O),

O, ut presidentium . . . . (as long as you please).

It would make a Christmas game to cap proper names: as Plato, Otway, Young, Goldsmith, etc., or to cap proverbs, as: "Rome was not built in a day"; "Ye are the salt of the earth"; "Hungry is the best sauce"; "Example is better than precept"; "Time and tide wait for no man"; etc.

Cap and Bells. Wearing the cap and bells. Said of a person who is the butt of the company, or one who excites laughter at his own expense. The reference is to licensed jesters formerly attached to noblemen's establishments. Their headgear was a cap with bells.

"One is bound to speak the truth . . . whether he mounts the cap and bells or a shovel hat (like a bishop)."—Thackeray.

Cap and Feather Days. The time of childhood.

"Here I was got into the scenes of my cap-and-feather days."—Cobbett.

Cap and Gown. The full academical costume of a university student, tutor, or master, worn at lectures, examinations, and after "hall" (dinner).

"Is it a cap and gown affair?"—C. Bade: Verdant Green.

Cap in Hand. Submissively. To wait on a man cap in hand is to wait on him like a servant, ready to do his bidding.

Cap of Fools (The). The chief or foremost fool; one that exceeds all others in folly.

"Thou art the cap of all the fools alive."—Shakespeare: Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

Cap of Liberty. When a slave was manumitted by the Romans, a small red cloth cap, called piceus, was placed on his head. As soon as this was done, he was termed libertinus (a freedman), and his name was registered in the city.
tribes. When Saturninus, in 263, possessed himself of the capitol, he hoisted a cap on the top of his spear, to indicate that all slaves who joined his standard should be free. When Marius incited the slaves to take up arms against Sylla, he employed the same symbol; and when Cesar was murdered, the conspirators marched forth in a body, with a cap elevated on a spear, in token of liberty. (See Liberty.)

Cap of Maintenance. A cap of dignity ancietly belonging to the rank of duke; the fur cap of the Lord Mayor of London, worn on days of state; a cap carried before the British sovereigns at their coronation. Maintenance here means defence.

Cap of Time. They wear themselves in the cap of time. Use more ceremony, says Parolles, for these lords do "wear themselves in the cap of time," i.e. these lords are the favours and jewels worn in the cap of the time being, and have the greatest influence. In the cap of time being, they are the very jewels, and most honoured. (Shakespeare: All's Well, etc., ii. 1.)

Cap-acquaintance (A), now called a bowing acquaintance. One just sufficiently known to bow to.

Cap-money. Money collected in a cap or hat; hence an improvised collection.

Cap-a-pie. The general etymology is the French cap à pied, but the French phrase is de pied en cap.

"Armed at all points exactly cap-a-pie," Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 2.
"I am courtier, cap-a-pie:" Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

"We are told that cap a pie is Old French, but it would be desirable to give a quotation from some old French author to verify this assertion. I have hunted in vain for the purpose. Again, is pie Old French for pied? This is not a usual change. The usual change would be pied into pie. The Latin might be De capitae ad pedem."

Capfull of Wind. Olaus Magnus tells us that Eric, King of Sweden, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soeuer he turned his cap the wind would blow, and for this he was called Windy Cap. The Laplanders drove a profitable trade in selling winds: but, even so late as 1814, Bessie Millie, of Pomo's (Orkney Islands), helped out her living by selling favourable winds to mariners for the small sum of sixpence. (See Mont St. Michel.)

Cape. Spirit of the Cape. (See page 14, col. 1, Adamastor.)

Cape of Storms. (See Storms.)

Cape Court. A speculation in stocks of such magnitude as to affect the money market. Cape Court is the name of the place in London where transactions in stocks are carried on.

Caper. The weather is so foul not even a caper would venture out. A Manx proverb. A caper is a fisherman of Cape Clear in Ireland, who will venture out in almost any weather.

Caper Merchant. A dancing-master who cuts "capers." (See c.ut Capers.)

Capet (Cap-pay). Hugues, the founder of the French monarchy, was surnamed Capetus (clothed with a capot or monk's hood), because he always wore a clerical costume as abbot of St. Martin de Tours. This was considered the family name of the kings of France; hence, Louis XVI. was arraigned before the National Convention under the name of Louis Capet.

Capital. Money or money's worth available for production.

"His capital is continually going from him [the merchant] in some shape, and returning to him in another."—Adam Smith: Wealth of Nations, vol. i. book ii. chap. i. p. 216.

Active capital. Ready money or property readily convertible into it.

Circulating capital. Wages, or raw material. This sort of capital is not available a second time for the same purpose.

Fixed capital. Land, buildings, and machinery, which are only gradually consumed.

Political capital. Something employed to serve a political purpose. Thus, the Whigs make political capital out of the errors of the Tories, and vice versa.

"He tried to make capital out of his rival's discomfiture."—The Times.

Capital Fellow (A). A stock-jobber; in French called Un Capitaine, par allusion aux capitains sur les bateaux ou agiote habituellement. A good-tempered, jovial, and generous person.

Capitals. To speak in capitals. To emphasise certain words with great stress. Certain nouns spelt with a capital letter are meant to be emphatic and distinctive.

Capite Censi. The lowest rank of Roman citizens; so called because they were counted simply by the poll, as they had no taxable property.

Capitulares. The laws of the first two dynasties of France were so called, because they were divided into chapters. (French, capitulaire.)

Capon. Called a fish out of the crop by those friars who wished to evade the Friday fast by eating chickens instead of fish. (See Yarmouth.)

Capon (A). A castrated cock.
A Crawle capon. A dried haddock.
A Severn capon. A sole.
A Yarmouth capon. A red herring.
We also sometimes hear of a Glasgow capon, a salt herring.

Capon (A). A love-letter. In French, poulet means not only a chicken but also a love-letter, or a sheet of note-paper. Thus Henri IV., consulting with Sully about his marriage, says: "My niece of Guise would please me best, though report says maliciously that she loves poulets in paper better than in a fricassee."

"Boyer, ... break up this capon [i.e. open this love-letter]."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 1.

Capricorn. Called by Thomson, in his Winter, "the centaur archer." Anciently, the winter solstice occurred on the entry of the sun into Capricorn; but the stars, having advanced a whole sign to the east, the winter solstice now falls at the sun's entrance into Sagittarius (the centaur archer), so that the poet is strictly right, though we vulgarly retain the ancient classical manner of speaking. Capricornus is the tenth, or, strictly speaking, the eleventh sign of the zodiac. (Dec. 21-Jan 20.)

"According to classic mythology, Capricorn was Pan, who, from fear of the great Typhon, changed himself into a goat, and was made by Jupiter one of the signs of the zodiac.

Captain. Capitano del Popolo, i.e. Garibaldi (1807-1882).
The Great Captain (el gran capitano). Gonzalvo di Cor'dova (1433-1515).
Manuel Conme'nu's of Treb/izond (1120, 1143-1180).

Captain Cal's Tail. The commander-in-chief of the mummers of Plough Monday.

Captain Copperthorne's Crew. All masters and no men.

Captain Podd. A showman. So called from "Captain" Podd, a famous puppet-showman in the time of Ben Jonson.

Captain Stiff. To come Captain Stiff over one. To treat one with cold formality.

"I shouldn't quite come Captain Stiff over him."—S. Warren: The Thousand a Year.

Captious. Fallacious, deceitful; now it means ill-tempered, carping. (Latin, captio'sus.)

"I know I love in vain, strive against hope;
Yet in this captious and intolerable sieve
I still pour in the waters of my love."—Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well, i. 3.

Capua. Capta corrupted Hannibal.
Luxury and self-indulgence will ruin anyone. Hannibal was everywhere victorious over the Romans till he took up his winter quarters at Capua, the most luxurious city of Italy. When he left Capua his star began to wane, and ere long, Carthage was in ruins and himself an exile.

Capua was the Canne of Hannibal. As the battle of Canne was most disastrous to the Roman army, so was the luxury of Capua to Hannibal's army. We have a modern adaptation to this proverb: "Moscow was the Austerlitz of Napoleon."

Capuchin. A friar of the order of St. Francis, of the new rule of 1528; so called from their "cap'uce" or pointed cowl.

Capuleat. A noble house in Verona, the rival of that of Montague (3 syl.); Juliet is of the former, and Romeo of the latter. Lady Capulet is the head-ideal of a proud Italian matron of the fifteenth century. The expression so familiar, "the tomb of all the Capulets," is from Burke. (Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet.)

Caput Mortuum. Latin for head of the dead, used by the old chemists to designate the residuum of chemicals, when all their volatile matters had escaped. Anything from which all that rendered it valuable has been taken away. Thus, a learned scholar paralysed is a mere caput mortuum of his former self. The French Directory, towards its close, was a mere caput mortuum of a governing body.

Caqueux. A sort of gipsy race in Brittany, similar to the Cagots of Gascony, and Colliberts of Poitou.

Carabas. He is a Marquis of Carabas. A fossil nobleman, of unbounded pretensions and vanity, who would fain restore the slavish foolery of the reign meaning that out of 24 parts, 22 or 18 are gold, and the rest alloy.

"Here's the note."
"How much your chain weighs to the utmost carat?"
"Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

Caraway. Latin, carum, from Caria in Asia Minor, whence the seeds were imported.

"Nay, you shall see my orchard, where in an armour we will eat a last year's piping of my own roasting, with a dish of caraways."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 3 (Justice Shallow to Falstaff).

Carbineer or Carabineer. Properly a skirmisher or light horseman, from the Arabic carabine. A carbine is the light musket used by cavalry soldiers.

"He... left the Rhinegrave, with his company of mounted carbineers, to guard the passage."—Moby: Dutch Republic (vol. i. part 1. chap. ii. p. 170).

Carbonado. A chop; mince meat. Strictly speaking, a carbonado is a piece of meat cut crosswise for the gridiron. (Latin, carbo, a coal.)

"If he do come in my way, so; if he do not—if I come in the willingly, let him make a carbonado of me."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., v. 2.

Carbonari means charcoal-burners, a name assumed by a secret political society in Italy (organised 1803-1814). Their place of meeting they called a "hut," its inside, "the place for selling charcoal," and the outside, the "forest." Their political opponents they called "wolves." Their object was to convert the kingdom of Naples into a republic. In the singular number, Carbonaro. (See CHARBONNERIE.)

Carbuncle of Ward Hill (The). A mysterious carbuncle visible enough to those who stand at the foot of the hill in May, June or July; but never beheld by anyone who has succeeded in reaching the hill top.

"I have distinguished, among the dark rocks, that wonderful carbuncle, which gleams rudely as a furnace to them who view it from beneath, but has ever become invisible to him whose daring foot has sealed the preserve from which it darts its splendour."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xix.

"Dr. Wallace thinks it is water trickling from a rock, and reddened by the sun.

Carcanet. A small chain of jewels for the neck. (French, carcan, an iron collar.)

"Like captain jewels in a carcanet."—Shakespeare: Sonnets.

Carcase. The shell of a house before the floors are laid and walls plastered; the skeleton of a ship, a wreck, etc. The body of a dead animal, so called from the Latin caro-casa (lifeless flesh). (French, carcasse.)

"The Goodwins. I think they call the place; a Carcasses. Shells with three fuzeholes. They are projected from mortars (q.e.), howitzers (q.v.), and guns. They will turn furiously for eight or ten minutes, do not burst like shells, but the flames, rushing from the three holes, set fire on fire everywhere within their influence.

"Charlestown, ... having been fired by a carcass from Copp's Hill, sent up dense columns of smoke."—Looking: United States.

Card. That's the card. The right thing; the ticket. The reference is to tickets of admission, cards of the races, and programmes.

"The is about the card."—Mayhew: London Labour, etc.

A queer card. An eccentric person; "indifferent honest." A difficult lead in cards to play to.

A knowing card. A sharp fellow, next door to a sharper. The allusion is to card-sharpeners and their tricks.

"Whose great aim it was to be considered a knowing card."—Dickens: Sketches, etc.

A great card. A big wig; the boss of the season; a person of note. A big card.

A leading card. A star actor. A person leads from his strongest suit.

A loose card. A worthless fellow who lives on the loose.

"A house card is a card of no value, and, consequently, the properest to throw away."—Hoyle: Games, etc.

A sure card. A person one can fully depend on; a person sure to command success. A project to be certainly depended on. As a winning card in one's hand.

He is the card of our house. The man of mark, the most distinctive. Osric tells Hamlet that Laertes is "the card and calendar of gentility" (v. 2). The card is a card of a compass, containing all its points. Laertes is the card of gentility, in whom may be seen all its points. We also say "a queer card," meaning an odd fish.

That was my best trump card. My best chance. The allusion is to loo, whist, and other games played with cards.

To play one's best card. To do that which one hopes is most likely to secure success.

To speak by the card. To speak by the book, be as precise as a map or book. A merchant's expression. The card is the document in writing containing the agreements made between a merchant and the captain of a vessel. Sometimes the owner binds himself, ship, tackle, and furniture for due performance, and the captain is bound to deliver the cargo committed to him in good condition. To speak by the card is to speak according to the indentures or written instructions. In some cases the reference is to the card of a mariner's compass.

"Law ... is the card to guide the world by."—Hooker: Ec. Pol., part ii, sec. 1.

"We must speak by the card, or equivocation will undo us."—Shakespeare: As You Like It, v. 1.

Cards. It is said that there never was a good hand of cards containing four clubs. Such a hand is called "The Devil's Four-poster."

Lieuven, a German lunatic, bet that he would succeed in turning up a pack of cards in a certain order stated in a written agreement. He turned and turned the cards ten hours a day for twenty years; and repeated the operation 4,245,028 times, when at last he succeeded.

In Spain, spades used to be columbinas; clubs, rabbets; diamonds, pinks; and hearts, roses. The present name for spades is espadas (swords); of clubs, bastos (cudgels); of diamonds, dianas (square pieces of money used for paying wages); of hearts, copas (chalices).

The French for spades is pique (pikemen or soldiers); for clubs, trèfle (clover, or husbandmen); of diamonds, carreaux (building tiles, or artisans); of hearts, cœur (choir-men, or ecclesiastics).

The English spades is the French form of a pike, and the Spanish name; the clubs is the French trefoil, and the Spanish name; the hearts is a corruption of cœur into cœur. (See Verves.)

Court cards. So called because of their heraldic devices. The king of clubs originally represented the arms of the Pope; of spades, the King of France; of diamonds, the King of Spain; and of hearts, the King of England. The French kings in cards are called David (spades), Alexander (clubs), Caesar (diamonds), and Charles (hearts)—representing the Jewish, Greek, Roman, and Frankish empires. The queens or dames are Argine—i.e. Juno (hearts), Judith (clubs), Rachel (diamonds), and Pallas (spades)—representing royalty, fortitude, piety, and wisdom. They were likenesses of Marie d'Anjou, the queen of Charles VII.; Isabeau, the queen-mother; Agnes Sorel, the king's mistress; and Joan d'Arc, the dame of spades, or war.

He felt that he held the cards in his own hands. That he had the whip-end of the stick; that he had the upper hand, and could do as he liked. The allusion is to games played with cards, such as whist.

He played his cards well. He acted judiciously and skillfully, like a whist-player who plays his hand with judgment. To play one's cards badly is to manage a project unskilfully.

The cards are in my hands. I hold the disposal of events which will secure success. The allusion is obvious.

"The Vitellii burned at Arausio; the Orsini rustating the French; the war of Naples imminent; the cards are in my hands."—Cesare Borja, XIX.

On the cards. Likely to happen, projected, and talked about as likely to occur. On the programme or card of the races; on the "agenda."

To count on one's cards. To anticipate success under the circumstances. The allusion is to holding in one's hand cards likely to win.

To go in with good cards. To have good patronage; to have excellent grounds for expecting success.

To throw up the cards. To give up as a bad job; to acknowledge you have no hope of success. In some games of cards, as too, a player has the liberty of saying whether he will play or not, and if one's hand is hopelessly bad he throws up his cards and sits out till the next deal.

Cardinal Numbers. Such numbers as 1, 2, 3, etc. 1st, 2nd, 3rd, etc., are ordinal numbers.

Cardinal Points of the Compass. Due north, west, east, and south. So called because they are the points on which the intermediate ones, such as N.E., N.W., N.N.E., etc., hinge or hang. (Latin, cardo, a hinge.)

Cardinal Signs [of the Zodiac]. The two equinoctial and the two solstitial signs, Aries and Libra, Cancer and Capricornus.

Cardinal Virtues. Justice, prudence, temperance, and fortitude, on which all other virtues hang or depend.

Cardinal Winds. Those that blow due East, West, North, and South.

Cardinals. Hinges. (Latin, cardo.) The election of the Pope "hinges" on the voice of the sacred college, and on the Pope the doctrines of the Church depend; so that the cardinals are in fact the hinges on which the Christian Church turns. There may be six cardinal bishops, fifty cardinal priests, and fourteen cardinal deacons, who constitute the Pope's council, and who elect the Pope when a vacancy occurs.

Cardinal's Red Hat. Some assert that Innocent IV. made the cardinals wear a red hat "in token of their being ready to lay down their life for the gospel."

Carduel or Kartel. Carlsbad. The place where Merlin prepared the Round Table.

Care-cloth (The). The fine linen cloth laid over the newly-married in the Catholic Church. (Anglo-Saxon, care, large, as care wīndā (a big wound), care sorh (a great sorrow), etc.)

Care killed the Cat. It is said that "a cat has nine lives," yet care would wear them all out.

Care Sunday (the fifth Sunday in Lent). Professor Skeat tells us (Notes and Queries, Oct. 28th, 1893), that "care" means trouble, suffering; and that Care-Sunday means Passion-Sunday. In Old High German we have Kär-woche and Kär-fristag.

The Latin cura sometimes meant "sorrow, grief, trouble," as "cura et angōres amō necrē."—Ciceron : Att. i. 15.

Carême (2 syl.). Lent; a corruption of quadragesima.

Car-goose (A) or Gargoose. The crested diver, belonging to the genus Colymbus. (Anglo-Saxon, gar and gos.)

Caricatures mean "sketches over-drawn." (Italian, caricature, from caricare, to load or burden.)

Carillons, in France, are chimes or tunes played on bells; but in England the suites of bells that play the tunes. Our word carol approaches the French meaning nearer than our own. The best chimes in the world are those in Les Halles, at Bruges.

Carine. Women hired by the Romans to weep at funerals; so called from Caria, whence most of them came.

Carle or Carling Sunday [Pest Sunday]. The octave preceding Palm Sunday; so called because the special food of the day was carling—i.e. peas fried in butter. The custom is a continuation of the pagan bean-feast. The fifth Sunday in Lent.

Carlovingian Dynasty. So called from Carolus or Charles Martel, Carludovica. A Pan'ama hat, made of the Carludovica palmate; so called in compliment to Carlos IV. of Spain, whose second name was Ludovic.

Carmano (3 syl.). A red Republican song and dance in the first French revolution; so called from Carnagno, in Piedmont, the great nest of the Savoyards, noted for street music and dancing. The refrain of "Madame Veto," the Carmagnole song, is "Dan-sons la Carnagnoile--vive le son du canon!" The word was subsequently applied to other revolutionary songs, such as Ca ira, the Marseillaise, the Chant du Depart. Besides the songs, the word is applied to the dress worn by the Jacobins, consisting of a blouse, red cap, and tri-coloured girdle; to the wearer of this dress or any violent revolutionist; to the speeches in favour of the execution of Louis XVI., called by M. Barriere des Carnagnoles; and, lastly, to the dance performed by the mob round the guillotine, or down the streets of Paris.

Carlucites (3 syl.). An order of mendicant friars of Mount Carmel, the monastery of which is named Elias, from Elijah the prophet, who on Mount Carmel told Ahab that rain was at hand. Also called White Friars, from their white cloaks.

Carmilhan. The phantom ship on which the Kobold of the Baltic sits when he appears to doomed vessels.

Carminative. A charm medicine. Magic and charms were at one time the chief "medicines," and the fact is perpetuated by the word carminative, among others. Carminatives are given to relieve flatulence. (Latin, carmen, a charm.)

Carmine (2 syl.). The dye made from the carmine or kermes insect, whence also crimson, through the Italian cre-misiino.

Carnation. "Flesh-colour." (Latin, caro; genitive, carnis, flesh.)

Carney. To whoolede, to keep carressing.

Carnival. The season immediately preceding Lent; shrove-tide. Du Cange gives the word carne-festive. (Modern Italian, carnevale; Spanish and French, carnaval.)

Italis, carnavale, carnowale, carnaval. Claudian spectacles held "carnes vale" dictum potens, quasi carnis sole (good-bye meat); sed id etymon non probat Oxy. Ferrarius. Cajusius . . . appellare Gallus astutam, carno-est, quod sonat caro abscedit . . . [We are referred to a charter, dated 1863, in which occurs the word carnum-femnum, and a quotation is given in which occurs the phrase in carnis femina].--Du Cange, vol. ii. p. 222.

Carotid Artery. An artery on each side of the neck, supposed by the ancients to be the seat of drowsiness, brought on by an increased flow of blood through it to the head. (Greek, karoticos, inducing sleep.)

Carouse (2 syl.). Mr. Gifford says the Danes called their large drinking cup a rouze; and to rouze is to drink from a rouze; ca-rouze is gar-rouze, to drink all up, or to drink all—i.e., in company.

"The king doth wake to-night, and takes his rouze." Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 4.

Carouse the hunter's hoop. Drinking cups were amusingly marked with hopbs, by which every drinker knew his stint. Shakespeare makes Jack Cade promise his friends that "seven halfpenny loaves shall be sold for a penny; and the three-hooped pot have ten hoops." Pegs or pins (q.v.) are other means of limiting the draught of individuals who drank out of the same tankard.

Carpathian Wizard. Proteus (2 syl.), who lived in the island of Carpathos, between Rhodes and Crete. He was a wizard and prophet, who could transform himself into any shape he pleased. He is represented as carrying a sort of crook in his hand. Carpathos, now called Scarpanto.

"By the Carpathian wizard's hook." Mitton: Cornes, 866.

Carpo Diem. Enjoy yourself while you have the opportunity. Seize the present day. (Horace: I Odes, xi. 8.) "Dum vivimus, vivamus."

Carpenter is from the Low Latin carpentarius, a maker of carpenta (two-wheeled carts and carriages). The carpentarius was used for ladies; the carpentum funebre or carpentum ponomatium was a hearse. There was also a carpentum (cart) for agricultural purposes. There is no Latin word for our "carpenter"; the phrase faber lignarius is used by Cicero. Our forefathers called a carpenter a "smith" or a "wood-smith." (French, charpentier.)

Carpet.
The magic carpet of Tangu. A carpet to all appearances worthless, but if anyone sat thereon, it would transport him instantaneously to the place he wished to go. So called because it came from Tangu, in Persia. It is sometimes termed Prince Houxin's carpet, because it came Carpet-bag into his hands, and he made use of it. (Arabian Nights: Prince Ahmed.) (See below.) Solomon’s carpet. The Eastern writers say that Solomon had a green silk carpet, on which his throne was placed when he travelled. This carpet was large enough for all his forces to stand upon; the men and women stood on his right hand, and the spirits on his left. When all were arranged in order, Solomon told the wind where he wished to go, and the carpet, with all its contents, rose in the air and alighted at the place indicated. In order to screen the party from the sun, the birds of the air with outspread wings formed a canopy over the whole party. (Sale: Koran.) (See above.)

Such and such a question is on the carpet. The French sur le tapis (on the table-cloth) — i.e. before the house, under consideration. The question has been laid on the table-cloth of the house, and is now under debate.

Carpet-bag Adventurer (A). A passing adventurer, who happens to be on the road with his travelling or carpet-bag.

Carpet-bag Government. The government of more adventurers. In America, a state in the South reorganised by “carpet-baggers,” i.e. Norther political adventurers, who sought a career in the Southern States after the Civil War of 1865. [It may be noted that in America members of Congress and the State legislatures almost invariably reside in the district which they represent.]

Carpet Knight. One dubbed at Court by favour, not having won his spurs by military service in the field. Mayors, lawyers, and other civilians knighted as they kneel on a carpet before their sovereign. “Knights of the Carpet,” “Knights of the Green Cloth,” “Knights of Carpety.”

“The subordinate commands fell to young patricians, carpet-knights, who went on campaigns with their families and slaves” — Froude: Caesar, chap. iv., p. 91.

Carpocratae. Gnostics; so called from Carpocrates, who flourished in the middle of the second century. They maintained that the world was made by angels,—that only the soul of Christ ascended into heaven,—and that the body will have no resurrection.

Carriage Company. Persons who keep their private carriage.

“Seeing a great deal of carriage company.”—Thackeray.

Carriages. Things carried, luggage. “And after those days we took upon our carriages, and went up to Jerusalem.”—Acts xxvi. 15.

Car’ronades (3 syl.). Short, light iron guns. As they have no trunnions they differ in this respect from guns and howitzers (q.v.). They were invented in 1779 by Mr. Gascoigne, director of the Carron foundry, in Scotland, whence the name. Carronades are fastened to their carriages by a loop underneath, and are chiefly used in the arming of ships, to enable them to throw heavy shot at close quarters, without overlooking the decks with heavy guns. On shore they are used as howitzers.

Carry Arms! Hold your gun in the right hand, the barrel nearly perpendicular, and rest against the hollow of the shoulder, the thumb and forefinger embracing the guard. (A military command.) (See Carry Swords.)

Carry Coals. (See Coals.)

Carry Everything before One (To). To be beyond competition; to carry off all the prizes. A military phrase. Similarly, a high wind carries everything before it.

Carry Fire in one Hand and Water in the other (To). To say one thing and mean another; to flatter, to deceive; to lull suspicion in order the better to work mischief.

“Alteram manu ferre aquam, altera laeunum.”

“Alteram manu ferre lapidem, altera pane ocentur.”

Carry One’s Point (To). To succeed in one’s aim. Candidates in Rome were bullied for, and the votes were marked on a tablet by points. Hence, omne punctum serve meant “to be carried num. con.,” or to gain every vote; and “to carry one’s point” is to carry off the points at which one aimed.

Carry Out (To) or Carry through. To continue a project to its completion.

Carry out one’s Bag (To). A cricketer is said to carry out his bat when he is not “out” at the close of the game.

Carry Swords! Hold the drawn sword vertically, the blade against the shoulder. (A military command.) (See above, Carry Arms.)

Carry the Day (To). To win the contest; to carry off the honours of the day. In Latin, victoriam reportare.
Carthaginian Faith. Treachery. (See Punica Fides.)

Carthu'sians. Founded, in 1086, by St. Bruno, of Cologne, who, with six companions, retired to the solitude of La Chartreuse, near Grenoble, in Vienne.

Cartoons. Designs drawn on cartone (pasteboard), like those of Raffaello, formerly at Hampton Court, but now at Kensington Museum. They were bought by Charles I., and are seven in number: "The Miraculous Draught of Fishes," "Feed my Lambs," "The Beautiful Gate of the Temple," "Death of Ananias," "El'ymas the Sorcerer," "Paul at Lystra," and "Paul on the Mars Hill."

"They were designed for tapestries to be worked in Flanders."—Julia B. De Forest: short History of Art, p. 248.

Cartridge Paper was originally manufactured for soldiers' cartridges. The word is a corruption of cartouch, from carta (paper).

Caryatid or Caryatids. Figures of women in Greek costume, used in architecture to support entablatures. Car'ya, in Arcadia, sided with the Persians in the battle of Thermopy'lae; in consequence of which the victorious Greeks destroyed the city, slew the men, and made the women slaves. Praxitèles, to perpetuate the disgrace, employed figures of these women, instead of columns. (See page 72, col. 2, Atlas; page 208, col. 2, Carians.)

Caryatic Order or Caryatidic Order. Architecture in which Caryatids are introduced to support the entablature.

Casabianca was the name of the captain of the French man-of-war, L'Orient. At the battle of Aboukir, having first secured the safety of his crew, he blew up his ship, to prevent it falling into the hands of the English. His little son, refusing to leave him, perished with his father. Mrs. Hemeny has made a ballad, Casabianca, on this subject, modifying the incident. The French poets Lebrun and Cénier have also celebrated the occurrence.

Cas'ca. A blunt-witted Roman, one of the conspirators against Julius Caesar. (Shakespeare: Julius Caesar.)

Case (To). To skin an animal. In the Cookery by Mrs. Glasse is the direction, "Take your hare when it is cased, . . . and make a pudding . . . ." The witticism, "First catch your hare," may possibly have been suggested by this direction, but it is not in the Art of Cookery made Plain and Easy.

Case-hardened. Impenetrable to all sense of honour or shame. The allusion is to iron toughened by carbonising the surface in contact with charcoal in a case or closed box. It is done by heat.

Cashier (2 syl.). To dismiss an officer from the army, to discard from society. (French, caisser; to break; Italian, causare; to blow out; Ger. kassieren.)

"The ruling race, who dreads to be casheled, contrives, as he is hated, to be feared."

Swift: Epistle to Mr. Gay, line 157.

Cassino. Originally, a little casa or room near a theatre, where persons might retire, after the play was over, for dancing or music.

Casket Homer. Alexander the Great's edition, with Aristotle's corrections. After the battle of Arbeia a golden casket, studded with jewels, was found in the tent of Dartus. Alexander, being asked to what purpose it should be applied, made answer, "There is but one production in the world worthy of so costly a depository," and placed therein his edition of Homer, which received from this circumstance the term of Casket Homer.

Caspar. A huntsman who sold himself to Zamiel, the Black Huntsman. The night before the expiration of his lease of life he bargained for three years' respite on condition of bringing Max into the power of the evil one. Zamiel replied, "To-morrow either he or you." On the day appointed for the trial-shot, Caspar places himself in a tree. Max is told by the prince to aim at a dove. The dove flies to the tree where Caspar is concealed. Max shoots at the dove, but kills Caspar, and Zamiel comes to carry off his victim. (Weber's Opera of Der Freischutz.)

Cassandra. Daughter of Priam, gifted with the power of prophecy; but Apollo, whom she had offended, brought it to pass that no one believed her predictions. (Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida.)

"Those who foresee and predict the downfall, meet with the fate of Cassandra."—The Tempest.

Cassation. The court of cassation, in France, is the court which can reverse (or quash) the judgment of other courts.

Cassii. Inhabitants of what is now Cassio hundred, Hertfordshire, referred to by Caesar in his Commentaries.

Cassii'belie. Great-uncle to Cymbeline. He granted Caesar a yearly tribute of £3,000. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Cassio (in Shakespeare's Othello). Michael Cassio was a Florentine, and Othello's lieutenant. Iago made him drunk, and then set on Roderi'go to quarrel with him. Cassio wounded Roderi'go, and a brawl ensued, which offended Othello. Othello suspended Cassio, but Iago induced Desdemona to plead for his restoration. This interest in Cassio, being regarded by the Moor as a confirmation of Desdemona's illicit love, hinted at broadly by Iago, provoked the jealousy of Othello. After the death of the Moor, Cassio was appointed governor of Cyprus.

Cassiopeia [the lady in the chair]. The chief stars of this constellation form the outline of a chair. The lady referred to is the wife of Cepheus (2 syl.), King of Ethiopia. She boasted that the beauty of her daughter Andromeda surpassed that of the sea-nymphs. The sea-nymphs complained to the sea god of this affront, and Andromeda, to appease their wrath, was chained to a rock to be devoured by sea-monsters. Perseus (2 syl.) delivered her, and made her his wife. The vain mother was taken to heaven out of the way, and placed among the stars.

"That starred Ethiopian queen that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea-nymphs and their powers offensive..."

N.B.—"Her beauty's praise" means that of her beautiful daughter. Andromeda was her mother's "beauty."

Cassiterides (5 syl.). The tin islands, generally supposed to be the Scilly Islands and Cornwall, but probably the isles in Vigo Bay are meant. It is said that the Veneti procured tin from Cornwall, and carried it to the Isles of Vigo Bay, but kept as a profound secret the place from which they obtained it. The Phoenicians were the chief customers of the Veneti.

Cast About (To). To deliberate, to consider, as, "I am casting about how I am to meet the expenses." A sporting phrase. Dogs, when they have lost scent, "cast for it," i.e. spread out and search in different directions to recover it.

Cast Accounts (To). To balance or keep accounts. To cast up a line of figures is to add them together and set down the sum they produce. To cast or throw the value of one figure into another till the whole number is totalled.
Cast Anchor (To). To throw out the anchor in order to bring the vessel to a standstill. (Latin, anchorum jacere.)

Cast Aside (To). To reject as worthless.

Cast Down. Dejected. (Latin, dejectus.)

Cast a Sheep's Eye at One (To). To look askance or sideways at one; to look wantonly at one.

Cast beyond the Moon. To form wild conjectures. One of Heywood's proverbs. At one time the moon was supposed to influence the weather, to affect the ingathering of fruits, to rule the time of sowing, reaping, and slaying cattle, etc.

"I take of things impossible, and cast beyond the moon." — Heywood.

Cast in One's Lot (To). To share the good or bad fortune of another.

Cast into One's Teeth (To). To throw a reproach at one. The allusion is to knocking one's teeth out by stones.

"All my faults observe, set in a note book, Learned and com'd by rules, to cast into my teeth." — Shakespeare: Julius Caesar.

Cast of the Eye (A). A squint. One meaning of the word cast is to twist or warp. Thus, a fabric is said to "cast" when it warps; and seamen speak of "casting," or turning the head of a ship on the tack it is to sail. We also speak of a "casting" or turning vote.

"My good man, I see cast [twisted] on one side." — Ascham: Toxophilus.

Cast Pearls before Swine (To). If pearls are cast to swine, the swine would only trample them under foot.

Casting Vote. The vote of the presiding officer when the votes of the assembly are equal. This final vote casts, turns, or determines the question.

Castagnette (Captain). A hero noted for having his stomach replaced by Desgenettes by a leather one. His career is ended by a bomb, which blows him into fragments. An extravaganza from the French of Manuel.

Castingly. A fountain of Parnassus sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

"The drooping Muse [Sir Industry]
Brought to another castall,
Where Isis many a famous nursing breda,
Or where old Cam sox jaces over the seas
In pearle and woud." — Thomson: Castle of Indolence, II. 51.

"Isis" means the University of Oxford, and "Cam" the University of Cambridge, so called from the respective rivers on which they stand.

Castle (1 syll.), race. The Portuguese casta. In Sanskrit the word used for the same purpose is varna (colour). The four Hindu castes are Brahmins (the sacred order), Shatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaisy'a (husbandmen and merchants), Sudra (agricultural labourers and mechanics). The first issued from the mouth of Brahma, the second from his arms, the third from his thighs, and the fourth from his feet. Below these come thirty-six inferior classes, to whom the Vedas are sealed, and who are held cursed in this world and without hope in the next. The Jews seem to have entertained the same notion respecting the common people, and hence the Sanhedrims say to the officers, "This people, who know not the law, are cursed." (John vii. 49.)

To lose casta. To lose position in society. To get degraded from one caste to an inferior one.

Castle Builder (A). One who entertains sanguine hopes. One who builds air-castles which have no existence except in a dreamy imagination. (See below.)

Castle in the Air. A splendid edifice, but one which has no existence. In fairy tales we often have these castles built at a word, and vanishing as soon, like that built for Aladdin by the Genius of the Lamp. These air-castles are called by the French Châteaux d'Espace, because Spain has no châteaux. We also find the expression Châteaux en Asie for a similar reason. (See CHATEAUX.)

Castle of Bungay (My). "Were I in my castle of Bungay Upon the river of Wauneg, I would care for the King of Cuckney." Attributed to Lord Bigod of Bungay. The lines are in Camden's Britannia (edit. 1607). The events referred to in the ballad belong to the reign of Stephen or Henry II. (See BAR-SUR-AUBE, page 100, col. 1.)

Castle of Indolence. In the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner of the castle was an enchanter, who deprived all who entered his domains of their energy and free-will. (Thomson: Castle of Indolence.)

Castle Terabil (or "Terrible") in Arthurian legends stood in Leamceston. It had a steep keep environed with a triple wall. Sometimes called Dunheved Castle. It was within ten miles of Tintagel.
Castor

Castor. A hat. Castor is the Latin for a beaver, and beaver means a hat made of the beaver’s skin.

"Tom Trot.
Took his new castor from his head."

---Diary.

Castor and Pollux. What we call comassants. Electric flames, sometimes seen in stormy weather playing about the masts of ships. If only one flame showed itself, the Romans called it Helen, and said that it portended that the worst of the storm was yet to come; but two or more luminous flames they called Castor and Pollux, and said that they boded the termination of the storm.

But when the wind of Levis shed
Their masts-jumps on our vessel’s head,
Then身穿-whiles came the troubled spray
From the rocks, clouds flee away,
And on the scene of the deep
In peace the angry billows sleep.
E. C. B.
Horace: Odes xiii., 42-32.

Castor’s Horse. Cyllarus. Virgil ascribes him to Pollux. (Geo., iii.) (See Horse.)

Cas’ulist (3 syl.). One who resolves cause conscientiae (cases of conscience). M. le Fevre calls casuistry “the art of quibbling with God.”

Casus Belli (Latin). A ground for war; an occurrence warranting international hostilities.

Cat. Called a “familiar,” from the mediaval superstition that Satan’s favourite form was a black cat. Hence “witches” were said to have a cat as their familiar.

Cat. A symbol of liberty. The Roman goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken sceptre in the other, and with a cat lying at her feet. No animal so great an enemy to all constraint as a cat.

Cat. Held in veneration by the Egyptians under the name of Selkis. This deity is represented with a human body and a cat’s head. Dio’s Hist tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death. According to Egyptian tradition, Diana assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

The London Review says the Egyptians worshipped the cat as a symbol of the moon, not only because it is more active after sunset, but from the dilation and contraction of its pupil, symbolic of the waxing and waning of the night-goddess.

(See Puss.)

"Hung me in a bottle like a cat. (Much

---Ado about Nothing, i. 1.
In olden times a cat was for sport enclosed in a bag or leather bottle, and hung to the branch of a tree, as a mark for bowmen to shoot at. Steevens tells us of another sport: “A cat was placed in a sack, and hung on a line; the players had to beat out the bottom of the bag without getting bemuddled, and he who succeeded in so doing was allowed to hunt the cat afterwards.

"Some... are mad if they behold a cat." (Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.) Henri III. of France swooned if he caught sight of a cat, and Napoleon I. showed a morbid horror of the same; so did one of the Ferdinands, Emperor of Germany. (See Antipathy, page 53; Pug.)

Cat-call. A kind of whistle used at theatres by the audience to express displeasure or impatience. A hideous noise like the call or wail of a cat.

"I was very much surprised with the great consort of cat-calls... to see so many persons of quality of both sexes assembled together at a kind of cat-calling." - Addison, Spectator, No. 331.

Cat-eyed. Able to see in the dark.

Cat’s eye is an opalescent mineral gem.

Cat Jumps (The). See how the cat jumps, “which way the wind blows”; which of two alternatives is likely to be the successful one before you give any opinion of its merit or adhesion to it, either moral or otherwise. The allusion is to the game called tip-cat. Before you strike, you must observe which way the “cat” has jumped up.

We are told that our forefathers had a cruel sport, which consisted in placing a cat in a tree as a mark to shoot at. A wily sportsman would, of course, wait to see which way it jumped before he shot at her. This sort of sport was very like that of hanging two cats by their tails over a rope. (See page 221, KILKENNY CAT.)

"He soon saw which way the cat did jump, And his company he offered jump." (The Dog’s neat Run (See Limerick Stranger, 185.)

Cat Stone. Battle stone. A monolith in Scotland (sometimes wrongly called a Druidical stone). The Norwegian term, bauta stein, means the same thing. (Celtic, catt, battle.)

Cat and Dog. To live a cat and dog life. To be always quarrelling and quarrelling, as a cat and dog, whose aversion to each other is intense.

"There will be jealousy, and a cat-and-dog life over yonder worse than ever." - Carlyle: Frederick the Great (vol. ii. book iv. p. 366.)

It is raining cats and dogs. Very heavily. We sometimes say, “It is Cat Proverbs

A cat has nine lives. A cat is more tenacious of life than other animals, because it generally lights upon its feet without injury, the foot and toes being padded so as to break the fall. (See Nine.)

"They would thou have me with? Mary, good king of cats, nothing but one of your nine lives." Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, III. 1.

All cats love fish. (See previous column, Cat i' the Adage.)

Before the cat can lick her ear—i.e., before the Greek kalends. Never. No cat can lick her ear. (See Never.)

Care killed the cat. (See page 216, 2, Care.)

In the dark all cats are gray. All persons are undistinguished till they have made a name.

Not room to swing a cat. Swinging cats as a mark for sportsmen was at one time a favourite amusement. There were several varieties of this diversion. Sometimes two cats were swung by their tails over a rope. Sometimes a cat was swung to the bough of a tree in a bag or sack. Sometimes it was enclosed in a leather bottle.

Sick on a cat. Cats are very subject to vomiting. Hence the vomit of a drunkard is called "a cat," and the act of discarding it is called "shooting the cat."

Let the cat out of the bag. To disclose a secret. It was formerly a trick among country folk to substitute a cat for a sucking pig, and bring it in a bag to market. If any greenhorn chose to buy a "pig in a poke" without examination, all very well; but if he opened the sack, "he let the cat out of the bag," and the trick was disclosed.

"She let the cat out of her bag of verse; she almost proposed to her hero in rhyme."—George Meredith: The Eposist, III.

To bell the cat. (See page 119, Bell.)

To turn cat-in-pan. To turn traitor, to be a turncoat. The phrase seems to be the French tournier côte en prime (to turn sides in trouble). I do not think it refers to turning pancakes.

"When George in pudding-time came over And moderate men looked big, sir, I turned a cat-in-pan once more, And so became a Whig, sir."

Virgil of Brag.

"Bacon says, "There is a cunning which we in England call the turning of the cat in the pan; which is, when that which a man says to another, he says it as if another had said it to him."

Touch not a cat but a glove. Here "but" is used in its original meaning of "beaut," i.e., without. (For another example of "but" meaning without, see Amos iii. 7.) The words are the motto of Mackintosh, whose crest is "cat-a-mountain salient guardant proper"; supporters, two cats proper. The whole is a pun on the word Catti, the Teutonic settlers of Caithness, i.e. Catti-ness, and mean, "Touch not the clan Cattan or Mountain Cat without a galue." The same words are the adopted motto of Grant of Ballindalloch, and are explained by the second motto, enu e dimo.

In French: On ne prend pas tel chat sans moufles.

What can you have of a cat but her skin? The thing is useless for any purpose but one. In former times the cat's fur was used for trimming cloaks and coats, but the flesh is utterly useless.

Who ate the cat? A gentleman who had his larder frequently assailed by barges, had a cat cooked and placed there as a decoy. It was taken like the other foods, and became a standing jest against these larder pilferers.

A Cheshire cat. He grows like a Cheshire cat. Cheese was formerly sold in Cheshire moulded like a cat. The allusion is to the grinning cheese-cat, but is applied to persons who show their teeth and gums when they laugh. (See Alice in Wonderland.)

A Kilkenny cat. The story is that, during the rebellion of Ireland, Kilkenny was garrisoned by a troop of Hessian soldiers, who amused themselves in barracks by tying two cats together by their tails and throwing them across a clothes-line to fight. The officers, hearing of this, resolved to put a stop to the practice. The look-out man, enjoying the sport, did not observe the officer on duty approaching the barracks; but one of the troopers, more quick-sighted, seizing a sword, cut the two tails, and the cats made their escape. When the officer inquired the meaning of the two bleeding tails, he was coolly told that two cats had been fighting and had devoured each other all but the tails.

Whatever the true story, it is certain that the municipalities of Kilkenny and Irishtown contended so stantly about their respective boundaries and rights to the end of the seventeenth century, that they mutually impoverished each other, leaving little else than "two tails" behind.

Whittington's cat. A cat is a ship formed on the Norwegian model, having a narrow stern, projecting quarters, and deep waist. It is strongly built, and used in the coal trade. Harrison speaks of it as a "cat" or "catch." According to tradition, Sir Richard Whittington made his money by trading in coals, which he conveyed in his "cat" from Newcastle to London. The black faces of his coal-heavers gave rise to the tale about the Moors. In confirmation of this suggestion, it may be added that Whittington was Lord Mayor in 1397, and coal was first made an article of trade from Newcastle to London in 1381.

Cat's Cradle. A child's play, with a piece of twine. Corrupt for cratch-cradle or manger cradle, in which the infant Saviour was laid. Cratch is the French creche (a rack or manger), and to the present hour the racks which stand in fields for cattle to eat from are called cratches.

Cat's Foot. To live under the cat's foot. To be under petitewick government; to be henpecked. A mouse under the paw of a cat lives but by sufferance and at the cat's pleasure.

Cat's Melody (The). Squalling.

"The children were playing the cat's melody to keep their mother in countenance."—W. B. Yeats, Fairy Tales of the Irish Faerytale, p. 236.

Cat's Paw. To be made a cat's paw of, i.e. the tool of another, the medium of doing another's dirty work. The allusion is to the fable of the monkey who wanted to get from the fire some roasted chestnuts, and took the paw of the cat to get them from the hot ashes.

"I had no intention of becoming a cat's paw to draw European chestnuts out of the fire."—Conn. Rodgers.

At sea, light air during a calm causing a ripple on the water, and indicating a storm, is called by sailors a cat's paw, and seamen affirm that the frolics of a cat indicate a gale. These are relics of a superstition that cats are witches or demons in disguise.

Cat's Sleep. A sham sleep, like that of a cat watching a mouse.

Cats. Mistress Tofts, the singer, left legacies at death to twenty cats.

"Not Niovi mourned more for fourteen brats, Nor Mistress Tofts, to leave her twenty cats."
Peter Pindar: Old Kinon.

Catacomb. A subterranean place for the burial of the dead. The Persians have a city they call Comb or Coom, full of mausoleums and the sepulchres of the Persian saints. (Greek, kota-kumbh, a hollow place underground.) (See Koom.)

"The most awful idea connected with the catacombs is their interminable extent, and the possibility of going astray in the labyrinth of darkness."—Hawthorne: Marble Faun, ill.
Cataian (3 syl.). A native of Cathay or China; outlandish, a foreigner generally, a liar.

"I will not believe such a Cataian, though the priest of the town commended him for a true man."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, ii. 1.

Catalogue Raisonné (French). A catalogue of books arranged under subjects.

Catamaran. A scraggy old woman, a vixen; so called by a play on the first syllable. It properly means a raft consisting of three sticks, lashed together with ropes: used on the coasts of Corsica and Madras.

"No, you old catamaran, though you pretend you never read novels ..."—Thackeray: Lover the Idler, chap. i.

Cataphrygians. Christian heretics, who arose in the second century; so called because the first lived in Phrygia. They followed the errors of Montanists.

Castann. A cold in the head. The word means a down-running; from the Greek kataarheo (to flow down).

Catastrophe (4 syl.). A turning upside down. The termination of a drama is always a "turning upside down" of the beginning of the plot. (Greek, kata-strepho.)

Catch. To lie upon the catch. To lie in wait.

"Quid me capitis?"

"They sent certain of the Pharisees ... to catch him in his words."—Mark xii. Here the Greek word is αψυπα, to take by hunting. They were to lie upon the catch till they found occasion against him.

You'll catch it. You'll get severely punished. Here "it" stands for the indefinite punishment, such as a whipping, a scolding, or other unpleasant consequence.

Catch a Crab (To). In rowing, is to be struck with the handle of one's oar; to fall backwards. This occurs when the rower leaves his oar too long in the water before repeating the stroke. In Italian granchio is a crab, and pigilar il granchio is to "catch a crab," or a Tartar.

Catch a Tartar. The biter bit. Gross says an Irish soldier in the Imperial service, in a battle against the Turks, shouted to his comrade that he had caught a Tartar. "Bring him along, then," said his mate. "But he won't come," cried Paddy. "Then come along yourself," said his comrade. "Arrah!"

replied Paddy, "I wish I could, but he won't let me."

"We are like the man who boasted of having caught a Tartar, when the fact was that the Tartar had caught him."—Caution for the Times.

Catch as Catch can. Get by hook or crook all you can.

"All must catch that catch can."—Johnson: Rambler, No. 197.

Catch Me at It! Most certainly I shall never do what you say.

"Catch me going to London!" exclaimed Vixen."—Miss Braddon: Vixen.

Catch the Speaker's Eye (To). To find the eye of the Speaker fixed on you; to be observed by the Speaker. In the House of Commons the member on whom the eye of the Speaker is fixed has the privilege of addressing the House.

"He succeeded in catching the Speaker's eye."—A. Trollope.

Catch Out (To). In cricket, is to catch the ball of a batsman, whereby the striker is ruled out, that is, must relinquish his bat.

Catch your Hare (First). It is generally believed that "Mrs. Glasse," in her Cookery Book, gave this direction; but the exact words are, "Take your hare when it is cased, and make a pudding, etc." To "case" means to take off the skin. Thus, in All's Well that Ends Well, iii. 6, we have these words, "We'll make you some sport with the fox ere we case him." Scotch also means to skin, and this word gave rise to the misquoted catch. Though catch and case both mean to skin, yet the word used in the book referred to in case, not catch. Mrs. Glass was the pen-name of Dr. John Hill (1716-1775), author of The Cookery Book. (See Case.)

Bracton, however (book iv. tit. i. chap. xxii. sec. 4), has these words: "Fulgariter dicitur, quod primo oportet cervum capere, et postea (cum captus fuerit) illum exoririare."

"The Welsh word cach = ordure, dung, and to cach (cacho) would be to clean and gut the hare."

Catch-Club. A member of the Catch-club. A hum-bailiff, a tipstaff, a constable. The pun is obvious.

Catchpenny. A worthless article puffed off to catch the pennies of those who are foolish enough to buy them.

Catchpole. A constable; a law officer whose business it was to apprehend criminals. Pole or poll means head, person; and the word means one Catch Weights, in racing, means without restrictions as to weight.

Catch-word. The first word on any page of a book or manuscript which is printed or written at the foot of the preceding page. In the early days of printing the catch-word was generally used, but for the last two hundred years the practice has been gradually dying out. Its purpose was, among other things, to enable the reader to avoid an awkward pause when turning over a leaf. The first book so printed was a Tactitus, by John de Spira, 1469.

Catch-word. In theatrical parlance, is the last word or so of the previous speaker, which is the cue of the person who follows.

Catechumen [kat' y-ku'men]. One taught by word of mouth (Greek, katachou'menos). Those about to be baptised in the early Church were first taught by word of mouth, and then catechised on their religious faith and duties.

Cater-cousin. An intimate friend; a remote kinsman. (French, quatre-cousin, a fourth cousin).

"His master and he, saying your worship's reverence, are scarce cater-cousins."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

Caterpillars. Soldiers. In 1745 a soldier, quartered at Derby, was desired by the landlord to call on him whenever he passed that way; for, added Boufface, "I consider soldiers the pillars of the state." When the rebellion was put down, it so happened that the same regiment was quartered in Derby, and the soldier called on his old host, but was very coldly and somewhat uncivilly received. The soldier reminded Boufface of what he said at parting—"I consider soldiers the pillars of the state." "Did I say so?" said mine host. "Well, I meant cater-pillars."

Caterwauling. The wail or wrrawl of cats; the er being either a plural, similar to "childer" (children), or a corrupted genitive.

"What a caterwauling do you keep here!"—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 8.

Catharine. To braid St. Catharine's tresses. To live a virgin.

"There art too fair to be left to braid St. Catharine's tresses."—Longfellow: Evangeline.

Catharine (Knights of St.), 1714. A Russian military order founded by Peter the Great after his naval victory of Aland, and so named in compliment to his wife Catharine.

Catharine of Russia. A sutler. When Czar Peter wished to marry her, it was needful to make her of noble birth: so a private person was first converted into her brother, and then into a great lord by birth. Hence Catharine, being the sister of a "great lord," was made fit to be the wife of the Czar. (De Chasse: Russia, chap. iv.)

Catharine Theot (1725-1793). A visionary born at Avranches, who gave herself out to be (like Joanna Southcott) the mother of God, and changed her name Theot into Theos (God). She preached in Paris in 1794, at the very time that the worship of the Supreme Being was instituted, and declared that Robespierre was the forerunner of the WORD. The Comité de la Sûreté Générale had her arrested, and she was guillotined. Catharine Theot was called by Dom Gerle "la mère de dieu," and Catharine called Robespierre "her well-beloved son and chief prophet."

Catharine Wheel (A). A sort of firework. (See below.)

Catharine Wheels. To turn Catharine Wheels. To turn head over heels.
on the hands. Boys in the streets, etc., often do so to catch a penny or so from trippers and others.

A Catharine-wheel window. A wheel-window, sometimes called a rose-window, with radiating divisions. St. Catharine was a virgin of royal descent in Alexandria, who publicly confessed the Christian faith at a sacrificial feast appointed by the Emperor Maximinus, for which confession she was put to death by torture by means of a wheel like that of a chaf-f-cutter.

Catharine-wheel Politicians. Lovers of political changes.

Catharine-wheel Republics. "Republics," says Mr. Lowell, "always in revolution while the powder lasts."

Catharists. A sect of the Manicheans; so called from their professed purity of faith. (Greek, katharos, pure.) They maintained that matter is the source of all evil; that Christ had not a real body; that the human body is incapable of newness of life; and that the sacraments do not convey grace. (See Ducange: vol. ii. p. 239, col. 1.)

Cathay. China, or rather Tartary, the capital of which was Albagaca, according to Orlando Furioso. It was called Khita'i by the Tartars, and China was first entered by Europeans in the Middle Ages from the side of Tartary.

"Better fifty years of Europe than a cycle of Cathay."

Cathedra Molles (Latin). Luxurious women. Properly, soft chairs. The cathedra was a chair for women, like our ottoman; and Juvenal applies the soft chair used by women of dainty habits to the women who use them.

Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. Those which have never been monastic, but which have ab initio been governed by a dean and chapter, with the statutable dignities of precentor, chancellor, and treasurer.

Caterans or Caterans. Highland freebooters or marauders. (Lowland Scotch, catherin, peasantry.)

Catherine. (See Catharine.)

Catholic (The). "Catholicus," a title inherited by the King of Spain; as the monarch of England is entitled "Fidei Defensor," and the King of France was styled "Christianissimus." (See page 228, Catholic Majesty.)

Catholic Association (The), 1756. The first Catholic Association was formed for the purpose of obtaining relief from disabilities. In 1760 the association was re-established on a more representative basis, but it became moribund in 1763. Another association was organised in 1773, which fell under the control of Lord Kenmare; this society was broken up 1783. In 1793 a new society was formed on a still wider basis, and Wolfe Tone was elected secretary. In 1793 the Catholic Relief Bill received the Royal Assent.

In Ireland, 1823: suppressed 1825 (6 Geo. iv. c. 4); dissolved itself February, 1829. The association was first suggested by Daniel O'Connell at a dinner-party given by Mr. O'Mara at Glencullen, and on Monday, May 12th, the first meeting of the association was held in Dempsey's Rooms, Sackville Street. It became one of the most powerful popular movements ever organised. The objects were: (1) to forward petitions to Parliament; (2) to afford relief to Catholics assailed by Orange lodges; (3) to support a Liberal press both in Dublin and London; (4) to circulate cheap publications; (5) to aid the Irish Catholics of America; and (6) to aid English Catholics. Indirectly it undertook the repeal of the Union, and the redress of Irish grievances generally. Everyone who paid Id. a month was a member. (See Catholic Emancipation.)

Catholic Church (The). The Church considered as a whole, as distinguished from parish churches. When the Western Church broke off from the Eastern, the Eastern Church called itself the Orthodox Church, and the Western Church adopted the term Catholic. At the Reformation the Western Church was called by the Reformers the Roman Catholic Church, and the British Established Church was called the "Protestant Church," the "Reformed National Church," or the "Anglo-Catholic Church." It is foolish and misleading to call the Anglican Church the Catholic Church, as at most it is only a branch thereof. No Protestant would think of calling himself a Catholic.

Catholic Emancipation Act (The), 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, April 13th, 1829, whereby Catholics were admitted to all corporate offices, and to an equal enjoyment of all municipal rights. The army and navy had been already opened to them. They were, however, excluded from the following offices: (1) Regent; (2) Chancellor of England or Ireland; (3) Viceroy of Ireland; (4) all offices connected with the Church, universities, and public schools; and (5) the disposal of Church patronage.

Catholic Epistles (The) of the New Testament are those Epistles not addressed to any particular church or individual. Conventionally they are seven—viz. 1 James, 2 Peter, 1 Jude, and 3 John; but 2 John is addressed to a "lady," and 3 John to Gaius, and, of course, are not Catholic Epistles either in matter or otherwise.

Catholic King (The) or His Catholic Majesty. A title given by the Pope to Ferdinand, King of Aragou (1452, 1474-1516), for expelling the Moors from Spain. This was about as unwise as the revocation of the Edict of Nantes by Louis XIV.

Catholic League (The), 1614. A confederacy of Catholicks to counterbalance the Evangelick League (q.c.) of Bohemia. The two Leagues kept Germany in perpetual disturbance, and ultimately led to the Thirty Years' War (1618-1648).

Catholic Majesty, 759. A title given by Gregory III, to Alfonso I, King of Asturias.

Catholic Relief. (See CATHOLIC ASSOCIATION.)

Catholic Rent (Ther), 1823. The subscription of 1d. per mouth towards the expenses of the Catholic Association (q.c.).

Catholic Roll (The). A document which each Roman Catholic was obliged to swear to on taking his seat as a Member of Parliament. It was abolished, and a single oath prescribed to all members by the 29, 30 Victoria, c. 10 (1866).

Catholic.' A panacea. (Greek, katholikon iduma, a universal remedy.)

"Meanwhile, permit me to recommend,
As the matter admits of no delay,

Catholicos. The head of the Assyrian Nestorians. Now called the Patriarch of Armenia.

Catiline's Conspiracy. Lucius Sergius Catilina, b.c. 64, conspired with a large number of disolute young nobles to plunder the Roman treasury, extirpate the Senate, and fire the Capitol. Cicero, who was consul, got full information of the plot, and delivered his first Oration against Catiline November 8th, 63, whereupon Catiline quitted Rome. Next day Cicero delivered his second Oration, and several of the conspirators were arrested. On December 4th Cicero made his third Oration, respecting what punishment should be accorded to the conspirators. And on December 5th, after his fourth Oration, sentence of death was passed. Catiline tried to escape into Gaul, but, being intercepted, he was slain fighting, b.c. 64.

Catilines and Cathedr (Ther). Syonyms for conspirators who hope to mend their fortunes by rebellion.

"The intrigues of a few impoverished Catilines and Cathedr."—MOLY: Dutch Republic.

Cattius. In Pope's Moral Essays (Epist. i.), intended for Charles Dartmouth, a kind of Lucullus, who preferred "A rogue with venison to a rogue without."

"See the yellow catkins cover
All the slender willows over."—MARY HOWITT: Voice of spring, stanza 2.

Cat-lap. Milk or weak tea, only fit for the cat to lap.

"A more accomplished old woman never drank cat-lap."—Sur W. Scott: Redgauntlet, chap. xii.

Cato. He is a Cato. A man of simple life, severe morals, self-denying habits, strict justice, brusque manners, blunt of speech, and of undoubted patriotism, like the Roman censor of that name.

Cato-Street Conspiracy. A scheme entertained by Arthur Thistlewood and his fellow-conspirators to overthrow the Government by assassinating the Cabinet Ministers. So called from Cato Street, where their meetings were held. (1820.)

"The other names of these conspirators are Brunt, Davidson, Harrison, Ings, Monument, Tidd, and Wilson. All eight were sent to the Tower, March 3rd, 1820, by warrant of the Secretary of State.

Cat-nup or Ketchup. The Eastern kitip (soy sauce).

Catted. The anchor hung on the cathead, a piece of timber outside the ship to which the anchor is hung to keep it clear of the ship.

"The decks were all life and commotion; the sailors on the forecastle singing, 'No! cleverly, then.' as they called the anchor."—E. METCALFE: Omoso, xxxvii, p. 191.
Casual. Chief minister of the Zamorin or ancient sovereign of India.

"Begin with high-plumed nobles, by the flood
The first great minister of India stood;
His name 'the Casual' in India's tongue."

Cassowary (Adj.) [the strong]. A bow which fell into the hands of Mahomet when the property of the Jews of Medinâ was confiscated. In the first battle the prophet drew it with such force that it snapped in two.

Cawdwell. The estuary of the Plym (Plymouth). A corruption of châtai (chat-eau); as the castle at the mouth of the Plym used to be called.

Caucasians, according to Blumenbach's ethnological system, represent the European or highest type of the human race; so called from Cau'casus, the mountainous range. Whilst the professor was studying ethnology, he was supplied with a skull from these regions, which he considered the standard of the human type.

Causa. A meeting of citizens in America to agree upon what members they intend to support, and to concert measures for carrying out their political wishes. The word arose from the caulkers of Boston, who had a dispute with the British soldiers a little before the Revolution. Several citizens were killed, and meetings were held at the caulkers' house or call-house, to concert measures for redress of grievances.

"The whole Fenian affair is merely a causas in disguise."—The Times.

"This day the caucasus club meets... in the garret of Tom Dawson, the adjutant of the Boston regiment."—The Adams: Diary, vol. ii. p. 164, February, 1763.

Caudebec. A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the Valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T. Veturius Calvinius and Sp. Postumius fell into the hands of the Samnites, and were made to pass under the yoke.

"Hard as it was to abandon an enterprise so very dear to him... he did not hesitate to take the more prudent course of passing under the Caudine Forks of the Monroe doctrine, and leave Maximilian and the French landlords to their fate."—Standard, Nov. 17th, 1908.

Caudle is any sloppy mess, especially that sweet mixture given by nurses to goslings who call to see the baby during the first month. The word simply means something warm. (Latin, calidus; French, chaudié; Italian, caldo.)

Caudle (Mrs.). A curtain lecturer. The term is derived from a series of papers by Douglas Jerrold, which were published in Punch. These papers represent Job Caudle as a patient sufferer of the curtain lectures of his nagging wife.

Caught Napping (to it). To suffer some disadvantage while off one's guard. Pheasants, hares, and other animals are sometimes surprised "napping." I have myself caught a cock-pheasant napping.

Caul. The membrane on the head of some new-born infants, supposed to be a charm against death by drowning.

To be born with a caul was with the Romans tantamount to our phrase, "To be born with a silver spoon in one's mouth," meaning "born to good luck." M. Francisque-Michel, in his Phlogisio Cornucopiae, p. 83, i. says: "Calle, espéere de coiffeur, est synonyme de coiffé," and quotes the proverb, "Ste. Mignon! nous sommes nus comme coiffes." (La Comédie des Proverbes, act ii. 4.)

Caudle-leaf (The) of Hilton Hall. A house-spirit, who moved about the furniture during the night. Being resolved to banish him, the inmates left for him a green cloak and hood, before the kitchen-fire, which so delighted him that he never troubled the house any more; but sometimes he might be heard singing—

"Here's a cloak, and here's a hood,
The cauld-leaf of Hilton will do no more good."

Cauline (Sir) (2 syl.). A knight who lived in the palace of the King of Ireland, and "used to serve the wine." He fell in love with Christabelle, the king's daughter, who plighted her troth to him secretly, for fear of the king. The king discovered the lovers in a bower, and banished Sir Cauline. After a time an eldrige came, and demanded the lady in marriage. Sir Cauline slew the "Soldain," but died of the wounds received in the combat; and the fair Christabelle died of grief, having "burst her gentle heart in twayne." (Percy's Reliques, iv.)

Cautus or Caurus. The west-northwest wind, which blew from Caurus (Argestes).

"The ground by piercing Caurus ceased."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 76.

Causa Causans. The initiating cause; the primary cause.

Causa Causata. The cause which owes its existence to the "causa causans"; the secondary cause.
The _vota causa_ is (a) the immediate predecessor of an effect; (b) a cause verifiable by independent evidence. (Mill.)

In theology God is the causa causarum, and creation the causa causarum. The presence of the sun above the horizon is the _vota_ causes of daylight, and his withdrawal below the horizon is the _vota_ cause of night.

Cause (The). A mission; the object or project.

To make common cause. To abet the same object. Here "cause" is the legal term, meaning _pro_ or _con_, as it may be, the cause or side of the question advocated.

Cause célèbre. Any famous law case.

Causes. Aristotelian causes are these four:

1. The _Efficient Cause_. That which immediately produces the effect.
2. The _Material Cause_. The matter on which (1) works.
3. The _Formal Cause_. The essence or "form" (=group of attributes) introduced into the matter by the efficient cause.
4. The _Final or Ultimate Cause_. The purpose or end for which the thing exists or the causal change takes place. But God is called the ultimate _Final Cause_, since, according to Aristotle, all things tend, so far as they can, to realise some Divine attribute.

God is also called _The First Cause_, or the _Cause Causeless_, beyond which even imagination cannot go.

Cautelous. Cautious, cunning, treacherous. (Latin, _cautella_; French, _cautelous_. Spanish, _cauteloso._)

"Caught with cautelous tait._" Shakespeare: _Coriolanus_, iv. 1.

"Sweat priests and cowards and men cautelous._" Shakespeare: _Julius Caesar_, ii. 1.

Cauter (A1)._ The lake of Paradise, the waters of which are sweet as honey, cold as snow, and clear as crystal. He who once tastes thereof will never thirst again. (The Koran._

Caution Money. A sum deposited before entering college, by way of security.

Caution. (See Cauter._

Cava. Cava's traitor sire. Cava or Florinda was the daughter of St. Julian. It was the violation of Cava by Roderick that brought about the war between the Goths and the Moors. St. Julian, to avenge his daughter, turned traitor to Roderick, and induced the Moors to invade Spain. King Roderick was slain at Xarés on the third day. (A.D. 711.)

Cavalier à Pied. The Zousves (pronounce _swar_ and Zephyrs of the French army are so called because of their fleetness and swiftness of foot.

Cavalier (3 syl.). A horseman: whence a knight, a gentleman. (Latin, _caballus_, a horse._

The _Cavalier_.

Eon de Beaumont, the French soldier; Chevalier d'Eon. (1728-1810.)

Charles Breydel, the Flemish landscape painter. (1677-1744.)

Francesco Cairo (Cavaliere del Cairo), historian. (1598-1674.)

Jean le Clerc, le chevalier. (1587-1633.)

J. Battista Marini, Italian poet; Il cavaliere (1659-1656.)

Andrew Michael Ramsay (1686-1743.)

Cavaliere or Chevalier de St. George. James Francis Edward Stuart, called "the Pretender," or "the Old Pretender" (1688-1765).

The _Young Cavaliere_ or the _Bonnie Cavaliere_. Edward, the "Young Pretender" (1720-1785.)

Cavaliere Servant, in Italian _ciechiebo_, and in Spanish _cortefio_. A gentleman that chaperones married ladies.

"Coach, servants, gondola, he goes to call.
And carries fan and tippet, gloves and shawl._" Byron: _Beppo_, st. xi.

Cavaliers. Adherents of Charles I. Those of the opposing Parliament party were called Roundheads (q.v.).

Cavall. "King Arthur's hound of deepest mouth._" (Idylls of the King; End._

Cave-dweller. (See page 157, col. 1, BOHEMIAN BRETHREN._

Cave In. Shut up! have done! I'll cave in his head (break it). His fortune has caved in (has failed). The bank has caved in (come to a smash). The affair caved in (fell through). Common American expressions.

In the leg diggings, after a shaft has been sunk, the earth round the sides falls or caver in, unless properly boarded; and if the mine does not answer, no caver is taken to prevent a caving in.

Cave ne litteras Bellerophonis adserras. Take care that the letter you carry is not a warrant for your death. (See page 121, col. 1, BELLERophon._

Cave of Achan Aldai. A cairn in Ireland, so called from Aldai, the ancestor of the Tuatha de Danaan kings.

Cave of Adullam (Th_._. (See page 17, col. 1, ADULLAMITES._

Cave

Cave of Mammon. The abode of the god of wealth in Spenser’s Faerie Queene, ii. 7.

Cav'eat (3 syl.). To enter a cavet. To give legal notice that the opponent is not to proceed with the suit in hand until the party giving the notice has been heard; to give a warning or admonition.

Cav'eat Emptor. The buyer must be responsible for his own free act. Let the buyer keep his eyes open, for the bargain he agrees to is binding. In English law, Chief Justice Tindal modified this rule. He said if the buyer gives notice that he relies on the vendor’s judgment, and the vendor warrants the article, then the vendor is bound to furnish an article “reasonable and fit for the purpose required.”

Cavell or Cavet. A parcel or allotment of land measured by a cord or cable. (German, kabel, whence kaveln, to assign by lot.)

Cavendish Tobacco. An American brand of chewing or smoking tobacco, prepared for use by softening, sweetening with molasses, and dressing into plugs. Called “Cavendish” from the original manufacturer.

Cavi'are (3 syl.). Caviare to the general. Above the taste or comprehension of ordinary people. Caviare is a kind of pickled made from the roe of sturgeons, much esteemed in Muscovy. It is a dish for the great, but beyond the reach of the general public. (Hamlet, ii. 2.)

“... All popular talk about lacustrine villages and flint implements... is cavare to the multitude.”—Faulk Mutt Gazette.

Cavo-rili've. “Relief,” cut below the original surface, the highest parts of the figure being on a level with the surface. Also called Intaglio-rilievato (pronounce cau'ro-rel-yay'ro).

Caxon. A worn-out wig; also a big cauliflower wig, worn out or not. It has been suggested that the word is from the proper name, but nothing whatever is known about such a person.

“... People scarce could decide on its phiz. Which looked wisest—the caxum or lowl.”—Peter Pindar: The Portfolio.

C. D. i.e. Cetera desunt (Latin). The rest of the MS. is wanting.

Ce'an. The Canan poet. Simonides, of Ceoes.

“The Canan and the Teban muse.”—Byron: Don Juan (The Poet’s Song).

Ceilict

Ceca to Mecca (From). From one end of the world to the other; from pillar to post. It is a Spanish phrase meaning to roam about purposelessly. Ceca and Mecca are two places visited by Mohammedan pilgrims. (Compare: From Dan to Beersheba; and From Land’s End to John o’ Groats.)

“... Let us return home,” said Sancho, “no longer ramble about from Ceca to Mecca.”—Cervantes: Don Quixote, I, iii. 4.

Cecilia (St.). A Roman lady who underwent martyrdom in the third century. She is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; she is also patroness of musicians, and “inventor of the organ.”

“... At length divine Cecilia came, In escort of the vocal frame.”—Dryden: Alexander’s Feast.

According to tradition, an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. Her husband saw the heavenly visitant, who gave to both a crown of martyrdom which he brought from Paradise. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honour, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers:

“... He [Time also] raised a mortal to the skies,” she [Cecilia] brought an angel down.”—Dryden: Alexander’s Feast.

Cecil’s Fast. A dinner off fish. W. Cecil (Lord Burleigh) introduced a Bill to enjoin the eating of fish on certain days in order to restore the fish trade.

Ced. Ket, or Ceridwen. The Arkite goddess or Cers of the Britons.

“... I was first modelled into the form of a pure man in the hall of Ceridwen, who subjected me to penance.”—Taliesin (Davies’ Translation).

Cedar. Curzon says that Solomon cut down a cedar, and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda was used to stand. A few days before the crucifixion, this cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was employed as the upright of the Saviour’s cross. (Monasteries of the Levant.) (See Canes.)

Cedilla. The mark („) under a French sibilant c. This mark is the letter z, and the word is from the Italian zediglis ("zeticula", a little z. (Greek, zeta; Spanish, ceda, with a diminutive.)

Cesilt (St.) or St. Calixtus, whose day is the 14th of October, the day of the Battle of Hastings.

Brown Willis tells us there was a tablet once in Battle parish church with these words:

“This place of war was Battle called, because in battle here...
Cen'ture. 232  Cen'to

Quite conquered and o'erthrown the English nation were.
This sooner happened to them upon St. Cecilia's day," etc.

Cen'ture de la Reina. The octroi levied at Paris, which at one time was the queen's pin-money or private purse.

Celadon. The lover of Amelia, a "matchless beauty." Being overtaken by a storm, Amelia became alarmed, but Celadon, folding her in his arms, exclaimed, "'Tis safety to be near thee, sure, and thus to clasp perfection." As he spoke, a flash of lightning struck Amelia dead. (Thomson: The Seasons; Summer.)

Celandine, a shepherdess in love with Marina. Finding his suit too hastily granted, he waxed cold, and discarded the "matchless beauty." (W. Broune: Britannia's Paintorials; 1613.)

Ces'terial City (The). Heaven is so called by John Bunyan in his Pilgrim's Progress.

Ces'terial Empire (The). China; so called because the first emperors were all ces'terian deities.

Ces'tians. Followers of Ces'tius, disciple of Pela'gius. St. Jerome calls him "a blockhead swolled with Scotch portage"—Scotch being, in this case, what we now call Irish.

Ces'tia [ces'te'line's]. Mother of Faith, Hope, and Charity. She lived in the hospice called Holiness. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, bk. i. 10.)

Ces'illa or Cil'a. A common poetical name for a lady or lady-love. Thus, Swift had an ode in which Sterephon describes Cessilia's dressing-room.

"Six hours, and who can do it less;
By naythy Cessil, spent in dressing.'

Celt. A piece of stone, ground artificially into a wedge-like shape, with a cutting edge. Used, before the employment of bronze and iron, for knives, hatchets, and chisels.

Cels (The), or The Kelts. This family of nations includes the Irish, Erse, Manx, Welsh, Cornish, and Low Bretons. According to historic fable, Celtina was the daughter of Britannus. She had a son by Hercules, named Celticus, the progenitor of the Celts.

Cem'etery properly means a sleeping-place. The Jews used to speak of death as sleep. The Persians call their cemeteries "The Cities of the Silent." The Greeks thought it unlucky to pronounce the name of Death. (Greek, koinê'teron.)

Cenob'ites (3 syl.) Monks. So called because they live in common. Hermits and anchorites are not cenob'ites, as they live alone. (Greek, koînô'bo'tes.)

Cenoman'ian. The inhabitants of Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridge, referred to by Cæsar in his Commentaries.

Cenoph'as. The most noted in ancient times—

AEGEO to Delphi: Homer, i. 6: v. 2507.
ANDROMACH: For Hector (Hesiod, 131; v. 302).
AESTUS: For Aneas (Anthologia, bk. iii. 22).
ARISTOTLE: To Heracles and Euthydicus (Diogène Laërtius).

The Athenians to the poet Euripides.
CALMACHON to Sophila, son of Diocles (Epigram of Callimachus, 22).
CATULLUS to his brother (Epigram of Catullus, 85).
Dido to Silenus (Vergil, xvii. 8).
KORPORIS and ATERTASSO to their son Tho'asianus.
GERMANUS to Hekle to Hervor, the Breton, in 1112.
Oxyntos to Timocles (Anthologia, iv. p. 300).
ROMANUS Pius to Fanes, in Germany, and to Alexander Severus, the emperor, in Gaul (Sidonius: Life of Claudius; and the Anthologia).
STATIUS to his father (The Syrinx of Staulus, v. Epicurius, 3).
TIMAEUS to his son Telemachus.
XENOPHANUS to Lyndicus (Anthologia).

"A celtaph (Irish, cresc't rasce, an empty tomb) is a monument or tablet to the memory of a person whose body is buried elsewhere. A mausoleum is an imposing monument enshrining the dead body itself.

Censar'ius or Sapiens. Cato Major was so called. (B.C. 234-149.)

Cen'taur (2 syl.). A huntsman. The Thessalian centaurs were half-horses, half-men. They were invited to a marriage feast, and, being intoxicated, behaved with great rudeness to the women. The Lap'ithous took the women's part, fell on the centaurs, and drove them out of the country.

"Feasts that Thessalian centaurs never knew." (Thomson: Ant'ian.)

Cent-cy'ne. One of the upper ten; a person of high birth, a descendant of the race of kings. (Anglo-Saxon cyn, royal; cyne-dom, a kingdom; also noble, renowned, chief.)

"His wife, by birth a cent-cyne, went out as a day-servant."—Gaboriau, Promise of Marriage, chap. 1.

Cento. Poetry made up of lines borrowed from established authors. Auso'nius has a nuptial idyll composed from verses selected from Virgil. (Latin, cen'to, patchwork.)

The best known are the Homéro'cento'n (3 syl.), the Cen'to l'Virgiliano by Proba Falconia (4th century), and the Cen'to Nepi'thio of Ausonius. Metellus made hymns out of the Odes of Horace by this sort of patchwork. Of modern cen- tos, the Comédie des Comédiens, made up of extracts from Balzac, is pretty well known.

Central Sun. That body or point about which our whole system revolves. Müller believed that point to be ca in Taurus.

Centre. In the Legislative Assembly The Centre were the friends of order. In the Fenian rebellion, 1866, the chief movers were called Head Centres, and their subordinates Centres.

Centre of Gravity. That point on which a body acted on by gravity is balanced in all positions.

Centur'viri. A court under whose jurisdiction the Romans placed all matters pertaining to testaments and inheritances.

Centur'ium. A Roman officer who had the command of 100 men. His badge was a vine-rod. (Latin, centum, a hundred.)

Century White. John White, the Nonconformist lawyer. So called from his chief publication, The First Century of Scandalous, Malignant Priests, made and admitted into Benefices by the Priests, etc. (1590-1645).

Cephalus and Procris. Made familiar to us by an allusion to them in the play of Pyramus and Thysbe, where they are miscalled Shafalus and Procrus. Cephalus was the husband of Procris, who, out of jealousy, deserted him. Cephalus went in search of her, and rested awhile under a tree. Procris, knowing of his whereabouts, crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him. Cephalus heard the noise, and thinking it to be made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew Procris. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin.

"Pyramus: Not Shafalus to Procrus was so true.
Thysbe: As Shafalus to Procris, 1 to 1." — Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

Ce'phes (2 syl.). One of the northern constellations, which takes its name from Ce'pes, King of Ethiopia, husband of Cassiopeia and father of Andromeda.

Ce'pola. Deveres of Cépola. Quips of law are so called from Bartholomew Cépola whose law-quirks for prolonging lawsuits have been frequently reprinted.

Cé'quel (3 syl.). A spirit who transported Torralba from Valladolid to Rome and back again in an hour and a half. (Pelllicer.)

Cer'navium. The opal. So called by the ancients from a notion that it was a thunder-stone. (Latin, ceravium; Greek, keravnios.)

Ger'berus. A grim, watchful keepers, house-porter, guardian, etc. Gerberus, according to Roman mythology, is the three-headed dog that keeps the entrance of the infernal regions. Hercules dragged the monster to earth, and then let him go again. (See Sor.)

Orpheus (2 syl.) lulled the Cerberus to sleep with his lyre; and the Sibyl who conducted Æneas through the Inferno, also threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey.

The origin of the fable of Cerberus is from the custom of the ancient Egyptians of guarding graves with dogs.

The exquisite cameo by Dioscorides, in the possession of the King of Prussia, and the painting of Hercules and Cerberus, in the Farnesé Gallery of Rome, are of world-wide renown.

Cerdonians. A sect of heretics, established by Cerdon of Syria, who lived in the time of Pope Hyginius, and maintained most of the errors of the Manichees.

Ceremonious (The). Peter IV. of Aragon. (1319, 1336-1387.)

Ceremony. When the Romans fled before Brennus, one Albinius, who was carrying his wife and children in a cart to a place of safety, overtook at Janiculum the Vostal virgins bending under their load, took them up and conveyed them to Cer-commonwealth in Etruaria. Here they remained, and continued to perform their sacred rites, which were consequently called "Cere-monia." (Lucy, V.)

Scaliger says the word comes from cree = saucius, Cerus = Creator; and Cerco (according to Varro) is by metathesis for creo. Creco, according to Scaliger, is also from creo. By this etymology, "Ceremony" means sacred rites, or solemn acts in honour of the Creator. The great objection to this etymology is that Cicero, Tacitus, and other classic authors spell the word Ceremonia and not Cere-monia.

Master of the Ceremonies. An officer, first appointed by James I., to superintend the reception of ambassadors and strangers of rank, and to prescribe the formalities to be observed in levees and other grand public functions.

Ceres (2 syl.). Corn. Ceres was the Roman name of Mother-Earth, the protectress of agriculture and of all the fruits of the earth.

"Darkrowning heaths grow bright with Ceres’ flower."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, ii. 27.

Cerinthians. Disciples of Cerinthus, a heresarch of the first century. They denied the divinity of Christ, but held that a certain virtus descended into Him at baptism, which filled Him with the Holy Ghost.

Cerulean Brother of Jove (The). Neptune. Here cerulean means green.

Cess. Measure, as ex cess, excessive. Out of all cess means excessively, i.e. ex (out of all) cess.

"Poor ladie, is wrung in the withers out of all cess."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 1.

Cess. A tax, contracted from assessment ("esse"); as a "church cess." In Ireland the word is used sometimes as a contraction of success, meaning luck, as "bad cess to you!"

Cestui que Vie is the person for whose life any lands or hereditaments may be held.

Cestui que vie, the person entitled to use. Cestui que trustee, the person for whose benefit a trust may be created.

Cestus, in Homer, is the girdle of Venus, of magical power to move to ardent love. In Jerusalem Delivered, Armida wore a similar cestus.

Cf. Latin, confer = compare.

Chabouk. (See Chibouque, p. 215.)

Chabouk or Chabouk. A long whip, or the application of whips and rods; a Persian and Chinese punishment. (Imbois.)

"Dray forward that faur, and cut his roke into ratters on his buck with your chabouks."—Scott: The Sagon's Daughter, c. xiv.

The criticism of the chabuk. The application of whips or rods (Persian). (Imbois.)

"If that monarch did not give the chabuk to Fermerow, there would be no end to all legitimate government in Bucharia."—T. Moore: Lalla Rookh.

Chacun a son goût. "Everyone has (a) his taste"; or, "Everyone to (a) his taste." The former is French, the latter is English-French. The phrase is much more common with us than it is in France, where we meet with the phrases—Chacun a sa charunerie (everyone has his idiosyncrasy), and chacun a sa marotte (everyone has his hobby). In Latin sua cuique robutas, "as the good-man said when he kissed his cow."

Chad-pennies. Whitsuntide offerings at St. Chad's cathedral, Lichfield, for keeping it in repair.

Chair. An old bird is not to be caught with chaff. An experienced man, or one with his wits about him, is not to be deluded by humbug. The reference is to throwing chaff instead of bird-seed to allure birds. Hence—

You are chaffing me. Making fun of me. A singular custom used to exist in Notts and Leicestershire some half a century ago. When a husband ill-treated his wife, the villagers emptied a sack of chaff at his door to intimate that "threshing was done within," which some think to be the origin of the word.

"To chaff" meaning to banter, is a variant of chafe, to irritate.

Chair (The). The office of chief magistrate in a corporate town.

Below the chair. An alderman who has not yet served the mayoralty.

Passed the chair. One who has served the chief office of the corporation.

The word is also applied to the office of a professor, etc., as "The chair of poetry, in Oxford, is now vacant." The word is furthermore applied to the president of a committee or public meeting. Hence—

To take the chair. To become the chairman or president of a public meeting. The chairman is placed in a chair at the head of the table, or in some conspicuous place like the Speaker of the House of Commons, and his decision is absolutely final in all points of doubt. Usually the persons present nominate and elect their own chairman; but in some cases there is an ex officio chairman.

Chair. When members of the House of Commons and other debaters call out "Chair," they mean that the chairman is not properly supported, and his words not obeyed as they ought to be. Another form of the same expression is, "Pray support the chair."

Grooming chair. The chair in which a woman is confined or sits afterwards to receive congratulations. Similarly "grooming cake" and "grooming cheese" are the cake and cheese which used to be provided in "goose month."

"For a nurse, the child to dandle,
Sugar, soap, spurred pots, and candle,
A grooming chair, and oke a candle.
Poor Robin's Almanack, 1810."
Chair-days. Old age.

"I had long supposed that chair-days, the beautiful name for those days of old age, was of Shakespeare's own invention; but this is a mistake. The word is current in Laucastre still."—Tennyson: English Poets and Poems, v.

"In thy reverence and thy chair-days, thus To die in tumultuous battle."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., act v. 2.

Chair of St. Peter (The). The office of the Pope of Rome, said to be founded by St. Peter, the apostle; but St. Peter's Chair means the Catholic festival held in commemoration of the two episcopates founded by the apostle, one at Rome, and the other at Antioch (January 18th and February 22nd).

Chalcodony [kal′kədɒnɪ]. A precious stone, consisting of half-transparent quartz, so called from Chalco don, in Asia Minor, where it was first found. In antiquity, it was set in gold or silver. Chalcos is a green color; cornelian, cat's-eye, chrysoprase, flint, hornstone, onyx, plum, and sand.

? Albertus Magnus (book i, chap. 2) says: "It dispels illusions and all vain imaginations. If hung about the neck as a charm, it is a defence against enemies, and keeps the body healthful and vigorous.

Chalk.

I'll chalk out your path for you—i.e. lay it down or plan it out as a carpenter or ship-builder plans out his work with a piece of chalk.

I can walk a chalk as well as you. I am no more drunk than you are. The allusion is to the ordeal on board ship of trying men suspected of drunkenness. They were required to walk along a line chalked on the deck, without deviating to the right or left.

The tapster is undone by chalk, i.e. credit. The allusion is to scoring up credit on a tally with chalk. This was common enough early in the nineteenth century, when milk scores, bread scores, as well as beer scores were general.

Chalk it up. Put it to his credit.

"'As good-humoured sarcasm, Chalk it up! is tantamount to saying, 'What you have done so amusingly that I must make some more or less permanent record of it."

Chalk and Cheese. I know the difference between chalk and cheese. Between what is worthless and what is valuable, between a counterfeit and a real article. Of course, the resemblance of chalk to cheese has something to do with the saying, and the alliteration helps to popularize it.

"This Scotch scarecrow was no more to be compared to him than chalk was to cheese."—Sir W. Scott: Woodstock, 311.

I cannot make chalk of one and cheese of the other. I must treat both alike; I must show no favouritism.

They are no more like than chalk is like cheese. There may be a slight apparent resemblance, but there is no real likeness.

Chalks.

I beat him by long chalks. Thoroughly. In allusion to the ancient custom of making merit marks with chalk, before lead pencils were so common.

Walk your chalks. Get you gone. Lodgings wanted for the royal retinue used to be taken arbitrarily by the marshal and sergeant-chamberlain, the inhabitants were sent to the right about, and the houses selected were notified by a chalk mark. When Mary de Medicis, in 1638, came to England, Sieur de Labat was employed to mark "all sorts of houses commodious for her retinue in Colchester." The same custom is referred to in the Life and Acts of Sir William Wallace, in Edinburgh. The phrase is "Walk, you're chalked," corrupted into Walk your chalks.

? In Scotland, at one time, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit by chalkling the door.

"The prisoner has cut his stick and walked his chalk, and is off to London."—C. Ingmery.

Challenge to the Array (4). An objection to the whole panel or body of jurymen, based on some default of the sheriff, or his officer who arrayed the panel.

Challenge to the Polls (4). An objection or protest to certain persons selected for a jury. If a man is not qualified to serve, or if he is supposed to be biased, he may be challenged. In capital cases a prisoner may challenge persons without assigning any reason, and in cases of treason as many as thirty-five. (22 Henry VIII., c. 14; 7, 8 George IV., c. 24, s. 3.)

Challenging a Jury. This may be to object to all the jurors from some informality in the way they have been "arrayed" or empanelled, or to one or more of the jurors, from some real or supposed disqualification or bias of judgment. The word "challenge" is Norman, and is exactly equivalent to "call out;" hence we say Captain A challenged or called out Captain B.

Cham (kæm). The sovereign prince of Tartary, now written "khan."

"Fetch you a hair off the great Cham's beard."—Shakespeare: Much Ado About Nothing, ii. 1.

The great Cham of Literature. Dr. Samuel Johnson (1709-1784).
Chambre Ardente (French). "A lighted chamber" (A darkened court). Before the Revolution, certain offences in France were tried in a court from which daylight was excluded, and the only light admitted was by torches. These inquisitorial courts were devised by Cardinal Lorraine. The first was held in the reign of François I., for trying heretics. Brinvilliers and his associates were tried in a darkened court in 1682. Another was held in 1716, during the regency. When judges were ashamed to be seen, prisoners could not expect much leniency.

Chameleon. You are a chameleon, i.e. very changeable—shifting according to the opinions of others, as the chameleon changes its hue to that of contiguous objects.

"As the chameleon, who is known To have no colour of his own, But borrows from his neighbour’s hue: His white or black, his green or blue."—Prior.

Pliny tells us that Democritus wrote a book on superstitions connected with the chameleon.

C’est un canéel. One who shifts his opinions according to circumstances; a vicar of Bray.

To chameleonise is to change one’s opinions as a chameleon changes its colour.

Champ de Manœuvres (Ir.). The soldiers’ exercise ground.

Champs de Mai. The same as the Champs de Mars (q.v.), transferred after 755 to the mouth of May. Napoleon I. revived these meetings during the "Hundred Days" (June 1st, 1815).

Champs de Mars. The March meetings held by Clovis and his immediate followers, sometimes as mere pageants for the amusement of the freedmen who came to offer homage to their lord, and pay their annual gifts; sometimes for business purposes, especially when the king wished to consult his warriors about some expedition.

Champak. An Indian tree (Michelia Champaca). The wood is sacred to Buddha, and the strongly-scented golden flowers are worn in the black hair of Indian women.

"The Champak odours fail."—Shelley: Lines to Indian Air.

Champerty (Latin, campi partitio, division of the land) is a bargain with some person who undertakes at his own cost to recover property on condition of receiving a share thereof if he succeeds.

"Champerty is treated as a worse offence; for by this a stranger supplies money to carry on a suit, on condition of sharing in the land or other property."—Perkins: Contracts (vol. II, part II, chap. 3, page 284.)

Champion and Several. A "champion" is a common, or land in allotments without enclosures. A "several" is a private farm, or land enclosed for individual use. A champion also means one who holds a champion.

"The champion differs from several much For want of partition, closer, and such."—Tyrer: Five Hundred Points, etc. (Intro.).

Champion of England. A person whose office it is to ride up Westminster Hall on a Coronation Day, and challenge any one who disputes the right of succession. The office was established by William the Conqueror, and was given to Marmion and his male descendants, with the manor of "broad Scredlesby." De Ludlow received the office and manor through the female line; and in the reign of Richard II. Sir John Dymoke succeeded through the female line also. Since then the office has continued in the Dymoke family.

"These Lincoln lands the Conqueror gave, That England’s glore they might convey To knight renowned amongst the brave— The baron hold of Peckover."—An Anglo-Norman Ballad modernised.

Chance. (See MAIN CHANCE.)

Chanoine means a lattice-screen. In the Roman law courts the lawyers were cut off from the public by such a screen. (Lat. cancellus.)

Chancel of a church. That part of a church which contains the altar, and the seats set apart for the choir. It is generally raised a step or more above the floor of the nave.

Chancellor. A petty officer in the Roman law courts stationed at the chancel (q.v.) as usher of the court. In the Eastern Empire he was a secretory or notary, subsequently invested with judicial functions. The office was introduced into England by Edward the Confessor, and under the Norman kings the chancellor was made official secretary of all important legal documents. In France, the chancellor was the royal notary, president of the councils, and keeper of the Great Seal.

Chancellor of England (The). The Lord Chancellor, or the Lord High Chancellor. The highest judicial functionary of the nation, who ranks above all peers, except princes of the blood. and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He is "Keeper of the Great Seal," is called "Keeper of His (or Her) Majesty's Conscience," and presides on the Wool sack in the House of Lords.

Chancery. The part of the Court occupied by the lawyers. To get a man's head into chancery is to get it under your arm, where you can pummel it as long as you like, and he cannot get it free without great difficulty. The allusion is to the long and exhausting nature of a Chancery suit. If a man once gets his head there, the lawyers punish him to his heart's content.

"When I can perform my mile in eight minutes, or a little less, I feel as if I had old Tyme's head in chancery."—Holmes: Autocut, chap. vii. p. 191.

Chaneph. The island of religious hypocrites, inhabited by sham saints, tellers of beads, numberers of ave marian, and friars who lived by begging. (The word meant hypocrite in Hebrew.) (See Rabelais: Pantagruel, iv. 63, 64.)

Change. Ringing the changes. Repeating the same thing in different ways. The allusion is to bell-ringing.

* To know how many changes can be rung on a peal of bells, multiply the known preceding number by the next subsequent one, thus: 1 bell no change; 2 bells, 1 × 2 = 2 changes; 3 bells, 2 × 3 = 6 changes; 4 bells, 6 × 4 = 24 changes; 5 bells, 24 × 5 = 120 changes; 6 bells, 720 changes, etc.

"Take your change out of that." Said to a person who insults you when you give him a quid pro quo, and tell him to take out the change. It is an allusion to shopping transactions, where you settle the price of the article, and put the surplus or change in your pocket.

Changeling (2 syl.). A peevish, sickly child. The notion used to be that the fairies took a healthy child, and left in its place one of their starveling elves which never did kindly.

"Oh, that it could be proved
That some night-travelling fairy had exchanged
In clothe-clutter our children as they lay,
And called mine Perry, his Plantagenet.
Then would I have his Harry, and be mine."

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, 1. 1.

Chant du Départ. After the Mar serailles, the most celebrated song of the first French Revolution. It was written by M. J. Chénier for a public festival, held June 11th, 1794, to commemorate the taking of the Bastille. The music is by Méhul. A mother, an old man, a child, a wife, a girl, and three warriors sing a verse in turn, and the sentiment of each is, "We give up our claims on the men of France for the good of the Republic." (See page 217, col. 1, CARMAGNOLE.)

"La republique nous appelle, Seulons vaincre or sauvons perir;
Un Français doit vivre pour elle,
Pour elle un Français doit mourir."

M. J. Chénier.
The Republic invites,
Let us conquer or fall;
For her Frenchmen live,
And die as her call. E. C. B.

Chanticleer. The cock, in the tale of Reynard the Fox, and in Chaucer's Nunne Pryched Tale. The word means "shriil-singer." (French chantier-clair, to sing clearly, i.e. distinctly.)

"My lungs began to crow like chanticleer," Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Chaoian Bird (The). The dove. So called because it delivered the oracles of Chaonia (Vodona).

"But the mild swallow none with tails infect,
And none the soft Chaoian bird molest." Ovid: Art of Love, ii.

Chaoian Food. Acorns. So called from the oak trees of Chaonia or Dodona. Some think beech-meat is meant, and tell us that the boughs of the oak were hung on beech-trees, not on oaks.

"The Greek word is ἄγος; Latin, fagus. Hence Strabo, Δωδοιτω, φάγου τε Παλασικον ἑλανον ἕρεμον. (He to Dodona came, and the hallowed oak or beech [fagus], the seat of the P earliest). Now, 'fagus' means the food-tree, and both acorns and mast are food, so nothing determinate can be derived from going to the root of the word, and, as it is extremely doubtful where Dodona was, we get no light by referring to the locality. Our text says Chaonia (in Epirus), others place it in Thessaly.

Chaos (ku'os). Confusion; that confused mass of elemental substances supposed to have existed before God reduced creation into order. The poet Hesiod is the first extant writer that speaks of it.

"Light, uncollected, through the chaos surged its infant way, nor order yet had drawn His lovely train from out the daunting gloom."

Thomson: Autumn, 12-4.
Chap. A man, properly a merchant. A chap-man is a merchantman or tradesman. "If you want to buy, I'm your chap." A good chap-man or chap became in time a good fellow. Hence, A good sort of chap, A clever chap, etc. (Anglo-Saxon, ceap-man.)

? An awkward customer is an analogous phrase.

Chapeau or Chapel de Roses. C'est un petit mariage, car quand on demande ce qu'un père donne à une fille, et qu'on veut répondre qu'il donne peu, on dit qu'il lui donne un chapeau de roses. Les roses sont consacrées à Venus, aux Grâces, et à l'Amour. (Les Origines de quelques Coutumes Anciennes, 1672.)

N.B.—"Chapel" we now call a chaplain.

Chapeau-bras. A soft hat which can be folded and carried under the arm (bras, French for arm). Strictly speaking, it should be a three-cornered hat.

Chapel is the chest containing relics, or the shrine thereof (Latin, capella; French, chape, a cope). The kings of France in war carried St. Martin's cope into the field, and kept it in a tent as a talisman. The place in which the cope was kept was called the chapelle, and the keeper thereof the chaplain.

Chapel (A). Either a place subsidiary to the parish church, or a place of worship not connected with the State, as a Methodist Chapel, a Baptist Chapel, etc.

Chapel, in printers' parlance, meant his workshop. In the early days of printing, presses were set up in the chapels attached to abbeys, as those of Caxton in Westminster Abbey. (See Monk, Friar, etc.)

Chapel. The "census" of journeymen printers assembled to decide any point of common interest. The chairman is called the "father of the chapel.

To hold a chapel. To hold a printers' caucus.

Chapel-of-Ease. A place of worship for the use of parishioners residing at a distance from the parish church.

Chaperon. A lady's attendant and protector in public. So called from the Spanish hood worn by duennas. (English-French.) (See Tapisserie.)

To chaperone. To accompany a young unmarried lady in loco parentis, when she appears in public or in society.

Chapter. To the end of the chapter. From the beginning to the end of a proceeding. The allusion is to the custom of reading an entire chapter in the first and second lesson of the Church service. This is no longer a general rule in the Church of England.

Chapter and Verse. To give chapter and verse is to give the exact authority of a statement, as the name of the author, the title of the book, the date thereof, the chapter referred to, and any other particular which might render the reference easily discoverable.

Chapter of Accidents (A). Unforeseen events. To trust to the chapter of accidents is to trust that something unforeseen may turn up in your favour. The Roman laws were divided into books, and each book into chapters. The chapter of accidents is that under the head of accidents, and metaphorically, the sequence of unforeseen events.

Chapter of Possibilities (The). A may-be in the course of events.

Character. In character. In harmony with a person's actions, etc.

Out of character. Not in harmony with a person's actions, writings, profession, age, or status in society.

Character (A). An oddity. One who has a distinctive peculiarity of manner: Sam Weller is a character, so is Pickwick. And Sam Weller's conduct in the law-court was "in character," but had he betrayed his master it would have been "out of character."

Charbonnerie Democratique. A new Carbonari society, founded in Paris on the principles of Babeuf. The object of these Republicans was to make Paris the centre of all political movements. (See page 214, col. 2, CARBONARI.)

Charge.

Curate in charge. A curate placed by a bishop in charge of a parish where there is no incumbent, or where the incumbent is suspended.

To charge oneself with. To take upon oneself the onus of a given task.

To give charge over. To set one in authority over.

"I gave my brother Hanani . . . charge over Jerusalem."—Nehemiah vii. 2.

To give in charge. To hand over a person to the charge of a policeman.

To have in charge. To have the care of something.

To take in charge. To "take up" a person given in charge; to take upon oneself the responsibility of something.
Charge (To). To make an attack or onset in battle. "To charge with bayonets" is to rush on the enemy with levelled bayonets.

To return to the charge. To renew the attack.

Chargé d’Affaires. The proxy of an ambassador, or the diplomatic agent where none higher has been appointed.

Chariclea. The lady-love of Theagenes in the exquisite erotic Greek romance called The Loves of Theagenes and Chariclea, by Heliodorus, Bishop of Trithka, in the fourth century.

Charing Cross. Not from chère reine, in honour of Eleanor, the dear wife of Edward I., but la chère reine (the Blessed Virgin). Hence, in the Close Roll, Richard II., part 1 (1382), we read that the custody of the falcons at Charryng, near Westminster, was granted to Simon Burley, who was to receive 12d. a day from the Wardrobe.

A correspondent in Notes and Queries, Dec. 28th, 1889, p. 507, suggests the Anglo-Saxon cærræn (to turn), alluding to the bend of the Thames.

Queen Eleanor died at Harly, Nottinghamshire, and was buried at Westminster. In every town where the corpse rested the king caused a cross of 'cunning workmanship' to be erected in remembrance of her. There were fourteen, some say fifteen, altogether. The three which remain are in capitals: Lincoln, Newark, Grantham, Leicester, Stamford, Geddington, Northampton, Stony Stratford, Woburn, Dunstable, St. Albans, Waltham, West Chesham (Chesham), Charlbury, and High Herdon."

"In front of the South Eastern Railway station (Strand is a model, in the original dimensions, of the old cross, which was made of green stone, and was demolished in 1643."

Chariot. According to Greek mythology, the chariot was invented by Erichthonius to conceal his feet, which were those of a dragon.

"Seated in car, by him constructed first
To hide his hideous feet."

_Homo: Orlando Furioso, xxxvii. 27."

Chariot of the Gods. So the Greeks called Sierra Leo'ne, in Africa, a ridge of mountains of great height. A sierra means a saw, and is applied to a ridge of peaked mountains.

"Her pining forests, mingling with the skies, Leona's rugged steep beneath us lies."

_Camoes: Lusiades, book 5.

Chariots or Cars. That of ADMETUS was drawn by lions and wild boars.

_BACCHUS by panthers.

_CERES by swans.

_CYBELE by winged dragons.

_DIANA by hounds.

_JUPITER by eagles.

_JUNO by peacocks.

_JUPITER by harpies, and harpies.

_PANTHEON by black horses.

_PANUPE by seven horses (the seven days of the week).

_VENUS by doves.

(Charlemagne) in Rome) were classed under four factions, distinguished by their livers—white, red, sky-blue, and green. Domitian added two more, viz. the golden and the purple.

Charities. Masks.

"Our ladies laugh at bare-faced trulls when they have those mufflers on, which they call masks, and which were formerly much more properly called charity, because they cover a multitude of sins."—_Babellus: Pantagruel, v. 27.

Charity. Charity begins at home. "Let them learn first to show piety at home!" (I Tim. v. 4 and 5).

Cold as charity. Than which what's colder to him who gives and him who takes?

Charivari. The clatter made with pots and pans, whistling, bawling, hissing, and so on. Our concert of "narrow-bones and cloggers"; the German Katzenmusik, got up to salute with ridicule unequal marriages. _Punch_ is our national Charivari, and clatters weekly against political and social wrong-sideliness.

Charistan. The following etymology is suitable to a Book of Phrase and Fable. It is said that one Latan, a famous quack, used to go about Paris in a gorgeous car, in which he had a traveling dispensary. A man with a horn announced the approach of this magnate, and the delighted sightseers used to cry out, "Voila! le char de Latan."

When I lived in Paris I often saw this gorgeous car; the horn-man had a drum also, and M. Latan, dressed in a long showy robe, wore sometimes a hat with feathers, sometimes a bruss helmet, and sometimes a showy cap. He was a tooth-extractor as well as dispensier.

Probably "Latan" was an assumed name, for Charistan is undoubtedly the Italian _carlistano_, a babbler or quack.

Charlemagne. His nine wives were Hamiltruide, a poor Frankish woman, who bore him several children; Desiderata, who was divorced; Hildegarde, Pastrade (daughter of Count Rodolphi the Saxon); and Luigarda the German; all three of whom died before him; Maltegarde; Gesuinde the Saxon; Regina; and Adalinda.

Charlemagne’s peers. (See PALADINS.)

Charlemagne’s sword. La Joyeuse.

Faire Charlemagne. To carry off one's winnings without giving the adversaries "their revenge."

"Faire Charlemagne cest ne partir du jeu avec tout son gain, ne point donner de revanche. Charlemagne se fait joueur a la fin du jeu, et qui quitte le jeu de la vie sans avoir rien renuit du fruit de ses victoires. Le joueur qui se retie les mains pleines, fait comme Charlemagne."—_Gratet: Histoire, t. 183.
Charles. An ill-omened name for kings:

England: Charles I. was beheaded by his subjects.

Charles II. lived long in exile.

Charles Edward, the Young Pretender, died in poverty and disgrace in France.

France: Charles I., the Bald, marching to repel the invading Saxons, was forsaken by his followers, and died of poison at Brieg.

Charles II., the Fat, reigned wretchedly, and died a beggarly dependant on the stinting bounty of the Archbishop of Metz.

Charles III., the Simple, died in the dungeon of Château Thierry.

Charles IV., the Fair, reigned six years, married thrice, but buried all his children except one daughter, who was forbidden by the Salic law to succeed to the crown.

Charles VI. lived and died an idiot or madman.

Charles VII. starved himself to death.

Charles VIII. smashed his head against the lintel of a doorway in the Château Amboise, and died in agony.

Charles IX. died at the age of twenty-four, harrowed in conscience for the part he had taken in the "Massacre of St. Bartholomew."

Charles X. spent a quarter of a century in exile, and when he succeeded to the throne, fled for his life and died in exile.

Charles le Téméraire, of Burgundy, lost his life at Nancy, where he was utterly defeated by the Swiss.

Naples: Charles I. saw the French massacred in the "Sicilian Vespers," and experienced only disasters.

Charles II., the Lame, was in captivity at his father's death.

Charles III., his grandson, was assassinated. (See Jane.)

Charles I. When Bernini's bust of Charles I. was brought home, the King was sitting in the garden of Chelsea Palace. He ordered the bust to be uncovered, and at the moment a hawk with a bird in its beak flew by, and a drop of the blood fell on the throat of the bust. The bust was ultimately destroyed when the palace was burnt down.

Charles and the Oak. When Charles II. fled from the Parliamentary army, he took refuge in Boscobel House; but when he deemed it no longer safe to remain there, he concealed himself in an oak. Dr. Stukeley says that this tree "stood just by a horse-track passing through the wood, and the king, with Colonel Carlos, climbed into it by means of the hen-roost ladder. The family reached them victuals with a nut-hook." (Itinerarium Curiosum, iii. p. 67, 1724.)

Charles's Wain. The constellation called the Great Bear, which forms the outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon. "Charles" is a corruption of the word churl, the farmer's wagon. (Anglo-Saxon, ceorle wæn.

"*" Sometimes still further corrupted into "'King Charles's wain."

Charleys, or Charlie. The old night watch, before the police force was organised in 1829. So called from Charles I., in whose reign the system was re-organised. (1640.)

Charlotte Elizabeth. Mrs. Tonna (1792-1846).

Charm means a song. Incantation is singing on or against some one. Enchantment is the same. (Latin, carneum.)

Charon's Toll [carcé-un]. A coin, about equal to a penny, placed in the mouth or hand of the dead to pay Charon for ferrying the spirit across the river Styx to the Elysian fields.

Charter. (See People's Charter.)

Chartist. The political system of the Chartists, who, in 1838, demanded the People's Charter, consisting of five principles: universal suffrage, annual parliaments, stipendiary members, vote by ballot, and electoral districts.

Charybdis [če-bi]. A whirlpool on the coast of Sicily. Scylla and Charybdis are employed to signify two equal dangers. Thus Horace says an author trying to avoid Scylla, drifts into Charybdis, i.e. seeking to avoid one fault, falls into another. The tale is that Charybdis stole the oxen of Hercules, was killed by lightning, and changed into the gulf.

"Thus when I shun Scylla, your father, I fall into Charybdis, your mother." — Merchant of Venice.

Chase. A small deer-forest held, for the most part, by a private individual, and protected only by common law. Forests are royal prerogatives, protected by the "Forest Laws."
Chasidim

one side of a sheet. The type is first set up letter by letter in the "composing stick," and is then transferred to the "galley," where it appears in columns. It is next divided into pages, and then transferred to the chase, where it is held tight by chains, or small bridges of wood. The word is French, chaise (a frame); our case-meat. (See STICK.)

Chasidim and Zadikim. After the Babylonian captivity the Jews were divided into two groups—those who accepted and those who rejected the Persian innovation. The former were called piéists (chasidim), and the latter upprights (zadikim).

Chasseurs de Vincennes (French). The Duke of Orleans' rifle corps; so called because they were garrisoned at Vincennes.

Chat. Nid d'une souris dans l'orille d'un chat. A mare's nest. This French phrase is the translation of a line in Wynkyn de Worde's Questiones, printed in English in 1511. "Demand: What is that that never was and never will be? Response: A mouse's nest in a cat's ear." (See MARE'S NEST.)

Chat de Béaugency (I.e.). Keeping the word of promise to the ear, but breaking it to the sense. The legend is this: An architect was employed to construct a bridge over the Loire, opposite Beaugency, but not being able to accomplish it, made a league with the devil to give his sable majesty the first living being which crossed the bridge. The devil supposed it would be the architect himself, but when the bridge was finished the man threw a cat forwards, and it ran over the bridge like a wild thing. The devil was furious, but a bargain's a bargain, and the "cat of Beaugency" became a proverb.

Château en Espagne. [Castle in Spain.] A castle in the air; something that exists only in the imagination. In Spain there are no châteaux. (See CASTLE.)

Château. Many wines are named after the manor on which the grapes are grown: as Château Lafitte, Château La Tour, Château Margaux, Château Rose (and Bordeaux), Château Yquem (a white Bordeaux), etc.

Chat'telain. A fashionable coffee-house in the reign of Charles II.

Chesterfield. A talkative person. The Germans have Pflanzjaehle (chatterbox). Shakespeare speaks of the click-dish. "His use was to put a ducat in her click-dish." (Measure for Measure, iii. 2)—i.e. the box or dish used by beggars for collecting alms, which the holder clatters to attract attention. We find also chatter-basket in old writers, referring to the child's rattle.

Chatterhouse. To go through the chatterhouse. Between the legs of one or more boys, set apart like an inverted A, who strike, with their hands or caps, the victim as he creeps through. Halliwell (Archaeic Dict.) gives chat, a small twig, and chatter, to bruise; also chatter, refuse wood left in making faggots. Probably, the boys used little twigs or sticks instead of caps or hands. And to go through chatterhouse means to get a trouncing or tundring. The pun between chatterhouse and chatterhouse is obvious.

Chatterpie. Same as chatterbox. The pie means the magpie. (Mag, to chatter.) (See Halliwell.)

Chaucer of Painting (The). Albert Dürer of Nurnberg (1471-1528), "The prince of artists."

Chauvin. A blind idolator of Napoleon the Great. The name is taken from Les Aides de Camp, by Bayard and Dumnanoir, but was popularised in Charet's Consuet Chauvin.

Chauvinism. A blind idolatry of Napoleon the Great. Now it means a blind and pugnacious patriotism: a warlike spirit.

"CHAUVIN, patriote ardent, jusqu'à l'exécration. Allusion au nom d'un type de caractére populaire, comme le prouve cet exemple: 1830, épisode où un liberalisme plus large commença à se moquer de ces croyances comme Chauvin, et justice de ces mésaventures, de l'opinion."—Larrey. Larrey. Dictionnaire de l'Arbor Politique, 1832.

Chaw-bacon (A). An uncouth rustic, supposed to eat no meat but bacon.

Che sarra, sara. What shall be will be. The motto of the Russells (Bolfrom).

"What doctrine call ye this, Che sara, sara?"—Fustel (Anster's translation), i. i.

Cheap as a Sardinian. A Roman phrase referring to the great crowds of Sardinian prisoners brought to Rome by Tiberius Gracchus, and offered for sale at almost any price.

Cheap Jack. Jack, the chap-man. Not cheap, meaning low-priced, but cheap meaning merchant, as in "chapman," "Chap-side," etc. Jack is a term applied to inferior persons, etc. (Saxon, ceapa, a merchant; cecepin, to buy; ceapmann, a trademan.) (See Jack.)

Cheapside Bargain (A). A very weak pun, meaning that the article was bought cheap or at market value.

Cheater (2 syl.) originally meant an Echeator or officer of the king’s exchequer appointed to receive dues and taxes. The present use of the word shows how these officers were wont to fleece the people. (See Catchpoler.)

Cheek. Called also stone-chest, kistvaen (a sepulchral monument or cromlech).

> "We find a rude cheek or flat stone of an oval form, about three yards in length, five feet over where broadest, and ten or twelve inches thick."
> —Camer.

Checkmate, in the game of chess, means placing your adversary’s king in such a position that he can neither cover nor move out of check. Figuratively, "to checkmate" means to foil or outwit another; checkmated, outmanoeuvred. "Mate" (Arabic, mat, dead; Spanish, matar, to kill). The German schach means both chess and check, and the Italian scacco means the squares of the chess-board; but schach-matt and scacca-matto = check-mate. The French échec is a "stoppage," whence dinner or faire échec et mat, to make a stoppage (check) and dead; the Spanish, zaque de mate, means the check of death (or final check).

> "If we go to Arabic for "mate," why not go there for "check" also? And "sheik mat" — the king dead, would be consistent and exact. (See Chess.)

Cheek. None of your cheek. None of your insolence. "None of your jaw" means none of your nagging or word irritation.

> "We say a man is very cheeky, meaning that he is saucy and presumptuous. To give cheek. To be insolent. "Give me none of your cheek."
> To have the cheek. To have the face or assurance. "He hadn’t the cheek to ask for more."

> "On account of his having so much cheek" —Dickens: Bleak House.

Cheek (2d). To be saucy. "You must cheek him well," i.e. confront him with fearless impudence; face him out.

Cheek by Jowl. In intimate confection; tête-à-tête. Cheek is the Anglo-Saxon ceaca, céac-bàn, cheek-bone; and jowl is the Anglo-Saxon ceolo (the jaw); Irish, gial.

> "I’ll go with thee, cheek by jowl." —Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream, act. 2.

Cheese.

Tusser says that a cheese, to be perfect, should not be like (1) Gehazi, i.e. dead white, like a leper; (2) not like Lot’s wife, all salt; (3) not like Argus, full of eyes; (4) not like Tom Piper, "hoven and puffed," like the cheeks of a piper; (5) not like Crispin, leathery; (6) not like Lazarus, poor; (7) not like Esau, hairy; (8) not like Mary Magdalene, full of whey or mauldin; (9) not like the Gentiles, full of maggots or gentils; and (10) not like a bishop, made of burnt milk. (First Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.)

> "A cheese which has no resemblance to these ten defects is "quite the cheese."

Cheese and bread. Food generally, but of a frugal nature. "Come and take your bread and cheese with me this evening."

A green cheese. An unripe cheese.

The moon made of green cheese. A slight resemblance, but not in the least likely. "You will persuade him to believe that the moon is made of green cheese." (See above.)

> "’Tis an old rat that won’t eat cheese."
> It must be a wondrously toothless man that is inaccessible to flattery; he must be very old indeed who can abandon his favourite indulgence; only a very cunning rat knows that cheese is a mere bait.

Cheese. Something choicio (Anglo-Saxon, cro-an, to choose; German, kiesen; French, choisir). Chaucer says, "To choose whether she wold him marry or no."

> "Now thou mightest choose > How thou couest (conest) to call, now thou Knowest all my names." —R. Ploughman’s Vision.

It is not the cheese. Not the right thing; not what I should choose.

He is quite the chear or just the cheese — i.e. quite the thing. By a double refinement we get the slang varieties, That’s prime Stilton, or double Gloster — i.e. slap bang up.

Cheeseparer (A). A skinflint; a man of small savings; economy carried Cheeseparing. to excess—like one who pares or shaves off very thinly the rind of his cheese instead of cutting it off. The tale is well known of the man who chose his wife out of three sisters by the way they ate their cheese. One pared it—she (he said) was mean: one cut it off extravagantly thick—she was wasteful; the third sliced it off in a medium way, and there his choice fell.

Cheeseparing Economy. A useless economy. The French say, "Une économie de bouts de chandelles." The allusion is to the well-known tale of a man who chose one of three sisters for wife by the way they pared their cheese. (See above.)

Cheese-Toaster (A). A sword; also called a "toasting-fork." "Come! out with your toaster." In Latin vert means a dart, a spit used in roasting, or a toasting fork. Thus we have "pyg-mant serpente verrique Sobello" (Juv. vii. 633), and in Juv. i. 210, etc., we read that the men prepared their supper, after slaying the beasts, "pars in fratra securr, cerubusque tremensque fugit." In the former example vert is used for an instrument of war, and in the latter for a toasting-fork or spit.

Cheesewring (Lynton, Devon). A mass of eight stones, towering to the height of thirty-two feet; so called because it looks like a gigantic cheese-press. This is probably a natural work, the effect of some convolution. The Kilmarnock Rocks, and part of Hugh Lloyd's Pulpit, present somewhat similar piles of stone.

Chef d'Oeuvre. A masterpiece. (French.) (Pronounce ah duh vuh.)

Chemistry [ke'wistry] is from the Arabic kimia, whence al-kimia (the occult art), from kawā' (to conceal).

Inorganic chemistry is that branch of chemistry which is limited to metallic and non-metallic substances, which are not organised bodies.

Organic chemistry is devoted to organised bodies and their elements.

Chemos or Chemosh [Ke'nom]. War-god of the Moabites; god of lust.

Chennappa. The city of Chennappa. So Madras is called by the natives.

Cherry (French). Hoary, grey-headed. This word is much used in Paris to signify good, delicate, exquisite in flavour, delicious, de bon goût. It was originally applied to wine which is improved by age. Thus we hear commonly in Paris the expression, "Voilà du vin qui est bien chenu" (mellow with age). Sometimes gris (grey with age) is substituted, as, "Nous en boirons tant de ce bon vin gris" (Le Trésor des Chansons Nouvelles, p. 78). The word, however, is by no means limited to wine, but is applied to well-nigh everything worthy of commendation. We even hear Chenu Reluit, good morning; and Chemu sorgue, good night. "Reluit," of course, means "sunshine," and "sorgue" is an old French word for evening or brown. "Chenument" = à merveille.

Chequers. A public-house sign. In England without doubt the arms of Fitzwarren, the head of which house, in the days of the Henrys, was invested with the power of licensing vintners and publicans, may have helped to popularise this sign, which indicated that the house was duly licensed; but the sign has been found on houses in exhumed Pompeii, and probably referred to some game, like our draughts, which might be indulged in on the premises. Possibly in some cases certain public-houses were at one time used for the payment of doles, etc., and a chequer-board was provided for the purpose. In such cases the sign indicated the house where the parish authorities met for that and other purposes.

Cheronean [ch = k]. The Cheronean Sage. Plutarch, who was born at Chersonese, in Bœotia (46-120).

"This phrase, O Cheronean sage, is thine." Boudica: Mustrel.

Cherry. The whole tree or not a cherry on it. "Aut cerasus aut nullus." All in all or none at all.

"This Hospitaller seems to be one of those impractical knaves who must hate the whole tree, or they'll not have a cherry on it."

To make two bites of a cherry. To divide something too small to be worth dividing.

Cherry Fairs. Now called tea-gardens. Nothing to do with cherries; it is cherry fairs—i.e. gay or recreation fairs. A "cheering" is a merry-making. Halliwell tells us that "Cherry (or rather cherry) fairs are still held in Worcestershire." Gower says of this world, "Alle is but a cherye-fayre," a phrase frequently met with.

"This life, my son, is but a cherye-fayre."—MS.
Bedl. 321 (quoted by Hailstear).

Cherry Trees and the Cuckoo.
The cherry tree is strangely mixed up with the cuckoo in many cuckoo stories, because of the tradition that the cuckoo must eat three good meals of cherries before he is allowed to cease singing.

"Cuckow, cunow, cherry-tree,
Good bird, prithee, tell to me,
How many years I am to see."
The answer is made by the cuckoo repeating its cry the prophetic number of times.

Cherubims. The 11th Hussars are so called, by a bad pun, because their trousers are of a cherry colour.

Cherry and Fair-Star. Cherry was the son of a king's brother and Brunetia; Fair-star was the daughter of the king and Blon'dina, the two fathers being brothers, and the two mothers sisters. They were cast on the sea adrift, but were found and brought up by a corsair and his wife. Ultimately they are told of their birth by a green bird, and marry each other. This tale is imitated from The Sisters who Enraged their Younger Sister, in Arabian Nights.
N.B.—The name is from the French cer (dear), and is about equal to "dearly" or "dear one." It is quite wrong to spell it with a double r.
(Contesse d'Aulnoy: Fairy Tales.)

Cheeshire is the Latin castra-shire, called by the Romans Deriva castra the camp town of Deva, or Dee-month.

Chess. Called by the Hindus cheturaang (the four angas) i.e. the four members of the army—viz. elephants, horses, chariots, and foot-soldiers; called by the ancient Persians chetran. The Arabs, who have neither nor , called it shetran, which modern Persians cor-rupled into satch, whence the Italian souccia, German souxb, French slope, our chess. (See page 242, Checkmate.)

Chesterfield, landed by Thomson in his Winter is the fourth earl, author of Chesterfield's Letters to His Son (1694-1773).

Chesterfield House (London) was built by Isaac Ware for Philip, fourth earl of Chesterfield. (See above.)

Chesnut. A stale joke. In The Broken Sword, an old melodrama by William Dillon, Captain Xavier is forever telling the same jokes with variations.
He was telling about one of his exploits, connected with a Cork-tree, when Pablo corrects him, "A chestnut-tree you mean, captain." "Bah! (replied the captain) I say a Cork-tree." "A chestnut-tree," insists Pablo. "I must know better than you (said the captain);
it was a Cork-tree, I say," "A chestnut (persisted Pablo). I have heard you tell the joke twenty-seven times, and I am sure it was a chestnut."

"Is not this an illustration of the enduring vitality of the 'chestnut' ? (Joke).—Notes and Queries."

Chestnut Sunday. Rogation Sunday, or the Sunday before Ascension Day.

Cheval (French, a cheval). Troops are arranged a cheval when they command two roads, as Wellington's army at Waterloo, which, being at the apex of two roads, commanded that between Charleroi and Brussels, as well as that to Mons.

"The Western Powers will assuredly never permit Russia to place herself again a cheval between the Ottoman empire and Persia."—The Times.

Cheval de Bataille (His). His strong argument. (See Notes and Queries, May 22nd, 1886, p. 410.)

Chevalier d'Industrie. A man who lives by his wits and calls himself a gentleman.

"Benicheur de faubourgs, chevalier d'industrie, qui va chercher quelque honneur quelque femme qui lui fasse une fortune."—Gonyam, ou l'Homme Prodigieux (1713).

Chevalier du Brouillard (Lr). The Chevaux de Frise (French). Horses of Friesland. A beam filled with spikes to keep off horses; so called from its use in the siege of Groningen, Friesland, in 1594. A somewhat similar engine had been used before, but was not called by the same name. In German it is "a Spanish horseman" (ein Spanischer Reiter).

Cheverell. He has a cheverell conservative. One that will easily stretch-like cheverell or kid leather.

"Oh here's a wit of cheverell, that stretches from an inch narrow to an eel broad."—Shakespeare: Rome and Juliet, ii. 4.

"Your soft cheverell conscience would receive,
If you might please to stretch it."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII, ii. 3.

Chevy Chase. There had long been a rivalry between the families of Pavy and Douglas, which showed itself by Chiabreresco. Percy of Northumberland one day vowed he would hunt for three days in the Scottish border, without descending to ask leave of Earl Douglas. The Scotch warned him in his anger, "Tell this vaunter he shall find one day more than sufficient." The ballad called Chevy Chase mixes up this hunt with the battle of Otterburn, which, Dr. Percy justly observes, was "as a very different event." (Chaucer, Chevy Chase, a military expedition on horseback.)

"To louden strauns he raised his voice, to tell What woful wars in 'Chevy Chase' betell,
When Percy drove the deer with hound and Penn.
Wars to be kept by children yet unborn." (Guy: Pastoral VI)

Chiabreresco (Italian). Poetry formed on the Greek model; so called from Gabriel Chiabr'er, surnamed the "Pindar of Italy." (1552-1637)

Chiaro-oscuro [pronounce ke-ar-ros-kw-re-o]. A style of painting now called "black and white."

"Chiaro-oscuro . . . is the art of representing light in shadow and shadow in light, so that the parts represented in shadow shall still have the clearness and warmth of those in light; and those in light, the depth and softness of those in shadow."—Chambers: Encyclopedia, 11. p. 171.

Chibbins. The musician: the harmony of nature personified. He teaches the birds to sing and the brooks to warble as they flow. "All the many sounds of nature borrow sweetness from his singing."

"Very dear to Hiawatha,
Was the gentle Chibbin,
For his gentleness he loved him,
And the magic of his singing."

Losgellon: Hiawatha, 14.

Chibouque (A). A smoking-pipe, with a long tube, used in the East (Turkish).

Chlo. Fashionable; comme il faut; the mode. This is an archaic French word in vogue in the seventeenth century. It really is the Spanish chico, little, also a little boy, and chico, a little girl or darling. Similarly, twee in Scotch is a loving term of admiration and pride. (Chic is an abbreviation of the German geschick ter, apt, clever.)

"J'este de nosse de l'art, je mot en marse hiez; J'esperie avec le temps que l'entendan le chloe."

Les douzner de l'ou lorene, XII. p. 87.

Avoir la chia. To have the knack of doing the thing smarly.

Cheers and chancier = elegant, de grand style, are very common expressions with artists.

Chiffrave (3 syl.). French for the "sorry cow," a monster that lived only on good women—all skin and bone, because its food was so extremely scarce. The old English romancers invented another monster, which they called Bicorn, as fat as the other was lean; but, luckily, he had for food "good and enduring husbands," of which there is no lack. (See Bicorn.)

"O noble way, so full of high prudence,
Let none humiliate your tongue in vain;
No let no clerk have cause or diligence
To write of you a story of such import
As of Grendel's, pacient and kynde,
Lest Chibbin-carthie you scowl in his entrails"

Chaucer: The Envoy of Chaucer, 1494.

The French chie-cie-face means "thinline." Lydgate wrote a poem entitled Bycorve and Chiechavache.

Chick-a-biddy (A). A child's name for a young chicken, and a mother's word of endearment to her young child. "Biddy" is merely the call of a child, bid-bid-bid-bid to a chicken.

"Do you, sweet Rob? Do you truly, chick-a-biddy?"—Dickens: Dombey and Son.

Chicken (plural chickens). It is quite a mistake to suppose "chickens" to be a double plural. The Anglo-Saxon is cewen, plural cin-en. We have a few plural forms in -en, as ox-en, brack-en, children, brethren, hosen, and eyen; but of these children and brethren are not the most ancient forms. "Chick" is a mere contraction of chicken.

The old plural forms of "child" are childe-ren, dialectic child-ren; chidren is a later form. The old plural forms of "brother" are brethren, brethren, brethren; later forms are brethren and brothers (now brothers).

Children and chicken must always be pickin'. Are always hungry and ready to eat food.

To count your chickens ere they are hatched (Hudibras). To anticipate profits before they come. One of Aesop's fables describes a market woman saying she would get so much for her eggs, with the money she would buy a goose; the goose in time would bring her so much, with which she would buy a cow, and so on; but in her excitement she kicked over her basket, and all her eggs were broken. The Latins said, "Don't sing your song of triumph before you have won the victory" (ante victoriae can'ter triumphum). "Don't crow till you are out of the wood" has a similar meaning. (See page 36, col. 2, ALNASCHAR'S DREAM.)

Curves like chickens come home to roost. (See under Curses.)

Mother Carey's chickens. (See Mother Carey.)

She's no chicken. Not young. The young child as well as the young fowl is called a chicken or chick.
Chicken of St. Nicholas (The). So the Piedmontese call the ladybird, or little red beetle with spots of black, called by the Russians "God's little cow," and by the Germans, "God's little horse" sent as a messenger of love.

Chichen-hearted. Cowardly. Young fowls are remarkably timid, and run to the wing of the hen upon the slightest cause of alarm.

Chien. Entre chien et loup. Dusk, between daylight and lamp-light; owl-light.

"The best time to talk of difficult things is entre chien et loup, as the German folk say."—Mrs. Edwards: A German Girl, chap. xliv.

Chien de Jean de Nivelle (Le), which never came when it was called. Jean de Nivelle was the eldest son of Jean II. de Montmorency, born about 1423. He espoused the cause of the Duke of Burgundy against the orders of Louis XI. and the wish of his father, who disinherited him. Bouillet says: Jean de Nivelle était devenu en France à cause du refus qu'il fit de répondre à l'appel de sou roi un objet de haine et de mépris; et le peuple lui donna le surnom injurieux de chien, de là le proverbe.

"C'est le chien de Jean de Nivelle. Qui n'en fait toujours quand on l'appelle."

The Italians call this Ariotto's dog.

Child, at one time, meant a female infant, and was the correlative of boy.

"Hear me on 's! A barne, a very pretty barne. A boy or a child, I wonder?"—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, iii. 8.

Child of God (A), in the Anglican and Catholic Church, means one who has been baptised; others consider the phrase to mean one converted by special grace and adopted into the holy family of God's Church.

"In my baptism, whereas I was made a member of Christ, the child of God, and an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven."—Church Catechism.

Child of the Cord. So the defendant was called by the judges of the vehmgirtich in Westphalia, because everyone condemned by the tribunal was hanged to the branch of a tree.

Child, as Child Harold, Child of Elchochile Waters, Childe Boland, Childe Tristram, Childe Arthur, etc. In all these cases the word "Child" is a title of honour, like the infantes and infantes of Spain. In the times of chivalry, the noble youths who were candidates for knighthood were, during their time of probation, called infans, valets, damoyets, and bacheliers. Childe or infant was the term given only to the most noble. (In Anglo-Saxon, the same word [cniht] means both a child and a knight.)

Child Harold. A man sated of the world, who roams from place to place to flee from himself. The "child" is, in fact, Lord Byron himself, who was only twenty-one when he began, and twenty-eight when he finished the poem. In canto i, (1809), he visited Portugal and Spain; in canto ii, (1810), Turkey in Europe; in canto iii, (1816), Belgium and Switzerland; and in canto iv, (1817), Venice, Rome, and Florence.

Children. The children in the wood. The master of Wayland Hall, Norfolk, on his deathbed left a little son, three years old, and a still younger daughter, named Jane, to the care of his wife's brother. The boy was to have £300 a year when he came of age, and the girl £500 as a wedding portion; but, if the children died previously, the uncle was to inherit. After twelve months had elapsed, the uncle hired two ruffians to murder the two babies. As they went along one of the ruffians relented, and killed his fellow; then, putting down the children in a wood, left them. The poor babes gathered blackberries to allay their hunger, but died during the night, and "Robin Redbreast" covered them over with strawberry leaves. All things went ill with the cruel uncle; his sons died, his barns were fired, his cattle died, and he himself perished in gaol. After the lapse of seven years, the ruffian was taken up for highway robbery, and confessed the whole affair. (Ferris: Reciters, iii. ii. 18.)

"Then said he sang: 'The Children in the Wood.' (Ah! barbarous uncle, stained with infant blood!) How blackberries they pickled in deserts wild, And fearlcss at the glittering falchions smiled: Their little corpse the Robin-Redbreast found, And strewed with pious balm the leaf around."—Gay: Fasting VI.

Children. Three hundred and sixty-five at a birth. It is said that the Countess of Henneberg accused a beggar of adultery because she carried twins, whereupon the beggar prayed that the countess might carry as many children as there are days in the year. According to the legend, this happened on Good Friday, 1276. All the males were named John, and all the females Elizabeth. The countess was forty-two at the time.

Chilenos. People of Chili.

Chilian. A native of Chili, pertaining to Chili, etc.

Chillast [ki'liast]. Another word for Millev'arians; those who believe that Christ will return to this earth and reign a thousand years in the midst of His saints. (Greek, chilies, a thousand.)

Chillingham Cattle. A breed of cattle (bov. taurus) in the park of the Earl of Tankerville, supposed to be the last remnant of the wild oxen of Britain.

Chillon. Prisoner of Chillon. Francois de Bonnivard, of Lunes. Lord Byron makes him one of six brothers, all of whom suffered as martyrs. The father and two sons died on the battle-field; one was burnt at the stake; three were incarcerated in the dungeon of Chillon near the lake of Gene'a of these, two died, and Francois was set at liberty by "the Bearmais." Byron says that Bonnivard has left traces of his footsteps in the pavement of the dungeon. He was put in prison for "republican principles" by the Duke-Bishop of Savoy. (1496-1570.)

Chilmonar' and Balbec. Two cities built by the Genii, acting under the orders of Jan ben Jan, who governed the world before the time of Adam. Chilmonar, or the "Forty Pillars," is Persepolis. These two cities were built as lurking places for the Genii to hide in.

Chiltern Hundreds (The). There are three, viz. Stoke, Desborough, and Bonenham (or Burnham). At one time the Chiltern Hills, between Bedford and Hertford, etc., were covered with beech trees which formed shelter for robbers; so a steward was appointed by the Crown to put down these marauders and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from depredations. The necessity of such watch and ward has long since ceased, but the office remains; and, since 1750, when a Member of Parliament wishes to vacate his seat, one way of doing so is by applying for the stewardship of the three Chiltern Hundreds. The application being granted, the Member is advanced to an office under the Crown, and his seat in the House is ex officio vacated. Immediately the Member has effectually his object, he resigns his office again. The gift is in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. It was refused to a Member for Reading in 1842.

* The Stewardships used for a similar purpose were Old Sarum (in Sussex), East Hendred (in Berks), the Manor of Foyning (in Sussex), Hempsholme (in Yorkshire), all of which have dropped out of use. The Stewardship of the Manor of Northstead (in Yorks) survives (1894), but the Escheatments of Munster and Ulster were abolished in 1838.

The London Gazette of August 4, 1868, announced that the "Chancellor of the Exchequer has appointed William Henry Grenfell to be steward and bailiff of the Chiltern Hundreds in the room of John Morough, resigned."

Chimera [ki'me-ra]. An illusory fancy, a wild, incongruous scheme, a castle in the air. Homer describes the chimera as a monster with a goat's body, a lion's head, and a dragon's tail. It was born in Lycia, and was slain by Bellerophon. (Greek, chimaira, a she-goat.)

Chime in with (To). To be in harmony with, to accord with, to fall in with. The illusion is to chiming bells. "This chimed in with Mr. Domney's own hope and belief."—Dickens: Domney and Lorry.

Chimney Money or Hearth money. A Crown duty for every fireplace in a house (14 Car. ii. c. 2). Repealed by 1 Will. & Mary, i. c. 2.

Chimneypot Hat (A). The ordinary cylindrical black-silk hat, generally worn as more dressy than the soft felt hats or stiff billycocks. Culled by the French cheminée.

Chinese Gordon. General Gordon (afterwards killed at Khartoum), who succeeded in putting down the Taiping rebellion, which broke out in 1851 and lasted fifteen years. The rebels had ravaged sixteen of the eighteen provinces, and had destroyed six hundred cities. In 1861 Ward raised an army called the "Ever Victorious," which was placed under General Gordon, and in 1864 the rebellion was stamped out.

Chingachgook. The Indian chief in Fenimore Cooper's Last of the Mohicans, Pathfinder, Deerslayer, and Pioneer. Called in French Le Gros Serpent.

Chink or Jink. Money; so called because it chinks or jingles in the purse. Thus, if a person is asked if he has money, he rattles that which he has in his purse or pocket.

"Have chinks in thy purse." Tasso.

Chintz means spotted. The cotton goods originally manufactured in the East. (Persian, chinz, spotted, stained; Hindu, chint, plur. chintas; Sanscrit, chitra, variegated.)
Chloe (K'lo'). The man of Chloe. Homer, who lived at Chios, near the "Alge'an Sea. Seven cities claim to be his place of birth—

" Smyrna, Rhodes, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athens."—Poltro.

Chios or Chry. A carpenter is known by his chips. A man is known to be a carpenter by the chips in his workshop, so the profession or taste of other men may be known by their manners or mode of speech. There is a broadcloth slang as well as a corduroy slang; a military, naval, school, and university slang.

Such carpenters, such chips. As the workman, so his work will be.

Brother Chry. Properly a brother carpenter, but in its extended meaning applied to anyone of the same vocation as ourselves. (Es nostræ fæciae; Petronius.)

" The ship's carpenter is, at sea, commonly addressed as "chips."

Saratoga chips. Potatoes sliced thin while raw, and fried crisp. Sometimes called chipped potatoes.

Chip of the Old Block (A). A son or child of the same stuff as his father. The chip is the same wood as the block. Burke applied the words to W. Pitt.

Chiron [K'ron]. The centaur who taught Achilles music, medicine, and hunting. Jupiter placed him in heaven among the stars, where he is called Sagittarius (the Archer).

Ch'ron, according to Dauto, has watch over the lake of boiling blood, in the seventh circle of hell.

Chirping Cup or Glass. A merry-making glass or cup of liquor. Wine that maketh glad the heart of man, or makes him sing for joy.

"A chirping cup in my nativ song,
And my vesper bell in my bowl: Ding dong."

Chisel. I chiselled him means, I cheated him, or cut him out of something.

Chitty-faced. Baby-faced, lean. A chit is a child or sprout. Both chit and chitty-faced are terms of contempt. (Anglo-Saxon, cith, a twig, etc.)

Chivalry. The paladins of Charlemagne were all scattered by the battle of Roncesvalles.

The champions of Did'errick were all assassinated at the instigation of Chriemhilda, the bride of Ezzel, King of the Huns.

The Knights of the Round Table were all extirpated by the fatal battle of Camlan.

Chivalry. The six following clauses may be considered almost as axioms of the Arthurian romances:

(1) There was no braver or more noble king than Arthur.
(2) No fairer or more faithless wife than Guin'iwer.
(3) No truer pair of lovers than Tristan and Isol't (or Tristram and Ysoide).
(4) No knight more faithful than Sir Kay.
(5) None so brave and amorous as Sir Laun'celot.
(6) None so virtuous as Sir Gal'ahad.

The flower of Chivalry. William Douglas, Lord of Liddesdale. (Fourteenth century.)

Chivy. A chase in the school game of "Prisoners' Base" or "Prison Bars." Probably a gipsy word. One boy sets a chivy, by leaving his bar, when one of the opposite side chases him, and if he succeeds in touching him before he reaches "home," the boy touched becomes a prisoner.

Chivy or Chivvy. Slang for the face. Much slang is due to rhyme, and when the rhyme is a compound word the rhyming part is sometimes dropped and the other part remains. Thus Chivy [Chevy]—chase rhymes with "face," by dropping "chase." chivy remains, and becomes the accepted slang word. Similarly, daisies—boots, thus: daisy—roots will rhyme with "boots," and by dropping "roots," the rhyme, daisy, remains. By the same process sky is the slang for pocket, the compound word which gave birth to it being "sky-rocket." Christmas is the slang for a railway guard, as "Ask the Christmas," is, of course, from the rhyme "Christmas-curd"; and "raspberry" the slang for heart, is from the rhyme "raspberry-tart."

"Then came a knock at the story; More [door], Which made my raspberry beat."

Other examples given under their proper heads.

Chloe (Klo'er). The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled Daphnis and Chloe. St. Pierre's tale of Paul and Virginia is founded on the exquisite romance of Longus.

* Prior calls Mrs. Centlivre "Cloe."

Chloe, in Pope's Moral Essays (epist. ii.), Lady Suffolk, mistress of George II. "Content to dwell in decencies for ever."
Choreas [K'rawn]. The lover of Callir'rhoe, in Chariton’s Greek romance, called the Loves of Choreas and Callir'rhoe. (Eighth century.)

Choice Spirit (A) or “Choice Spirit of the Age,” a gallant of the day, being one who delights to exaggerate the whims of fashion.

Hobson’s Choice. (See Hobson.)

Choke. May this piece of bread choke me, if what I say is not true. In ancient times a person accused of robbery had a piece of barley bread, on which the mass had been said, given him to swallow. He put it in his mouth uttering the words given above, and if he could swallow it without being choked, he was pronounced innocent. Tradition ascribes the death of the Earl Godwin to choking with a piece of bread, after this solemn appeal. (See CORNED.)

Choke-pear. An argument to which there is no answer. Robbers in Holland at one time made use of a piece of iron in the shape of a pear, which they forced into the mouth of their victim. On turning a key, a number of springs thrust forth points of iron in all directions, so that the instrument of torture could never be taken out except by means of the key.

Choker (A). A neckcloth. A white choker is a white neckcloth or necktie, worn in full dress, and generally by waiters and clergymen. Of course, the verb to choke has supplied the word.

Chop and Chops.

Chop and change (To). To barter by the rule of thumb. Boys “chop” one article for another (Anglo-Saxon, cip-an, or cep-dian, to sell or barter).

A mutton chop is from the French coup-er, to cut off. A piece chopped off.

The wind chops about. Shifts from point to point suddenly. This is cip-an, to barter or change hands. (See above To Chop and Change.)

How now, the House of Lords and House of Commons chopped round.?—Thackeray: The Four George (George I).

Chop-fallen. Crest-fallen; down in the mouth. (See next column, Chops.)

Chop-House (A). An eating-house where chops and steaks are served.

“John Bull! I would set up a chop-house at the very gates of paradise.”—Washington Irving: vol. i, chap. vi, p. 61.

A Chinese custom-house is called a Chop-house (Hindi, chap, a stamp).

Chop Logic (To). To bandy words; to altercation. Lord Bacon says, “Let not the council chop with the judge.” (See Chop and Change.)

How now, how now, chop lugle! What is this? Proud! and ‘tis thank you, and ‘tis thank you not.

And yet not proud.”—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

Chops. The face, is allied to the Latin caput, the head; Greek κεφαλή, Anglo-Saxon ceatl, the snout; in the plural, the cheeks. We talk of a “pig’s chop.”

The Latin caput gives us the word chop, a fellow or man; and its alliance with chop gives us the term “chapped” hands, etc. Everyone knows the answer given to the girl who complained of chapped lips: “My dear, you should not let the chaps come near your lips.”

Down in the chops—i.e., down in the mouth; in a melancholy state; with the mouth drawn down. (Anglo-Saxon, ceatl, the snout or jaw; Icelandic, kiptr.)

Chops of the Channel. The short broken motion of the waves, experienced in crossing the English Channel; also the place where such motion occurs.

Chopine (2 syl.), or Chopin. A high-heeled shoe. The Venetian ladies used to wear “high-heeled shoes like stilts.” Hamlet says of the actress, “Your ladyship is nearer to heaven, than when I saw you last, by the altitude of a chopine” (act ii. s. 2). (Spanish, chapin, a high cork shoe.)

Choretans [Korets']. A sect of heretics, who, among other errors, persisted in keeping the Sunday a fast.

Choramblic Metre. Horace gives us a great variety, but the main feature in all is the prevalence of the chorambus (— — — —). Specimen translations of two of these metres are subjoined:

(1) Horace, 1 Odes, viii.

— — — — | — — — — | — — — — | —

Lydyas, why on Stanley,
By the great gods, tell me, I pray, ruinous love you centre?

Once he was strong and manly,
Never even now, tacit of talk, Mars' wanty camp to a ter.

E. C. B.

(2) The other specimen is 1 Odes, xii.

— — — — | — — — — | — — — — | — — — — | —

When you, with an approving smile,
Praise those delicate arms, Ldy. of Telephus,
Ah me! when you stir up my love!
Heart-sick, that for a boy you should forsake me thus.

E. C. B.

Chouans (2 syl.). French insurgents of the Royalist party during the Revolution. Jean Cottereau was their leader, nicknamed chouan (owl), because he was accustomed to warn his companions of danger by imitating the screech of an owl. Cotterneau was followed by George Cadoudal.

It is an error to suppose Chouan to be a proper name.

Chouans Protected. (See page 137, col. 1, Birds, etc.)

Choune (1 syl.). To cheat out of something. Gifford says the interpreter of the Turkish embassy in England is called chiusa, and in 1609 this chiusa contrived to defraud his government of £4,000, an enormous sum at that period. From the notoriety of the swindle the word chiusa or to choune was adopted.

"He is no chiusa."
Ben Jonson: Alclohemitst, 1, 1 (1610).

Chried-bal'dsa or Chried-bal'da. A woman of unrivalled beauty, sister of Gunther, and beloved by Siegfried, the two chief heroes of the Nibelungenlied. Siegfried gives her a talisman taken from Gunther's lady-love, and Gunther, in a fit of jealousy, induces Hagen to murder his brother-in-law. Chriemhild in revenge murders Fessel, King of the Huns; invites the Nibelungs to the wedding feast; and there they are all put to the sword, except Hagen and Gunther, who are taken prisoners, and put to death by the bride. (See Kriem-hild.)

Chriess-cross Row (row to rhyme with low). The alphabet in a hornbook, which had a cross at the beginning and end.

"Philosopher is all the go,
And science quite the fashion;
Our grandams learnt the Chriess-cross Row,
L-o, how their daughters done."
Anon. in Egdon.

Chrisom or Chrisam signifies properly the white cloth set by the minister at baptism on the head of the newly anointed with chrisam—i.e., a composition of oil and balm. In the Form of Private Baptism is this direction: "Then the minister shall put the white vesture, commonly called the chrisome, upon the child." The child thus baptised is called a chrisom or chrism child. If it dies within the month, it is shrouded in the vesture; and hence, in the bills of mortality, even to the year 1726, infants that died within the month were termed chrisoms. (The cloth so called because it was anointed. Greek, chrisma, verb chrie, to anoint.)

"A made her end and went away as it had been any chrisom child."—Shakespeare: Henry V., 4, 3.

Christabel [Kris'tabel]. The heroine of Coleridge's fragmentary poem of that name.

Christabelle [*Kris'tabel*l*. Daughter of a "bonnie king" in Ireland. She fell in love with Sir Cauline (g.r.).

Christendom [Kris'en-dum] generally means all Christian countries; but Shakespeare uses it for baptism, or "Christian citizenship." Thus, in King John, the young prince says:—

"By my christendom: So I were out of prison and kept sheep.
I should be merry as the day is long."
Act iv. sc. 1.

Christian (ch = k). The hero of John Bunyan's allegory called The Pilgrim's Progress. He faces from the "City of Destruction," and journeys to the "Celestial City." He starts with a heavy burden on his back, but it falls off when he stands at the foot of the cross.

Christina. A follower of Christ. So called first at Antioch (Acts xi. 26).

Most Christian King. The style of the King of France. (1469.)

Pepin le Bref was so styled by Pope Stephen III. (714-768).

Charles lo Chauve was so styled by the council of Savonnières (823, 840-877).

Louis XI. was so styled by Pope Paul II. (1423, 1461-1463).

Since which time (1469) it was universally adopted in the French monarchy.

"And thou, O Gaal, with gaudy trophies plumed, Most Christian king," Aeneid in vain assumed.

Founder of Christian Eloquence. Louis Bordalono, the French preacher (1032-1704).

Christian Traditions, connected with natural objects.

1. Birds, Beasts, and Fishes. The Ass: Cross on the back. (See Ass.)

Bunting. (See Yellow-Hammer.)

"The Crossbill has nothing to do with the Christian cross; the bird is so called, because its mandibles cross each other.

Haddock: The finger-marks on the Haddock and John Dory. (See Haddock, etc.)

Icthus: A fish. (See Icthus.)

Pike's Head (g.v.).

Pigeons or Doves: The Russians are averse to pigeons as a food, because the Holy Ghost assumed the form of a dove at the baptism of Jesus. (See Sporting Magazine, January, 1825, p. 307.)
Robin Redbreast: The red breast. (See Robin.)

Stork: The cry of the Stork. (See Stork.)

Swallow: The cry of the Swallow. (See Swallow.)

Swine: The holes in the forefront of Swine. (See Pigs.)

2. The Vegetable World.
The Arum, Aspen, Calvary-clover, Cedar (see also Cross), Dwarf-elder, Judas-tree, Passion-flower, Purple Orchis, Red Anemone, Rood Selken, Spotted Persicaria, Thistle.

(See these articles, and FLOWERS WITH TRADITIONS OF CHRIST.)

3. The Number Thirteen. (See Thirteen.)

Christian's [ch = k]. The wife of Christian, who started with her children and Mercy from the "City of Destruction" long after her husband. She was placed under the guidance of Mr. Great-Heart, and went, therefore, in "silver slippers" along the thorny road (Hunyan: The Pilgrim's Progress, part ii.).

Christmas (Krist'mas). "Christmas comes but once a year." (Thomas Tusser.)

Christmas. Slang for a railway-guard. Explained under Chivy (g.r.).

Christmas Box. A small gratuity given to servants, etc., on Boxing Day (the day after Christmas Day). In the early days of Christianity boxes were placed in churches for promiscuous charities, and opened on Christmas Day. The contents were contributed next day by the priests, and called the "dole of the Christmas box," or the "box money." It was customary for heads of houses to give small sums of money to their subordinates "to put into the box" before mass on Christmas Day.

Somewhat later, apprentices carried a box round to their master's customers for small gratuities. The custom since 1830 has been gradually dying out.

"Glady the box, with Christmas-box in hand,
Throughout the town his devious route pursues,
And of his master's custom's imposes
The yeasty bite."

Christmas. Christmas Carols are in commemoration of the song of the angels to the shepherds at the nativity. Durand tells us that the bishops with the clergy used to sing carols and play games on Christmas Day. (Welsh, carol, a love-song; Italian, carola, etc.)

Old Christmas Day. January 6th. When Gregory XIII. reformed the Calendar in 1582, he omitted ten days; but when the New Style was adopted in England in 1752, it was necessary to cut off eleven days, which drove back January 6th to December 26th of the previous year. So what we now call January 6th in the Old Style would be Christmas Day, or December 25th.

Christmas Decorations. The great feast of Saturn was held in December, when the people decorated the temples with such green things as they could find. The Christian custom is the same transferred to Him who was born in Bethlehem on Christmas Day. The holly or holy-tree is called Christ's thorn in Germany and Scandinavia, from its use in church decorations and its putting forth its berries about Christmas time. The early Christian gave an emblematic turn to the custom, referring to the "righteous branch," and justifying the custom from Isaiah lx. 13—"The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary."

Christmas Trees and Maypoles are remnants of the Scandinavian Ash, called Yggdrasil', the Tree of Time, whose roots penetrate to heaven, Niflheim and Gunnungagap (the gap of gaps). In Ginnungagap the frost giants dwell, in Niflheim is the great serpent Nidhogg; and under this root is Helheim, the home of the dead.

We are told that the ancient Egyptians, at the Winter Solstice, used a palm branch containing twelve leaves or shoots to symbolise the "completion of the year." The modern custom comes from Germany.

Christolytes [Kris'to-lytes]. A sect of Christians that appeared in the sixth century. They maintained that when Christ descended into hell, He left His soul and body there, and rose only with His heavenly nature.

Christopher (St.). The giant carried a child over a brook, and said, "Chyld, thou hast put me in grete peryll. I might bere no greater burden." To which the child answered, "Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise." This is an allegory: Christopher means...
Christ-bearer; the child was Christ, and the river was the river of death.

Chronicle Small Beer (To). To note down events of no importance whatsoever.

“...he was a wight, if ever such wight were.”

To suckle fools and Chronicle small beer.”

Shakespeare: Othello, ii. 1

Chronicon ex Chronicle is by Florence, a monk of Worcester, the earliest of our English chroniclers. It begins from Creation, and goes down to 1119, in which year the author died; but it was continued by another hand to 1141. Printed in 4to at London, 1592. Its chief value consists in its serving as a key to the Saxon chronicle.

Chronicon-boton-theologos [ch = k]. A burlesque pomposo in Henry Carey's farce, so called. Anyone who delivers an inflated address.

Chrysállis [ch = k]. The form which caterpillars assume before they are converted into butterflies or moths. The chrysalis is also called an auro'lia, from the Latin aurum, gold. The external covering of some species has a metallic, golden hue, but others are green, red, black, etc. (Greek, chrusos, gold.)

° The plural is either chrysalises or chrysalides (4 syl.).

Chrys'or [ch = k]. Sir Artegal's sword, "that all other swords excelled." (Spenser: Faerie Queene.) (See SWORD.)

Chrysippus. Nisi Chrysippus fruisset, Porticos non curaret. Chrysippus of Soli was a disciple of Zeno the Stoic, and Cleanthes his successor. He did for the Stoics what St. Paul did for Christianity—that is, he explained the system, showed by plausible reasoning its truth, and how it was based on a solid foundation. Stoicism was founded by Zeno, it is true; but if Chrysippus had not advocated it, the system would never have taken root.

Chubb (Thomas). A deistical writer who wrote upon miracles in the first half of the eighteenth century.

"...he heard of Blount, of Mandeville, and Chubb." Crabbé: Borough.

Chuck Full. Probably a corruption of chock full or choke full—i.e. full enough to choke one.

"...put was holding some grand market; streets and lanes had been chokefull during the sunny hours." Currie, on Prome's June W. Currie, vol. 4, letter lixxviii. p. 276.

Chukwa. The tortoise at the South Pole on which the earth is said to rest.

Chum. A cron, a familiar companion, properly a bedfellow; a corruption either of chambermate or conrade.

"...to have a good chum is one of the pleasantest parts of a voyage." Northoff: Merchant Venetia, chap. xii. p. 164.

Chum in with (To). To be on friendly terms with. (See above.)

Church. The etymology of this word is generally assumed to be from the Greek, Kuriou oikos (house of God); but this is most improbable, as the word existed in all the Celtic dialects long before the introduction of Greek. No doubt the word means "a circle." The places of worship among the German and Celtic nations were always circular. (Welsh, cyngh; French, cirque; Scotch, Kerr; Greek, kirkos, etc.) Compare Anglo-Saxon cire, a church, with cireol, a circle.

High, Low, and Broad Church. Dr. South says, "The High Church are those who think highly of the Church and lowly of themselves; the Low Church, those who think lowly of the Church and highly of themselves" (this may be epigrammatic, but the latter half is not true). Broad Church are those who think the Church is broad enough for all religious parties, and their own views of religion are chiefly of a moral nature, their doctrinal views being so rounded and elastic that they can come into collision with no one.

° By the "High Church" now are meant those who follow the "Oxford Movement"; the "Low Church" party call themselves the "Evangelical" Church party.

The Church of Latter-day Saints. The Mormons.

The Anglican Church. That branch of the Protestant Church which, at the Reformation, was adopted in England. It disavowed the authority of the Pope, and rejected certain dogmas and rules of the Roman Church.

° Since 1532 generally called the "Established Church," because established by Act of Parliament.

The Catholic Church. The Western Church called itself so when it separated from the Eastern Church. It is also called the Roman Catholic Church, to distinguish it from the Anglican Church or Anglican Catholic Church, a branch of the Western Church.

The Established Church. The State Church, which, in England, is Episcopalian and in Scotland Presbyterian.
Before the Reformation it was, in both countries, “Catholic;” before the introduction of Christianity it was Pagan, and before that Druidism. In Turkey it is Mohammedanism; in Russia the Greek Church; in China, India, etc., other systems of religion.

To go into the Church. To take holy orders, or become an “ordained” clergyman.

Church-goer (.A). One who regularly attends the parish church.

Church Invisible (The). Those who are known to God alone as His sons and daughters by adoption and grace. (See Church Visible.)

“Oh, may I join the choir invisible.”

G. Biot.

Church Militant. The Church on earth means the whole body of believers, who are said to be “waging the war of faith” against “the world, the flesh, and the devil.” It is therefore militant, or in warfare. (See Church Triumphant.)

Church Porch (The) was used in ancient times for settling money transactions, paying dowries, rents, and purchases of estates. Consequently, it was furnished with benches on both sides. Hence, Lord Stourton sent to invite the Hartgills to meet him in the porch of Kilmington church to receive the £2,000 awarded them by the Star Chamber. (Lord de Ros: Tower of London.)

Church Triumphant (The). Those who are dead and gone to their rest. Having fought the fight and triumphed, they belong to the Church triumphant in heaven. (See Church Militant.)

Church Visible (The). Allshintaneous Christians; all who profess to be Christians; all who have been baptised and admitted into Church Communion. (See Church Invisible.)

Churched. Baptized.

To church a woman is to read the appointed service when a woman comes to church to return thanks to God for her “safe deliverance” and restored health.

Churchwarden (.A). A long clay pipe, such as churchwardens used to smoke some half a century ago when they met together in the parish tavern, after they had made up their accounts in the vestry, or been elected to office at the Easter meeting.

“Thirty years have enabled these [tobacco pipes] to destroy short clay, ruin meerschaums, and even do much mischief to the venerable churchwardens.”—Notes and Queries, April 25th, 1865, p. 23.

Churchyard Cough (.A). A consumptive cough indicating the near approach of death.

Churchlewit (Martin). The hero of Dickens’s novel so called. Jonas Chuzzlewit is a type of mean tyranny and sordid greed.

Chyndesnay. A chief Druid, whose tomb, with a Greek inscription, was discovered near Dijon in 1506.

Ci-devant (French). Former, of times gone by. As ci-devant governor—i.e. once a governor, but no longer so.

Ci-devant philosophers means philosophers of former days.

“The appellation of mistresses put her in mind of her ci-devant anguish.”—Jane Porter: Thaddeus of Wirmar, chap. xvi.

Cicero. So called from the Latin, cicer (a wart or vetch). Plutarch says “a flat excrescence on the tip of his nose gave him this name.” His real name was (Tullius) Tully.

La Bouche de Cicero. Philippe Pot, prime minister of Louis XI. (1428-1494.)

The Cicero of France. Jean Baptiste Massillon (1663-1742.)

The Cicero of Germany. Johann III., elector of Brandenburg. (1455-1499.)

The Cicero of the British Senate. George Canning (1770-1827.)

The British Cicero. William Pitt, Earl of Chatham (1708-1718.)

The German Cicero. Johann Sturm, printer and scholar. (1507-1569.)

Cicerone (4 syl.). A guide to point out objects of interest to strangers. So called in the same way as Paul was called by the men of Lystra “Mercu-rius, because he was the chief speaker” (Acts xiv. 12). Cicero was the speaker of speakers at Rome; and certainly, in a party of sight-seers, the guide is “the chief speaker.” It is no compliment to the great orator to call the glib patterer of a show-place a Cicero: but we must not throw stones at our Italian neighbours, as we have conferred similar honour on our great epic poet in changing “Grub Street” into “Million Street.”

* Pronounce ‘chek-er-ohn’.

Every glib and loquacious hireling who shows strangers about their pleasure-gardens, palaces, and ruins, is called (in Italy) a cicerone or a Cicero.”—Trench: On the Study of Words, lecture lii. p. 85.

7 In England, generally called “a guide.”
Cicisbeo [kis'-chiz-be'-o]. A danger about women; the professed gallant of a married woman. Also the knot of silk or ribbon which is attached to fans, walking-sticks, umbrellas, etc. Cicisbeism, the practice of dangling about women.

Ciclenius or Cylle'nius. Mercury. So called from mount Cylle'nis, in Peloponnesus, where he was born.

Cicuta. In Latin cicuta means the length of a reed up to the knot, such as the internodes made into a Pan-pipe. Hence Virgil (Ecl. ii. 36) describes a Pan-pipe as "septem compacta cicutis fistula." It is called Cow-bane, because cows not unfrequently eat it, but are killed by it. It is one of the most poisonous of plants, and some think it made the fatal draught given to Socrates.

"Precent cincta movient venenum est, sic cicuta vimin."—Phaed., xiv. 7.
"Quae potenter nuncuius satis expurgare cictusa."—Horace: "Epist. ii. 23.

Cid. Arabic for lord. Don Roderigo Laynez, Ruy Diaz (son of Diaz), Count of Bivar. He was called "mi es el campedor," my lord the champion (1025-1099). Corruption of Said.

The Cid's horse. Babieca. (3 or 4 ysl.). (See Horse.)

The Cid's sword. Cola da. The sword taken by the Cid Roderigo from King Bucar was called Tizrina. (See Sword.)

The Portuguese Cid. Nuñez Alverez Pereira, general diplomatist. (1300-1431.)

Cid Hamet Benengeli. The supposititious author of Don Quixote's Adventures.

Cigogné (French). A stork. Conte de la cigogne. An old wife's tale; silly tittle-tattle. "On conte des choses merveilleuses de la cigogne" (wonderful stories are told of the stork). This, no doubt, refers to the numerous Swedish legends of the stork, one of which is that its very name is derived from a stork flying round the cross of Christ, crying, Styrka! Styrka! (strengthen, strengthen, or bear up), and as the stork has no voice at all, the legend certainly is a "Conte de la cigogne," or old wife's fable.

"J'appréhende qu'on ne croye que tant ce que j'ai rapporté jusqu'à présent ne passe pour des riades de la cigogne, ou de ma mère l'âme."—Le Roman Bourgeois, 1718.

Cil'ares. (See Horse.)

Cimmerian Bosporus. The strait of Kaffa.

Cimmerian Darkness. Homer (possibly from some story as to the Arctic night) supposes the Cimmerians to dwell in a land "beyond the ocean-stream," where the sun never shone. (Odys., xi. 14.)

"In dark Cimmerian desert ever dwell."

Cinchoana or Quinine. So named from the wife of the Conti del Chinchon, viceroy of Peru, whence the bark was first sent to Europe in 1640. Linnaeus erroneously named it Cinchona for Chinchon. (See Peruvian Bark.)

Cincinnatus, the Roman, was ploughing his field, when he was saluted as Dictator. After he had conquered the Volsci and delivered his country from danger, he laid down his office and returned to his plough.

"And Cincinnatus, away from the plough."—Thomson: Winter, 192.

Cindere'la [little cinder girl]. Heroine of a fairy tale. She is the drudge of the house, dirty with housework, while her older sisters go to fine balls. At length a fairy enables her to go to the prince's ball; the prince falls in love with her, and she is discovered by means of a glass slipper which she drops, and which will fit no foot but her own.

The glass slipper is a mistranslation of pantoufle en vair (a fur slipper), not en verre. (R. C. Pirovaut: Contes de Fées.)

Cinquecento. An epithet applied to art between 1500-1600; called in France Renaissance, and in England Elizabethan. It was the revival of the classical or antique, but is generally understood as a derogatory term, implying debased or inferior art. The great schools of art closed with 1500. The "immortal five" great painters were all born in the previous century: viz. Leonardo da Vinci, born 1452; Michel Angelo, 1474; Titian, 1477; Raphael, 1480; and Correggio, 1494. Cinquecento is the Italian for 500, omitting the thousand—mi cinque cento.

Cinque Ports (The). Originally the five seaports: Hastings, Sandwich, Dover, Romney, and Hythe. Subsequently Winchelsea and Rye were added.

Cinter (A.). The framing erected between piers to hold up the stones of an arch during the making thereof.

"Certain crude beliefs may be useful in the infancy of a nation, but when the arch is made, when the intelligence is fully developed, the center is thrown down and truth stands unsupported."—E. D. Fawcett.
Ciphner. Dr. Whewell's riddle is—"A headless man had a letter (o) to write,
He who read it (ought) had lost his sight;
The dull (o) repeated it (ought) word for word,
And deaf was the man who listened and heard (ought).

Circe (2 syl.). A sorceress. She lived in the island of Aeaea. When Ulysses landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but Ulysses resisted this metamorphosis by virtue of a herb called moly, given him by Mercury.

"Who knows not Circe.
The daughter of the sun, whose charmed cup
Whoever tasted lost his upright shape.
And downward fell into a grumbling swine?"
—Milton: Comus, 30–33.

Circle of Ullea. A white rainbow or luminous ring sometimes seen in Alpine regions opposite the sun in foggy weather.

Circuit. The journey made through the counties of Great Britain by the judges twice a year. There are six circuits in England, two in Wales, and three in Scotland. Those in England are called the Home, Norfolk, Midland, Oxford, Western, and Northern; those of Wales, the North and South circuits; and those of Scotland, the Southern, Western, and Northern.

Circumbendibulus (A). He took a circumbendibulus, i.e. he went round about and round about before coming to the point.

"Partaking of what scholars call the periphrastic and antithetic, and the vulgar the circum-bendibulus."—Sir W. Scott: Waverley, chap. xvii.

Circumcellians. A sect of the African Donatists in the fourth century; so called because they rambled from town to town to redress grievances, forgive debts, manumit slaves, and set themselves up as the oracles of right and wrong. (Latin, circum-cello, to beat about.)

Circumcised Brethren (in Hudi-bras). They were Prymne, Bertie or Burton, and Bastwick, who lost their ears and had their noses slit for lampooning Henrietta Maria and the bishops.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule to our public offices, because each person tries to shuffle off every act to some one else; and before anything is done it has to pass through so many departments, that every fly is crushed on a wheel. The term was invented by Charles Dickens, and appears in Little Dorrit.

Cirio-Scot or Church Scot. An ecclesiastical due, paid chiefly in corn, in the reign of Canute, etc., on St. Martin's Day.

Cist (Greek κίστη, Latin cista). A chest or box. Generally used as a coffin for the remains of the dead. The Greek and Roman cist was a deep cylindrical basket made of wickerwork, like a lady's work-basket. The basket into which voters cast their tablets was called a "cist;" but the mystic cist used in the rites of Cerés was latterly made of bronze.

Cist Urn (A). An urn for the ashes of those buried in cists.

Cistercian. A religious order, so called from the monastery of Cistercium, near Dijon, in France. The abbey of Cistercium or Citeaux was founded by Robert, abbot of Molémé, in Burgundy, at the close of the eleventh century.

Citadel (A). In fortification, a small strong fort, constructed either within the place fortified, or on the most inaccessible spot of its general outline; to give refuge for the garrison, that it may prolong the defence after the place has fallen, or to hold out for the best terms of capitulation. Citadels generally command the interior of the place, and are useful, therefore, for overawing a population which might otherwise strive to shorten a siege. (French, citadelle; Italian, cittadella, a little city.)

Cities.

Cities of Refuge. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whether any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh. (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 1-8.)

The Cities of the Plain. Sodom and Gomorrah.

"Abraham dwelt in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelt in the midst of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom."—Gen. xiii. 12.

The Seven Cities. Egypt, Jerusalem, Babylon, Athens, Rome, Constantinople, and either London for commerce, or Paris for beauty. (See Pentapolis.)

Citizen King (The). Louis Philippe of France. So called because he was elected king by the citizens of Paris. (Born 1773, reigned 1830-1848, died 1850.)

City (A), strictly speaking is a large town with a corporation and cathedral; but any large town is so called in ordinary speech. In the Bible it means a town having walls and gates.

"The eldest son of the first man [Cain] built a city [Gen. iv. 17]—not, of course, a Niniveh or a Babylon, but still a city."—Boullion: "Origin of Nations., part i., chap. i. p. 10.

City College (The). Newgate. The wit is now a thing of the past.

City of Bells (The). Strasburg.

"He was a Strasbourger, and in that city of bells had been a medical practitioner."—Matthew Bell: "The Nave Hunters., chap. xx.

City of David (The). Jerusalem.

So called in compliment to King David. (2 Sam. v. 7, 9.)

City of Destruction (The). This world, or rather, the world of the unconverted. Bunyan makes Christian flee from the "City of Destruction" and journey to the "Celestial City," by which he allegorises the "walk of a Christian" from conversion to death.

City of God (The). The church or whole body of believers; the kingdom of Jesus Christ, in contradistinction to the city of the World, called by John Bunyan the City of Destruction. The phrase is that of St. Augustine; one of his chief works bearing that title, or rather De Civitate Dei.

City of Lanterns (The). A suppositional city in Lucian's "Verve Historie., situate somewhere beyond the zodiac. (See LANTERN-LAND.)

City of Palaces (The). Agrippa, in the reign of Augustus, converted Rome from "a city of brick huts to one of marble palaces." (Cf. Suetonius.)

Calcutta is called the "City of Palaces." Modern Paris well deserves the compliment of being so called.

City of Refuge (The). Medina, in Arabia, where Mahomet took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca. He entered the city, not as a fugitive, but in triumph, A.D. 622. (See under CITIES OF REFUGE, page 255.)

City of St. Michael (The). Dumfries, of which city St. Michael is the patron saint.

City of Saints. Montreal, in Canada, is so named because all the streets are named after saints.

"Mr. Geo. Martin . . . said he came from [Montreal] a city of saints, where all the streets were named after saints."—Scotsman, September 10th, 1801.

City of the Great King (The)—i.e. Jerusalem. (Ps. xlviii. 2; Matt. v. 35.) collection of the revenue, and other expenses neither pertaining to the Sovereign, the army, nor the navy.

Civil War. War between citizens (civiles). In English history the term is applied to the war between Charles I. and his Parliament; but the War of the Red and White Roses was a civil war. In America the War of Secession (1861-1865) was a civil war.

Civis Romanus Sum. This angle plea sufficed to arrest arbitrary condemnation, bonds, and scourging. Hence, when the centurion commanded Paul "to be examined by scourging," he virtually pleaded "Civis Romanus sum"; and asked, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a Roman citizen, and uncondemned?" (1) No Roman citizen could be condemned unheard; (2) by the Valerian Law he could not be bound; (3) by the Sempronian Law it was forbidden to scourge him, or to beat him with rods. (See also Acts xvi. 37, etc.)

Citizens Sole. A political and philosophical romance by Thomas Campanella (1558-1639), born at Stilo, or Silio, in Italy. This romance is a kind of Utopia, formed on the model of Plato’s Republic. His society is a sort of convenut-life established on the principles of a theocratic communism.

Clabber Napper’s Hole. Near Gravesend; said to be named after a freebooter; but more likely the Celtic Cebrer Parcer (water-town lower camp).

Clack Dish. A dish or basin with a movable lid. Some two or three centuries ago beggars used to proclaim their want by clacking the lid of a wooden dish.

"Can you think I get my living by a bell and clack-dish?"

"Well, beggar, sir." (Family of Love, 1908)."

Claff. An Egyptian head-dress with long lappets pendent on the shoulders, as in the statue of Amunophis III.

Clack-ho-haryah. At Fort Vancouver the medium of intercourse is a mixture of Canadian-French, English, Indian, and Chinese. An Englishman goes by the name of Kint-shah; a corruption of King George; an American is called Boston; and the ordinary salutation is clack-ho-haryah. This is explained by the fact that the Indians, frequently hearing a trader named Clark addressed by his companions, "Clark, how are you?" imagined this to be the correct English form of salutation. (Taylor: Words and Places.)

Clam. (See Close as a Clam.)

Clans-na-Gael (The). An Irish Fenian organisation founded in Philadelphia in 1870, and known in secret as the "United Brotherhood"; its avowed object being to secure "the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connection between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland." (See Dynamite Saturday.)

In 1883 Alexander Sullivan was elected one of the three heads of this club, to which is due the dynamite outrages in London (January, 1886), and the design to murder the Queen's ministers.

Clap-trap. Something introduced to win applause; something really worthless, but sure to take with the groundlings. A trap to catch applause.

Clapper. A plank bridge over a stream; a ferry-gate. A roofing-board is called a clap-board.

"A little low and lonesome shed, With a roof of clap-boards overhead." (After Cary: Letters Christmas Eve.)

Probably a corruption of cloth-board, a covering board, from Anglo-Saxon, cloth, a covering, whence our clothes.

"Boards for making casks are also called "clap-boards.""

Clappercial. To jangle and claw each other about. (Dutch and German, klappen, to strike, clatter.)

"Now they are clapper-clawing one another; I'll go look on." (Shakespeare: Twelfth and Christmas, 1.4."

"A clapper-claw is a back-scratcher.

Clapper-dudgeons. Abrum-men (q.v.). The clapper is the tongue of a bell, and in cant language the human "tongue." Dudgeon is a slang word for a beggar.

Clapping the Prayer Books, or stamping the feet, in the Roman Catholic Church, on Good Friday, is designed to signify the abandonment of our Saviour by His disciples. This is done when twelve of the thirteen burning candles are put out. The noise comes from within the choir.

Claque; Cliqueuere. Applause by clapping the hands; persons paid for doing so. M. Sauton, in 1829, established in Paris an office to ensure the success of dramatic pieces. He was the first to organise the Parisian claque. The manager sends an order to his office for any number of claqueurs, sometimes for 500, or even more. The class is divided into conmiserati, those who commit the pieces to memory and are noisy in pointing out its merits; vieurs, who laugh at the puns and jokes; pleureurs, chiefly women, who are to hold their pocket-handkerchiefs to their eyes at the moving parts; chatouilleurs, who are to keep the audience in good humour; and bisserius, who are to cry (bis) encore. The Romans had their Laudiceni (q.v.).

Clare (St.). A religious order of women, the second that St. Francis instituted. It was founded in 1213, and took its name from its first abbess.

Clarenceux King-of-Arms. One of the two provincial heralds, with jurisdiction over the southern provinces. The name was taken in honour of the Duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III. The herald of the northern provinces is called Norroy King-of-Arms.

Garter-King-of-Arms, also "Principal King-of-Arms," has to attend on Knights of the Garter, and arrange whatever is required in connection with these knights. There is a Bath King-of-Arms, not a member of the college, to attend on Knights of the Bath.

Clarendon. The Constitutions of Clarendon. Laws made by a general council of nobles and prelates, held at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, in 1164, to check the power of the Church, and restrain the prerogatives of ecclesiastics. These famous ordinances, sixteen in number, define the limits of the patronage and jurisdiction of the Pope in these realms.

Clarendon Type. The black letters which head these articles are so called.

Claret. The wine so called does not receive its name from its colour, but the colour so called receives its name from the wine. The word means clarified wine (vinum claretum). What we call hippocras was called claretum, made of wine and honey clarified.

Claret. Blood. To broach one's claret. To give one a bloody nose; so called from the claret colour.

Claret Cup. A drink made of claret, brandy, lemon, borage, sugar, ice, and carbonated water.

Claret Jug (One's). One's nose. (See above, Claret.)

To tap one's claret jug. To give one a bloody nose. "Tap" is meant for a pun—to broach and to knock.

Classick Races (The). The five chief horse-races in England, viz. the 2,000 and 1,000 guineas races for two-year-olds, run at Newmarket, the Derby for fillies and colts, the Oaks for fillies only, and the St. Leger.

Classics. The best authors. The Romans were divided by Servius into six classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicius, all the rest were said to be infirm classicius. From this the best authors were termed classici autoreis (classic authors), i.e. authors of the best or first class. The high esteem in which Greek and Latin were held at the revival of letters obtained for these authors the name of classic, emphatically; and when other first-rate works are intended some distinctive name is added, as the English, French, Spanish, etc., classics.

Claude Lorrain (i.e. of Lorraine). This incorrect form is generally used in English for the name of Claude le Lorrain, or Claude Gelee, the French landscape painter, born at the Château-de-Chamagne, in Lorraine. (1600-1682.)

The Scotch Claude. Thomas of Duddingston (near Edinburgh).

Clauz (Santa). (See SANTA CLAUS.)

Clause. Letter-clause, a close letter, sealed with the royal signet or privy-seal; in opposition to letters-patent, which are left open, the seal being attached simply as a legal form. ("Clause," Latin clausum, shut, closed. "Patent," Latin patens, open.)

 Clause Rolls (Rotuli clausi). Close Rolls. (See CLOSE ROLLS.)

"Clause Rolls contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs. These rolls are preserved in the Tower."—Jacob: Law Dictionary.

Clavie. Burning of the Clavie on New-year's eve (old style) in the village of Burghead, on the southern shore of the Moray Firth. The clavie is a sort of bonfire made of casks split up. One of the casks is split into two parts of different sizes, and an important item of the ceremony is to join these parts together with a huge nail made for the purpose. Whence the name clavis (Latin), a nail. Chambers, who in his Book of Days (vol. ii. p. 789) minutely describes the ceremony, suggests that it is a relic of Druid worship, but it seems to me to be connected with the Roman ceremony observed on the 13th September, and called the clavis annalis. The two divisions of the cask, I think, symbolise the old and the new year, which are joined together by a nail. The two parts are unequal, because the part of the new year joined on to the old is very small in comparison.

Clavileno. The wooden horse on which Don Quixote got astride, in order to disenchant the Infanta Antonomasia and her husband, who were shut up in the tomb of Queen Magun'cia, of Canda'ya. It was the very horse on which Peter of Provence carried off the fair Magalona; it was constructed by Merlin, and was governed by a wooden pin in the forehead. (The word means Wooden Peg.) (Don Quixote, part ii. book 3, chaps. 4, 5.) (See Cambuscans.)

Claw means the foot of an animal armed with claws; a hand. To claw is to lay one’s hands upon things. It also means to tickle with the hand; hence to please or flatter, puff or praise. (Anglo-Saxon, claw, a claw, with the verb clav-ian, to claw.)

Clean me and I will claw thee, means, “praise me, and I will praise you,” or, scratch my back, and I will do the same for you.

Laugh when I am merry, and claw no man in his humours.”—Shakespeare: Much Ado, etc., i. 3.

Claw-backs. Flatterers. Bishop Jewel speaks of “the Pope’s claw-backs.” (See above, and Clapperclaws.)

Claymore or Claymore (2 syl.) is the Celtic gyn (a bent sword), (Gaelic cleithbrann; a sword), and mor (great). (See Morelly.)

I’'ve told thee how the Sonthrons fell Beneath the broad claymore.

Agamemnon: Exordeion of Montes, stanza 2.

Clean. Free from blame or fault.

Ye are clean, but not all.”—John viii. 10.

Bill. To show a clean bill of health. (See page 135, col. 1. Bill of Health.)

Bread. To make a clean breast or Make a clean breast of it. To make a full and unreserved confession.

Hands. To have clean hands. To be quite clear of some stated evil. Hence “clean-handed.”

To keep the hands clean. Not to be involved in wrong-doing.

Heart. To have a clean heart. A righteous spirit.

Create in me a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me.”—Psalm li. 10.

Heels. To show a clean pair of heels. To make one’s escape, to run away. Here “clean” means free from obstruction.

The Maroons were runaway slaves who had shown their tyrants a clean pair of heels.

Life. To live a clean life. Blameless and undefiled.

Tongue. A clean tongue. Not abusive, not profane, not foul.

Clean (70).

Clean away! Scrub on, go on cleaning, etc.

To clean down. To sweep down, to swill down.

To clean out. To purify, to make tidy. Also, to win another’s money till his pocket is quite empty.

To clean up. To wash up, to put in order.

Clean, used adverbially, means entirely, wholly; as, “you have grown clean out of knowledge,” i.e. wholly beyond recognition.

Clean and Unclean Animals. Pythagoras taught the doctrine of the transmigration of the soul, but that it never entered into those animals which it is lawful to eat. Hence those animals which were lawful food for man were those into which the human soul never entered; but those into which the human soul entered were unclean or not fit for human food. This notion existed long before the time of Pythagoras, who learnt it in Egypt.

In the Old Testament, those animals which chew the cud and part the hoof were clean, and might be eaten. Hares and rabbits could not be eaten because (although they chew the cud) they do not part the hoof. Pigs and camels were unclean, because (although they part the hoof) they do not chew the cud. Birds of prey were accounted unclean. Fish with fins and scales were accounted fit food for man. (Lev. xi.)

Cleaned Out. Impoverished of everything. De Quincy says that Richard Bentley, after his lawsuit with Dr. Colbatch, “must have been pretty well cleaned out.”

Clear (verb).

Clear away. Remove.

Clear off! Away with you! Take away.

Clear out. Empty out, make tidy. (See below, Cleared Out for Guam.)

Clear up. Become fine after rain or cloudiness; to make manifest; to elucidate what was obscure.

To clear an examination paper. To floor it, or answer every question set.

To clear the air. To remove the clouds, mists, and impurities.

To clear the dishes. To empty them of their contents.
Clear the Court

- To clear the room. To remove from it every thing or person not required.
- To clear the table. To remove what has been placed on it.

Clear the Court. Remove all strangers, or persons not officially concerned in the suit.

Clear the Decks. Prepare for action by removing everything not required.

"Clear" used adverbially means wholly, entirely; as, "He is gone clear away," "Clear out of sight."

Clear (the adjective).

A clear head. A mind that can understand clearly anything which it grasps.
A clear statement. A straightforward and intelligible statement.
A clear style (of writing). A lucid method of expressing one's thoughts.

Clear as Crystal. Clear as Mud. (See Similes.)

Clear-coat. A mixture of size, alum, and whitening, for sizing walls. To cover over whatever might show through the coat of colour or paper to be put on it, also to make them stick or adhere more firmly.

Clear Day (A). A bright day, an entire day, as, "The bonds must be left three clear days for examination," to examine them before the interest is paid.

Clear Grit (Thc). The real thing, as "champagne is ... if it be but the clear grit" (Anglo-Saxon, gryl, bolted flour).

A man of grit, or clear grit, is one of decision, from whom all doubt or vacillation has been bolted out, as husks from fine flour.

Clear out for Guam (Thb). The ship is bound for no specific place. In the height of the gold fever, ships were chartered to carry passengers to Australia without having return cargoes secured for them. They were, therefore, obliged to leave Melbourne in ballast, and to sail in search of homeward freights. The Custom House regulations required, however, that, on clearing outwards, some port should be named; and it became the habit of captains to name "Guam" (a small island of the Ladrones group) as the hypothetical destination. Hence, "to clear out for Guam" came to mean, clear out for just anywhere—we are bound for whatever coast we may choose to venture upon. (See Notes and Queries, April 18th, 1885, p. 314.)

Clear Cut. I am quite cleared out.
I have spent all my money; I have not a farthing left. In French, Je suis Angl. (See French Leave.) Cleared out means, my purse or pocket is cleared out of money.

Clearing House. A building in Lombard Street, set apart, since 1776, for interchanging bankers' cheques and bills. Each bank sends to it daily all the bills and cheques not drawn on its own firm; these are sorted and distributed to their respective houses, and the balance is settled by transfer tickets. The origin of this establishment was a post at the corner of Birchin Lane and Lombard Street, where banking clerks met and exchanged memoranda.

Railway lines have also their "Clearing Houses" for settling the "tickets" of the different lines.

A "clearing banker" is a banker who has the entrée of the clearing house.

"London has become the clearing-house of the whole world, the place where international debts are exchanged against each other. And something like 500 million pounds' worth of checks and bills pass that clearing yearly."—A. C. Perry: Elements of Political Economy, p. 363.

Cleave. Either to stick to or to part from. A man "shall cleave to his wife" (Matt. xix. 5). As one that "cleaveth wood" (Psalm cxli. 7). The former is the Anglo-Saxon clif-an, to stick to, and the latter is clof-an, to split.

Cle'lia. A vain, frivolous female butterfly, with a savoring of everything. In youth she coquetted; and, when youth was passed, tried sly ways of earning a living, but always without success. It is a character in Crabbe's Borough.

Cle'lie. A character in Madam Scudéris's romance so called. This novel is a type of the buckram formality of Louis XIV. It is full of high-flown compliments, theatrical poses, and cut-and-dry sentiments.

Clement (Nfr). Patron saint of tanners, being himself a tanner. His symbol is a pot, because November the 23rd, St. Clement's Day, is the day on which the early Danes used to go about begging for ale.

Clementina (The Lady). In love with Sir Charles Grandison, who marries Harriet Biron. (Richardson: Sir Charles Grandison.)
Clench and Clench. To clench is to grasp firmly, as, "He clench'd my arm firmly," "He clench'd his nerves bravely to endure the pain." (Anglo-Saxon, be-clínsan, to hold fast.)

To clínež is to make fast, to turn the point of a nail in order to make it fast. Hence, to clinch an argument. (Dutch, klinken, to rivet. Whence "clinker-built," said of a ship whose planks overlap each other, and are riveted together.)

"I gave him a clench'er (should be "clínercher"). I nailed him fast.

Cleom'brotos (4 syl.). A philosopher who so admired Plato's Phædon that he jumped into the sea in order to exchange this life for a better. He was called Ambraciota (of Ambracía), from the place of his birth in Epirus.

"He who would enjoy Plato's elysium, leaped into the sea.
Cleombronios.

Cleon. The personification of glory in Spenser's Faerie Queen.

Cleopatra was introduced to Julius Caesar by Apollodorus in a bale of rich Syrian rugs. When the bale was unbound, there was discovered the fairest and Wittiest girl of all the earth; and Caesar became her captive slave.

Cleopatra and her Pearl. It is said that Cleopatra made a banquet for Antony, the costliness of which excuted his astonishment; and, when Antony expressed his surprise, Cleopatra took a pearl ear-drop, which she dissolved in a strong acid, and drank to the health of the Roman triumvir, saying, "My draught to Antony shall far exceed it." There are two difficulties in this anec- dote—the first is, that vinegar would not dissolve a pearl; and the next is, that any stronger acid would be wholly unfit to drink. Probably the solution is this: the pearl was sold to some merchant, whose name was synonymous with a strong acid, and the money given to Antony as a present by the fond queen. The pearl melted, and Cleopatra drank to the health of Antony as she handed him the money. (See "Gresham" in Reader's Handbook.)

Clergy. The men of God's lot or inheritance. In St. Peter's first epistle (ch. v. 3) the Church is called "God's heritage" or lot. In the Old Testament the tribe of Levi is called the "lot or heritage of the Lord." (Greek, kλησις; Latin, clerus and decredens, whence Norman clerev and clerks; French, clercs.)

Benefit of clergy. (See BENEFIT.)

Cler'gymen. The dislike of sailors to clergymen on board ship arises from an association with the history of Jonah. Sailors call them a little cargo, or kittle cargo, meaning dangerous. Probably the disastrous voyage of St. Paul confirmed the prejudice.

Cler'ical Titles.

(1) Clerk. As in ancient times the clergymen was about the only person who could write and read, the word clerical, as used in "clerical error," came to signify an orthographical error. As the respondent in church was able to read, he received the name of clerk, and the assistants in writing, etc., are so termed in business. (Latin, clericus, a clergymen.)

(2) Curate. One who has the cure of souls. As the cure of the parish used to be virtually entrusted to the clerical stipendiary, the word curate was appropriated to this assistant.

(3) Rector. One who has the personage and great tithes. The man who rules or guides the parish. (Latin, "a ruler").

(4) Vicar. One who does the "duty" of a parish for the person who receives the tithes. (Latin, vicearius, a deputy.)

(5) Incumbent and Perpetual Curate are now termed Vicars. (See PARSONS.)

"The French curé equals our vicar, and their ricardo our curate.

Cler'ical Vestments.

(1) White. Emblem of purity, worn on all feasts, saints' days, and sacramental occasions.

(2) Red. The colour of blood and of fire, worn on the days of martyrs, and on Whit-Sunday, when the Holy Ghost came down like tongues of fire.

(3) Olive. Worn only on days which are neither feasts nor fasts.

(4) Purple. The colour of mourning, worn on Advent Sundays, in Lent, and on Ember days.

(5) Black. Worn on Good Friday, and when masses are said for the dead.

Clar'mond. Niece of the Green Knight (q.v.), bride of Valentine the brave, and sister of Ferragus the giant. (Valentine and Orson.)

Clerk. A scholar. Hence, beau-clerk. (See above, CLERICAL TITLES.)

"All the clerks. I mean the learned ones, in Christian kingdoms, Have their free voices."

Shakespeare: Henry VIII., ii. 2.
Clerk-ale. Thieves. An equivocal on the word Nick.

"I think there came prancing down the hill a couple of St. Nicholas’s clerks."—Rowley: Match at Midnight, 1629.

Clerk-ale and Church-ale. Mr. Donne says the word "ale" is used in such composite words as bride-ale, clerk-ale, church-ale, lamb-ale, Midsummer-ale, Scot-ale, Whitsun-ale, etc., for revel or feast, ale being the chief liquor given.

"The multitude call Church-ale Sunday their resting day, which day is spent in mirthseating, bearheating...dicing...and drunkenness."—W. Keate (1570).

Clerkenwell (London) means the Clerks’ well, where the parish clerks of London used to assemble yearly to play some sacred piece.

Clerkly. Cleverly; like a scholar.

"I thank you, gentle servant: 'tis very clerkly done."—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 1.

Client. In Roman history meant a plebeian under the patronage of a patron. The client performed certain services, and the patron protected the life and interests of the client. The word is now a legal one, meaning a person who employs the services of a legal adviser to protect his interests.

Clifford (Paul). A highwayman, reformed by the power of love, in Sir L. Bulwer Lytton’s novel so called.

Climaenteric. It was once believed that 7 and 9, with their multiples, were critical points in life; and 63, which is produced by multiplying 7 and 9 together, was termed the Grand Climaenteric, which few persons seduced in outliving.

"There are two years, the seventh and the ninth, that commonly bring great changes in a man’s life, and great dangers: wherefore 63, that contains both these numbers multiplied together, comes not without hope of danger."—Leviathan.

Climacteric Years are seventh and ninth, with their multiples by the odd numbers 3, 5, 7, 9—viz. 7, 9, 21, 27, 35, 45, 49, 63, and 81, over which astrologers supposed Saturn, the malevolent planet, presided. Hippocrates recognizes these periods. (See Nine.)

Climax means a staur (Greek), applied to the last or gradation of argument, each of which is stronger than the preceding. The last of a gradation of words of a similar character is also called a climax. The point of highest development.

"In the very climax of his career...he was stricken down."—Chambers: Recollections of Lincoln, chap. xiv. p. 454.

Climb. On the climb. Under the hope of promotion. Thomas Becket, after he became Cardinal-archbishop of Canterbury, was at the top of the tree, and no further promotion was in the power of the king to bestow. Being no longer on the climb, he could set the king at defiance, and did do so.

Clinch. To bend the point of a nail after it is driven home. The word is sometimes written clench, from the French clench, the lift of a latch. (German, klinke; Dutch, klippen, to rivet.) (See page 261, col. 1, Clinch.)

That was a clincher. That argument was not to be gainsaid; that remark drove the matter home, and fixed it "as a nail in a sure place."

A lie is called a clincher from the tale about two swaggerers, one of whom said, "I drove a nail right through the moon." "Yes," said the other, "I remember it well, for I went the other side and clinched it." The French say, Je lui ai bien rive son clou (I have clinched his nail for him).

Clinker (Humphrey). Hero of Smollett’s novel so called. The general scheme of Oliver Twist resembles it. Humphrey is a workhouse boy, put out apprentice; but being afterwards reduced to great want, he attracts the notice of Mr. Bramble, who takes him into his service. He turns out to be Bramble’s natural son, and falls in love with Winifred Jenkins, Miss Bramble’s maid.

Clio was one of the nine Muses, the inventress of historical and heroic poetry.

Cho. Addison is so called because his papers in the Spectator are signed by one of the four letters in this word, probably the initial letters of Chelsea, London, Islington, Office. (See Nota.)

"See Professor Morley’s "Introduction to the Spectator," on the subject.

Clipper. A fast-sailing ship.

"We shall have to catch the Aurora, and she has a name for being a clipper."—A. C. Logic: The Sign of Four, chap. x.

She’s a clipper. Said of a stylish or beautiful woman. A first-class craft.

Clipping Pace (A). Very fast. A clipper is a fast-sailing vessel.

"Leaving Dún Head, we worked on at a clipping pace, and the skiff yielded so much to the breeze that Bury said we must reef the main sail."—W. S. Trench: Realities of Irish Life, chap. 2.

Cliquot (of Punch celebrity). A nickname of Frederick William IV. of Prussia; so called from his fondness for champagne (1795, 1840-1861).

Cioacina. Goddess of sewers. (Latin, cloaca, a sewer.)

"Then Cioacina, goddess of the tide,
Whose agile streams beneath the city glide,
Indulged the modish flame; the town she roved,
A mortal scavenger she saw, she loved."

Guy: Trivia, ii.

Cloak and Sword Plays. Modern comedy, played in the ordinary costume of modern life. The phrase was adopted by Cameron, who lived in Spain while gentlemen were accustomed to wear cloaks and swords. For tragedy the men actors wore either heraldic or dramatic-historic dresses. In England actors in tragedy and old comedy wore the costumes of Charles II.'s period, till quite recently.

Cloak. So church bells were once called. (German, glocke; French, cloche; Medieval Latin, cloca.)

"Weel sikere [surer] was his crownyng in his logge Than is a clok [bell] or ablaye profugge."

Chaucer: The Rome Preste Tale (1350-40).

Clock. The tale about St. Paul's clock striking thirteen is given in Walcott's Memorials of Westminster, and refers to John Hatfield, who died 1770, age 102. He was a soldier in the reign of William III., and was brought before a court-martial for falling asleep on duty upon Windsor Terrace. In proof of his innocence he asserted that he heard St. Paul's clock strike thirteen, which statement was confirmed by several witnesses.

Clodhopper. A farmer, who hopes or walks amongst the clods. The cavalry call the infantry clodhoppers, because they have to walk instead of riding horseback.

Clog Almanac. A primitive almanac or calendar, originally made of a "clog," or log of wood, with four faces or parallelograms; the sharp edge of each face or side was divided by notches into three months, every week being marked by a big notch. The face left of the notched edge contained the saints' days, the festivals, the phases of the moon, and so on in Runic characters, whence the "clog" was also called a Runic staff. These curiosities are not uncommon, and specimens may be seen in the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the Ashmolean Museum, St. John's (Cambridge), the Cheetham Library (Manchester), and other places both at home and abroad.

Cloister. He retired into a cloister, as monastery. Almost all monasteries have a cloister or covered walk, which generally occupied three sides of a quadrangle.

Clottie, Auld Clottie. Old Nick. The Scotch call a cloven hoof a cloot, so that Auld Clottie is Old Cloven-foot.

Cloridae (in Orlando Furioso). A humble Moorish youth, who joins Medoro in seeking the body of King Dardinello to bury it. Medoro being wounded, Cloridano rushed madly into the ranks of the enemy and was slain.

Clorinda (in Jerusalem Delivered). A female knight who came from Persia to oppose the Crusaders, and was appointed by Aladine leader of all the Pagan forces. Tancred fell in love with her; but not knowing her in a night attack, slew her after a most dreadful combat. Before she died she received Christian baptism at the hands of Tancred, who mourned her death with great sorrow of heart. (Book xii.)

Senap'sus of Ethiopia (a Christian) was her father; but her being born white alarmed her mother, who changed her babe for a black child. Arsetis, the eunuch, was entrusted with the infant Clorinda, and as he was going through a forest he saw a tiger, dropped the child, and sought safety in a tree. The tiger took the babe and sucked it, after which Arsetis left Ethiopia with the child for Egypt.

Close as a Clam. A clam is a bivalve mollusca, which burrows in sand or mud. It is about the size of a florin, and may be eaten raw or fried like an oyster. Clams are gathered only when the tide is out. When the tide is in they are safe from molestation, hence the saying "Happy as a clam at high tide." (Anglo-Saxon, clam, mud; verb clem-ian, to glue; German, klamm, close.)

Close Rolls are mandates, letters, and writings of a private nature, addressed, in the Sovereign's name, to individuals, and folded or closed and sealed on the outside with the Great Seal.

* Patent Rolls are left open, with the seal hanging from the bottom.

Close-time for Game. (See Sport- ing Seasons.)

Closh (Mynherr). A Dutch Jack- tar. Closh is corrupt form of Claus, a contraction of Nicholas, a name as common with the Dutch as Jack is with the English people.

Cloon: A vindictive lout who wore his dagger in his mouth. He fell in love with Imogen, but his love was not reciprocated. (Shakespeare: Cymbeline.)

Cloth (The). The clergy; the clerical office; thus we say "having respect for the cloth." Formerly the clergy used to wear a distinguishing costume, made of gray or black cloth.

Clotharius or Clothaire (in Jerusalem Delivered). At the death of Hugo he takes the lead of the Franks, but is shot by Clorinda (q.v.) with an arrow (book xii). After his death, his troops sneak away and leave the Christian army (book xiii).

Clotho, in Classic mythology, one of the Three Fates. She presided over birth, and drew from her distaff the thread of life; Atropos presided over death and cut the thread of life; and Lachesis spun the fate of life between birth and death. (Greek, klētho, to draw thread from a distaff.)

"A French shamed wether with Clotho-Rhods and Evelyn."—Coryate. (This is an erroneous allusion. It was Atropos who cut the thread.)

Cloud, Clouds. He is in the clouds. In dreamland; entertaining visionary notions; having no distinct idea about the matter in question.

He is under a cloud. Under suspicion, in disrepute.

To blow a cloud is to smoke a cigar or pipe.

Cloud. A dark spot on the forehead of a horse between the eyes. A white spot is called a star, and an elongated star is a blaze. (See Blaze.)

"Aptolph. He [Antony] has a cloud on his face. Environus. He was the worse for that he was a horse."—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

Cloud (St.). Patron saint of nail-smiths, but play upon the French word cloot, a nail.

Clouded Cane (A). A malacca cane clouded or mottled from age and use. These canes were very fashionable in the first quarter of the present century.

Clowen Foot. To show the clowen foot, i.e. to show a knavish intention; a base motive. The allusion is to Satan, represented with the legs and feet of a goat; and, however he might disguise himself, he could never conceal his cloven feet. (See Bag o' Nails, Goat.)

...and the clowen foot peeps out in some letters written by him at the period."—St. James's Magazine.

Cloy. He's in cloy. In luck, in prosperous circumstances, in a good situation. The allusion is to cattle feeding in clover fields.

Clown. The three most celebrated are Joseph Grimaldi (1779-1837), the French Carlin (1718-1783), and Richard Tarlton, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, who acted at the gallery inn called the Belle Sauvage.

"To sit with Tarlton on an alehouse sign."—Bishop Hall: Satires.

Club. A society of persons who club together, or form themselves into a knot or lump.

The word was originally applied to persons bound together by a vow. (German, gelübde.) (See Cards, 4 clubs.)

"[the] was the era of chivalry,... for bodies of men uniting themselves by a sacred vow, gelübde, which word and thing have passed over to us in a singularly dwindled condition;..."—Coryate: Frederick the Great, vol. i. p. 111.

Club-bearer (The). Periphetis, the robber of Argolus, is so called because he murdered his victims with an iron club.

Club-land. That part of the West End of London where the principal clubs are situated; the members of such clubs.

Club-law. The law of might or compulsion through fear of chastisement. Do it or get a hiding.

Clue. I have not yet got the clue: to give a clue, i.e. a hint. A clue is a ball of thread (Ang.-Saxon, cloywen). The only mode of finding the way out of the Cretan labyrinth was by a skein of thread, which, being laid along the proper route, indicated the right path.

Clumsy (Norwegian, klump, a lump; Swedish, klumnus, bumbled; Icelandic, kluma). Piers Plowman has "thou klompsis for cold," and Wiclif has "Our houdis ben aclumspid." Halliwell gives us clumpish = awkward, and clump = lazy.

Clür'scane (3 syl.). An elf of evil disposition who usually appears as a wrinkled old man, and has knowledge of hid treasures. (Irish mythology.)

Clydesdale Horses. Scotch draught-horses, not equal to Shire-horses in size, but of great endurance. (See Shire-horses.)

Clowen of the Clough, with Adam Bell and William of Cloudesley, were noted outlaws, whose skill in archery rendered them as famous in the north of England as Robin Hood and Little John in the midland counties. Their place of resort was in Englewood Forest, near Carlisle, N.B.—Englewood means firewood. Cloyn of the Clough means Clement of the Cliff.

Clytie (3 syl.). A water-nymph, in love with Apollo. Meeting with no return, she was changed into a sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Cneoph. The name under which the Egyptians adore the Creator of the world.

Cnidian Venus (The). The exquisite statue of Venus or Aphrodite by Praxitéles, placed in the temple of Venus, at Cnidus.

Co. A contraction of company; as Smith and Co.

Coach (A). A private tutor. The term is a pun on getting on foot. To get on fast you take a coach; you cannot get on fast without a private tutor—ergo, a private tutor is the coach you take in order that you may get on quickly. (University slang.)

"The books . . . are expensive, and often a further expense is entailed by the necessity of securing a coach."—Stedman: Oxford, chap. x. p. 196.

To dine in the coach. In the captain's private room. The coach or couch of a ship is a small apartment near the stern, the floor being formed of the aftermost part of the quarter-deck, and the roof by the poop. A slow coach. A dull, unprogressive person, somewhat fossilised.

"What a dull, old-fashioned chap that boy is, but thou wert always a slow-coach."—Mrs. Gaskell: Cobbê's Marsh (Edn. 25).

Coach-and-four (or Coach-and-six). It is said one may drive a coach-and-four through an Act of Parliament, i.e. lawyers can always find for their clients some loophole of escape.

"It is easy to drive a coach-and-four with allies and settlements, and legal means."—R. H. Hurwood.

"[Rice] was often heard to say . . . that he would drive a coach and six horses through the Act of Settlement."—Wetmore.

Coach Away. Get on a little faster. Your coach drags; drive on faster.

Coach-up. Taught by a private tutor for examination. "Well coached up," well crammed or taught.

Coal. Hot as a coak. The expression has an obvious allusion.

To post the coal or cole. To pay or put down the cash. Coal = money has been in use in the sporting world for very many years. Buxton, in 1863, used the phrase "post the coal," and since then it has been in frequent use. Probably rhyming slang: "Coal," an imperfect rhyme of "gool" = gold. (See page 248, Carrey, and page 266, Cawley.)

"It would not suit me to write . . . even if they offered . . . to post the cole."—Hood.

Coal Brandy. Burnt brandy. The ancient way to set brandy on fire was to drop in it a live or red-hot coal.

Coal.

To blow the coals. To fan dissensions, to excite smouldering animosity into open hostility, as dull coals are blown into a blaze by a pair of bellows.

To carry coals. To be put upon. "Gregory, o my word, we'll not carry coals,—i.e. submit to be "put upon" (Romeo and Juliet, i. 1). So in Every Man out of his Humour, "Here comes one that will carry coals, rygo, will hold my dog." The allusion is to the dirty, laborious occupation of coal-carriers. Gifford, in his edition of Ben Jonson, says, "Of these (i.e. scullions, etc.), the most forlorn wretches were selected to carry coals to the kitchen, halls, etc." (See page 141, col. 1, Blackguard.)

To carry coals to Newcastle. To do what is superfluous. As Newcastle is the great coal-field, it would be quite superfluous to carry coals thither. The French say, "Porter de l'eau à la rivière" (to carry water to the river). There are numerous Latin equivalents: as, "To carry wood to the forests;" "Pons Alcino prodest" (See Alcino); "Notiaus Athenae forro" (See Notius); "Crocos in Catio forro" (See Crocos).

To haul over the coals. To bring to task for shortcomings; to scold. At one time the Jews were "bled" whenever the kings or barons wanted money; and one very common torture, if they resisted, was to haul them over the coals of a slow fire, to give them a "roasting." (See Iraunoe, where Front-de-Boeuf threatens to haul Isaac over the coals.)

Coals of fire. To heap coals of fire on the head of a foe. To melt down his animosity by deeds of kindness.

"If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat: and if he be thirsty, give him water to drink; for thou shalt heap coals of fire upon his head."—Psalms 21:21, 22.
Coaling, in theatrical slang, means telling phrases and speeches, as, "My part is full of 'coaling lines.'" Coal being money, means profit, whence coaling. (See p. 265, To Post the Coal...)

Coalition Government. A Government formed by various parties by a mutual surrender of principles. The administration of Lord North and Charles Fox, 1783, was a coalition, but it fell to pieces in a few months. That of Lord Salisbury with the old Whig party headed by Lord Harrington was a coalition (1886-1892).

Coast Clear. Is the coast clear? The coast is clear. There is no likelihood of interference. None of the coastguards are about.

Coast Men of Attica. The merchant class who lived along the coastlands (Par'ah).

Coasting Lead (A). A sounding lead used in shallow water.

Coasting Trade. Trade between parts of the same country carried on by coasting vessels.

Coasting Waiter. An officer of Customs in the Fort of London, whose duty it was to visit and make a return of coasting vessels trading from one part of the kingdom to another, and which (from the nature of their cargo) were not required to report or make entry at the Custom House. These vessels were liable to the payment of certain small duties, which it was the duty of the Coasting Waiter to exact. He was also expected to search the cargo, that no contraband goods were illicitly on board. Like Tide Waiters, these Coasting Waiters were abolished in the latter half of the nineteenth century, and their duties have since been performed by the Examining Officer. Their salary was about £40 a year.

Coat.
Cut your coat according to your cloth. Curtail your expenses to the amount of your income; live within your means.

'Nec possis quod velis, velis id quod possis.'

'Vestis mea est, sed magis est mea.'

"Tinea potito proprius est." "Ego proximus mihi." To haste one's coat. To dust his jacket; to beat him.

To wear the king's coat. To be a soldier.

"Turning one's coat for luck. It was an ancient superstition that this was a charm against evil spirits. (See Turncoat.)"

"William found A means for our deliverance: 'Turn your cloaks.' Quoth hee, 'for Pucke is busie in these noyse.'"

Bishop Corbet: Her Bufale.

Coat of Arms. A surcoat worn by knights over their armour, decorated with devices by which heralds described the wearer. Hence the heraldic device of a family. Coast-armour was invented in the Crusading expeditions, to distinguish the various noble warriors when wrapped in complete steel, and it was introduced into England by Richard Lion-heart.

Coat of many Colours (Gen. xxxvii. 3). Harmer, in his Observations (vol. ii. p. 386), informs us that "many colours" in this connection does not mean striped, flowered, embroidered, or "printed" with several colours, but having "divers pieces of different colours sewed together" in patchwork. The Hebrew word is pass chrom. In 2 Sam. xiii. 18 we are told that king's daughters wore a garment of many colours or divers picres. Dr. Adam Clarke says that similar garments "are worn by persons of distinction in Persia, India, and some parts of China to the present day." The great offence was this: Jacob was a sheik, and by giving Joseph a "prince's robe" he virtually announced him his heir. (See Divers Colours.)

Coats, Hosen, and Hats (Dan. iii. 21). These were not articles of dress, but badges of office. It will be recollected that Shadrach and his two companions had recently been set over provinces of Babylon; and Nebuchadnezzar degraded them by insisting on their wearing their insignia of office. The word cap would be better than "hat," their caps of office; and sandals would be better than "hosen." Coats or cloaks have always designated office. "Hosen" means what the Romans called calceus patricius, which were sandalled up to the calf of the leg. Every Latin scholar knows that calceus mutare means to "become a senator."

Cob (A). Between a pony and a horse in size, from thirteen to nearly fifteen hands high. The word means big, stout. The original meaning is a tuft or head, hence eminent, large, powerful. The "cob of the county" is the great boss thereof. A rich cob is a plutocrat. Hence also a male, as a cob-swan.

"Riding horses run between fifteen and sixteen hands in height, and carriage Cobalt. From the German Kobold (a gnome). The demon of mines. This metal was so called by miners, because it was long thought to be useless and troublesome. It was consequently attributed to the ill offices of the mine demon.

Cobbler. A drink made of wine (sherry), sugar, lemon, and ice. It is sipped up through a straw. (See Cobblers’ Punch.)

“This wonderful invention, sir, . . . is called cobbler—sherry cobbler, when you name it long; cobbler when you name it short.”—Dickens: Martin Chuzzlewit, xvii.

Cobbler. Let not the cobbler overstep his last (Ne sutor ultra crepidam). Let no one presume to interfere in matters of which he is ignorant. The tale goes that a cobbler detected a fault in the shoe-latchet of one of Apelles’ paintings, and the artist rectified the fault. The cobbler, thinking himself very wise, next ventured to criticise the legs; but Apelles answered, “Keep to your trade”—you understand about shoes, but not about anatomy.

Cobbler Poet (The). Hans Sachs of Nuremburg, prince of the mastersingers of Germany (1494-1571).

Cobbler’s Punch. Gin and water, with a little treacle and vinegar.

Cobbler’s Toast. School-boys’ bread and butter, toasted on the dry side and eaten hot.

Cobham, referred to by Thomson in his Autumn, was Sir Richard Temple, created Lord Cobham in 1714.

Cobnut. A nut with a tuft. (Welsh, cob or cop, a tuft; German, kopf, the head.)

Coburgia. A corded or ribbed cotton cloth made in Coburg (Saxony), or in imitation thereof. Chiefly used for ladies’ dresses.

Cobweb. Cob, Teutonic for “spider.” Dutch, spinnekop; Saxon, atter-cop (poisonous spider); Chaldee, kopi (spider’s web).

Cock. Mahomet found in the first heaven a cock of such enormous size that its crest touched the second heaven. The crowing of this celestial bird arouses every living creature from sleep except man. The Moslem doctors say that Allah lends a willing ear to him who reads the Koran, to him who prays for pardon, and to the cock whose chant is divine melody. When this cock ceases to crow, the day of judgment will be at hand.

Cock. Dedicated to Apollo, the sun-god, because it gives notice of the rising of the sun. It was dedicated to Mercury, because it summons men to business by its crowing. And to Esculapius, because “early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy.”

A cock on church spires is to remind men not to deny their Lord as Peter did, but when the cock crew he “went out and wept bitterly.” Peter Le Neve affirms that a cock was the warlike ensign of the Goths, and therefore used in Gothic churches for ornament.

Every cock crowes on its own dunghill, or Ilka cock crowes on his own mudden. It is easy to brag of your deeds in your own castle when safe from danger and not likely to be put to the proof.

Latin: Gallus in suo sterquilinio plurimum potest.

French: Chien sur son fourmier est hardi.

Spanish: Cada Gallina canta en su muladar.

Nourish a cock, but offer it not in sacrifice. This is the eighteenth Symbolic Saying in the Protreptics of Iamblichus. The cock was sacred to Minerva, and also to the Sun and Moon, and it would be impious to offer a sacrilegious offering to the gods. What is already consecrated to God cannot be employed in sacrifice.

That cock won’t fight. That dodge wouldn’t answer; that tale won’t wash. Of course, the allusion is to fighting cocks. A bet is made on a favourite cock, but when pitted he refuses to fight.

To cry cock. To claim the victory; to assert oneself to be the superior. As a cock of the walk is the chief or ruler of the whole walk, so to cry cock is to claim this cockslip.

Cook and Bottle. A public house sign, probably meaning that draught and bottled ale may be had on the premises. If so, the word “cock” would mean the tap.

Cock and Bull Story. A corruption of a courteous and bully story. The catch-pennies hawked about the streets are still called cocks—i.e. concocted things. Bully is the Danish bullen (exaggerated), our bull-rush (an exaggerated rush), bull-rag, etc.

Another etymology may be suggested:
Cock and Pie (By). We meet with cock’s bones, cock’s scownds, cock’s mother, cock’s body, cock’s passion, etc., where we can have no doubt that the word is a minced oath, and stands for the sacred name which should never be taken in vain. The Pie is the table or rule in the old Roman offices, showing how to find out the service for each day, called by the Greeks πίναρα (an index). The latter part of the oath is equivalent to “the Mass book.”

Cock and Pie (as a public-house sign) is probably “The Cock and Magpie.”

Cock of Hay (d.) or a haycock. A small heap of hay thrown up temporarily. (German, kocke; a heap of hay; Norwegian, kok, a heap.)

Cock of the North. The Duke of Gordon. So called on a monument erected to his honour at Fochabers, in Aberdeenshire. (Died 1836.)

Cock of the Walk. The dominant bully or master spirit. The place where barn-door fowls are fed is called the walk, and if there is more than one cock they will fight for the supremacy of this domain.

Cock-a-hoop or Cock-a-hoop. To sit cock-a-hoop. Boastful, defiant, like a game-cock with his house or crest erect; eagerly expectant. (French, cog a huppe.)

And having routed a whole troop, with victory was cock-a-hoop.

--Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Cock apiece. Set off as fast as you can run. A cock is a tap through which liquor runs. “To cock” is to walk lightly or nimbly.

“If storms be nigh then cock apiece,” says Tussor (1174).

Cockboat or Cockle Boat. A small boat made of a wicker frame, and covered with leather or oil-cloth. The Welsh fishers used to carry them on their backs. (Welsh, cuch; a boat; French, coche, a passage boat; Irish, coca; Italian, coca; Norwegian, kuy, a cockboat.)

French, coche, a passage boat; Irish, coca; Italian, coca; Norwegian, kuy, cockpit.

Cock-crow. The Hebrews divided the night into four watches: 1, The “beginning of the watches” or “even” (Lam. ii. 19); 2, “The middle watch” or “midnight” (Judg. vii. 19); 3, “The cock-crowing”; 4, “The morning watch” or “dawning” (Exod. xiv. 24).

“Ye know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, or at the cock-crowing, or in the morning.”—Mark xiii. 35.

* The Romans divided the night into sixteen parts, each one hour and a half, beginning at midnight. The third of these divisions (3 a.m.) they called gallicinium, the time when cocks begin to crow; the next was continuinum, when they ceased to crow; and fifth was dilicenum, dawn.

Probably the Romans sounded the hour on a trumpet (bugle) three times, and if so it would explain the diversity of the Gospels: “Before the cock crow” (John xiii. 38, Luke xxii. 34, and Matt. xxvi. 34); but “Before the cock crow twice” (Mark xiv. 30)—that is, before the “bugle” has finished sounding.

Apparitions vanish at cock crow. This is a Christian superstition, the cock being the watch-bird placed on church spires, and therefore sacred.

“The morning cock crew loud, And at the sound it [the Ghost] shrink in haste away, And vanished from our sight.”

--Shakespeare: Hamlet, l. 2.

Cock-eye. A squint. Cock-eyed, having a squint; cross-eyed. (Irish and Gaelic, caog, a squint; “caogahull,” squint-eyed.)

Cock-fighting was introduced into Britain by the Romans. It was a favourite sport both with the Greeks and with the Romans.

That beats cock-fighting. That is most improbable and extraordinary. The allusion is to the extravagant tales told of fighting-cocks.

“...he can only relieve his feelings by the frequent repetition, ‘Well, that beats cock-fighting!’”—Wright: Miscell.

To live like fighting-cocks. To live in luxury. Before game-cocks are pitted they are fed plentifully on the very best food.

Cock-horse. To ride-a-cock-horse. To sit astride a person’s foot or knee while he dances or tosses it up and down.

Cock Lane Ghost. A tale of terror without truth; an imaginary tale of Cock-pit. The judicial committee of the privy council is so called, because the council-room is built on the old cock-pit of Whitehall palace.

"Great consultations at the cockpit about battles, duels, victories, and what not."—Poor Robin's Almanack, 1780.

-Cock Sure is cocky sure—pertly confident. We call a self-confident, over-bearing prig a cocky fellow, from the barnyard despot; but Shakespeare employs the phrase in the sense of "sure as the cook of a firelock."

"We steer as in a cock. cock sure."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., ii. 1.

The French phrase is à coup sûr, as: "Nous réussissons à coup sûr," we are certain of success, "Cela est ainsi à coup sûr," etc., and the phrase "Sure as a gun," seem to favour the latter derivation.

Cock the Ears (To). To prick up the ears, or turn them as a horse does when he listens to a strange sound. Here "cock" means to turn, and seems to be connected with the Greek κυκλος, a circle, and the verb κυκλαμω.

Cock the Nose or Cock up the nose. To turn up the nose in contempt. (See Cock your EYE.)

Cock up your Head [foot, etc.]. Lift up, turn up your head or foot. The allusion is to cocking hay, i.e., lifting it into small heaps or into the hay-cart. (See Cock or Hay.)

Cock your Eye (To) is to shut one eye and look with the other; to glance at. A "cock-eye" is a squinting eye, and "cock-eyed" is having squinting eyes. In many phrases, cock means to turn. (See above).

Cock your Hat (To). To set your hat more on one side of the head than on the other; to look knowing and pert. Soldiers cock their caps over the left side to "look smart." (See COCKED Hat.)

Cockade. The men-servants of the military wear a small black cockade on their hat, the Hanoverian badge. The Stuart cockade was white. At the battle of Sherra-Muir, in the reign of George I., the English soldiers wore a black rossette in their hats. In the song of Sherra-Muir the English soldiers are called "the red-coat lad wi' black cockades." (French, coqarde; German, Glocke.)

In the British Army and Navy the cockade, since the Hanoverian accession, has been black.

AUSTRIAN cockade is black and yellow.

All sentry boxes and boundary posts are so painted. Ein schwarz-gelber was the nickname of an Austrian Imperialist in 1848.

BAVARIA, light blue and white are the royal colours.

BELGIUM, black, yellow, and red.

FRANCE (royal), the royal colour was white.

HANOVER, the cockade was black.

Black enters into all the German cockades.

RUSSIA, black and white are the royal colours.

RUSIA, green and white are the royal colours.

To mount the cockade. To become a soldier. From time immemorial the partisans of different leaders have adopted some emblem to show their party; in 1767 an authoritative regulation determined that every French soldier should wear a white cockade, and in 1782 the badge was restricted to the military. The phrase given above is common both to England and France.

Cockaigne (Land of). An imaginary land of idleness and luxury. The subject of a burlesque, probably "the earliest specimen of English poetry which we possess." London is generally so called, but Boileau applies the phrase to Paris. (See page 270, col. 2, COCKNEY.)

Allied to the German, kuchen, a cake. Scotland is called the "land of cakes"; there is the old French word cocagne, abundance. Compare Latin coqua, to cook, coquinaria, coquinas, etc.

* Ellis, in his Specimens of Early English Poets (1. 85-95), has printed at length an old French poem called "The Land of Cockaign" (thirteenth century), where "the houses were made of barley sugar and cakes, the streets were paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods for nothing."

Cockatrice (3 syl.). A monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon, and head of a cock. So called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death. In consequence of the crest with which the head is crowned, the creature is called a basilisk, from the Greek, basiliskos (a little king). Isaiah says, "The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice's den" (xi, 6), to signify that the most noxious animal should not hurt the most feeble of God's creatures.

Figuratively, it means an insidious, treacherous person bent on mischief.

"They will kill one another by the look, like cockatrice."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Cocked Hat. A hat with the brim turned, like that of a bishop, dean, etc. It is also applied to the chapeau brisé, and the military full-dress hat, pointed before and behind, and rising to a point at the crown, the chapeau à cornu. "Cock" in this phrase means to turn; cocked, turned up.

Knocked into a cocked hat. In the game of nine-pins, three pins were set up in the form of a triangle, and when all the pins except these three were knocked down, the set was technically said to be "knocked into a cocked hat." Hence, utterly out of all shape or plumb. A somewhat similar phrase is "Knocked into the middle of next week."

Cocked-hat Club (The). A club of the Society of Antiquaries. A cocked hat was always placed before the president when the club met.

There was another club so called in which the members, during club sitting, wore cocked hats.

Cocker. According to Cocker. All right, according to Cocker. According to established rules, according to what is correct. Edward Cocker (1631-1677) published an arithmetic which ran through sixty editions. The phrase, "According to Cocker," was popularised by Murphy in his farce called The Apprentice.

Cookie or Cooky. Rumpjious, overbearing, conceited, and dogmatical; like a little bantam cock.

Cockle Hat. A pilgrim's hat. Warburton says, as the chief places of devotion were beyond sea, or on the coasts, pilgrims used to put cockle-shells upon their hats, to indicate that they were pilgrims. Cockles are symbols of St. James, patron saint of Spain. Cockle = scallop, as in heraldry.

"And how shall I your true love know From many another one? Oh, by his cockle hat and staff, And by his sandal shoon."

Bensaw and Fletcher: The Friar of Oders Gray.

Cockie Shells. Favourite tokens worn by pilgrims in their hats. The polished side of the shell was scratched with some rude drawing of the "blessed Virgin," the Crucifixion, or some other subject connected with the pilgrimage. Being blessed by the priest, they were considered amulets against spiritual foes, and might be used as drinking vessels.

Cockles. To cry cockles. To be hanged; from the gurgling noise made in strangulation.

Cockles of the Heart. "To warm the cockles of one's heart," said of good wine. (Latin, cockeae cordis, the ventricles of the heart.)

"Fibra quem recta haste exterioribus in dextra ventriculo proxime subjecte oblique dextrosum ascendentes in basilica cordis terminantur, et eamnulla sua remota sive cockeae nervis inquit referent."—Lover: Tractatus de Corde, p. 55. (1605.)

Cockledemoy (A). An amusing rogue, a sort of Tyll Eulenspiegel. A character in Marston's comedy of The Dutch Courtesan. He cheats Mrs. Mulligrub, a vintner's wife, of a goblet and salmon.

Cockney. One born within sound of Bow-bells, London; one possessing London peculiarities of speech, etc.; one wholly ignorant of country sports, country life, farm animals, plants, and so on.

Camden says the Thames was once called "the Cockney."

The word has been spelt Cockney, Cockemey, Cooknell, etc., "Cocknell" would be a little cock. "Puer in deliciis matris nutritus," Anglice, a * kokney, a pampered child*. "Niax" means a nestling, as fievixixxixixix, and if this is the last syllable of "Cockney," it confirms the idea that the word means an infant gite.

Wedgwood suggests cocker (to fiddle), and says a cockerney or cockney is one pampered by city indulgence, in contradistinction to rustics hardened by outdoor work. (Dutch, kokkeler, to pamper; French, coqueliner, to dangle.)

Chambers in his Journal derives the word from a French poen of the thirteenth century, called The Land of Cocagne, where the houses were made of barley-sugar and cakes, the streets paved with pastry, and the shops supplied goods without requiring money in payment. The French, at a very early period, called the English cocagne men, i.e. bons vivants (beef and pudding men).

"Cry to it, uncle; as the cockney did to the eel, when she put them into the paste alive."—Shakespeare: Lear, ii. 4.

The king of cockneys. A master of the revels chosen by students of Lincoln's Inn on Childermans Day (Dec. 28th).

Cockney School. Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats; so called by Lockhart. (1817.)

"If I may be permitted to have the honour of christening it, it may be henceforth referred to by the designation of the 'Cockney School.'"—E. Blackwood's Magazine, Oct., 1817.

Cockpit of Europe. Belgium is so called because it has been the site of more European battles than any other country; for example, Oudenarde, Ramillies, Fontenoy, Fleurus, Jemmapes, Ligny, Quatre Bras, Waterloo.

Cookshy (A). A free fling or "shy" at something. The allusion is to the once popular Shrove-Tuesday sport of shying or casting stones or sticks at cocks. This sport is now superseded by pigeon-shooting, which is thought to be more aristocratic! but can hardly be deemed more humane.

Cookswain, or Coxswain [cox'n]. The swain or servant of the cook or boat, together with its crew. (Anglo-Saxon, swan or severn, a youth or servant, and cock, a boat.) (See COCK-BOAT.)

Cocktail. The New York World, 1891, tells us that this is an Aztec word, and that "the liquor was discovered by a Toltec noble, who sent it to the king by the hand of his daughter Xochitl. The king fell in love with the maiden, drank the liquor, and called them xoc-tl, a name perpetuated by the word cocktail.

Cocktail is an iced drink made of spirits mixed with bitters, sugar, and some aromatic flavouring. Champagne cocktail is champagne flavoured with Angostura bitters; soda cocktail is soda-water,, sugar, and bitters."

"Did ye ever try a brandy cocktail, Cornel?"—Thackeray: The Newcomes, xii.

Coeequivoces. At the coming of the Coeequivoces. That time coming, when every mystery shall be cleared up.

"That is one of the seven things," said the fairy Bedonebymyhead, "I am forbidden to tell till the coming of the 'Coeequivoces.'"—C. Kingsley: The Water Babies, chap. vi.

Coeytus [Ko-k'ytus]. One of the five rivers of hell. The word means the "river of lamentation." The unburied were doomed to wander about its banks for 100 years. (Greek, kókōs, to weep.)

"Coeytus, named of lamentation loud
Heard on the restful stream.
Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 370.

Codda. Codgers, Thackeray says, "The Cistercian lads call the poor brethren of the Charterhouse codda," adding, "but I know not wherefore." (Turkish, kudah, an old man or woman.) We say "Well, old boy," without referring to age.

"I say, do you know any of the old coddas...? Colonel Newcome is going to be a codd."—Twentieth Century, October, 1908, p. 569.

Codille (2 syl.). Triumph. A term in the game of Ombre. When one of the two opponents of Ombre has more tracks than Ombre, he is said to have won Codille, and takes all the stake that Ombre played for. Thus Belinda is said, in the Rape of the Lock, to have been "between the jaws of ruin and Codille.

She wins with the "king of hearts," and she wins codille.

Codlin's your Friend, not Short. (Duckens: Old Curiosity Shop, chap. xix.). Codlin had a shrewd suspicion that little Nell and her grandfather had absconded, and that a reward was offered for their discovery. So he tried to bespeak the goodwill of the little girl in the hope of making something of it.

"None of the speakers has much to say in actual hostility to Lord Salisbury's speech, but they all harp upon the theory that Codlin is the friend, not Short."—Newspaper paragraph, Oct. 18th, 1866.

Coehorns (2 syl.). Small howitzers of about 4½ inches calibre; so called from Baron van Coehorn, of Holland.

Connobites or Conobites (3 syl.). Monks who live in common, in contradistinction to the hermits or anchorites. (Greek, koinobios.)

Coeur de Lion. Richard I. of England; so called from the prodigies of personal valour performed by him in the Holy Land. (1157, 1189-1199.)

Louis VIII. of France, more frequently called Le Lion. (1187, 1223-1226.)

Boleslas I. of Poland, also called "The Intrepid." (960, 992-1025.)

Coffee. The Turkish word is Koubi, Kauvi or Kauve.

Gloria is coffee with a small glass of brandy in lieu of milk; all the following have more and more l’eau de vie; and the last is the “stirrup-cup.”

Coffin. A raised crust, like the lid of a basket. Hence Shakespeare speaks of a “custard coffin” (Taming of the Shrew, iv. 3). (Greek, κόφνος, a basket.) (See Mahomer’s COFFIN.)

“Of the paste a coffin will I tear.”
-Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, v. 2.

Coggeshall. A Coggeshall job. The saying is, that the Coggeshall folk wanted to divert the current of a stream, and fixed hurdles in the bed of it for the purpose. Another tale is that a mad dog bit a wheelbarrow, and the people, fearing it would go mad, chained it up in a shed. (See GOTHAM.)

Cogito, ergo sum. Descartes’ axiom. This is a petitio principii. “I think” can only prove this: that “I think.” And he might just as well infer from it the existence of thought as the existence of I. He is asked to prove the latter, and immediately assumes that it exists and does something, and then infers that it exists because it does something. Suppose I were asked to prove the existence of ice, and were to say, ice is cold, therefore there is such a thing as ice. Manifestly I first assume there is such a thing as ice, then ascribe to it an attribute, and then argue back that this attribute is the outcome of ice. This is not proof, but simply arguing in a circle.

Cohens (Stock Exchange term). The Turkish ‘69 loan, floated by the firm of that name.

Coif (1 syl.). The coif of the old serjeant-at-law was a relic of his ecclesiastical character. The original serjeants-at-law were clerical lawyers, and the coif is the representation of the tonsure.

Serjeants of the Coif. Serjeants-at-law (now abolished). (See above.)

Coiffe. Il est né coiffé. He is born with a silver spoon in his mouth; born tofortune. (See page 229, col. 2, CAUL.)

“Quelques enfants viennent au monde avec une peau... que l’on appelle un nom de coiffe; et que l’on croit être une marque de bonheur. Coiffé a donné lieu au proverbe François... il est né coiffé.”—Traité des Superstitions, 1674.

Coiffer to Saints Catherine. To remain an old maid. “St. Catherine is la patronne des filles à marier et des vieilles filles. Ce sont ces dernières qui restent ordinairement pour soigner les chapelles consacrées à la sainte, et qui sont chargées de sa toilette.” (Retaire le Gai: Encyclopédie des Proverbes Français.)

“II croit peut-être que je le regrette, que, de desespérer je vais coiffer St. Catherine. Ah! ah! mais non! moi aussi je veux me marier.”—La Masque (an opera).

Coin. Paid in his own coin. Tit for tat. “Par pari referre.”

Coin Money (7s). To make money with rapidity and ease.

“For the last four years... I literally coined money.”—F. Kemble: Residence in Georgia.

Coins.

British. Iron rings were used for money by the ancient Britons, and Segonax, a petty king under Cassivellanus, is the first whose head was impressed on the coin. Gold, silver, and copper coins were struck by Cunobelin.

The ROMANS introduced their own coins into the island.

The oldest ANGLO-SAXON coin was the sceatta (pl. sceattae), sixth century. In the reign of Ethelbert, King of Kent, money accounts were kept in pons, mancuses, shillings, and pence. One of the last being equal to about 3 pence of our money. 5 pence = one shilling, 30 shillings one mancus or mancus, and 40 one pound. Mancuses were in gold and silver also.

The NORMANS introduced pence with a cross so deeply impressed that the coin could be broken either into two or four parts, hence the terms half-pence and fourthings.

The Angel, a gold coin (7s. 6d.), was introduced by Edward IV., and had a figure of Michael slaying the dragon.

The Bawbee first came into use in the reign of James VI. of Scotland. (French, bailli, bailey, copper coin.)

The Cavalier (20s.) was a gold coin of the reign of Charles I.

The Crown (5s.) was first issued in 1558. Crowns and half-crowns are still in common circulation.

English Dollars (4s. 6d.) were introduced in 1798.

 Florins, a gold coin (6s.), were issued by Edward III.; but the silver florin (2s.) in 1849.

The Guinea (a gold coin = 21s.) was first issued in 1717; but a gold coin so-called, of the value of 30s., was issued in 1673, reduced in 1696 to 22s.

Our Sovereign was first issued in 1816, but there were coins so-called in the reigns of Henry L (worth 22s.), Edward VI. (from 24s. to 30s.).

Shillings of the present value date from 1663; pence made of bronze in 1862, but copper pence were coined in 1820, half-pence and farthings in 1865.

Coke. To cry coke. To cry peccavi; to ask for mercy. Rudimentary says "cokc" is the sound which cocks utter when they are beaten.

Coke upon Littleton. Tent and brandy.

"Another... sipping Coke upon Littleton, i.e. tent and brandy."—Nicholas: Illustrations of Literature (1748).

Colbronde or Colbrand. The Danish giant slain by Sir Guy of Warwick. By the death of this giant the land was delivered from Danish tribute.

"I am not Samson, nor Sir Guy, nor Colbrand, To mow 'em down before me."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., v. 4.

Colcannon. Potatoes and cabbage pounded together and then fried in butter (Irish). "Col" is cole or cale, i.e. cabbage.

"About 1774 Isaac Sparks, the Irish comedian, founded in Long Acre a Colcannon Club.—The Athenaeum, January 29th, 1873.

Cold as Charity. (See Charity.)

Cold-Bath Fields. So called from the cold baths established there by Mr. Bains, in 1897, for the cure of rhumatism, convulsions, and other nervous disorders.

Cold Blood. Done in cold blood. (French, sang froid.) Not in the heat of temper; deliberately, and with premeditation. The allusion is to the ancient notion that the blood grew hot and cold, and this difference of temperature ruled the temper.

Cold-blooded Animals. As a rule, all invertebrate animals, and all fishes and reptiles, are called cold-blooded, because the temperature of their blood is about equal to the medium in which they live.

Cold-blooded Persons. Those not easily excited; those whose passions are not easily roused; those whose circulation is sluggish.

Cold-chisel. (A.) A chisel of tempered steel for cutting cold metal.

Cold Drawn Oil. Castor oil, obtained by pressure in the cold.

Cold Pigeon. (A.) A message sent in place of a love-letter. The love-letter would have been a poulet (g.v.). A pigeon pie is called a dove-tart, and dove is symbolical of love. Pyramus says of Thisbe, "What dead, my dove?" A verbal message is "cold comfort" to a lover looking out for a letter.

Cold Pudding settles Love by giving the pains of indigestion, colic, etc.

Cold Shoulder. To show or give one the cold shoulder is to assume a distant manner towards a person, to indicate that you wish to cut his acquaintance. The reference is to a cold shoulder of mutton served to a stranger at dinner; there is not much of it, and even what is left is but moderato fare.

Cold Steel. The persuasion of cold steel is persuasion enforced at the point of the sword or bayonet.

Cold Water Ordeal. An ancient method of testing the guilt or innocence of the common sort of people. The accused, being tied under the arms, was thrown into a river. If he sank to the bottom, he was held to be guiltless, and drawn up by the cord; but if he floated, the water rejected him, because of his guilt.

Cold Without. An elliptical expression, meaning spirits mixed with cold water without sugar.

Coldbrand. (See Colbronde.)

Coldstream Guards. One of the three regiments of Foot Guards. It was originally under the command of Colonel Monk (1650-1660), and in January, 1690, marched under him from Coldstream in Berwickshire with the object of bringing back Charles II. to the throne.

Cole = money. (See Coal.)

Cole (King). A legendary British king, described as "a merry old soul" fond of his pipe, fond of his glass, and fond of his "fiddlers three." (Ky. Coal, i.)

Colemira (3 syl.). A poetical name for a cook; being, of course, compounded of coal and more.

"'Tould I,' he cried, 'express how broad a grace Adorns thy morning hands and wash'd face. Thou wouldst, Colomira, grant what I implore, And yield me love, or wash thy face no more.'

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, Act Eighth.

Colin Clout. A name which Spenser assumes in The Shepherd's Calendar, and in the pastoral entitled Colin Clout's Come Home Again, which represents his return from a visit to Sir Walter Raleigh, "the Shepherd of the Ocean."

Colin Tampon. The nickname of a Swiss, as John Bull is of an Englishman, Brother Jonathan of a North American, and Monsieur Crapaud of a Frenchman.
Collapse

Collapse. The scheme collapsed. Came to nothing. An inflated balloon is said to collapse when the gas has escaped and the sides fall together, or pucker into wrinkles. As a collapsed balloon will not mount, a collapsed scheme will not go off. (Latin, colapsus, collabcr, to fall or sink together.)

Collar.

Against the collar. Somewhat fatiguing. When a horse travels up-hill the collar distresses his neck, so foot-travellers often find the last mile or so "against the collar," or distressing. Authors of long books often find the last few pages wearisome and against the grain.

In collar. In harness. The allusion is to a horse's collar, which is put on when about to go to work.

Out of collar. Out of work, out of place. (See above.)

To slip the collar. To escape from restraint; to draw back from a task begun.

To work up to the collar. To work tooth and nail; not to shirk the work in hand. A horse that lets his collar lie loose on his neck without bearing on it does not draw the vehicle at all, but leaves another to do the real work.

"As regarded himself, the path lay plain. He must work up to the collar, hot and hard, leaving himself no time to feel the parts that were galled and wrung."—Mrs. Edwardes: A Gordon Girl, chap. 11.

Collar (verb). To collar one. To seize by the collar; to prig; to appropriate without leave.

To collar the cowl or coaf. To prig the money. (See COAL.)

Collar-day (adj). In royal levees, means that attendants are to wear all their insignia and decorations, such as medals, stars, ribbons, and orders. This is done on grand occasions by order of the Crown. The Queen's Collar-day is when she wears the Order of the Garter.

Collar of Armoiries (4 syl.) or Collar of Arms (4 syl.), given by her to her husband Alençon, was a fatal gift; so was the collar and veil of Eriphylé, wife of Amphiaros. (See FATAL GIFTS.)

Collar of Ss. A decoration restricted to the Lord Chief Justices of the Queen's Bench, the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the Lord Mayor of London, the Kings-of-Arms, the Heralds, the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the Sergeant Trumpeter. (Conyngham's Heraldry.) (See Ss.)

College Colours

Collectivists. Collectivism is the opposite of Individualism. In the latter system, everyone is to be his own master, and everything is to be free and in common. In the former system, government is to be the sole employer, the sole landlord, and the sole pay-master. Private property is to be abolished, competition to be stamped out; everyone must work for his living, and the State must find the work. Bellamy's novel of Looking Backward will give a pretty fair notion of what is meant by Collectivism. (See INDIVIDUALISTS.)

College (N. V.). Newgate prison. "To take one's final degree at New College" is to be hanged. "King's College" is King's Bench Prison, now called Queen's College. Prisoners are "colegiates." College is the Latin collegium, and has a very wide range, as, College of the Apostles, College of Physicians, College of Surgeons, Heralds' College, College of Justice, etc.; and on the Continent we have College of Foreign Affairs, College of War, College of Cardinals, etc.

College Colours.

Virgin Mary, and made offerings to her in a twisted cake, called a colyrya. (Greek, kollura, a little cake.)

Cellywobbles. The gripes, usually accompanied with sundry noises in the stomach. These noises are called the "borbarigmus." (The wobbling caused by a slight colic.)

Cologne. The three kings of Cologne. The three magi, called Gaspar, Melchior, and Baltasar. They are called by other names, but those given are the most generally accepted.

Colonic. One of the rabble leaders in Hudibras was Noel Perryn, or Ned Perry, an ostler, who loved bear-baiting, but was a very straight-laced Puritan of low morals.

Colophon. The end of a book. Colophon was a city of Ionia, the inhabitants of which were such excellent horsemen that they would turn the scale of battle to the side on which they fought; hence, the Greek phrase, To add a colophonian, means "to put a finishing stroke to any matter." (Strabo.) In the early times of printing, the statement containing the date, place, printer, and edition was given at the end of the book, and was called the colophon.

* Now called the "imprint."

"The volume was unimpaired...from title-page to colophon."—Scott: The Antiquary.

Coloquin'tida or Colocynth. Bitter-apple or colocynth. (Greek, kolokunthis.)

"The food that to him now is luxurious as locusts, shall be to him shortly as bitter as coloquin'tida."

—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Coloquin'tida (St.). Charles I. was so called. He was bitter as gall to the Levellers.

Colorado (U.S. America). A Spanish word meaning red, referring to the red hue of the water of the river.

Colossal. Gigantic. As a colossal scheme. (See below.)

Colossus or Colossos (Latin, colossus). A giant. The Rhodian Colossus was a gigantic statue of brass, 126 feet high, executed by Chares. It is said that ships could pass full sail under the logs of this statue, but the notion of a striding statue rose in the sixteenth century, and is due to Blaise du Vigenère, who was the first to give the chef d'œuvre of Chares this impossible position. The Comte de Caylus has demonstrated that the Apollo of Rhodes was never planted.

College Port. The worst species of red wine that can be manufactured and palmed off upon young men at college. (See Window's Port.)

"We all know what college port is like."—The Times.

Col'liberta. A sort of gipsy race in Poitou, Maine, and Aunou, similar to the Capods of Gascony and the Caguerux of Brittany. In feudal times a colibert was a serf partly free, but bound to certain services. (Latin, col-libertus, a fellow freedman.)

Colu'm~tiana. A religious sect which rose in the fourth century; so called from Colluthos of Alexandria, their founder.

Colly my Cow. A corruption of Calanias, the most ancient of Spanish ballads. Calanias the Moor asked a damsel to wife, who said the price of winning her should be the heads of the three paladins of Charlemagne, named Rinaldo, Roland, and Olivier. Calanias went to Paris and challenged the paladins. First Sir Baldwin, the youngest knight, accepted the challenge and was overthrown; then his uncle Roland went against the Moor and smote him.

Collyri'diana. A sect of Arabian Christians, chiefly women, which first appeared in 373. They worshipped the at the mouth of the Rhodian port, that it was not a striding statue, and that ships never passed under it. Neither Strabo nor Pliny makes mention of any of these things, though both describe the gigantic statue minutely. Philo (the architect of Byzantium, third century) has a treatise on the seven wonders of the world, and says that the Colossus stood on a block of white marble, and Lucius Ampelius, in a similar treatise, says it stood "in a court. Tirkell out-herods Herod in the following lines:

"So, near proud Rhodes, across the roaring flood, Stupendous form: the vast Colossus stood,
While at one foot the tempesting galley ran,
A woe, a woe! and the Oracle harken:
Beswixt her brazen thighs, in loose array,
Ten thousand streamers on the billows play."—On the Prospect of Rhodes.

"He doth besride the narrow world
Like a Colossus."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, i. 2.

"The twin Colossi of Amenophis III.
On the banks of the Nile, near Thebes, are seated.
The statue of Liberty, New York, is colossal.

Colour. (See Rank.)

Colour, Colours. A man of colour.
A negro, or, more strictly speaking, one with negro blood. (See Colours.)

"There are three great classes: (1) the pure whites; (2) the people of colour; (3) negroes and mulattos."—Edwards: St. Dominy, i.

Colours.
Accidental colours. Those colours seen on a white ground after looking for some time at a bright-coloured object, like the sun.

Complementary colours. Colours which, in combination, produce white light.

"The colour transmitted is always complementary to the one reflected."—Herschel: Optics, xii.

Fundamental colours. The seven colours of the spectrum: violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red. Or red, yellow, blue, also called primary or simple colours.

Secondary colours. Those which result from the mixture of two or more primary or simple colours.

Colours. He was with the colours. In active military service.
Colours

"The period... was raised from seven to nine years, five years being passed with the colours, and four in the reserve."—Edinburgh Review 1858.

His coward lips did from their colours fly. He was unable to speak. As cowards run away from their regimental colours, so Caesar's lips, when he was ill, ran away from their colour and turned pale.

To come out in his true colours. To reveal one's proper character, divested of all that is meretricious.

To describe [a matter] in very black colours. To see them with a jaundiced eye, and describe them accordingly; to describe [the matter] under the bias of strong prejudice.

To desert one's colours. To become a turncoat; to turn tail. The allusion is to the military flag.

To give colour or to give some plausible colour to the matter. To render the matter more plausible; to give it a more specious appearance.

To paint in bright colours. To see or describe things in couleur de rose. Also "to paint in lively colours."

To put a false colour on a matter. To misinterpret it, or put a false construction on it.

To see things in their true colours. To see them as they really are.

Under colour of. . . . Under pretence of. . . . under the alleged authority of. . . .

Wearing his colours. Taking his part; being strongly attached to one. The idea is from livery.

"Jim could always count on every man, woman, and child, wherever he lived, wearing his colours, and a little above ... through the... and thin..."

Bulwer-Lytton: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xii.

Without colour. "In nulδ veritate;" without disguise.

Switzerland. Red, with white cross.

Colours Nailed to the Mast (With our), a boat's crew. If the colours are nailed to the mast, they cannot be lowered to express submission.

"If they catch you at disadvantage, the mines for your life is the word; and we fight them with our colours nailed to the mast."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. xii.

Colt's-tooth. The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word "colt-iah" for skittish. Horses have at three years old the colt's tooth. The allusion is to the colt's teeth of animals, a period

Colour-blindness. Incapacity of discerning one colour from another. The term was introduced by Sir David Brewster. It is of three sorts: (1) inability to discern any colours, so that everything is either black or white, shade or light; (2) inability to distinguish between primary colours, as red, blue, and yellow; or secondary colours, as green, purple, and orange; and (3) inability to distinguish between such composite colours as browns, greys, and neutral tints. Except in this one respect, the colour-blind may have excellent vision.

Colour Sergeant. A sergeant who carries or has charge of the regimental colours.

Colour (verb). To colour up, to turn red in the face; to blush.

Coloured Frontispiece by Phiz (A). A blush.

Colporteur. A hawker or pedlar; so called because he carries his basket or pack round his neck. The term is more especially applied to hawkers of religious books. (Latin, column, the neck; porto, to carry.)

Colt (A). A piece of knotted rope eighteen inches long for the special benefit of ship boys; a cat-o'-nine-tails.

"Look alive there, lads, or as sure as my name is Sam Wesson I'll give the colt to the last man off the deck."—J. Grant: Dick Rodney, chap. vii.

Colt (A). A barrister who attends a sergeant-at-law at his induction.

"I accompanied the newly-made Chief Baron as his colt."—Punch.

"Then Mr. Bailey, his colt, delivered his ring to the Lord Chancellor."—Wycherley.

Colt (7ds). To befool, to gull. (Italian, colto, cheated, befuddled.)

Colt-pixy (A). A pixy, puck, or fairy. To colt-pixy is to take what belongs to the pixies, and is specially applied to the gleaning of apples after the crop has been gathered in; these apples were the privilege of the pixies, and to colt-pixy is to deprive the pixies of their prerogatives.

Colt's Revolver. A fire-arm which, by means of revolving barrels, can be fired several times without intermission. This instrument was patented by Colonel Samuel Colt, U.S., in 1835.

Colt's-tooth. The love of youthful pleasure. Chaucer uses the word "colt-iah" for skittish. Horses have at three years old the colt's tooth. The allusion is to the colt's teeth of animals, a period of their life when their passions are strongest.

"Her merry dancing-days are done;
The sun has set, and I warrant."
King : Orpheus and Eurydice.

"Well said, Lord Sandal;
Your cotte's-tongue is not cast yet."
Shakespeare : Henry VIII., 1. 3.

Columbine (3 syl.). The sweetheart of Harlequin, and, like him, supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. Colum-bina in Italian is a pet-name for a lady-love, and means a little dove, a young coquette.

Columbus. His signature was—

S. t.e. Servidor
S. A. S. Sus Altezas Sacras
X. M. Y. Jesus Maria Isabel
Xto. FERENS Christo-pher
El Almirante El Almirante.

In English, "Servant—of their Sacred Highnesses—Jesus Mary and Isabella—Christopher—the Admiral."

The second Columbus. Cyrus West Field was so called by John Bright when he completed the Atlantic Cable. Born at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, 1819.

Columbus of the Skies (The). Sir F. William Herschel, discoverer of Georgium Sidus (Uræus), 1738-1822.

Column.

The Alexandrine Column. Made of granite; in memory of the Emperor Alexander.

The Column of Antoninus. At Rome; made of marble, 176 feet high; in memory of the Emperor Marcus Aurelius Antoninus. Like that of Trajan, this column is covered externally with spiral bas-reliefs representing the wars carried on by the emperor.

Sixth of V. caused the original statue of this column to be supplanted by a figure of St. Paul. (See Trajan's Column.)

The Column of Arcadius. At Constantinople; made of marble.

Column at Boulogne. To commemorate the camp of Boulogne. This formidable array was intended for the invasion of England. England also girded herself for battle, and here the matter ended. The Column perpetuates the memory of this threat.

The Duke of York's Column. In London, at the top of the steps leading into St. James's Park. Erected in 1830-1833 in memory of Frederick, Duke of York, second son of George III., who died in 1827. It is of the Tuscan order, was designed by R. Wyatt, and is made of Aberdeenshire granite. On the summit is a statue of the duke by Sir R. Westmacott.

The Column of July. 1832, Paris; made of bronze, and erected on the spot where the Bastille stood, to commemorate the revolution of July, 1830, when Charles X. abdicated. It is surmounted with a statue of Liberty standing on one foot.

London's Column. (See Monument.)

Nelson's Column. In Trafalgar Square, London; was erected in 1843. The four lions, by Landseer, were added in 1857. The order of the Column is Corinthian, and the material Devonshire granite. The reliefs are (north side) the battle of the Nile, where Nelson was wounded; (south side) Nelson's death at the battle of Trafalgar; (east side) the bombardment of Copenhagen; and (west side) the battle of St. Vincent. The column is surmounted by a statue of Nelson by E. H. Baily.

The Column of the Place Vendôme. Paris, 1806-1810; made of bronze, and erected in honour of Napoleon I. The spiral outside represents in bas-relief the battles of Napoleon I., ending with Austerlitz in 1805. It is a facsimile of Trajan's Column.

In 1871 the statue of Napoleon, which surmounted this column, was hurled to the ground by the Communists, but in 1874 a statue of Liberty was substituted for the original one.

The Pompey's Column. In Egypt; made of marble.

Trajan's Column. At Rome; made of marble, a.d. 114, by Apollodorus. It is 132 feet in height, and has inside a spiral staircase of 185 steps, and 40 windows to let in light. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan, but Sixth of V. supplanted the original statue by that of St. Peter. The spiral outside represents in bas-reliefs the battles of the emperor.

Columns of Herculēs. Two large pyramidal columns set up by the Phcenicians as lighthouses and landmarks, dedicated, one to Herculēs (the sun), and the other to Astartê (the moon).

By the Greeks and Romans the two pyramidal mountains at the Straits of Gibraltar (Calpe and Abyla), the former in Europe and the latter in Africa, were termed the Pillars of Herculēs.

Coma Berenices (4 syl.). (See Berenice.)

Com'azants. Called St. Elmo fires by the French, Castor and Pollux by the Romans. A celestial light seen occasionally to play round mast-heads, etc.
(Latin, cóma, hair.) Virgil makes good use of this phenomenon while Æneas is hesitating whether to leave burning Troy or not:

"Ecce levis summo de vertice visus illú
Fundere tumen apex, tactique incensia mo-
Lambere Ænum cumas, et circurn tempora pael-Nos, pavidi trepidare notu, crinemque fragran-tem

Excipere, et sanctos restinque fontibus ignes."

When old Anchises interferes, and a falling star is interpreted to mean that Jupiter will lead them forth securely. (Æneid, ii. 682, etc.)

Comb.

A crabtree comb. A cudgel applied to the head. To smooth your hair with a crabtree comb, is to give the head a knock with a stick.

Reynard's wonderful comb. This comb existed only in the brain of Master Fox. He said it was made of the Pan'thora's bone, the perfume of which was so fragrant that no one could resist following it; and the wearer of the comb was always cheerful and merry. (Reynard the Fox, chap. ii.)

To comb one's head. To humiliate a person, or to give him a "set down."

"I'll carry you with me to my country box and keep you out of harm's way, till I find you a wife who will comb your head for you."—Bulwer Lytton: What will he do with it? iv. 16.

To comb your noddle with a three-legged stool (Taming of the Shrew, i. 1) is to beat you about the head with a stool. Many stools, such as those used by milkmaids, are still made with three legs; and these handy weapons seem to have been used at one time pretty freely, especially by angry women.

To cut one's comb. To take down a person's conceit. In allusion to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

To set up one's comb is to be cockish and vainglorious.

Comb the Cat (To). To run your fingers through the lashes of a cat's nine-tails to disentangle them.

Come and take Them. The reply of Leonídas, King of Sparta, to the messengers sent by Xerxes to Thermopylae. Xerxes said: "Go, and tell those madmen to deliver up their arms." Leonídas replied, "Go, and tell Xerxes to come and take them."

Come Ather (pron. ah-ther) means, when addressed to horses, "come hither"—i.e. to the left, the side on which the teamman walks. (See Woo'iser.)

Come Down a Peg. Humiliated; lowered in dignity, tone, demands, etc.

"Well, he has come down a peg or two, and he don't like it."—Hogarth.

A come down. Loss of prestige or position.

"Now I'm your worship's washerwoman." The dignitary coloured, and said that this was rather a come down. "Ah, Assa."

Come Down upon One (To). To reprove, to punish severely, to make a peremptory demand.

Come Home. Return to your house; to touch one's feelings or interest.

"No poetry was ever more human than Chauer's; none over came more generally: it came to its readers."—Green: Short History of the Eng-ish People, chap. v.

Come it. Has he come it? Has he lent the money? Has he hearkened to your request? Has he come over to your side? Also, "Out with it!"

Come it Strong. Lay it on thick; to exaggerate or overdo. (See Draw; It Mild.)

Come Lightly. Lightly come, lightly go. There is a somewhat similar Latin proverb, male parte, male dilabenter.

Come Of. What's to come of it? What's to come of him? A contracted form of become. To come of [a good stock] is to be descended from [a good family].

Come Off (To). To occur, to take place. (Anglo-Saxon, of-cumàn = Latin, pro-cedo, to proceed.)

To come off with honours is to proceed to the end successfully.

Come On! A challenge to fight with fists.

Come Out. Said of a young lady after she has been introduced at Court, or has entered into society as a "grown-up" person. She "comes out into society."

Come Over One (To). To wheedle one to do or give something. (Anglo-Saxon, of-cumàn, to overcome.) To come over one is in reality to conquer or get your own way.

Come Round. (See COMING, etc.).

Come Short (To). Not to be sufficient. "To come short of" means to miss or fail of attaining.

Come That, as, Can you come that? I can't come that. Here, "come" means to arrive at, to accomplish.

Come the Religious Dodge (To) means to ask or seek some favour under pretence of a religious motive. Here "come" means to come and introduce. (See DODGE.)
Come to. Amount to, to obtain possession. "It will not come to much."

Come to Grief (To). To fail, to prove a failure, as, "the undertaking (or company) came to grief," i.e. to a grievous end.

Come to Hand (It has). Been received. "Come into my hand." In Latin, ad manus (ad manus) pervenire.
"Your letter came to hand yesterday." — A. Trollope.

Come to Pass (To). To happen, to befall, to come about.
"What thou hast spoken is come to pass." — Jer. xxxii. 24.
"It came to pass (ἐγένετο) in those days that there went out a decree." — Luke ii. 1.

Come to an End. To terminate. The allusion is to travelling, when the traveller has come to the end of his journey.

Come to the Hammer. To be sold by auction.

Come to the Heath. To tip. A pun taken from the place called Tip-tree Heath, in Essex. Our forefathers, and the French too, delighted in these sort of puns. A great source of slang. (See CHIVY.)

Come to the Point. Speak out plainly what you want; do not beat about the bush, but state at once what you wish to say. The point is the gist or grit of a thing. Circumlocution is wandering round the point with words; to come to the point is to omit all needless speech, and bring all the straggling rays to a focus or point.

Come to the Scratch. (See SCRATCH.)

Come to the Worst. If the worst come to the worst; even if the very worst occurs.

Come Under (To). To fall under; to be classed under.

Come Up. Marry, come up! (See MARRY.) "To come up to" means to equal, to obtain the same number of marks, to amount to the same quantity.

Come Upon the Parish (To). To live in the workhouse; to be supported by the parish.

Come Yorkshire over One (To). To bamboozle one, to overreach one. Yorkshire has always been proverbial for shrewdness and sharp practice. "It's Yorkshire too" means, I am sure as you are, and am not to be taken in.

Comedy means a village-song (Greek, κυμη-όδες), referring to the village merrymakings, in which comic songs still take a conspicuous place. The Greeks had certain festal processions of great licentiousness, held in honour of Dionysos, in the suburbs of their cities, and termed ko'moi or village-revels. On these occasions an ode was generally sung, and this ode was the foundation of Greek comedy. (See TRAG. ERY.)

The Father of comedy. Aristoph'anes, the Athenian (b.c. 444-380).

Comes (2 syl.). A Latin military title, now called count on the continent of Europe, but earl in England from the Saxon earldorman (alderman), Danish eorl. The wife of an earl is called countess.

Comet Wine. A term of praise to signify wine of superior quality. A notion prevails that the grapes in comet years are better in flavour than in other years, either because the weather is warmer and ripens them better, or because the comets themselves exercise some chemical influence on them. Thus, wine of the years 1811, 1826, 1839, 1846, 1852, 1856, 1861, etc., have a reputation.

"The old gentleman yet nurses some few bottles of the famous comet year (i.e. 1811), emphatically called comet wine." — The Times.

Coming Round. He is coming round. Recovering from sickness; recovering from a fit of the sulkis; returning to friendship. Death is the end of life, and therefore recovering from "sickness nigh unto death" is coming back to health, or coming round the corner.

Command Night. In theatrical parlance, a night on which a certain play is performed by command of some person of authority or influence.

Commandment. The eleventh commandment. Thou shalt not be found out.
"After all, that Eleventh Commandment is the only one that vitally important to keep in these day's." — B. H. Burton, Jemine of the Prince's, iii. 31.

The ten commandments. The ten fingers or nails. (Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, i. 3.)

Comme il Faut (French, pronounce eem el fo), as it should be; quite proper; quite according to etiquette or rule.

Commemd. A living in Cm'md is a living held by a bishop till an incumbent is appointed. When a clergyman accepts a bishopric he loses all his previous preferment; but in Commemoration

Commemoration Ninepence. A bent silver ninepence, supposed to be lucky, and commonly used in the seven-teenth century as a love-token, the giver or sender using these words, “From my love, to my love.” Sometimes the coin was broken, and each kept a part.

“Like commemoration ninepence, crooked,
With ‘To and from my love,’ it looked.”

Butler: Hudibras, I, 1.

“Filbert: As this divides, thus are we torn in twain, Kitty: And as this meets, thus may we meet again.”

Gay: What d’ye Call It?

Commis-voyageur (A). A commercial traveller.

Committee. A committee of the whole house, in Parliamentary language, is when the Speaker leaves the chair and all the members form a committee, where anyone may speak once or more than once. In such cases the chair is occupied by the chairman of committees, elected with each new Parliament.

A standing committee, in Parliamentary language, is a committee which continues to the end of the current session. To this committee are referred all questions which fall within the scope of their appointment.

Committing Falsehood. Swindling.
The Earl of Rosebery pointed out that the expression “committing falsehood” in Scotch law was synonymous with what in England was called swindling (April 25th, 1885).

Commodity of Brown Paper (A). Rubbish served as make-weight; worthless stock; goods palmèd off on the inexperienced. In most auctions the buyer of a lot has a fair share of the commodity of brown paper. Rubbish given to supplement a loan.

“Here’s young Master Bash! he’s in for a commodi-ty of brown paper and old ginger, nine score and seventeen pounds [i.e. £9, a part of the advance being old ginger and brown paper].”—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, IV, 3.

Commodore. A corruption of “commander” (French, commandeur; Spanish, comendador). A naval officer in temporary command of a squadron or division of a fleet. He has the pay of a rear-admi.-ral.

Common Pleas. Civil actions at law brought by one subject against another—not by the Crown against a subject. The Court of Common Pleas is for the trial of civil (not capital) offences. In 1875 this court was abolished, and in 1880 it was represented by the Common Pleas Division and merged in the King’s (or Queen’s) Bench Division.

Common Sense does not mean that good sense which is common, or commonly needed in the ordinary affairs of life, but the sense which is common to all the five, or the point where the five senses meet, supposed to be the seat of the soul, where it judges what is presented by the senses, and decides the mode of action. (See SEVEN SENSES.)

Commoner. The Great Commoner.
1. Sir John Barnard, who, in 1737, proposed to reduce the interest of the national debt from 4 per cent. to 3 per cent., any creditor being at liberty to receive his principal in full if he preferred it. Mr. Goschen (1889-90) reduced the 3 per cents. to 24.
2. William Pitt, the statesman (1759-1806).

Commons. To put one on short commons. To stint him, to give him scanty meals. In the University of Cambridge the food provided for each student at breakfast is called his commons; hence food in general or meals.

To come into commons. To enter a society in which the members have a common or general dinner table.

Commons in Gross—that is, at large. These are commons granted to individuals and their heirs by deed, or claimed by prescription as by a parson or corporation.

Companion Ladder. The ladder leading from the poop to the main deck. The “companion way” is the staircase to the cabin. (Dana: Searman’s Manual.)

The staircase from the deck to the cabin.

Companions of Jehu. The Chozans were so called, from a fanciful analogy between their self-imposed task and that appointed to Jehu, on being set over the kingdom of Israel. Jehu was to cut off Ahab and Jezebel, with all their house, and all the priests of Baal. The Chouans were to cut off all who assassinated Louis XVI., and see that his brother (Jehu) was placed on the throne.

Comparisons are Odorous. So says Dogberry. (Much Ado About Nothing, iii. 5.)

"We own your verses are melodious,
But then comparisons are odious."
Swift: Answer to Sheridan's "Smiles."

Complementary Colours. (See Colours.)

Complexion literally means "what embraces or contains," and the idea implies that the colour of the skin corresponds to the habit of body, and the habit of body answers to the element which predominates. If fire predominates, the person is bilious or full of bile; if air, he is sanguine or full of blood; if earth, the body is melancholic or full of black bile; if water, it is phlegmatic or full of phlegm. The first is hot and dry, the second hot and moist, the third cold and dry, and the last moist and cold like water.

"'Tis ill the different our complexions are (i.e. dispositions)."
Dryden.
"Creatas through mere complexion lies."
Put: Hymn of Gallinanus.

Comp'line (2 syl.) The last service of the day in the Roman Catholic Church. First appointed by the abbot Benedict in the sixth century. The word is a corruption of comple'tiorum. In ecclesiastical Latin vesperinus, from vespere, means evening service, and comple'tinus is formed on the same model.

Compostella. A corruption of Gia-conmo-posto-lo (James the Apostle). So called after his relics were transferred thither from Iria Flavia (El Padron) on the borders of Galicia, in the ninth century. Leo III. transferred the See of Iria Flavia to Compostella. (Somewhere between 810 and 816.)

Compte rendu. The account already sent; the account of particulars delivered; a report of proceedings.

Com'tade (2 syl.). The name of Fortunio's fairy horse. It ate but once a week; knew the past, present, and future; and spoke with the voice of a man. (Grinnin's Goblins: Fortunio.) (See Horse.)

Com'tades (2 syl.). Those who sleep in the same bed-chamber. It is a Spanish military term derived from the custom of dividing soldiers into chambers. The proper spelling is camarade, men of the same camera (chamber).

Comus. God of revelry. Milton represents him as a male Circe. (Greek, koonos, carousel.)

"This nymph [Circe], that gazed upon his [Bacchus's] clustering locks, Had by him, ere he parted thence, a son, Much like his father, but his mother more, Whom therefore she brought up, and Comus named."
Milton: Comus, 54-58.

Comus. The elder brother in this domestic drama is meant for Lord Viscount Brackley, eldest son of John, Earl of Bridgewater, president of Wales. The younger brother is Mr. Thomas Egerton. The lady is Lady Alice Egerton. (Milton.)

Comus's Court. A social gathering formerly held at the Half-Moon Tavern in Cheapside, London.

Con Amo're (Italian). With heart and soul; as, "He did it con amore"—i.e. lovingly, with delight, and therefore in good earnest.

Con Commodo (Italian). At a convenient rate. A musical term.

Con Spirito (Italian). With quickness and vivacity. A musical term.

Conan. The Thersi'tes of "Fingal;" brave even to rashness.

Blow for blow or claw for claw, as Conan said. Conan made a vow never to take a blow without returning it; when he descended into the infernal regions, the arch-fiend gave him a cuff, which Conan instantly returned, saying "Claw for claw."

"1 Blow for blow," as Conan said to the devil."—Scott: Waverley, Chap. xxii.

Concert Pitch. The degree of sharpness or flatness adopted by a number of musicians acting in concert, that all the instruments may be in accord. Generally, a particular note is selected for the standard, as A or C; this note is put into the proper pitch, and all other notes are regulated by it.

Concerto (Italian). A composition intended to display the powers of some particular instrument, with orchestral accompaniments.

Con'clerge (3 syl.). French. The door-keeper of a public or private "hotel," or house divided into flats, or of a prison.

Conciergerie. (French.) The office or room of a concierge or porter's lodge; a state prison. During the Revolution it was the prison where the chief victims were confined prior to execution.
Conclave (2 syl.). A set of rooms, all of which are entered by one common key (Latin, con clave). The word is applied to the little deal cells erected in some large apartment for the cardinals who meet to choose a new Pope, because the long gallery of the Vatican between the cells and the windows of the palace is common ground to all the conclaveists. The assembly itself is, by a figure of speech, also called a conclave.

Conclamatio, amongst the ancient Romans, was similar to the Irish howl over the dead; and, as in Ireland, women led the funeral cortège, weeping ostentatiously and gesticulating. “One not howled over” (corpus non iam conclamatum) meant one at the point of death; and ‘one howled for’ was one given up for dead or really deceased. Virgil tells us that the ululation was a Phœnician custom; and therefore he makes the palace ring with howls when Dido burnt herself to death.

Conclamatum est. He is dead past all hope. The sense of hearing is generally the last to fail in the hour of death, hence the Romans were accustomed to call on the deceased three times by name, and if no indication of hearing was shown death was considered certain. Conclamatum est, he has been called and shows no sign.

Concord is Strength. The wise saw of Periander, “tyrant” of Corinth (b.c. 663-585).

Concor'dat. An agreement made between a ruler and the Pope relative to the collation of benefices. As the Concordat of 1801 between Napoleon Bonaparte and Pope Pius VII.; the Concordat of 1516 between Francois I. and Pope Leo X. to abolish the “pragmatic sanction”; and the (Germanic) Concordat of 1448 between Frederick III. and Pope Nicholas V.

Condign. Latin, condignus (well worthy); as condign punishment—i.e. punishment well deserved.

“In thy condign praise.”
Shakespeare: Love’s Labour’s Lost, i. 2.

Condottie’ri. Leaders of military adventurers in the fifteenth century. The most noted of these brigand leaders in Italy were Guarnizio’ri, Lando, Francesco of Carmagnola, and Francesco Sforza. Giacomo Sforza, the son of Francesco, married the daughter of the Duke of Milan, and succeeded his father-in-law. The singular is Condottière (5 syl.).

Conf'derate States. The eleven States which revolted from the Union in the late American Civil War (1861-1866)—viz. Georgia, North and South Carolina, Virginia, Tennessee, Alabama, Louisi’sa, Ark’an’sas, Mississip’pi, and Flor’ida and Texas.

Confederation of the Rhine. Sixteen German provinces in 1806 dissolved their connection with Germany, and allied themselves with France. At the downfall of Napoleon in 1814 this confederation melted away of itself.

Confession. John of Nepomuc, canon of Prague, suffered death rather than violate the seal of confession. The Emperor Wenceslas ordered him to be thrown off a bridge into the Moldau, because he refused to reveal the confession of the empress. He was canonized as St. John Nepomuc’en.

Confiscate (3 syl.). To forfeit to the public treasury. (Latin, con fisura, with the tribute money.)

“Et thou dost shed one drop of Christian blood, Thy lands and goods are by the laws of Venice, Confiscate to the State of Venice.”
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Confusion Worse Confounded. Disorder made worse than before.

“With ruin upon ruin, rout on rout, Confusion worse confounded.”
Miller: Paradise Lost, i. line 906.

Congé. “To give a person his congé” is to dismiss him from your service. “To take one’s congé” is to give notice to friends of your departure. This is done by leaving a card at the friend’s house with the letters P.P.C. (pour prendre congé) inscribed on the left-hand corner. (French, donner congé and donner à son congé.)

Congé d’Elle (Norman-French, leave to elect). A royal warrant given to the dean and chapter of a diocese to elect the person nominated by the Crown to their vacant see.

Congleton Bears. The men of Congleton. It is said that the Congleton parish clerk sold the church Bible to buy a bear.

Congrega’ctionalists. Those Protestant Dissenters who maintain that each congregation is an independent community, and has a right to make its own laws and choose its own minister. They rose in the time of Queen Elizab’eth.

Congreves. A predecessor of Lucifer matches. The splints were first dipped in sulphur, and then tipped with the chlorate of potash paste, in which gum was substituted for sugar, and there was added a small quantity of sulphide of antimony. The match was ignited by being drawn through a fold of sandpaper with pressure. These matches, being dangerous, were prohibited in France and Germany. (See HOMEHEANS; LUCIFERS.)

Conjugal. What pertains to conjugés (yoke-fellows). In ancient times a yoke (jugum) was put on a man and woman by way of marriage ceremony, and the two were said to be yoked together by marriage.

Conjuring Cap. I must put on my conjuring cap—i.e. your question requires deliberate thought, and I must reflect on it. Eric XIV., King of Sweden, was a great admirer of magic, and had an "enchanted cap" made, either to keep his head warm or for mystification. He pretended to have power over the elements; and when a storm arose, his subjects used to say "The king has got out on his conjuring cap."

Connecticut. U.S. America, is the Indian Quin-neh-tuk-gut, meaning "land of the long tidal river."

Connubials de Mulchbre feot Apellem. Love turned a blacksmith into a great artist. Said of Quentin Matsys, the blacksmith of Antwerp, who was in love with an artist's daughter. The father scorned the alliance, and said he should not be accepted unless he made himself a worthy artist. This did Matsys and won his bride. The sentence may be seen still on the monument of Quentin Matsys outside Antwerp cathedral.

Conqueror. The Conqueror.
Alexander the Great. The conqueror of the world. (A.C. 356, 356-323.)
Alfonso of Portugal. (1094, 1137-1185.)
Aurungzebe the Great. Alcinger. The most powerful of the great Moguls. (1618, 1659-1707.)
James I. of Aragon. (1266, 1213-1276.)
Othman or Osman I. Founder of the Turkish power. (1259, 1299-1328.)
Francisco Pizarro, Conquistador. So called because he conquered Peru. (1476-1541.)
William, Duke of Normandy. So called because he obtained England by conquest. (1027, 1066-1087.)

Conqueror's Nose (A). A prominent straight nose, rising at the bridge. Charlemagne had such a nose, so had Henry the Fowler (Heinrich I. of Germany); Rudolf I. of Germany; Friedrich I. of Hohenzollern, famous for reducing to order his unruly barons by blowing up their castles (1382-1440); our own "Iron Duke;" Bismarck, the iron Chancellor of Prussia; etc.

Conquest (The). The accession of William I. to the crown of England. So called because his reign depended on his conquest of Harold, the reigning king. (1066.)

Conrad (Lord). Afterwards called Lara, the corsair. A proud, ascetic, but successful captain. Hearing that the Sultan Seyd was about to attack the pirates, Conrad assumed the disguise of a dervish and entered the palace, while his crew set fire to the sultan's fleet. The trick being discovered, Conrad was taken prisoner, but was released by Gulnare, the sultan's favourite concubine, whom he had rescued from the flaming palace. Gulnare escaped with the corsair to the Pirates' Isle, and when Conrad found Medora dead, he left the island, and no one knew whither he went. The rest of his adventures are recorded under his new name of Lara. (Byron: The Corsair.)

Conscience. Have you the conscience to [demand such a price]. Can your conscience allow you to [demand such a price]. Conscience is the secret monitor within man which accuses or excuses him, as he does what he thinks to be wrong or right.

In all conscience. As, "And enough too, in all conscience." Meaning that the demand made is as much as conscience would tolerate without accusing the person of actual dishonesty; to the verge of that fine line which separates honesty from dishonesty.

My conscience! An oath. I swear by my conscience.

Court of Conscience. Established for the recovery of small debts in London and other trading places. These courts have been superseded by county courts.

"Why should not Conscience have vacation, As well as other courts of the nation?" Butler: Hudibras, ii. 2.
Conscience Clause (A). A clause in an Act of Parliament to relieve persons with conscientious scruples from certain requirements in it.

Conscience Money. Money paid anonymously to Government by persons who have defrauded the revenue. Their conscience being uneasy, they send the deficit to the Treasury, and the sum is advertised in the Gazette.

Conscript Fathers. In Latin, Patres Conscriptri. The Roman senate. Romulus instituted a senate consisting of a hundred elders, called Patres (Fathers). After the Sabines joined the State, another hundred were added. Tarquinus Friscus, the fifth king, added a third hundred, called Patres Minimi Centum. When Tarquinus Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was banished, several of the senate followed him, and the vacancies were filled up by Junius Brutus, the first consul. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial register, and called Conscripti; the entire body was then addressed as Patres [et] Conscriptri or Patres, Conscriptri.

Consenitates Dil. The twelve chief Roman deities—Jupiter, Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Mercury, and Vulcan.

Junus, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, and Venus. Ennius puts them into two hexameter verses:

"Junus, Vesta, Minerva, Ceres, Diana, Venus, Mars, Mercurius, Jovis, Neptunus, Vulcanus, Apollo."

"Called "consentes," says Varro,

Consenting Stars. Stars forming configurations for good or evil. In Judges v. 20 we read that "the stars in their courses fought against Sisera," i.e. formed unlucky or malignant configurations.

"... Scourge the bad revolting stars
That have consented unto Henry's death."—Shakespeare: Henry VI., i. 1.

Conservative (4 syl). A medium Tory—one who wishes to preserve the union of Church and State, and not radically to alter the constitution. The word was first used in this sense in 1839, in the January number of the Quarterly Review—"We have always been conscientiously attached to what is called the Tory, and which might with more propriety be called the Conservative party." (p. 276).

Canning, ten years previously, had used the word in a speech delivered at Liverpool in March, 1820. In Lord Salisbury's Ministry those Whigs and Radicals who joined the Conservatives were called "Liberal Unionists" because they objected to give Ireland a separate parliament (1885).

Consistory (A). An ecclesiastical court. In Rome it consists of the cardinals, presided over by the Pope. In England it is a diocesan court, presided over by the chancellor of the diocese.

Consolidated Fund (The). In 1757 an Act was passed for consolidating the nine loans bearing different interests, into one common loan bearing an interest of three per cent. In 1890 this interest was reduced to two and three-quarter per cent.; and in 1903 will be still further reduced to two and a-half per cent. This fund is pledged for the payment of the interest of the national debt, the civil list, the salaries of the judges, ambassadors, and other high officials, etc.

Consols. A contraction of Consolidated Fund. (See above.)

Consort is properly, one whose lot is cast in with another. As the Queen does not lose by marriage her separate existence, like other women, her husband is called a consort, because he consorts with the Queen, but does not share her sovereignty.

"Wilt thou be our consort?"—Shakespeare: Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 1.

Conspirators. Members of a commercial ring or corner. (See Corner, Trusts.) These merchants "conspire" to fix the price of articles, and make the public bleed ad libitum. In criminal law it means persons who league together to do something unlawful.

Constable (Latin, comites-stabulorum) means "Master of the Horse." The constable of England and France was at one time a military officer of state, next in rank to the crown.

To overrun or outrun the constable. To get into debt; spend more than one's income; to talk about what you do not understand. (See below.)

"Quoth Hallam, Friend Ralph, thou hast outrun the constable at last;
For thou hast fallen on a new Dispute, as seniles at utrum,"

Butler: Hudibras, I. 2.

Who's to pay the constable? Who is to pay the score?

The constable arrests debtors, and, of course, represents the creditor; wherefore, to overrun the constable is to overrun your credit account. To pay the constable is to give him the money due, to prevent an arrest.

Constable de Bourbon. Charles,
Duc de Bourbon, a powerful enemy of François 1. He was killed while heading the assault on Rome. (1527.)

Constantine Tolman (Cornwall).
A vast egg-like stone, thirty-three feet in length, eighteen in width, and fourteen in thickness, placed on the points of two natural rocks, so that a man may creep under it. The stone upheld weighs 750 tons.

Constantine's Cross. In Latin,
vincit in hoc; in English, by this conquer. It is said that Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, in the shape and with the motto here given. In the night before the battle of Saxa Rubra a vision appeared to him in his sleep, commanding him to inscribe the cross and the motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice of the vision, and prevailed.
The monogram is ΧΡΩΤΟΣ (Christ). (See Gibbon: Decline and Fall, chap. xix. n.)

This may be called a standing miracle in legendary history: for, besides Andrew's cross, and the Dannebrog or red cross of Denmark (q.v.), we have the cross which appeared to Don Alonzo before the battle of Ourique in 1139, when the Moors were totally routed with incrédible slaughter. As Alonzo was drawing up his men, the figure of a cross appeared in the eastern sky, and Christ, suspended on the cross, promised the Christian king a complete victory. This legend is commemorated by the device assumed by Alonzo, in a field argent five ecchecions azure, in the form of a cross, each ecchecion being charged with five bezants, in memory of the five wounds of Christ. (See Labiabum.)

Constituent Assembly. The first of the national assemblies of the French Revolution; so called because it took an oath never to separate till it had given to France a constitution. (1788-1791.)

Constituents. Those who constitute or elect members of Parliament. (Latin, constituere, to place or elect, etc.)

Constitution. The fundamental laws of a state. It may be either despotic, aristocratic, democratic, or mixed.

To give a nation a constitution is to give it fixed laws even to the limitation of the sovereign's rights, so that the people are not under the arbitrary capsice of a ruler, but under a known code of laws. A despotism or autocracy is solely under the unrestricted will of the despot or autocrat.

Constitutions of Clarendon. (See Clarendon.)

Apostolic Constitutions. A "Catholic" code of both doctrine and discipline collected by Clemens Romæus. The word "Apostolic," as in the "Apostles' Creed," does not mean made by the Apostles, but what the "Church" considered to be in accordance with apotolic teaching.

Construe. To translate. To translate into English means to set an English word in the place of a foreign word, and to put the whole sentence in good grammatical order. (Latin, construe, to construct.)

Conusolo (4 syl.). The impersonation of moral purity in the midst of temptations. The heroine of George Sand's (Mad. Dudefaut's) novel of the same name.

Contango. The sum paid by a speculator on a "bull account" (i.e. a speculation on the rise in the price of certain stock), to defer completing the bargain till the next settling day. (See Backwardation.)

Contemplate (3 syl.). To inspect or watch the temple. The augur among the Romans, having taken his stand on the Capitoline Hill, marked out with his wand the space in the heavens he intended to consult. This space he called the temple. Having divided his temple into two parts from top to bottom, he watched to see what would occur; the watching of the temple was called contemplating.

Contempt of Court. Refusing to conform to the rules of the law courts.
Consequential contempt is that which tends to obstruct the business or lower the dignity of the court by indication.
Direct contempt is an open insult or resistance to the judge or others officially employed in the court.

Contenement. A word used in Magna Charta, meaning the lands and chattels connected with a tenement;
also whatever besits the social position of a person, as the arms of a gentleman, the merchandise of a trader, the plough and wagons of a peasant, etc.

"in every case the contenement (a word expres of chastity necessary to each man's station) was exempted from seizure." — HALLAM: Middle Ages, part II, chap. VIII, p. 342.

Contenement is true Riches. The wise saw of Democritus, the laughing philosopher. (B.C. 509-400.)

"Content is wealth, the riches of the mind; And happy he who can such riches find." — Dryden: Wife of Bath's Tale.

Contests of Warburg (The), sometimes called The Battle of the Minstrels. An annual contest held in Warburg, in Saxe Weimar, for a prize given by Hermann, Margrave of Thuringia, for the best poem. About 150 specimens of these poems are still extant, by far the best being those of Walter of Vogelweide, in Thuringia (1168-1230). The poem called The Contest of Warburg is by Wolfraam, a minnesinger. It records the contests of the two great German schools of poetry in the thirteenth century—the Thuringian and the Suabian. Henry of Vogelweide and Henry of Ottertingen represent the two schools.

Continence of a Scipio. It is said that a beautiful princess fell into the hands of Scipio Africanus, and he refused to see her, "lest he should be tempted to forget his principles." The same is said of Cyrus (see Panthina), of Anson (see Themis), and of Alexander.

Continental System. A name given to Napoleon's plan for shutting out Great Britain from all commerce with the continent of Europe. He forbade under pain of war any nation of Europe to receive British exports, or to send imports to any of the British dominions. It began Nov. 21st, 1806.

Contin'gont (A). The quota of troops furnished by each of several contracting powers, according to agreement. The word properly means the number which falls to the lot of each; hence we call a fortuitous event a contingency.

Contra bonus Mores (Latin). Not in accordance with good manners; not commone il faut (q.v.).

Contrtemps (French). A mischance, something inopportune. Literally, "out of time."

Conventicle means a "little convent," and was originally applied to a cabal of monks against the election of a proposed abbot. It now means a religious meeting of dissenters. (Latin, conventus, an assembly, with a diminutive.) (See Chapel.)

Conversation Sharp. Richard Sharp, F.R.S., the critic. (1750-1835.)

Convey. A polite term for steal. Thieves are, by a similar euphemism, called conveyers. (Latin, con-veho, to carry away.)

"Convey, the wise it call. Steal! soft is a face for the phrase." — Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, I. 3.

Conveyers. Thieves. (See above.)

"Bollingbroke. 'Go, some of you, convey him to the Tower.'

Rich. II. 'O, good! 'Convey.' Conveyers are ye all, That rise thus nimbly by a true king's fall.'

Shakespeare: Richard II., iv. 4.

Conway Cabal (The), 1777. A faction organised to place General Gates at the head of the American army. He conquered Burgoyne, October, 1777, at Saratoga, and hoped to supplant Washington. The Conway referred to is the town in New Brunswick, North America, where the cabal was formed.

(General Gates was conquered in 1776 by Lord Cornwallis.)

Conyger or Conig'ry. A warren for conies, a cony-burrow.

Cooking and Billing, like Philip and Mary on a shilling. The reference is to coins struck in the year 1655, in which Mary and her consort are placed face to face, and not cheek by jowl, the usual way.

"Still amorous, and fond, and willing,
Like Philip and Mary on a shilling." — Hudibras, part II, 1.

Cook your Goose. (See Goose.)

Cooked. The books have been cooked. The ledger and other trade books have been tampered with, in order to show a balance in favour of the bankrupt. The term was first used in reference to George Hudson, the railway king, under whose chairmanship the Eastern Counties Railway accounts were falsified. The allusion is to preparing meat for table.

Cooking.

Terms belonging to cuisine applied to man under different circumstances:

Sometimes he is well basted; he boils with rage, is baked with heat, and burns with love or jealousy. Sometimes he is buttered and well buttered; he is often cut up, devoured with a flame, and done brown. We dress his jacket for him; sometimes he is eaten up with care; sometimes he is fried. We cook his goose for him, and sometimes he makes a goose of himself.

We make a hash of him, and at times he makes a hash of something else. He gets into hot water, and sometimes into a mess. If made into mincemeat, makes mincemeat of his money, and is often in a pickle. We are often asked to toast him, sometimes he gets well roasted, is sometimes set on fire, put into a stew, or is in a new no one knows why. A “soft” is half-baked, one severely handled is well peppered, to falsify accounts is to salt them, wit is littie salt, and an exagerrated statement must be taken cum grano salis. A pet young person is a sauce box, a shy lover is a dragon, a rich father has to frown out, and is sometimes dished of his money.

ii. Connected with foods and drinks.

A conceited man does not think small. Beer (or small potatoes) of himself, and our mouth is called a potato-trap. A simpleton is a cake, a gudgeon, and a pigeon. Some are cool as a cucumber, others hot as a quail. A chunky child is a little dumpling. A man or woman may be a cheese or duck. A courteous is called a mutton, and a large coarse hand is a mutton flat. A greedy person is a pig, a fat one is a sausage, and a shy one, if not a sheep, is certainly sheepish; while a Lubin casts sheep’s eyes at his lady-love. A coward is chicken-hearted, a fat person is cummony, and a cross one is cranky, while an aristocrat belongs to the upper crust of society. A yeoman of the guards is a beef-eater, a soldier a vol herring, a policeman a lobster, and a stingy, ill-tempered old man is a crab. A walking advertiser between two boards is a sandwich. An alderman in his chair is a turkey hung with sausages. Two persons resembling each other are like as two peas. A clut is a mere sprat, a delicate maiden a tit-bit, and a colorless countenance is called a whey-face. “How now? Where got ye that whey-face?”

Cooked. Athenaus affirms that cooks were the first kings of the earth.

In the luxurious ages of ancient Greek Sicilian cooks were most esteemed, and received very high wages. Among them Trimalchio was very celebrated. It is said that he could cook the most common fish, and give it the flavour and look of the most highly esteemed.

In the palmy days of Rome a chief cook had £800 a year. Antony gave the cook who arranged his banquet for Cleopatra the present of a city.

Modern Cooks.

CAREME. Called the “Regenerator of Cookery” (1784-1833).

FRANCATELLI (Charles Elmi), who succeeded Ude at Crockford’s. Afterwards he was appointed to the Royal household, and lastly to the Reform Club (1805-1876).

SOYER (Alexis), who died 1858. His epitaph is Soyé tranquille.

UDE. The most learned of modern cooks, author of Science de Cuisiner, it was Ude who said, “A cook must be born a cook, he cannot be made.” Another of his sayings is this: “Music, dancing, fencing, painting, and mechanisms possess professors under the age of twenty years, but they commence in cookery can never be attained under thirty years of age.” Ude was chef to Louis XIV., then to Lord Sefton, then to the Duke of York, then to Crockford’s Club. He left Lord Sefton’s because on one occasion one of the guests added pepper to his soup.

VATEL. At a fête given by the great Condé to Louis XIV. at Cantilly the vole at the twenty-fifth table was wanting. Vatel being told of it exclaimed that he could not survive such a disgrace. Another messenger then announced that the lobsters for the turbot-sauce had not arrived, whereupon Vatel retired to his room and, leaving his sword against the wall, thrust himself through, and at the third attempt succeeded in killing himself (1671). WELTJE. Cook to George while Prince Regent.

Cool Card. You are a cool card (or pretty cool card). A person who coolly asks for something preposterous or outrageous. Card = character, hence a queer card, a rum card, etc. And “cool” in this connection means coolly impudent.

Gifford says the phrase means a “cooling-card, or bolus”; but this is not likely, as a cool-card acts generally as an irritant. A person’s card of address is given at the door, and represents the person himself, and this without doubt is the card referred to.

“There’s a shaky old card; and you can’t be in love with this Lizzie.”—D’Urberville: Our Mutual Friend, book iii. chap. 1, p. 192.

Cool as a Cucumber. Perfectly composed; neither angry nor agitated in the least.

Cool Hundred (A) or Cool Thousand (or any other sum) means entire, or the whole of £100. Cool, in this case, means not influenced by hot-headed enthusiasm or exaggeration.

"I had a cool hundred myself."—Mackenzie.

Cool Tankard (A) or Cool Cup. A drink made of wine and water, with lemon, sugar, and borage; sometimes also slices of cucumber.

Coon (A) means a raccoon, a small American animal valued for its fur. It is about the size of a fox, and lodges in hollow trees.

_A gone coon._ A person in a terrible fix; one on the verge of ruin. The coon being hunted for its fur is a "gone coon" when it has no escape from its pursuers. It is said that Colonel Crockett was one day out raccoon-shooting in North America, when he levelled his gun at a tree where an "old coon" was concealed. Knowing the colonel's prowess, it cried out, in the voice of a man, "Hallo, there! air you Colonel Crockett? for if you air, I'll jest come down, or I know I am a gone coon."

—Martin Scott, lieutenant-general of the United States, is said to have had a prior claim to this saying.

Cooper. Half stout and half porter. The term arises from the practice at breweries of allowing the coopers a daily portion of stout and porter. As they do not like to drink porter after stout, they mix the two together.

Cooper. A coop for wine bottles. The bottles lie in a slanting position in the coop, and may be transported in it from place to place. We find allusions to "six-bottle coopers" not infrequently, i.e. coops or cases containing six bottles. Compare "hem-coops," "cooped up," etc. (Latin, _cupa_, a cask; our "cup.")

Cooper's Hill. Near Runnymede and Egham. Both Denham and Pope have written in praise of this hill.

"If I can be to thee
    A poet, thou Parnassus sit to be.,
—Denham.

Coot. A silly old coot. Stupid as a coot. The coot is a small water-fowl.

Cope (A). A policeman.

Cope (A). A copperhead (q.v.).

Cope. To throw, as _cope it here_. The word properly means to beat or strike, as to cope a shuttlecock or ball with a bat. (Greek, _cope_, to beat); but in Norfolk it means to "hull" or throw.

Cope (B). To catch [a fever, etc.]. To "get copped" is to get caught by the police. (Lat., _capere_, to take, etc.) A similar change of _a into o_ is in _coped_ (caught).

"They thought I was sleepin', ye know,
And they set as I'd cup Jerry Jim;\nWell, it come like a bit of a blow,
For I watched by the deathbed of him."

_—Simon Bignell, Bailiff_ (The Last Letter).

"I shall cut this to-morrow,
... said the younger man. 'You'll be copped, then, replied the other."—T. Terrell: _Lady Delmar._

Copenhagen. The Duke of Wellington's horse, on which he rode in the Battle of Waterloo, "from four in the morning till twelve at night." It was a rich chestnut, 15 hands high. It was afterwards a pensioner in the paddocks of Strathfieldseay. It died quite blind, in 1835, at the age of twenty-seven, and was buried with military honours. (See Horse.)

Copernicanism. The doctrine that the earth moves round the sun, in opposition to the doctrine that the sun moves round the earth; so called after Nicolaus Copernicus, the Prussian astronomer. (1473-1543.)

"Even Bellarmine does not by any means hold the conclusions to be declared against Copernicanism; for, in his letter to F. Foscarini, he says that though he does not believe that any proof of the earth's motion can be adduced, yet, should such proof occur, he is quite prepared to change his views as to the meaning of the Scripture text."—Nineteenth Century, May, 1878 (The Case of Galileo).

"While it has come to the knowledge of the Holy Congregation that that false [1] Copernican doctrine altogether opposed to Holy Scripture, on the mobility of the earth and the immobility of the sun, taught by Nicholas Copernicus, . . .

This congregation has decreed that the said book of Copernicus be suspended until it be corrected."

—Decree of the II. Congregation of the Index, A.D. 1616. (Quoted in the Nineteenth Century, as above.)

Copesmate (2 syl.). A companion. "Copesmate of ugly night" (Raps: of Locrine), a mate who copes with you.

Cophetua. An imaginary king of Africa, of great wealth, who "disdained all womankind." One day he saw a beggar-girl from his window, and fell in love with her. He asked her name: it was Penelope, called by Shakespeare Xenoppe (Love's Labours Lost, iv.1).
They lived together long and happily, and at death were universally lamented. (Percy's Reliques, book ii. 6.)

“King Cophetua loved the hezmar-maid.”

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

Copper. *A. A policeman. Said to be so called from the copper badge which Fernando Wood, of New York, appointed them to wear; but more likely a variant of "cop" (q.v.).

“There were cries of ‘Coppers, Coppers!’ in the yard, and then a violent struggle. . . . Whatever it was that was wanted had evidently secured and dragged off to gaol.”—T. Terrell: Lady Delasar, i.

Copper was by the ancient alchemists called Venus; gold, symbol of Apollo (the sun); silver, of Diana (the moon); iron, of Mars; quicksilver, of Mercury; tin, of Jupiter; and lead, of Saturn.

Copper. Give us a copper, i.e. a piece of copper money. I have no coppers—no ha’pence.

Copper Captain (A). A Brummagem captain; a “General von Poffenburgh.” Michael Perez is so called in Rule a Wife and have a Wife, by Beaumont and Fletcher.

“To this copper-captain was confided the command of the troops.”—W. Irving.

Copper Nose. Oliver Cromwell; also called “Ruby Nose,” “Nosey,” and “Nose Almighty,” no doubt from some scurvy tendency which showed itself in a big red nose.

Copper-nosed Harry. Henry VIII. When Henry VIII. had spent all the money left him by his miserly father, he minted an inferior silver coin, in which the copper alloy soon showed itself on the more prominent parts, especially the nose of the face; and hence the people soon called the king “Old Copper-nose.”

Copperheads. Secret foes. Copperheads are poisonous serpents of America that give no warning, like rattlesnakes, of their attack. In the great Civil War of the United States the term was applied by the Federals to the peace party, supposed to be the covert friends of the Confederates.

Cop’la. The hen killed by Reynard, in the tale of Reynard the Fox.

Copronymus. So Constantine V. was surnamed (718, 741-775). “Kopros” is the Greek for dung, and Constantine V. was called Copronymus: “Parce qu’il salit les fonts baptismaux lorsqu’on le baptisait.”

Coq. The Jacobite Christians of Egypt, who have for eleven centuries been in possession of the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Thebaid. These Christians conduct their worship in a dead language called “Coptic” (language of the Copts).

“The Copts [of Egypt] circumcise, confess to their priests, and abstain from swine's flesh. They are Jacobites in their creed.”—S. Olin: Travels in Egypt (vol. 1, chap. vii. p. 102).

Copus. A drink made of beer, wine, and spice heated together, and served in a “loving-cup.” Dog-Latin for cupellon Hippocratis (a cup of hippocras).

Copy. That’s a mere copy of your countenance. Not your real wish or meaning, but merely one you choose to present to me.

Copyhold Estate. Land which a tenant holds [or rather, held] without any deed of transfer in his own possession. His only document is a copy of the roll made by the steward of the manor from the court-roll kept in the manor-house.

“The villain took an oath of fealty to his lord for the cottage and land which he enjoyed from his bounty. . . . These tenements were suffered to descend to their children, . . . and thus the tenure of copyhold was established.”—Lindley: England (vol. 1, chap. i. p. 27, note).

Copyright. The law of copyright was made in 1814 (54 Geo. III. c. 150). It enacted that an author should possess a right in his work for life, or for twenty-eight years. If he died before the expiration of twenty-eight years, the residue of the right passed to the heirs.

By Talfourd’s or Lord Mahon’s Act (1842) the time was extended to forty-two years, and at least seven years after decease: for example, if the time expired exceeds seven years, the heirs enjoy the residue; if less, the heirs claim seven years.

* In the first case eleven copies of the work had to be given for public use; by Lord Mahon’s Act the number was reduced to five: i.e. one to each of the following institutions, viz. the British Museum, the Bodleian (Oxford), the University library (Cambridge), the Advocates’ library (Edinburgh), and the library of Trinity College (Dublin).

The six omitted are Elgin College, the Scotch Universities of Glasgow, Aberdeen, and St. Andrews, and King’s Ian (Dublin).

Coq-à-l’âne. A cock-and-bull story; idle nonsense, as “Il fait toujours des coq-à-l’âne”—he is always doing silly things, or talking rubbish.
Corah. In Dryden's satire of Absalom and Achitophel, is meant for Dr. Titus Oates (Numbers xxvi.). North describes him as a short man, extremely ugly: if his mouth is taken for the centre, his chin, forehead, and cheek-bones would fall in the circumference.

"Sunk were his eyes, his voice was harsh and loud: Sure signs he neither choler was, nor prou'd; His long chin proved his wit; his saint-like grace.

A church vermillion, and a Moses' face.
His memory, miraculously great.
Could pluck, exceeding man's belief, repeat."

Coral Beads. The Romans used to hang beads of red coral on the cradles and round the neck of infants, to " preserve and favour their tooth" and save them from "the falling sickness." It was considered by soothsayers as a charm against lightning, whirlwind, shipwreck, and fire. Paracelsus says it should be worn round the neck of children as a preservative "against fits, sorcery, charms, and poison." The coral bolls are a Roman Catholic addition, the object being to frighten away evil spirits by their jingle.

"Coral is good to be hanged about the neck of children, to preserve them from the falling sickness. It has also some special sympathy with nature, for the best coral ... will turn pale and wan if the party that wears it be sick, and it comes to its former colour again as they recover."

Coral Master. A juggler. So called by the Spaniards. In ancient times the juggler, when he threw off his mantle, appeared in a tight scarlet or coral dress.

Coram Judice (Latin). Under consideration; still before the judge.

Cor'anach, or Cobonach. Lamentation for the dead, as anciently practised in Ireland and Celtic Scotland. (Gaelic, corch rámach, crying together.) Pennant says it was called by the Irish hulublo.

Corbant. The rock, in the tale of Reynard the Fox. (Latin, cœbus; French, corbeau.) Heinrich von Alkmun.

Corbeaux. Bearers, i.e. persons who carry the dead to the grave: mutes, etc. So called from the corbills, or coches d'eau, which went from Paris to Corbeil with the dead bodies of those who died in the 16th century of a fatal epidemic.

"J'ai lu quelque part que ce coche (the Corbillard) servit, sous Hérou, IV., à transporter des morts, victimes d'une épidémie de Paris Corbeil. Le nom de Corbillard reste depuis aux voitures funèbres."—A. Bonnardot.

Coréia [-Blind-heart]. Superstition is so named in Spenser's Fáerie Queene. Abscess tried to make her understand that danger was at hand, but, being blind, she was dull of comprehension. At length she was induced to shut her door, and when Una knocked would give no answer. Then the lion broke down the door, and both entered. The meaning is that England, the lion, broke down the door of Superstition at the Reformation. Coréia means Romanism in England. (Book I. 3.)

Coreyran Sedition (The). B.C. 479. Coreyra was a colony of Corinthis, but in the year of the famous Battle of Plataea revolted from the mother country and formed an alliance with the Athenians. The Corinthian made war on the colony and took 1,000 prisoners; of these 250 were men of position, who promised as the price of liberty to bring back the Coreyrenans to the mother country. This was the cause of the sedition. The 250 returned captives represented the oligarchical party; their opponents represented the democratic element. The latter prevailed, but it would be difficult to parallel the treachery and brutality of the whole affair. (Thucydides, book iv. 46. 48.)

Cordeilla. The youngest of Lear's three daughters, and the only one that loved him. (Shakespeare: King Lear.)

Cordelia's Gift. "A voice ever soft, gentle, and low; an excellent thing in woman." (Shakespeare: King Lear, v. 3.)

"It is her voice that he hears prevailing over the those (sic) of the rest of the company ... for she has not Cordelia's gift." Miss Browne to: Dr. Cephal.

Cordeliers, i.e. "cord-wavers," 1215. A religious order of the Minor Brothers of St. Francis Assisi. They wore a large grey cloth vestment, girt about the loins with a rope or cord. It was one of the mendicant orders, not allowed to possess any property at all, even their daily food was a gift of charity. The Cordeliers distinguished themselves in philosophy and theology. Duns Scotus was one of their most distinguished members. The tale is that in the reign of St. Louis these Minorites repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordeliers (corded people) were. From this they received their appellation.
Cordeliers. (The), 1790. A French political club in the Great Revolution. It held its meetings in the “Convent des Cordeliers,” which was in the “Place de l’École de Médecine.” The Cordeliers were the rivals of the Jacobins, and numbered among its members Paré (the president), Danton, Marat, Camille Desmoulins, Hébert, Chaumette, Dufourny de Villiers, Fabre d’Eglantine (a journalist), and others. The Club of the Cordeliers was far in advance of the Jacobins, being the first to demand the abolition of the monarchy and the establishment of a commonwealth instead. Its leaders were put to death between March 24th and April 5th, 1794.

This club was nicknamed “The Pamphlet-men,” and Danton was called the “Arch-Head.” When Bailly, the mayor, locked them out of their hall in 1794, they met in the Tennis Court (Paris), and placed the cross into the “Society of the Rights of Man”; but they are best known by their original application.

Cordon (Thre), in fortification, is the flat stone covering of the revetment (q.r.), to protect the masonry from the rain.

Cordon (Un grand). A member of the Légion d’Honneur. The cross is attached to a grand (broad) ribbon.

Cordon Bleu (Un) (French). A knight of the ancient order of the St. Esprit (Holy Ghost); so called because the decoration is suspended on a blue ribbon. It was at one time the highest order in the kingdom.

Un repas de cordon bleu. A well-cooked and well-appointed dinner. The commandant de Souvè, Comte d’Olonne, and some others, who were cordons bleus (i.e., knights of St. Esprit), met together as a sort of club, and were noted for their excellent dinners. Hence, when anyone had dined well he said, “Bien, c’est un vrai repas de cordon bleu.”

Une Cordon Bleu. A facetious compliment to a good female cook. The play is between cordon bleu, and the blue ribbons or strings of some favourite cook.

Cordon Noir (Un). A knight of the Order of St. Michael, distinguished by a black ribbon.

Cordon Rouge (Un) (French). A chevalier of the Order of St. Louis, the decoration being suspended on a red ribbon.

Corduroy. A cabled fabric, originally made of silk, and worn by the kings of France in the chase. (French, corde du roy.)

Corduroy Road. A term applied to roads in the backwoods and swampy districts of the United States of America, formed of the halves of trees sawn in two longitudinally, and laid transversely across the track. A road thus made presents a ribbed appearance, like the cloth called corduroy.

“Look well to your seat, ’tis like taking an airing on a corduroy road, and that out of repairing.” — Lovel: Table for Critics, stanza 2.

Cordwainer. Not a twister of cord, but a worker in leather. Our word is the French cordouanier (a maker or worker of cordouan); the former a corruption of Cordovaner (a worker in Cor- donnan leather).

Corea (The). The dancing mania, which in 1800 appeared in Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia. The usual manifestations were laughing, shouting, dancing, and convulsions. (Latin chorēs, a dance where many dance simultaneously.)

Corfambe. The impersonation of sensual passion in Spenser’s Faerie Queene. (Hook iv. 8.)

Corineus (3 syl.). A mythical hero in the suite of Brute, who conquered the giant Gogun’got, for which achievement the whole western horn of England was allotted him. He called it Corin’ea, and the people Corin’eans, from his own name.

“Of these great conquests by them got,
Corin’ues had that produce which west
To him assigned for his worthy lot
Whose name and memorable gest,
He called Cornwall.” — Spenser: Faerie Queene, 11. 10.

Corinna. A Greek poet before the time of Homer. He wrote in heroic verse the Siege of Troy, and it is said that Homer is considerably indebted to him. (Suidas.)

Corinth. Non enim homini contingit adire Corinthum (It falls not to every man’s lot to go to Corinth). Gellius, in his Nortex Atticus, i. 8, says that Horace refers to Laos, a courtesan of Corinth, who sold her favours at so high a price that not everyone could afford to purchase them; but this most certainly is not the meaning that Horace intended. He says, “To please princes is no little praise, for it falls not to every man’s lot to go to Corinth.” That is, it is as hard to please princes as it is to enter Corinth, situated between two seas, and hence called Bimāris Corinthius. (1 Odes, vii. line 2.)

Still, without doubt, the proverb was applied as Aulus Gellius says: “The courtesans of Corinth are not every man’s money.” Demosthenes tells us that Iais sold her favours for 10,000 [Attic] drachmes (about £300), and adds tanti non emo pariterere. (Horace: 1 Epistula, xvii. line. 36.)

Corinth. There is but one road that leads to Corinth. There is only one right way of doing anything. The Bible tells us that the way of evil is broad, because of its many tracks; but the way of life is narrow, because it has only one single footpath.

"All other ways are wrong, all other guides are false. Hence my difficulty!—the number and variety of the ways. For you know, 'There is but one road that leads to Corinth.'"—Peter: Marins the Epicurean, chap. 24.

Corinth’s Pedagogue. Dionysios the younger, on being banished a second time from Syracuse, went to Corinth and became schoolmaster. He is called Dionysios the lyrum. Henco Lord Byron says of Napoleon—

"Corinth's pedagogue hath now Translated his lyrum to thy brow."

Odes to Napoleon, stanza xiv.

Corinthian (A). A licentious libertine. The immorality of Corinth was proverbial both in Greece and Rome. To Corinthiathiacus is to indulge in licentious conduct. A gentleman sportman who rides his own horses on the turf, or sails his own yacht.

A Corinthian. A member of the puglistic club, Bond Street, London.

Corinthian Brass. A mixed metal made by a variety of metals melted at the conflagration of Corinth in B.C. 116, when the city was burnt to the ground by the consul Mummius. Vases and other ornaments were made by the Romans of this metal, of greater value than if they had been made of silver or gold.

The Hung-hoo vases (1150) of China were made of a similar mixed metal when the imperial palace was burnt to the ground. These vessels are of priceless value.

"I think it may be of Corinthian brass,
Which was a mixture of all metals, but
The brazen uppermost."

Paron: Don Juan, v. 586.

Corinthian Order. The most richly decorated of the five orders of Greek architecture. The shaft is fluted, and the capital adorned with acanthus leaves. (See ACANTHUS.)

Corinthian Tom. The sporting rake in Pierce Egan’s Life in London. A Corinthian was the “fast man” of Shakespeare’s period.

"I am no proud Jack, like Falstaff; but a Corinthian, a bit of mettle, a good lad."

—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 4.

Corinthian War (The), B.C. 395-387.

A suicidal contention between the Corinthians and the Lacedemonians. The allies of Corinth were Athens, Thebes, and Argos. The only battle of note was that of Coronea won by the Lacedemonians. Both the contending parties, utterly exhausted, agreed to the arbitration of Artaxerxes, and signed what is called The Peace of Antikidas.

Not long after this destructive contest Eumenes and Poltiropidas (Thessalian generals) won the battle of Leuctra (B.C. 371), from which defeat the Lacedemonians never recovered.

Corked. This wine is corked—i.e. tastes of the cork.

Corker or Caller. The nail in a horse’s shoe to prevent slipping in frosty weather. (Latin, calix.)

Corking-pins. Pins at one time used by ladies to keep curls on the forehead fixed and in trim.

Cormoran. The Cornish giant who fell into a pit twenty feet deep, dug by Jack the Giant-killer, and filmed over with grass and gravel. The name means cormorant or great eater. For this doughty achievement Jack received a belt from King Arthur, with this inscription—

"This is the valiant Cornish man
That slew the giant Cormoran.
Jack the Giant-killer.

Corn... Horn. Up corn, down horn. When corn is high or dear, beef is down or cheap, because persons have less money to spend on meat.

Corn in Egypt (There’s). There is abundance; there is a plentiful supply. Of course, the reference is to the Bible story of Joseph in Egypt.

Corn-Law Rhymer. Ebenezer Elliot, who wrote philippics against the corn laws (1781-1849).

"Is not the corn-law rhymer already a king?"

—Carlyle.

Corns. In Australia and the United States, youths of colonial birth are so called from being generally both taller and more slender than their parents.

Corns. To tread on one’s corns. To irritate one’s prejudices; to annoy another by disregard to his pet opinions or habits.

Cornage (2 syl.), horn-service. A kind of tenure in grand servitude. The service required was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived. "Cornagium" was money paid instead of the old service.

Corneille au Boulevard. Guibert de Fixérecourt (1773-1814).

Corneille d’Esopé (Le), Motley work. "C’est la corneille d’Esopé."
The allusion is to the fable of the Jack-daw which decked itself with the plumage of the peacocks. The jackdaw not only lost its borrowed plumage, but got picked well-nigh to death by the angry peacocks.

Corner (A). The condition of the market with respect to a commodity which has been largely bought up, in order to create a virtual monopoly and enhance its market price; as a salt-corner, a corner in pork, etc. The idea is that the goods are piled and hidden in a corner out of sight.

"The price of bread rose like a rocket, and speculators wished to corner what little wheat there was."—New York Weekly Times (June 13, 1861).

Corner. Driven into a corner. Placed where there is no escape; driven from all subterfuges and excuses.

Corner (The). Tattersall's horse-stores and betting-rooms, Knightsbridge Green. They were once at the corner of Hyde Park.

To make a corner. To combine in order to control the price of a given article, and thus secure enormous profits. (See Corner.)

What have I done to deserve a corner? To deserve punishment. The allusion is to setting naughty children in a corner by way of punishment.

"There's nothing I have done yet, o' my conscience. Deserve a corner."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII., iii. 1.

Corner-stone (The). The chief corner-stone. A large stone laid at the base of a building to strengthen the two walls forming a right angle. These stones in some ancient buildings were as much as twenty feet long and eight feet thick. Christ is called (in Eph. ii. 20) the chief corner-stone because He united the Jews and Gentiles into one family. Daughters are called corner-stones (Psalm clv. 12) because, as wives and mothers, they unite together two families. In argument, the minor premise is the chief corner-stone.

Cornet. The terrible cornet of horse. William Pitt, first Earl of Chatham (1708-1778). His son William was "the pilot that weathered the storm" (meaning the French Revolution and Napoleon).

Cornette. Porter la cornette. To be dominated over by the woman of the house; to be a Jerry Sneak. The cornette is the mob-cap anciently worn by the women of France. Porter les culottes (to wear the breeches) is the same idea; only it shows who has the mastery, and not who is mastered. In the latter case it means the woman wears the dress of the man, and assumes his position in the house. Probably our expression about "wearing the horns" may be referred to the "cornette" rather than to the stag or deer.

Corn'grate (2 syl.). A term given in Wiltshire to the soil in the northwestern border, consisting of an irregular mass of loose gravel, sand, and limestone.

Cornish Hugs. A hug to overthrow you. The Cornish men were famous wrestlers, and tried to throttle their antagonist with a particular grip or embrace called the Cornish hug.

Cornish Language was virtually extinct 150 years ago. Doll Peutreath, the last person who could speak it, died, at the age of ninety-one, in 1777. (Notes and Queries.)

Cornish Names.

"By Tre, Pol, and Pen,
You shall know the Cornishmen."

Thus, Tre [a town] gives Trefry, Trengon, Tregony, Tregothman, Trelawy, Tremeayne, Trevannion, Treveddow, Trewithen, etc. Pol [a head] gives Polkerris Point, Polperro, Polwheel, etc. Pen [a top] gives Penkevil, Penrice, Penrose, Penitre, etc.

Cornish Wonder (The). John Opio, of Cornwall, the painter. (1761-1807.)

Cornubian Shore (The). Cornwall, famous for its tin mines.

"...from the bleak Cornubian shore
Dispense the mineral treasure, which of old British pilots sought."—Aksuesid: Hymn to the Naiads.

Cornu-o'phia. (See Amalthea's Horn.)

Cornwall. (See Barry, Cornues.)

Cor'onach. (See Coranach.)

Coronation Chair consists of a stone so enclosed as to form a chair.

It was probably the stone on which the kings of Ireland were inaugurated on the hill of Tarm. It was removed by Fergus, son of Eric, to Argyleshire, and thence by King Kenneth (in the ninth century) to Scone, where it was enclosed in a wooden chair. Edward I. transferred it to Westminster.

The monkish legend says that it was the very stone which formed "Jacob's pillow."

The tradition is, "Wherever this stone is found, there will reign some of the Scotch race of kings." (See

Coroner means properly the crown-officer. In Saxon times it was his duty to collect the Crown revenues; next, to take charge of Crown pleas; but at present to uphold the paternal solicitude of the Crown by searching into all cases of sudden or suspicious death. (Vulgo, crouner; Latin, corona, the crown.)

"But is this law? Ay, marry, is't: crown'er a quest law." Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Coronet. A crown inferior to the royal crown. A duke's coronet is adorned with strawberry leaves above the band; that of a marquess with strawberry leaves alternating with pears; that of an earl has pears elevated on stalks, alternating with leaves above the band; that of a viscount has a string of pears above the band, but no leaves; that of a baron has only six pears.

Coronis. Daughter of a King of Pho'sis, changed by Athina into a crow. There was another Coronis, loved by Apollo, and killed by him for infidelity.

Corporal Violet. (See Violet.)

Corporation. A large paunch. A municipal corporation is a body of men elected for the local government of a city or town.

Corps de Garde (French). The company of men appointed to watch in a guard-room; the guard-room.

Corps Diplomatique (French). A diplomatic body of men.

Corps Legislatif (French). The lower house of the French legislature. The first assembly so called was when Napoleon I. substituted a corps legislatif and a tribunal for the two councils of the Directory, Dec. 24, 1799. The next was the corps legislatif and conseil d'état of 1807. The third was the corps legislatif of 750 deputies of 1848. The legislative power under Napoleon III. was vested in the Emperor, the senate, and the corps legislatif. (1852.)

Corpus Candle. The ignis fatuus is so called by the Welsh because it was supposed to forbode death, and to show the road that the corpse would take. Also a large candle used at lich wakes—i.e. watching a corpse before interment. (German leiche, a corpse.)

Corpus Christi [body of Christ]. A festival of the Church, kept on the first Thursday after Trinity Sunday, in honour of the eucharist. There are colleges both at Cambridge and Oxford so named.

Corpus Delicti (Latin). The fundamental fact that a crime has really been committed; thus finding a murdered body is "corpus delicti" that a murder has been committed by someone.

Corpuscular Philosophy, promulgated by Robert Boyle. It accounts for all natural phenomena by the position and motion of corpuscles. (See Atomic Philosophy.)

Corrector. (See Alexander the Corrector.)

Corre'ggio. The Corre'ggio of sculptors. Joan Goujon, who was slain in the massacre of St. Bartholomew. (1510-1572.)

Corrob'oree. An Australian war-dance.

"He roared, stamped, and danced corroboree, like any black fellow."—Kinglake: Water-Babes, chap. v. iii. p. 1840.

Corrouge. The sword of Sir Otuel in mediaval romance. (See Sword.)

Cotted Iron. Sheet iron coated with zinc. It is called corrugated or wrinkled because the sheet is made wavy by the rollers between which it is made to pass.

Corrupt'icle. A sect of heretics of the sixth century, who maintained that Jesus Christ was corruptible.

Corruption of Blood. Loss of title and entailed estates in consequence of treason, by which a man's blood is attainted and his issue suffers.

Corsair means properly "one who gives chase." Applied to the pirates of the northern coast of Africa. (Italian corso; a chase; French corsaire; Latin cursus.)

Corses'ed means the "cursed mouthful." It was a piece of bread "consecrated for exorcism," and given to a person to swallow as a test of his guilt. The words of "consecration" were, "May this morsel cause convulsions and find no passage if the accused is guilty, but turn to wholesome nourishment if he is innocent." (Saxon, corse, curse; suer, mouthful.) (See Choke.)

Cortes (2 syl.). The Spanish or Portuguese parliament. The word means court officers.

Cortina. The skin of the serpent Pytho, which covered the tripod of the Pythianess when she delivered her oracles. "Tripodas cortina tegit" (Pra dentius: Apophthegmata, 506); also the tripod itself, or the place where the oracle was delivered. (Virgil: Aenid, vi. 345.) "Neque te Phaeli cortina fecellit."

Corvinus (a warden). János Hunyady, Governor of Hungary, is so called from the raven on his shield.

There were two Romans so called—viz. Valerius Maximus Corvinus Messala, and Valerius Messala Corvinus.

Marcus Valerius was so called because, in a single combat with a gigantic Gaul during the Gallic war, a raven flew into the Gaul's face and so harassed him that he could neither defend himself nor attack his adversary.

Corhyantine Religion. An expression applied by Prof. Huxley to the Salvation Army and its methods. The rowdy processions of the Salvation Army (especially at Eastbourne, 1891), resembling the wild ravings of the ancient Corhyantes, or devotees of Bacchus, more than sober, religious functions, have given colour to the new word.

Corcyrian Cave (Thr). On Mount Parnassus; so called from the nymph Corcyra. The Muses are sometimes called Coricydes (4 syl.)

"The immortal Muse
To your calm habitations, to the vale
Corcyra... will guide his footsteps;"
Akinside: Hyens to the Naiads.

Corcyrian Nymphs (Thr). The Muses. (See abov.)

Cor'ydor. A swain; a brainless, love-sick spooner. It is one of the shepherds in Virgil's eclogues.

Cor'ypedus (Thr) or "Corypedus." The leader and speaker of the chorus in Greek dramas. In modern English it is used to designate the chief speaker and most active member of a board, company, or expedition.

Corypedus of German Literature (Thr). Goethe, "prince of German poets" (1749-1812).

"The Polish poet called upon... the great Corypedus of German literature."—See Notes and Queries, 27th April, 1878.

Corypedus of Grammarians. Aristarchos of Sam'othrace. A cor-herited was the leader of the Greek chorus; hence the chief of a department in any of the sciences or fine arts. Aris-tarchos, in the second century B.C., was the chief or prince of grammarians. (Greek, koruphas, leader.)

Coryphée. A ballet-dancer. (See preceding column.)

Cossa (plu. Cosseas). A theoretic speculation; a literary fancy; a whims of the brain (Indian).

Cos'miel (3 syl.). The genius of the world. He gave Theodidac's a boat of asbestos, in which he sailed to the sun and planets. (Kircher: Eristatic Journey to Heaven.)

Cosmopolite (4 syl.). A citizen of the world. One who has no partiality to any one country as his abidingplace; one who looks on the whole world with "an equal eye." (Greek, cosmospolites.)

Cosset. A house pet. Applied to a pet lamb brought up in the house; any pet. (Anglo-Saxon, cot-seat, cottagedweller; German, kossat.)

Costard. A clown in Love's Labour's Lost (Shakespeare), who apes the court wit of Queen Elizabeth's time, but misapplies and miscalls like Mrs. Malaprop or Master Dogberry.

Costard. A large apple, and, metaphorically, a man's head. (See Costermonger.)

"Take him over the costard with the hilt of thy sword."—Shakespeare: Richard III, i. 4.

Costermonger. A seller of cabbages about the streets, properly an apple-seller (from costard, a sort of apple, and monger, "a trader;" Saxon, manigian, "to trade"). A word still retained in ironmonger, cheese-monger, fish-monger, news-monger, fell-monger, etc.

"Her father was an Irish costermonger."—B. Jonson: The Alchemist, vi. 1.

Cote-hard. A tight-fitting tunic buttoned down the front.

"He was clothed in a cote-hard upon the eye of Almack (Germany)."—Godefroy de la Tour: Lament.

Cotereaux (French). Cut-throats. The King of England, irritated at the rising in Brittany in the twelfth century, sent the Bruilancours (q. v.) to savage the lands of Raoul de Fourcres. These cut-throats carried knives (conteurs) with them, whence their name.

Coterie (3 syl.). A French word, originally tantamount to our "guild," a society where each paid his quota—i.e., his quote-part or gild (sherry). The French word has departed from its original meaning, and is now applied to an exclusive set, more especially of ladies.

"All coteries... it seems to me, have a tendency to change truth into affection."—R. C. Gaskell: Charlotte Bronte (vol. ii. chap. xi. p 47).
Cotillon. The lowest of bondsmen. So called from cot-scot (a cottage-dweller). These slaves were bound to work for their feudal lord. The word occurs frequently in Domesday Book.

Cotswold Barley. You are as long a-coming as Cotswold barley. Cotswold, in Gloucestershire, is a very cold, bleak place on the wolds, exposed to the winds, and very backward in vegetation, but yet it yields a good late supply of barley.

Cotswold Lion. A sheep for which Cotswold hills are famous. Pique as a Cotswold iron (ironical).

Cotta, in Pope’s Moral Essays (Epistle 2). John Holles, fourth Earl of Clare, who married Margaret, daughter of Henry Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and was created Duke of Newcastle in 1694 and died 1711.

Cottage Countess (The). Sarah Higgins, of Shropshire, daughter of a small farmer, in 1790 married Henry Cecil, Marquis of Exeter and Lord of Burleigh. The bridegroom was at the time living under the name of John Jones, separated from his wife, whose maiden name was Emma Vernon. She eloped with a clergyman, and subsequently to the second marriage “John Jones,” the lord of Burleigh obtained a divorce and an Act of Parliament to legitimise the children of his second wife. Sarah Higgins were seventeen at the time of her marriage, and “John Jones” was thirty. They were married by licence in the parish church of Bolas. Tennyson has a poem on the subject called The Lord of Burleigh, but historically it is not to be trusted.

Cottage Orné (A). (French). A cottage residence belonging to persons in good circumstances.

Cotysn. One of the three Hundred-handed giants, son of Heaven and Earth. His two brothers were Briaurus [Bri-a-rruce] and Gyges or Gyis. (See Hundred-Handed, Giants.)

Cotton. To cotton to a person. To cling to one or take a fancy to a person. To stick to a person as cotton sticks to our clothes.

Cotton Lord. A great cotton lord. A rich Manchester cotton manufacturer, a real lord in wealth, style of living, equipage, and tenantry.

Cottonian Library. In the British Museum. Collected by Sir R. Cotton, and added to by his son and grandson, after which it was invested in trustees for the use of the public.

Cottonopolis. Manchester, the great centre of cotton manufactures.

“His friends thought he would have preferred the easy life of Cottonopolis to the out-of-way county of Cornwall.”—Newspaper paragraph, January, 1880.

Cotytta. The Thracian goddess of immodesty, worshipped at Athens with nocturnal rites.

“Hail! goddess of nocturnal sport,

Milton: Comus, 129, 130.

Coutcy. Enguerrand III., Sire de Coutcy, has won fame by his arrogant motto:

“Roi je ne suis,
Ni Prince, ni comte, aussi,
Je suis Le Serre de Coutcy.”

Couleur de Rose (French). Highly coloured; too favourably considered; overdrawn with romantic embellishments, like objects viewed through glass tinted with rose pink.

Conlin. A British giant, pursued by Debu (one of the companions of Brute) till he came to a chasm 132 feet across, which he leaped; but slipping on the opposite side, he fell back into the chasm and was killed. (Spenser: Faerie Queene.) (See Giants.)

Councils. (Conciliar Councils). There are twenty-one recognised, nine Eastern and twelve Western.

The Nine Eastern: (1) Jerusalem; (2 and 8) Nice, 325, 787; (3, 6, 7, 9) Constantinople, 381, 553, 680, 869; (4) Ephesus, 431; (5) Chalcedon, 451.

The Twelve Western: (10, 11, 12, 13, 19) Lateram, 1123, 1139, 1179, 1215, 1517: (14, 15) Synod of Lyon, 1245, 1274; (16) Synod of Venice, in Dauphine, 1311: (17) Constancis, 1414: (18) Basil, 1431-1443: (20) Trent, 1545-1563: (21) Vatican, 1869.

* Of these, the Church of England recognises only the first six, viz.:

25 of Nice, against the Arians.
36 of Constantinople, against heretics.
43 of Ephesus, against the Nestorian and Pelagians.
41 of Chalcedon, when Athanasius was restored.
353 of Constantinople, against Origens.
266 of Constantinople, against the Monothelites (431).
Counsel. Keep your own counsel. Don’t talk about what you intend to do. Keep your plans to yourself.

Count Kin with One (To), is a Scotch expression meaning to compare one’s pedigree with that of another.

Count not your Chickens . . .
(See Chickens.)

Count the House (To). To declare the House of Commons adjourned because there are not forty members present. The Speaker has his attention called to the fact, and must himself count the number present. If he finds there are not forty members present, he declares the sitting over.

Count Upon (To). To rely with confidence on some one or some thing; to reckon on.

Countenance (To). To sanction; to support. Approval or disapproval is shown by the countenance. The Scripture speaks of “the light of God’s countenance,” i.e. the smile of approbation; and to “hide His face” (or countenance) is to manifest displeasure.

“General grant, neither at this time nor at any other, gave the least countenance to the efforts . . . .” — Lincoln and Hay: Abraham Lincoln (vol. ii. chap. ii. p. 121).

To keep in countenance. To encourage, or prevent one losing his countenance or feeling dismayed.

To keep one’s countenance. To refrain from smiling or expressing one’s thoughts by the face.

Out of countenance. Ashamed, confounded. With the countenance fallen or cast down.

To put one out of countenance is to make one ashamed or disconcerted. To “discountenance” is to set your face against something done or propounded.

Counter-caster. One who keeps accounts, or casts up accounts by counters. Thus, in The Winter’s Tale, the Clown says, “Fifteen hundred shorn; what comes the wool to? I cannot do’t without counters.” (Act iv. s. 3.)

“...And what was he? Forsouth, a great arithmetician . . . And I . . . must be heeded and calmed By debtor and creditor, this counter-caster.” Shakespeare: Othello, i. 1.

Countercheck Quarrelsome (The). Sir, how dare you utter such a falsehood? Sir, you know that it is not true. This is the third remove from the lie direct; or rather, the lie direct in the third degree.

The Reproof Valiant, the Countercheck Quarrelsome, the Lie Circumstantial, and the Lie Direct, are not clearly defined by Touchstone. That is not true; how dare you utter such a falsehood; if you say so, you are a liar; you lie, or are a liar, seem to fit the four degrees.

Counterfort, in permanent fortification. The sides of ditches strengthened internally by buttresses some fifteen or eighteen feet apart. (See REVETMENTS.)

Counter-jumper. A draper’s assistant, who jumps over the counter to go from one part of the shop to another.

Counterpane. A corruption of counterpoint, from the Latin calcita (a wadded wrapper, a quilt). When the stitches were arranged in patterns it was called calcita panca, which in French became contre-pointe, corrupted into contre-pointe, counter-point, where point is pronounced “poyn,” corrupted into “pane.”

Counterscarp, in fortification, the side of a ditch next to the open country. The side next to the place fortified is the escarp.

Countess di Civillari (The). A log, sewer, cesspool, into which falls the filth of a city. Two wags promised Simon da Villa an introduction to the Countess di Civillari, and tossed him, in his scarlet gown, into a ditch where farmers “emptied the Countess of Civillari for manuring their lands.” Here the doctor floundered about half the night, and, having spilt his robes, made the best of his way home, to be rated soundly by his wife. (Boccaccio: Decameron, Eighth day, ix.)

Country.

To appeal to the country. To dissolve Parliament in order to ascertain the wish of the country by a new election of representatives.

Father of his country. (See FATHEr.)

Country-dance. A corruption of the French contre danse (a dance where the partners face each other).

Coup [cou]. He made a good coup. A good hit or haul. (French.)

Coup d’État (French) means a state stroke, and the term is applied to one of those bold measures taken by Government to prevent a supposed or actual danger; as when a large body of men are arrested suddenly for fear they should overturn the Government.

The famous coup d’état, by which Louis Napoleon became possessed of absolute power, took place on December 2nd, 1851.

Coup de Grâce. The finishing stroke. When criminals were tortured by the wheel or otherwise, the executioner gave him a coup de grâce, or blow on the head or breast, to put him out of his misery.

"The Turks dealt the coup de grâce to the Eastern empire."—Times.

v. The following is taken from a note (chap. xxx.) of Sir W. Scott's novel The Betrothed.

"This punishment [being broken on the wheel] consists in the executioner, with a bar of iron, breaking the shoulder-bones, arms, thighs-bones, and legs—taking alternate sides. The punishment is concluded by a blow across the breast, called the coup de grâce, or blow of mercy, because it removes the sufferer from his agony. Mandrino, the celebrated smuggler, while in the act of being thus tortured, tells us that the sensibility of man never continues after the nervous system has been shattered by the first blow."

Coup de Main (French). A sudden stroke; a stratagem whereby something is effected suddenly. Sometimes called a coup only, as "The coup [the scheme] did not answer."

"London is not to be taken by a coup de main."

—Paul de Coubertin.

Coup d'Œil (French). A view; glance; prospect; effect of things in the mass.

These principles are presented at a single coup d'œil.

The coup d'œil was grand in the extreme.

Coup de Pied de l'Anse (kick from the ass's foot). A blow given to a vanquished or fallen man; a cowardly blow; an insult offered to one who has not the power of returning or avenging it. The allusion is to the fable of the sick lion kicked by the ass. (French.)

Coup de Soleil (French). A sun-stroke, any malady produced by exposure to the sun.

Coup de Théâtre. An unforeseen or unexpected turn in a drama to produce a sensational effect. In ordinary life, something planned for effect. Burke and his dagger was meant for a coup de théâtre, but it was turned into farce by a little ready wit. (See DASSER-SCène.)

Coup Manqué (A). A false stroke.

"Shoot dead, or don't aim at all; but never make a coup manqué."—Oudin. Under Two Flags, chap. xx.

Coupoun. A certificate of interest which is to be cut off [French, couper] from a bond and presented for payment. It bears on its face the date and amount of interest to be paid. If the coupons are exhausted before the principal is paid off, new ones are gratuitously supplied to the holder of the bond.

Most foreign state-bonds expire in a stated term of years, generally a portion being paid off annually at par. Suppose there are 1,000 bonds, and 10 are paid off annually, then in 100 years all are paid off and the obligation is cancelled.

Courage of One's Opinion. To have the courage of one's opinion means to utter, maintain, and act according to one's opinion, be the consequences what they may. The French use the same location. Martyrs may be said to have had the courage of their opinions.

Courland Weather. Very boisterous, ungenial weather, with high winds, driving snow and rain, like the weather of Courland, in Russia.

Course. Another course would have done it. A little more would have effected our purpose. It is said that the peasants of a Yorkshire village tried to wall in a cuckoo in order to enjoy an eternal spring. They built a wall round the bird, and the cuckoo just skinned over it. "Ah!" said one of the peasants, "another curse would 'a' done it."

"There is a school of monarchs who, connecting hasty short-comeings . . . with changes in manners, could not forbear to persuade that only another curse is wanted to wall in the cuckoo."

—Nineteenth Century, December, 1862, p. 193.

Course. To keep on the course. To go straight; to do one's duty in that course [path] of life in which we are placed. The allusion is to racing horses.

"We are not the only horses that can't be kept on the course, with a good turn of speed, too."

—Bolton's wood; Robbery under Arms, chap. vi.

Court. Originally meant a coop or sheepfold. It was on the Latin hills that the ancient Latins raised their cors or cohaors, small enclosures with hurdles for sheep, etc. Subsequently, as many men as could be coopered or folded together were called a corps or cohaor. The "core" or cattle-yard being the nucleus of the farm, became the centre of a lot of farm cottages, then of a hamlet, town, fortified place, and lastly of a royal residence.

Court. A short cut, alley, or paved way between two main streets. (French, court, "short," as prendre un chemin court, "to take a short cut.")

Out of court. Not worth consideration; wholly to be discarded, as such and such an hypothesis is wholly out of court, and has been proved to be untenable. "No true bill."

Court Circular. Brief paragraphs supplied to certain daily papers by an officer (the Court Newman) specially appointed for the purpose. He announces the movements of the sovereign, the Prince of Wales, and the court generally; gives reports of the levees, drawing-rooms, state balls, royal concerts, meetings of the Cabinet ministers, deputations to ministers, and so on. George III., in 1803, introduced the custom to prevent misstatements on these subjects.
Court-cupboard

Court-cupboard. The buffet to hold flagons, cans, cups, and beakers. There are two in Stationers' Hall.

"Away with the joint-stools, remove the court-cupboard, look to the plate." — Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 5.

Court Fools. (See Fools.)

Court Holy Water. Fair speeches, which look like promises of favour, but end in nothing.

Court Plaster. The plaster of which the court ladies made their patches. These patches, worn on the face, were cut into the shape of crescents, stars, circles, diamonds, hearts, crosses; and some went so far as to patch their face with a coach-and-four, a ship in full sail, a château, etc. This ridiculous fashion was in vogue in the reign of Charles I.; and in the reign of Anne was employed as the badge of political partisanship. (See Patches.)

"Your black patches you wear variously, Some cut like stars, some in half moons, some lozenges."——Bowdoin and Fletcher: Elder Brother, vi. 2.

Court of Love. A judicial court for deciding affairs of the heart, established in Provence during the palmy days of the Troubadours. The following is a case submitted to their judgment: A lady listened to one admirer, squeezed the hand of another, and touched with her toe the foot of a third. Query. Which of these three was the favoured suitor?

Court of Pie-powder. (See Pie-poudre.)

Court of the Gentiles (The). They are but in the Court of the Gentiles. They are not wholly God's people; they are not the elect, but have only a smattering of the truth. The "Court of the Israelites" in the Jewish temple was for Jewish men; the "Court of the Women" was for Jewish women; the "Court of the Gentiles" was for those who were not Jews.

"Oh, Chaddie, they are but in the Court of the Gentiles, and will never win further him, I doubt." —Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. viii.

Court. Civility, politeness. It was at the courts of princes and great feudatories that minstrels and pages practised the refinements of the age in which they lived. The word originally meant the manners of the court.

Court Titles. Titles assumed or granted by social custom, but not of any legal value. The courtesy title of the eldest son of a duke is marquis; of a marquis is earl; of the eldest son of an earl is viscount. Younger sons of peers are by courtesy called lord or honourable, and the daughters are lady or honourable. These titles do not give the holders official rank to sit in the House of Lords. Even the Marquis of Lorne, the Queen's son-in-law, is only a companion (1894).

Cousin. Blackstone says that Henry IV., being related or allied to every earl in the kingdom, artfully and constantly acknowledged the connection in all public acts. The usage has descended to his successors, though the reason has long ago failed. (Commentaries, i. 398.)

Cousin. All peers above the rank of baron are officially addressed by the Crown as cousin.

A visecount or earl is "Our right trusty and well-beloved cousin." A marquis is "Our right trusty and entirely-beloved cousin." A duke is "Our right trusty and right-entirely-beloved cousin."

Cousin Betsy. A half-witted person, a "Bess of Bedlam" (q.e.).

"[None] can say Foster's wrung him of a penny, or made short measure to a child or a cousin Betsy."—Mrs Gaskell.

Cousin-german. The children of brothers and sisters, first cousins; kinsfolk. (Latin, germa, a brother, one of the same stock.)

"There is three cousin-germans that has covered all the hostes at Reading, of Maidenhead, of Caldecott, of horses and money."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 5.

Cousin Jack. So Cornishmen are called in the western counties.

Cousin Michael (or Michel). The Germans are so called. Michel, in Old German, means "gloss," cousin Michel is meant to indicate a slow, heavy, simple, unrefined, course-feeding people.

Coûte que Coûte (French). Cost what it may, at any price, be the consequences what they may.

"His object is to serve his party coûte que coûte."—Standard.
Covade

Covade (2 syl.). A man who takes the place of his wife when she is in child-bed. (See Reader’s Handbook, p. 217, col. 2.)

Cover (1 syl.). An individual; as a flash cover (a swell), a rum cover (a man whose position and character is not quite palpable), a gentry cover (a gentleman), a doory cover (a very knowing individual), etc. (Gipsy, cover, a thing; cover, that man; covit, that woman.)

Coverenants. A term applied, during the civil wars, to the Scotch Presbyterians, who united by “solemn league and covenant” to resist the encroachments of Charles I. on religious liberty.

Covent Garden. A corruption of Convent Garden; the garden and burial ground attached to the convent of Westminster, and turned into a fruit and flower market in the reign of Charles II. It now belongs to the Duke of Bedford.

Cov’entry. To send one to Coventry. To take no notice of him; to let him live and move and have his being with you, but pay no more heed to him than to the idle winds which you regard not. According to Missrs. Chambers (Cyclopaedia), the citizens of Coventry had at one time so great a dislike to soldiers that a woman seen speaking to one was instantly tabooed. No intercourse was ever allowed between the garrison and the town; hence, when a soldier was sent to Coventry, he was cut off from all social intercourse.

Hutton, in his History of Birmingham, gives a different version. He says that Coventry was a stronghold of the parliamentary party in the civil wars, and that all troublesome and refractory royalists were sent there for safe custody.

The former explanation meets the general scope of the phrase the better. (See Boycott.)

Coventry Mysteries. Miracle plays acted at Coventry till 1591. They were published in 1841 for the Shakespeare Society.

Parliaments held at Coventry. Two parliaments have been held in this city, one in 1401, styled Parliamentum Indiscrevum; and the other in 1439, called Parliamentum Diabolicon.

Cover. To break cover. To start from the covert or temporary lair. The usual earth-holes of a fox being covered up the night before a hunt, the creature makes some gorse-bush or other cover its temporary resting-place, and as soon as it quits it the hunt begins.

Covered Way, in fortification. (See Glacis.)

Covering the Face. No malefactor was allowed, in ancient Persia, to look upon a king. So, in Esther vii. 5, when Haman fell into disgrace, being seen on the queen’s diwan, “they instantly cover Haman’s face,” that he might not look on the face of Ahaseurus.

* In India a low caste man covers his mouth when speaking to one of high caste.

Coverley. Sir Roger de Coverley. A member of an hypothetical club in the Spectator, “who lived in Soho Square when he was in town.” Sir Roger is the type of an English squire in the reign of Queen Anne. He figures in thirty papers of the Spectator.

“Who can be sensible to his unpretending virtues and amiable weaknesses; his modesty, generosity, hospitality, and courteous welcome; the respect which his neighbours, and the affection of his domestics?”—Huzilt.

Covetous Man. A Tantalus (q.v.).

“In the full flood stands Tantalus, his skin Washed over in vain, for ever dry within. He catches at the stream with greedy lips— From his parched mouth the wanton torrent slips.

Change but the name, this tale is the story: That in a flood of useless wealth destitute, Which thou cannot touch, but never taste.”—Coverley: Borrac, satire i.

Cow. The cow that nourished Ymir with four streams of milk was called Audhumla. (Scandinavian mythology.) (See AUDHUMLA.)

Cow’s Tail. “Always behind, like a cow’s tail.” “Tanquam codae vituli.” (Petronius.)

The cow knows not the worth of her tail till she loses it, and is troubled with flies, which her tail brushed off.

“What we have we prize not to the worth Whiles we enjoy it; but being lack’d and lost, Why, then we rack the value.”—Shakespeare: Much Ado about Nothing, iv. 1.

Cow-hick. A tuft of hair on the human forehead, sometimes called a feather: it cannot be made to lie in the same direction as the rest of the hair by brushing, or even by pomatum. When cows lick their hides they make the hair stand on end.

"This term must have been adopted from a comparison with that part of a... cow's hide where the hairs, having different directions, meet and form a projecting ridge, supposed to be occasioned by the animals licking themselves." — Brockett: Glossary of North Country Words.

Coward (anciently written culward) is either from the French, coward, originally written culverd, from culver (a pigeon), pigeon-livered being still a common expression for a coward; or else from the Latin, culum vertere, to turn tail (Spanish, culaver; Portuguese, coward; Italian, codardo, "a coward"); Latin, cauda, "a tail"). A beast cowarded, in heraldry, is one drawn with its coue or tail between its legs. The allusion is to the practice of beasts, who sneek off in this manner when they are cowed.

Cowper. Called "Author of The Task," from his principal poem. (1791-1800.)

Cowper Law, a corruption of Cupar, etc., is trying a man after execution. Similar expressions are Jedwood, Jeddart, and Jedburgh justice. Cowper justice had its rise from a barn-bailie in Cupar-Angus, before heritable jurisdictions were abolished. (See Lydford Law.)

"Cowper Law, as we say in Scotland—hang a man first, and then judge him."—Lord de Roos: Tower of London.

Coxcomb. An empty-headed, vain person. The ancient licensed jesters were so called because they wore a cock's comb in their caps.

"Coxcomb, an ever empty race, Are trumpets of their own disgrace." Gay: Fables, xix.

"Let me hire him too; here's my coxcomb." Shakespeare: King Lear, 1. 4.

The Prince of Coxcomb. Charles Joseph, Prince de Ligne. (1553-1614.)

Richard II. of England is sometimes called the Coxcomb. (1366, 1377-1400.)

Henri III. of France was called le Mignon, which means pretty well the same thing. (1551, 1574-1589.)

Coxeytes (S. yl.). Followers of Mr. ["General"] Coxey, of the United States, who induced 50,000 labourers from sundry states "to march" to Washington to overawe the Government into giving employment to the unemployed. The word is now employed to express labour processions and masses organised to force concessions to workmen.

Coxswain. Kog is Norwegian for a cockboat; Welsh, cuch; Italian, cossa, etc.; and scawn, Anglo-Saxon for a servant, superintendent, or bailiff. (See Cockboat.)

Coyne and Livery. Food and entertainment for soldiers, and forage for their horses, exacted by an army from the people whose lands they passed through, or from towns where they rested on their march.

Coystral, Cousrel, or Kestrel. A degenerate hawk; hence, a paltry fellow. Holinhed says, "costeilers or bearers of the arms of barons or knights" (vol. i. p. 162); and again, "women, lackeys, and costeilers are considered as the unwarlike attendants on an army" (vol. iii. 272). Each of the life-guards of Henry VIII. had an attendant, called a coystrel or coystryl. Some think the word is a corruption of co斯特el, which they derive from the Latin coterellus (a peasant); but if not a corruption of kestryl, I should derive it from costrel (a small wooden bottle used by labourers in harvest time). "Iassa guardam quae costrelli vocantur." (Matthew Paris.)

"He's a coward and a coystrel that will not drink to my nuce." —Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, i. 3.

Cowen. To cheat. (Armorice, conçyein; Russian, konusol; Arabic, gama; Ethiopic, chosweca; our choose.)

Crab. (A.) An ill-tempered fellow; sour as a crab-apple.

To catch a crab, in rowing. (See Catch A CRAB.)

Crab-cart. The carapace of a crab. So called because it is used very commonly by children for a toy-cart.

Crack, as a crack man, a first-rate fellow; a crack hand at cards, a first-rate player; a crack article, an excellent one, i.e. an article cracked up or boasted about. This is the Latin crepis, to crack or boast about. Hence Lucretius ii. 1168, "crepas antiquum genus."

"Indeed, he 'tis a noble child; a crack madam." Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 3.

A guile crack. A good talker.

"To be a guile crack... was essential to the trade of a 'pup body' of the more esteemed class." — Sir W. Scott: The Autobiography (Introduction).

In a crack. Instantly. In a snap of the fingers, crepis digito rum (in a crack of the fingers). (French, crepir.)

"Une allusion au trait de l'onde contre la dent que les Orientaux du moyen age touchaient du Crack-brained. Eccentric; slightly mad. Another form is "A crack-skull."

Crack a Bottle — i.e. drink one. The allusion is to the mischievous pranks of the drunken frolics of times gone by, when the bottles and glasses were broken during the bout. Miss Oldbuck says, in reference to the same custom, "We never were glass-breakers in this house, Mr. Love!" (Antiquary); meaning they were not bottle-crackers, or given to drunken orgies. (See Craze.)

"Dear Tom, this brown jug that now rests on the table, from which I now drink to sweet Nan of the Vale, was once Toby Flintoff's, a thirsty old soul. As o'er cracked a bottle, or fathomed a bowl." —O’Keefe: Poor Soldier.

Crack a Crib (To). To break into a house as a thief. (See Carb.)

Crack Up a Person (To). To praise him highly. (See Crack.)

Cracked. Made a bankrupt. A play on "rupt," which is from the Latin rumpere, to break.

Cracked Pipkins. Cracked pipkins are discovered by their sound. Ignorance is betrayed by speech.

"They bid you talk — my honest son!"

"This you for ever hold your tongue; silence with some is wisdom more profound—Cracked pipkins are discovered by the sound." —Peter Findon: Lord B. and his Motions.

Cracker. So called from the noise it makes when it goes off.

Cracknels (from the French croque-la). A hard, brittle cake.

Cradle-land. The same as "bourough, English," under which lands descend to the youngest son. By Gavelkind, land passes to all sons in equal proportions. If the father has no son, then (in cradle-land tenures) the youngest daughter is sole heiress. If neither wife, son, nor daughter, the youngest brother inherits; if no brother, the youngest sister is heir; if neither brother nor yet sister, then the youngest next of kin.

Craft. A trade (Anglo-Saxon, crafte). A craftsman is a mechanic. A hundrercraft is manual skill, i.e. mechanical skill. And teecrercraft is skill in medicine. (Anglo-Saxon teec-craft; tece, a doctor.)

Craft (A). A general term for a vessel employed in loading and unloading ships.

Small craft. Such vessels as schooners, sloops, cutters, and so on. A shipbuilder was at one time the prince of craftsmen, and his vessels were work of craft emphatically.

Craft. Cunning, or skill in a bad sense. Hence Witchcraft, the art or cunning of a witch.

Craigmillar Castle. So called from Henry de Craigmillar, who built the castle in the twelfth century.

Crak's of War. Cannons were so called in the reign of Edward III.

Cram. To tell what is not true. A crammer, an untruth. The allusion is to stuffing a person with useless rubbish.

Crambe bis Costae ("cabbage boiled twice"). A subject hacked out. Juvenal says, "Acretit minus cramba repetita magistra." (VIII, 153), alluding to the Greek proverb "Dis crambis bis-costei.

"There was a disadvantage in trying this Border district, for it had been already ravaged by the author himself, as well as by others; and, unless prevented under a new guise, was likely to afford ground to the objection of Crambe bis costae." —Sir W. Scott: The Monastery (Introduction).

Crambo. Repetition. So called from a game which consists in some one setting a line which another is to rhyme to, but no one word of the first line must occur in the second.

Crambo. Pantomime of a word in rhyme to a given word. Thus if "cat" is the given word, the pantomimists would act Rat, Pat, Hat, Mat, Pat, Rat, Sat, etc., till the word acted is guessed.

Crampt (King). The king who made a wooden horse which would travel 100 miles an hour. (Alkmounar: Reynard the Fox, 1498)

Crampt (King). Quick as lightning; quick as thought. (See above.)

Cramping. To scour the cramping. To be put into fetters; to be imprisoned. The allusion is obvious.

Crane. Long-shanks. (Welsh, ar, "the shank," whence our garter and garter.) Garan is the long-shankd ird, contracted into g'ran, crane; heron is another form of the same word.

Crank. An Abram man (g.v.). So called from the German kramp (sickly), whence cranky, "idiotic, foolish, full of whines," and cranks (simulated sickness). These beggars were called cranks.
because they pretended madness and sickness to excite compassion.

Crannock. An Irish measure which, in the days of Edward II., contained either eight or sixteen pecks.

"Crannocks contains eight Pecks. Crannoceans contain eight Pecks."—Exchequer of Ireland (Rec.).

Crapaud or Johnny Crapaud. A Frenchman; so called from the device of the ancient kings of France, "three toads crect, saltant." (Guillim’s Display of Heraldrie, 1611.) Nostreda’mus, in the sixteenth century, called the French "crapauds."

Les ancens crapauds prenteront Sara (Nostrada’mus). Sara is the word Aras reversed, and when the French under Louis XIV. took Aras from the Spaniards, this verse was quoted as a prophecy.

Crape . . . Lawn. A saint in crape in twice a saint in lawn. (Pope: Fp. to Cobham, 1361.) Crape (a sort of bombazine, or alpaca) is the stuff of which cheap clerical gowns used to be made, and here means one of the lower clergy; "lawn" refers to the lawn sleeves of a bishop, and here means a prelate. A good curate is all very well, but the same goodness in a bishop is exalted as something noteworthy.

Cravat. A corruption of Crubat or Croit. It was introduced into France by some French officers on their return from Germany in 1636. The Croats, who guarded the Turkish frontiers of Austria, and acted as scouts on the flanks of the army, wore linen round their necks, tied in front, and the officers wore muslin or silk. When France organised a regiment on the model of the Croats, these linen neckcloths were imitated, and the regiment was called "The Royal Cravat."

The Bonny Cravat. A public-house sign at Woodchurch, Kent: a corruption of La bonne coruelle. Woodchurch was noted for its smuggling proclivities, and the "Bonnie Cravat" was a smuggler's hostelry.

To wear a hempen cravat. To be hanged.

Craven means "your mercy is craved." It was usual in former times to decide controversies by an appeal to battle. The combatants fought with batons, and if the accused could either kill his adversary or maintain the fight till sundown, he was acquitted. If he wished to call off, he cried out "Craven!" and was held infamous, while the defendant was advanced to honour. (Blackstone.)

Crawley. Crooked as Crawley (or) Crawley brook, a river in Bedfordshire. That part called the brook, which runs into the Ouse, is so crooked that a boat would have to go eighty miles in order to make a progress direct of eighteen. (Fuller: Worthies.)

Crayton (Geoffrey). The name do plume under which Washington Irving published The Sketch-Book. (1820.)

Breaking Doors hang the Longest. "Un put jolé dure plus qu’un neuf." "Tout ne brule ne cheul pas" (tumbles not). Delicate persons often outlive the more robust. Those who have some personal affliction, like the goat, often live longer than those who have no such vent.

Create. Make.

God created the heavens and the earth (Gen. 1:1.)

God made the firmament (Gen. 1:6.)

God made the sun and moon (Gen. 1:16.)

God created the great fishes . . . . . . (Gen. 1:21.)

God made the terrestrial animals (Gen. 1:25.)

God created man and made him "God-like. . . . . . . (Gen. 1:27.)

God said "Let us make man in our own image" (verse 26), and so God created man in His image (verse 27).

Chap. ii. 3. He rested from all the works which He had created and made.

Chap. iii. 4. He made the earth and the heavens; He also created them.

Chap. iii. 22. He made woman, but created man.

Most certainly create does not of necessity mean to make out of nothing, as fishes were "created" from water, and man was created from "earth."

Creature (The). Whisky or other spirits. A contracted form of "Creature-comfort."

"When he changed to have taken an overdose of the creature."—Sir W. Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. xlv.

A drop of the creature. A little whisky. The Irish call it "a drop of the crater."

Creature-comforts. Food and other things necessary for the comfort of the body. Man being supposed to consist of body and soul, the body is the creature, but the soul is the "vital spark of heavenly flame."

"Mr. Squeers had been seeking in creature-comforts [brandy and water] temporary forgetfulness of his unpleasant situation."—Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.

Credat Judæus or Credat Judeus. Tell that to the Marines. That may do for Apella, but I don’t believe a word of it. Who this Apella was, nobody knows. (Horace: Satires, v. line 100.)

* Cicero mentions a person of this name in Ad Atticum (12, cp. 19); but see, Ducange.
Credence Table. The table near the altar on which the bread and wine are deposited before they are consecrated. In former times food was placed on a credence-table to be tasted provisionally so its being set before the guests. This was done to assure the guests that the meat was not poisoned. The Italian credenza means to taste meats placed on the credenza. (Italian, la credenza, a shelf or buffet; Greek, kreas, food.)

Credito Fonciére (French). A company licensed to borrow money for city and other improvements connected with estates. A board of guardians may form such a company, and their security would be the parish rates. The money borrowed is repaid by instalments with interest. The word fonciére means "landed," as impôt fonciére (land-tax), bien fonciére (landed property), and so on.

Credito Mobiliére (French). A company licensed to take in hand all sorts of trading enterprises, such as railways, and to carry on the business of stock-jobbers. The word mobiliére means personal property, general stock, as bien mobiliére (personal chattels), mobiliére viv et mort (live and dead stock).

Cres'kenpit. A fictitious river near Hustleroe, according to the invention of Master Reynard, who calls on the Haro to attest the fact. (Reynard the Fox.)

Cremo'na. An organ stop, a corruption of the Italian cornamuse, which is the German krummhorn, an organ stop of eight feet pitch; so called from a wind-instrument made of wood, and bent outwards in a circular arc (krummhorn, crooked horn).

Cremo'nas. Violins of the greatest excellence; so called from Cremo'na, where for many years lived some makers of them who have gained a world-wide notoriety, such as Andrea Amati and Antonio his son, Antonio Stradivarius his pupil, and Giuseppe Guarnerius the pupil of Stradivarius. Cremo'na has long since lost its reputation for this manufacture.

"In silvis viva silvis; cano'ra jam mortua cano." A motto on a Cremo'na.

Crep'lodynam. Supra crep'lodynam. Talking about subjects above one's métier, meddling and muddling matters of which you know little or nothing. (See CORBELER.)

Cres'cent. Tradition says that "Philip, the father of Alexander, meeting with great difficulties in the siege of Byzantium, set the workmen to undermine the walls, but a crescent moon discovered the design, which miscarried; consequently the Byzantines erected a statue to Diann, and the crescent became the symbol of the state."

Another legend is that Othman, the Sultan, saw in a vision a crescent moon, which kept increasing till its horns extended from east to west, and he adopted the crescent of his dream for his standard, adding the motto, "Duce reg' beat orbem."

Cres'cent City (Thc.). New Orleans, in Louisiana, U.S.

Cres'cett. Cysecit sub pow'dere Virtus (Virtue thrives best in adversity). The allusion is to the palm-tree, which grows better when pressed by an incumbent weight.

Many plants grow the better for being pressed, as grass, which is wonderfully improved by being rolled frequently with a heavy roller, and by being trodden down by sheep.

Cressell'e (2 syl.). A wooden rattle used formerly in the Roman Church during Passion week, instead of bells, to give notice of Divine worship. Supposed to represent the rattling in the throat of Christ while hanging on the cross.

Cres'sett. A beacon-light; properly "a little cross." So called because originally it was surmounted by a little cross. (French, croise'tte.)

Cress'ida, daughter of Calchas the Greek priest, was beloved by Troilus, one of the sons of Priam. They vowed eternal fidelity to each other, and as pledges of their vow Troilus gave the maiden a sleeve, and Cressid gave the Trojan prince a glove. Scarse had the vow been made when an exchange of prisoners was agreed to. Diomed gave up three Trojan princes, and was to receive Cressid in lieu thereof. Cressid vowed to remain constant, and Troilus swore to rescue her. She was led off to the Grecian's tent, and soon gave all her affections to Diomed—nay, even bade him wear the sleeve that Troilus had given her in token of his love.

"As false
As air, as water, wind, or sandy earth,
As fox to lamb, as wolf to heifer's calf,
Fard to the hound, or step-dame to her son;
'Yes,' let them say, to stick the heart of falsehood.
As false as Cressid.'"
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

Cresswell (Madame). A woman of infamous character who bequeathed £10 for a funeral sermon, in which nothing ill should be said of her. The Duke of Buckingham wrote the sermon, which was as follows: "All I shall say of her is this—she was born well, she married well, lived well, and died well; for she was born at Shud-well, married to Cresswell, lived at Clerken-well, and died in Bride-well."

Cressy (Battle of). Won by Edward
III. and the Black Prince over Philippe
VI. of France, August 26, 1346.

"Cressy was lost by kickeawa and sump measure."
Fenelon: Prov. to Southern's Spartan Dame.

Crestfallen. Dispirited. The allusion is to fighting cocks, whose crest falls in defeat and rise rigid and of a dep colour red in victory.

"Shall I seem crest-fallen in my father's sight?"
Shakespeare: Richard II., i. 1.

Crete. Hound of Crete. A bloodhound.

"Coupe le gorge, that's the word. I thee defy again, a hound of Crete."
Shakespeare: Henry V., ii. 1.

The Infamy of Crete. The Minotaur.

"There lay stretched
The Infamy of Crete, defeated brood
Of the fourest herc."
Pope: Hell, xili. (Curry's translation).

Creticus. Metellus, the Roman general, was so called because he conquered Crete (Candia).

Cretinism. Mental imbecility accompanied by goitre. So called from the Cretins of the Alps. The word is a corrupution of Christian (Christien), because, being baptised, and only idiots, they were "washed from original sin," and incable of actual sin. Similarly, idiots are called innocents. (French crétin, crétinsme.)

Crox. White builace. (Dutch, kriclek, cherry; Latin, corassin.)

Crib (A.). Slang for a house or dwelling as a "Stocking Crib" (i.e. a hosier)' or a "Thimble Crib" (i.e. a silver-smith's). Crib is an ox-stall.
(Anglo-Saxon, cribe, a stall, a bed, etc.)

"Where no open are, the crib is clean."—Prov.
xiv. 4.

A child's crib is a child's bed. (See preceding column.)

Crib (A.). A petty theft; a literal translation of some foreign work, stealth-ily employed to save trouble.

"We are glad to turn from the chorus of Ecchylus, or the odes of Horace, confected in English verse by some petty scholar, to the original text, and the honest help of a school-boy's crib."—Baizae's Shorter Stories: Prefatory Notes, p. 10.

Crib. To steal small articles. (Saxon, crybb; Irish, griib; our grab, grapple, grip, grip, etc.)

Cricket.
The diminutive of the Anglo-Saxon crick, a staff or crutch. In the Bodleian library is a MS. (1444) picture of a monk bowling a ball to another monk, who is about to strike it with a crick. In the field are other monks. There are no wickets, but the batsman stands before a hole, and the art of the game was either to get the ball into the hole, or to catch it.

Perhaps the earliest mention of the word "cricket" is 1593. John Derrick, gent., tells us when he attended the "free school of Guildeforde, he and his fellowes did runne and play there at crickett and other plaies." It was a Wykehamist game in the days of Elizabeth.

A single stump was placed in the seventeenth century at each hole to point out the place to bowlers and fielders. In 1700 two stumps were used 24 inches apart and 12 inches high, with long nails atop.

A middle stump was added by the Hambledon Club in 1779, and the height of the stumps was raised to 22 inches.

In 1814 they were made 26 inches, and in 1817 they were reduced to 22 inches— the present height. The length of run is 22 yards.

The first cricket club was Hambledon, which practically broke up in 1791, but existed in name till 1825.

Criel. A profane oath; a perverted form of the word Christ.

Crielon. Where wert thou, Crielon?
Crielon, surnamed the Bruer, in his old age went to church, and listened intently to the story of the Crucifixion.
In the middle of the narrative he grew excited, and, unable to contain himself, cried out, "Ou elies - tu, Crielon?"
(What were you about, Crielon, to allow of such things as these?).

N.B. Louis de Berton des Balbes de Crielon was one of the greatest captains.
of the sixteenth century. Born in Provence 1541, died 1615.

Henri IV., after the battle of Arques (1589), wrote to Crimen the following letter: "Prouez, sire, Crimen vous envoie saluer à Arques, et en v’aim pas." The first and last part of this letter have become proverbial.

Crimen lese Majestatis (Latin). High treason.

Crimp. A decoy; a man or woman that is on the look-out to decoy the unwary. It is more properly applied to an agent for supplying ships with sailors, but these agents are generally in league with public-houses and private lodging-houses of low character, into which they decoy the sailors and relieve them of their money under one pretence or another. (Welsh, crumpya, to squeeze or pinch; Norwegian, kryppa, a sponge.)

Crimp of Death (Crimping). A thief-catcher. A crimp is a decoy, especially of soldiers and sailors. (See above.)

"Here lie three crimps of death, knocked down by fate, of justice, the staunch blood-hounds keen." Peter Pindar: Epitaph on Two Seamen, Shoemakers, and Sedan.

Crip'ple. A battered or bent six-pence; so called because it is hard to make it go.

Crip'plegate. St. Giles is the patron saint of cripples and beggars, and was himself a cripple. Churches dedicated to this saint are, therefore, in the suburbs of large towns, as St. Giles of London, Norwich, Cambridge, Salisbury, etc. Cripplegate, London, was so called before the Conquest from the number of cripples who resorted thither to beg. (Stowe.)

Cris-cross Row (Christ-cross row). The A B C horn-book, containing the alphabet and nine digits. The most ancient of these infant-school books had the letters arranged in the form of a Latin cross, with A at the top and Z at the bottom; but afterwards the letters were arranged in lines, and a + was placed at the beginning to remind the learner that "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom."

"Mortals never shall know More than contained of old the Chris-cross row." Tickell: The Horn-Book.

Cris'han. An incorrate deity of perfect beauty. King Canza, being informed that a child of the family of Devaci would overturn his throne, gave orders to destroy all the male infants that were born. When Krishna was born, his brother conveyed him secretly to the house of a shepherd king; but Canza discovered his retreat, and sent the monster Kākshas to poison him. The tale says the infant child sucked the monster to death, and so escaped. As he grew up, his beauty was so divine that all the princesses of Hindustan fell in love with him, and even to the present hour he is the Apollo of India and the "idol of women." His images are always painted a deep azure colour. (Sir W. Jones.) (See Rama.)

Crisis properly means the "ability to judge." Hippocrates said that all diseases had their periods, when the humours of the body ebbed and flowed like the tide of the sea. These tides he called critical days, and the tide itself a crisis, because it was on these days the physician could determine whether the disorder was taking a good or a bad turn. The seventh and all its multiples were critical days of a favourable character. (Greek, krino, to judge or determine.)

Crispin. A shoemaker. St. Crispin was a shoemaker, and was therefore chosen for the patron saint of the craft. It is said that two brothers, Crispin and Crispian, born in Rome, went to Soissons, in France (A.D. 303), to propagate the Christian religion, and maintained themselves wholly by making and mending shoes. Probably the tale is fabulous, for crepsin is Greek for a shoe. Latin crepsin-a, and St. Crespin or Cripid became Crepin and Creispin.

St. Crispin's Day. October 25th, the day of the battle of Agincourt. Shakespeare makes Crispin Crispian one person, and not two brothers. Hence Henry V. says to his soldiers—

"And Crispin Crispian shall never go by... But we in it shall be remembered." Shakespeare: Henry V., iv. 3.

St. Crispin's holiday. Every Monday, with those who begin the working week on Tuesday: a no-work day with shoemakers. (See Cripin.)

Crite'rior. A standard to judge by. (Greek, kritio, to judge.)

Crit'ic. A judge; an arbiter. (Greek, kritio, to judge.)
Crocator. A captious, malignant critic is called a Zolus (q.v.).

"And what of this new book the whole world makes such a fuss about? " Oh, it is out of all reach; we had rather see some other animal.

7. The abbé Charles Bossuet (1730-1814) was a noted mathematician and geometer.

Prince of Critics. Aristarchos, of Byzantium, who compiled the rhap soleides of Homer. (Second century B.C.)

Stop-watch critics.

"And how did Darius speak the soliloquy last night? " Oh, against all rules, in blank verse, most unmusically. Beware the substantive and the adjective, which should agree together in number, case, and voice, the verb he made a base sonnet, thus—stop- ping as if the point wanted settling; and beware the nominative case, which, you know, means, keep the verbal, he suspended his voice in the epilogue a dozen times, three seconds and three-fifths by a stop-watch, my lord, each time, " Admire the grammarian! " But in suspending his voice was the sense suspended likewise? Did no expression of anxiety or consternation fill up the chasm? Was the eye silent? Did you narrowly look? " I looked only at the stop-watch, my lord. " Excellent observer!"—Sermes: Tristram Shandy, vol. III. chap. XII.

Croaker (2 syl.). A raven, so called from its croak; one who takes a despising view of things. Goldsmith, in his Good-natured Man, has a character so named.

Crouchamshire. Northumberland is so called from the peculiar croaking of the natives in speaking. This is especially observable in Newcastle and Morpeth, where the people are said to be born with a burr in their throats, which prevents their giving effect to the letter r.

Croc mitaine (-4). A fire-eater, one always ready to quarrel and fight. (See Croquemitaine.)

Crocodile (3 syl.). A symbol of deity among the Egyptians, because it is the only aquatic animal, says Plutarch, which has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen; so God sees all, Himself not being seen. To this he subsequently adds another reason, saying, "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech." (De Iside et Osiride, vol. ii. p. 381.)

7. Achilles Tatius says, "The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year." Another tradition is, that during the seven days held sacred to Apis, the crocodile will harm no one.

Crocodile (King). A king who devours his people, or at least their substance. Browne, in his Travels, tells us that there is a king crocodile, as there is a queen bee. The king crocodile has no tail.

Crocodile's Eye. Hieroglyphic for the morning.

Crocodile's Tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is, that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress, to allure travellers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it.

"As the mournful crocodile
With sorrow проис inmiting passengers."

Crocum in Cilician ferrre. To carry coals to Newcastle. As Cilicius abounds with saffron, to send it there would be needless and extravagant excess. For similar phrases, see Alcinoo Poma Dare, Noctuas Athenas, Coales.

Croesus. Rich as Cyrus. Croesus, King of Lydia, was so rich and powerful that all the wise men of Greece were drawn to his court, and his name became proverbial for wealth. (n.c. 560-546.) (See Cyrus.)

Crom'ernash. Chief idol of the Irish before the preaching of St. Patrick. It was a gold or silver image surrounded by twelve little brazen ones.

Cromlech. A large stone resting on two or more others, like a table. (Welsh, Crom, bent; Lech, a flat stone.)

Weyland Smith's cave (Berkshire), Trevethy stone (Cornwall), Kit's Coty House (Kent). Irby and Mangles saw twenty-seven structures just like these on the banks of the Jordan; at Plas Newydd (Anglesey) are two cromlechs; in Cornwall they are numerous; so are they in Wales; some few are found in Ireland, as the "killing-stone" in Louth. In Brittany, Denmark, Germany, and some other parts of Europe, cromlechs are to be found.

Cromwell in the part of "Tactus." (See Tactus.)

Cron, properly speaking, means a awe whose teeth are worn out; but metaphorically it means any toothless old beldam. (Irish, ciuma, old; allied to the Grec geronta, an old man.)

"Take up the bastard; take 't up, I say; give's to thy cron."—Shakespeare: Winter's Tale, II. 3.
Croonian Sea. The north polar sea. Pliny says, "A Thule unus dui navigatio nért marét concretum, a nonnullis eironium appellata tur." (Natural History, iv. 16.)

"As when two polar winds blowing adverse Upon the Croonian sea." Milton: Paradise Lost, v. 250.

Cro'ny. A familiar friend. An old crook is an intimate of times gone by. Probably crook with the diminutive ic for endearment, and equivalent to "dear old fellow," "dear old boy." (See CRONE.)

Crook in the Lot. There is a crook in the lot of everyone. There is vexation bound up in every person's lot of life, a skeleton in the cupboard of every house. A crook in a stick is a bend, a part where the stick does not run straight, hence a "shepherd's crook." When lots were drawn by bits of stick, it was desirable to get sticks which were smooth and straight; but it is very hard to find one without a crook, knot, or some other defect. Boston has a book entitled The Crook in the Lot.

Crooked as Crawly. (See CRAWLEY.)

Crooked Sixpence (A). Said to bring luck. (See MONEY.)

Crooked Stick (A). A self-willed fellow who will neither lead nor drive, neither be led nor driven. (See CROOK.)

Crop Up (or) Out. To rise out of, to appear at the surface. A mining term. Strata which rise to the surface are said to crop out. We also say, such and such a subject crops up from time to time—i.e. rises to the surface; such and such a thing crops out of what you were saying—i.e. apropos thereof.

Cropper. He came a cropper. He fell head over heels. To get a cropper. To get a bad fall. "Neck and cropp" means altogether, and to "come a cropper" is to come to the ground neck and crop.

Croquemitaine [croak-mit-tain], the bogie raised by fear. The romance so called, in raised parts. The first relates the bloody tournament at Fransac, between the champions of the Moorish King Marsillus and the paladins of Charlemagne. The second is the Siege of Saragossa by Charlemagne. The third is the allegory of Fear-Fortress. The epilogue is the disaster at Roncesvalles. The author is M. l'Epine. There is an English version by Tom Hood, illustrated by Gustave Doré (1867). (See FEAR-FORTRESS, MITAINNE, etc.)

Croquet. A game played with a sort of handy stick. The crook was superseded by a kind of mallet. Dufange gives "Croque, croguerain, crogue, bétton avrai d'un croc, au gni est revanché!" (vol. vii. p. 115). The art of the game is to strike your balls through very small hoops arranged in a given order.

Crose (A), in the East Indies, means a hundred lacs of rupees, equal nominally, in round numbers, to a million sterling. (Pronounce e-r, Hindustanee khor.)

Cross. The cross is said to have been made of four sorts of wood (palm, cedar, olive, and cypress), to signify the four quarters of the globe.

"Ligia croceis palmae, cedrus, cupressus, oliva." We are accustomed to consider the sign of the cross as wholly a Christian symbol, originating with the crucifixion of our Redeemer. This is quite erroneous. In ancient Carthage it was used for ornamental purposes. Runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes. Cicero tells us (De Divinatione, ii. 27, and 30, 81) that the augur's staff with which they marked out the heaven was a cross. The ancient Egyptians employed the same as a sacred symbol, and we see on Greek sculptures, etc., a cake with a cross; two such buns were discovered at Herculanenum. It was a sacred symbol among the Aztecs long before the landing of Cortez. (MALTUNE.) In Cosumel it was an object of worship; in Tabasco it symbolised the god of rain; in Palmoque (the Palm of America) it is sculptured on the walls with a child held up adoring it.

"The cross is not only a Christian symbol, it was also a Mexican symbol. It was one of the emblems of Quetzalcoatl, as lord of the four cardinal points, and the four winds that blow therefrom."—Fiske: Discovery of America, vol. ii. chap. viii. p. 230.

Cross (in heraldry). There are twelve crosses in heraldry, called (1) the ordinary cross; (2) the cross humette, or coupé; (3) the cross urdré, or pointed; (4) the cross potent; (5) the cross crosslet; (6) the cross botonne, or treillé; (7) the cross moline; (8) the cross potence; (9) the cross flourie; (10) the cross paté; (11) the Maltese cross (or eight-pointed cross); (12) the cross cloché and flitché. Some heraldic writers enumerate 285 different kinds of crosses.
Cross (a mystic emblem) may be reduced to these four:

The Greek cross (+), founded on Assyrian tablets, Egyptian and Persian monuments, and on Etruscan pottery.

The cross crucis (×), generally called St. Andrew's cross. Quite common in ancient sculpture.

The Latin cross (†), or "crux immaculata." This symbol is also found on coins, monuments, and medals, long before the Christian era.

The tau cross (τ), or "crux commissa." Very ancient indeed, and supposed to be a phallic emblem.

The fato cross with a handle (†) is common to several Egyptian deities, as Isis, Osiris, etc.; and is the emblem of immortality and life generally.

Everyone must bear his own cross. His own burden or troubles. The allusion is to the law that the person condemned to be crucified was to carry his cross to the place of execution.

Get on the cross. Get into bad ways; not go straight.

"It's hard lines to think a fellow must grow up and get on the cross in spite of himself, and come to the gallows foot at last, whether he likes it or not." - Boldtrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. viii.

The judgment of the cross. An ordeal instituted in the reign of Charlemagne. The plaintiff and defendant were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

On the cross. Not "on the square," not straightforward. To get anything "on the cross" is to get it unfairly or surreptitiously.

See Rosicrucians.

Cross (Th). Cross it off or out. Cancel it by running your pen across it. To cancel (q.v.) means to mark it with lattice lines.

Cross, ill-tempered, is the Anglo-Saxon cros.

"Azezyn [against] hem was le rancr and cros." Univer. Manut.

Cross Buns. (See Buns.)

Cross-grained. Patchy, ill-tempered, self-willed. Wood must be worked with the grain; when the grain crosses we get a knot or curling, which is hard to work uniform.

Cross-legged Knights indicate that the person so represented died in the Christian faith. As crusaders were supposed to do, they were generally represented on their tombs with crossed legs.

"Sometimes the figure on the tomb of a knight has his legs crossed at the ankles; this meant that the knight was one crusader. If the legs are crossed at the knees, he went to Purgatory; if at the thighs he went three times." — Bithchfield: Our Village, 1899.

Cross Man (4). Not straightforward; ungain; not honest.

"The storekeeper's knav who are their best customers, the square people of the cross ones." — Boldtrewood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. xvii.

Cross-patch. A disagreeable, ill-tempered person, male or female. Patch means a fool or gossip; so called from his parti-coloured or patched dress. A cross-patch is an ill-tempered fool or gossip. Patch, meaning "fellow," is common enough; half a dozen examples occur in Shakespeare, as a "scourvy patch," a "soldier's patch," "What patch is made our porter?" "a crew of patches," etc.

"Cross-patch, draw the latch, Sit by the fire and snuf; Take a cup, and drink it up, Then call our neighbours in, Old Nursery Rhyme.

Cross-roads. All (except suicides) who were excluded from holy rites were piously buried at the foot of the cross erected on the public road, as the place next in sanctity to consecrated ground. Suicide were ignominiously buried on the highway, with a stake driven through their body.

Cross and Ball, so universally marked on Egyptian figures, is a circle and the letter Τ. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world, and the Τ is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Mercury, meaning wisdom.

The coronation orb is a sphere or ball surmounted by a cross, an emblem of empire introduced in representations of our Saviour. In this case the cross stands above the ball, to signify that the spiritual power is above the temporal.

Cross and Pile. Money; pitch and toss. Hilaire Le Gal tells us that some of the ancient French coins had a cross, and others a column, on the reverse; the column was called a pile, from which comes our word "pillar," and the phrase "pile-driving." Sealeger says that some of the old French coins had a ship on the reverse, the arms of Paris, and that pile means "a ship," whence our word "pilot."

"A man may now justifiably throw up cross and pile for his opinions." — Locke: Human Understanding.

Cross or pile. Heads or tails. The French say pile ou face. The "face" or Cross was the reverse of the coin, the "pile" was the reverse; but at a later period the cross was transferred to the reverse, as in our florins, and the obverse bore a "head" or "polt."

"Marriage is worse than cross I win, pile you lose."

Chevalier: Epitome ill. 66.

Cross nor pile. I have neither cross nor pile. Not a penny in the world. The French phrase is, "N'auront ni croix ni pile" (to have neither one sort of coin nor another).

"Whacum had neither cross nor pile."

Butler: Hudibras, part 1, 3.

Cross as a Bear, or Cross as a bear with a sore head.

Cross as the Tongue. The reference is to tongues which open like a pair of scissors.

Cross as Two Sticks. The reference is to the cross (X).

Crossing the Hand. Fortune-tellers of the gipsy race always bid their dupes to "cross their hand with a bit of silver." This, they say, is for luck. Of course, the sign of the cross warded off witches and all other evil spirits, and, as fortune-telling belongs to the black arts, the palm is signed with a cross to keep off the wiles of the devil. "You need fear no evil, though I am a fortune-teller, if by the sign of the cross you exercise the evil spirit."

Crossing the Line—i.e., the equator.

Crot'alum. A sort of castanet, rattled in dancing. Aristophanes calls a great talker crot'alon (a clack).

Crot'chet. A whim; a fancy; a twist of the mind, like the crotch or crome of a stick. (See Crook.)

"The duke hath crotchets in him."

Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, 11. 2.

Crot'oena's Sage. Pythagoras. So called because at Crotona he established his first and chief school of philosophy. Such success followed his teaching that the whole aspect of the town became more moral and decorous in a marvellously short time. About B.C. 540.

Crouchback. (See Red Rose.)

Crouchmas, from the Invention of the Cross to St. Helen's Day (May 3rd to August 16th). Not Christ-nus, but Cross-nus. Rogation Sunday is called Crouchmas Sunday, and Rogation week is called Crouchmas.

"From bull-cow fast, Till Crouchmas be past" [i.e., August 16th].

Tennyson: May Remembrances.

Crow. As the crow flies. The shortest route between two given places. The crow flies straight to its point of destination. Called the bee-line in America.

Crow. (See Raven.)

I must pluck a crow with you: I have a crow to pick with you. I am displeased with you, and must call you to account. I have a small complaint to make against you. In Howell's proverbs (1659) we find the following, "I have a goose to pluck with you," used in the same sense; and Chaucer has the phrase "Pull a flysh," but means thereby to cheat or flick. Children of distinction among the Greeks and Romans had birds for their amusement, and in their boyish quarrels used to pluck or pull the feathers out of each other's pets. Tyndarus, in his Captives, alludes to this, but instances it with a lapwing. In hieroglyphics a crow symbolises contention, discord, strife.

"If a crow help us in, sirrah, we'll pluck a crow together."—Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors, act 1, 1.

"If not, resolve before we go,
That you and I must pull a crow."

Butler: Hudibras, part 1, 2.

Crow over One (To), is to exult over a vanquished or abused person. The allusion is to cocks, who always crow when they have vanquished an adversary.

Crowbar. An iron with a crook, used for leverage. (Anglo-Saxon, cen.)

"Science is as far removed from brute force as this sword from a crowbar."—Bunyan-Blyton: Leela, book II, chap. 1 1. 33.

Crowd or Crouch. A species of fiddle with six or more strings. The last noted player on this instrument was John Morgan, who died 1720. (Welsh, cruth.)

"O sweet consent, between a crowd and a Jew's harp!"

Lyly.

Crowderee. One of the rabbler leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The original of this character was one Jackson or Jeptho, a milliner, who lived in the New Exchange, Strand. He lost a leg in the service of the Roundheads, and was reduced to the necessity of fiddling from alcohouse to alcohouse for his daily bread. The word means fiddler. (See above, Crow.)

Crown. In heraldry nine crowns are recognised: The oriental, the triumphal or imperial, the diadem, the obisodial crown, the civic, the crown vallery, the mural crown, the naval, and the crown celestial.

The blockhead crown (corona obsidio-nalis), presented by the Romans to the general who liberated a beleaguered army. This was made of grass and wild flowers gathered from the spot.

A camp crown was given by the Romans to him who first forced his way into the enemy’s camp. It was made of gold, and decorated with palmisks.

A civic crown was presented to him who preserved the life of a civic or Roman citizen in battle. This crown was made of oak leaves, and bore the inscription, H.O.C.S.—i.e. hostem occidit, cives servavit (a foe he slew, a citizen saved).

A mural crown was given by the Romans to that man who first scaled the wall of a besieged town. It was made of gold and decorated with battle-marks.

A naval crown was by the Romans given to him who won a naval victory. It was made of gold, and decorated with the beaks of ships.

An olive crown was by the Romans given to those who distinguished themselves in battle in some way not specially mentioned in other clauses.

An ovation crown (corona ovatis) was by the Romans given to the general who vanquished pirates or any despised enemy. It was made of myrtle.

A triumphal crown was by the Romans given to the general who obtained a triumph. It was made of laurel or bay leaves. Sometimes a massive gold crown was given to a victorious general. (See Laurel.)

The iron crown of Lombardy is the crown of the ancient Longobardic kings. It is now at Monza, in Italy. Henry of Luxembourg and succeeding kings were crowned with it. Napoleon I. put it on his head with his own hands. It is a thin fillet of iron, said to be hammerd from a nail of the true cross, covered with a gold circle, enamelled with jewels, etc.

Crown Glass is window glass blown into a crown or hollow globe. It is flattened before it is fit for use.

Crown Office (The). A department belonging to the Court of Queen’s Bench. There are three Crown officers appointed by the Lord Chief Justice—viz. (1) Queen’s Coroners and Attorney; (2) the Master; and (3) the Assistant Master. The offices are held during good behaviour.

Crown of the East—i.e. Antioch, capital of Syria, which consisted of four walled cities, encompassed by a common rampart, that “enrounded them like a coronet.” It was also surnamed “the beautiful.”

Crows (worn by heathen deities):

Apollo wore a crown of laurels.
Bacchus, of grapes or Ivy.
Ceres, of blades of wheat.
Ceres, of corn.
Cybele, of pine leaves.
Flora, of flowers.
Fortuna, of fir-leaves.
The Graces, of olive-leaves.
Hercules, of poplar-leaves.
Hymen, of roses.
Juno, of purple-leaves.
Jupiter, of oak-leaves.
The Lar, of rosemary.
Mercury, of myrtle, olive-leaves, or mulberries.
Minerva, of olive-leaves.
The Muses, of flowers.
Pan, of pine-leaves.
Pluto, of cypresses.
Pomona, of fruits.
Saturn, of vine-leaves.
Venus, of myrtle or roses.

Crownier. Coroner—i.e. an officer of the Crown.

The crownier hath sat on her, and finds it Christian burial.”—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. i.

Crow’s Nest (The), in a Greenlander’s galley, is a small room constructed of staves, something like an empty cask. It is fitted up with seats and other conveniences, and here the person on watch continues for two hours looking out for whales. The whale generally announces his approach by a “blowing,” which may in favourable circumstances be heard several miles off.

Croysado. The Great Croysado. General Lord Fairfax. (Hudibras.)

Crozier or Crozicr. An archbishop’s staff terminates in a floriated cross, while a bishop’s crook has a curved, bracken-like head. A bishop turns his crook outwards, to denote his wider authority; an abbot (whose crook is the same as a bishop’s) carries it turned inwards, to show that his jurisdiction is limited to his own inmates. When walking with a bishop an abbot covers his crook with a veil hanging from the knob, to show that his authority is veiled in the presence of his superior.

Crucial. A crucial test. A very severe and undeniable one. The allusion is to a fancy of Lord Bacon’s, who said that two different diseases or sciences might run parallel for a time, but would ultimately cross each other: thus, the plague might for a time resemble other diseases, but when the bubo or boil appeared, the plague would assume its specific character. Hence the phrases instantia crucis (a crucial or unmistakable symptom, a crucial experiment, a crucial example, a crucial question, etc.

Crude Forms in grammar. The roots or essential letters of words. The words are crude or unfinished. Thus am is the crude form of the verb amo; bon of the adjective bonus; and domin- of the noun dominus.

Cruel (The). Pedro, King of Castile (1334, 1350-1369). Pedro I. of Portugal; also called le Justicier (1320, 1357-1367).

Cruel (now Crewel) Garters. Garters made of worsted or yarn.

"Ha! ha! look, he wears cruel garters."

"Wearing of silk, why art thou so cruel?"

Crummy. That's crummy, that's jolly good. She's a crummy woman, a fine handsome woman. Crummy means fat or flashy. The crummy part of bread is the fleshy or main part. The opposite of "crusty" = ill-tempered.

Crump. "Don't you wish you may get it, Mrs. Crump?" Cross says Mrs. Crump, a farmer's wife, was invited to dine with Lady Coventry, who was very deaf. Mrs. Crump wanted some beer, but, awed by the purple and plush, said, in a half-whisper, "I wish I had some beer, now." Mr. Flunkey, conscious that his mistress could not hear, replied in the same aside, "Don't you wish you may get it?" At this the farmer's wife rose from table and helped herself. Lady Coventry, of course, demanded the reason, and the anecdote soon became a standing joke.

Crusades (2 syl.). Holy wars in which the warriors wore a cross, and fought, nominally at least, for the honour of the cross. Each nation had its special colour, which, says Matthew Paris (i. 446), was red for France; white for England; green for Flanders; for Italy it was blue or azure; for Spain, gules; for Scotland, a St. Andrew's cross; for the Knights Templars, red on white.

The seven Crusades.

1. 1096-1100. Preached up by Peter the Hermit. Led by Godfrey of Bouillon, who took Jerusalem. As a result of this crusade, Geoffrey of Bouillon became the virtual king of Jerusalem.

2. 1147-1149. At the instigation of St. Bernard. Led by Louis VII. and the Emperor Conrad. To secure the union of Europe.

3. 1189-1193. Led by Richard Lion-heart. For knightly distinction. This was against Saladin or Salah-Eddin.

4. 1202-1204. Led by Baldwin of Flanders and the doge. To glorify the Venetians.

5. 1217. Led by John of Brienné, titular King of Jerusalem. To suit his own purpose.

6. 1228-1229. Led by Frederick II. As a result, Palestine was ceded to Frederick (Kaiser of Germany), who was crowned king of Jerusalem.

7. 1248-1254 and (8) 1268-1270. To satisfy the religious scruples of Louis IX.

Crush. To crush a bottle — i.e. drink one. (Cf. Milton's crush the sweet poison. The idea is that of crushing the grapes. Shakespeare has also burst a bottle in the same sense (Induction of Taming the Shrew). (See Crack).

"Come and crush a cup of wine."

Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 2.

To crush a fly on a wheel. To crack a nut with a steam-hammer; to employ power far too valuable for the purpose to be accomplished. The wheel referred to is the rack. (See Break a Butterfly.)

Crush-room (The) of an opera or theatre. A room provided for ladies where they can wait till their carriages are called. Called crush because the room is not only crowded, but all crush towards the door, hoping each call will be that of their own carriage. "Mrs. X.'s carriage stops the way," "Lord X.'s carriage," etc.

Cruëse (4). A solitary man; the only inhabitant of a place. The tale of Defoe is well known, which describes Robinson Crusoe as cast on a desert island, where he employs the most admissible ingenuity in providing for his daily wants.

"Whence creeping forth, to Duty's call he yields, And rolls the Crusoe of the lonely isles." Bloomfield: Farmer's Boy.

Crust. The upper crust (of society). The aristocracy; the upper ten-thousand.

Crusted Port. When port is first bottled its fermentation is not complete; in time it precipitates argol on the sides of the bottle, where it forms a crust. Crusted port, therefore, is port which has completed its fermentation.

The "crust" is composed of argol, tartrate of lime, and colouring matter, thus making the wine more ethereal in quality and lighter in colour.
Crusty. Ill-tempered, apt to take offense. This is formed from the old word cross, cross, peevish.

"Aye, aye! (against) him was he keen ake cross, and said, 'Go out my Pater hons.'"—Curzon Mendis.

Crutched Friars is the Latin cruciati (crossed)—i.e., having a cross embroidered on their dress. They were of the Trinitarian order.

Crux (A). A knotty point, a difficulty. Instantia crucis means a crucial test, or the point where two similar diseases crossed and showed a special feature. It does not refer to the cross, an instrument of punishment; but to the crossing of two lines, called also a node or knot; hence a trouble or difficulty. Quae te mula crucis agitat? (Plautus); What evil cross destroys you?—i.e., what difficulty, what trouble are you under?

Crux Ansa'ata. The tau cross with a loop or handle at the top. (See Cross.)

Crux Decussata. A St. Andrew's cross.

"Crux decussata est in qua duo luna directa et aquilibra inter se obliquantur, cujus formam referunt iudices, ut ad iidem, (Orig. 1, lit.) 'in figura crucis et in numero decem demonstrat.' Here a ulgo Andreasic vocant, quod aestimant aut lucu S. Anodram fuisse nemorum."—Gretry: De Cruce, book 1, p. 2.

Crux Pectoralis. The cross which bishops of the Church of Rome suspend over their breast.

"Crucem cum postero luno vel com reliquis sanctorum aut pectora posturam suspeniit ad colurum, hoc est, quot vocant encolium of crux pectoralis."—See Ducange, Vol. I, p. 362, col. 2, article ENCOLUM.

Cry. Great cry and little wool. This is derived from the ancient mystery of David and Abigail, in which Nabul is represented as shearing his sheep, and the Devil, who is made to attend the churl, imitates the act by "shearing a hog." Originally, the proverb ran thus, "Great cry and little wool, as the Devil said when he sheared the hogs." N.B. —Butler alters the proverb into "All cry and no wool."

Cry of Animals (The). (See Animals.)

Cry (To). To cry over spilt milk. To fret about some loss which can never be repaired.

Cry Cave (To). To ask mercy; to throw up the sponge; to confess oneself beaten. (Latin, caveo.) (See Cave In.)

Cry Havoc! No quarter. In a tract entitled The Office of the Constable and Marscahill in the Tyrme of Werre (contained in the Black Book of the Admiralty), one of the chapters is, "The peyne of hym that crieth havock, and of them that followeth him"—"Item si quis inventus fuerit qui clamavere inceperit qui vocatur haroc."

"Cry Havock, and let slip the dogs of war."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1

Cry Quits. (See Quits.)

Cry Vinegar (To). In French, Crier l'Vinaigre. The shout of sportsmen when a hare is caught. He cries "Vinegar!"—he has caught the hare; metaphorically it means, he has won success. "C'etait, dit le Ducat, la coutume en Languecor, entre les chasseurs, de s'acter l'un à l'autre 'Vinaigre,' dès qu'ils avaient tiré un lièvre, parce que la vraie saute de cet animal est le vinaigre."

Crier au Vinaigre has quite another meaning. It is the reproach to a landlord who serves his customers weak wine. In a figurative sense it means Crier au Voleur.

Cry Wolf. (See Wolf.)

Crystal Hills. On the coast of the Caspian, near Badkoo, is a mountain which sparkles like diamonds, from the sea-glass and crystals with which it abounds.

Crystal line (3-syl.). The Crystalline sphere. According to Ptolemy, between the "primum mobile" and the firmament or sphere of the fixed stars comes the crystalline sphere, which oscillates or has a shimmering motion that interferes with the regular motion of the stars. "They pass the planets seven, and pass the "fixed."

And that crystalline sphere, whose balance weighs
The trepidation talked of."

Milton: Paradise Lost, ii.

Cub. An ill-mannered lout. The cub of a bear is said to have no shape until its dam has licked it into form.

"A bear's a savage beast, of all
Most ugly and unnatural;
Whelped without form until the dam
Has licked it into shape and frame."

Butler: Hudibras, i. 3.

Cuba. The Roman deity who kept guard over infants in their cribs and sent them to sleep. Verb cubo, to lie down in bed.

Cube. A fruitless cube. A truly good man; a regular brick. (See Brick.)

"О γάες εἰς ἄνθροπος ἡμάς τερέγονος ἄνων ψώγων.—Aristotle: Nicomachean Ethics, i. 11, sec. 11.

Cucking-stool (The) or Choking-stool, for ducking scolds, is not connected with choke (to stifle), but the French choquer; hence the archaic verb cuck (to throw), and one still in use, chuck.
Cuckold

The cuckoo-stool is the stool which is chuckled or thrown into the water.

"Now, if one cuckoo-stool was for each soul, some towns, I fear, would not have their numbers hold."
—Poor Robin (1766).

Cuckold. (See Acteon.)

Cuckold King (The). Mark of Cornwall, whose wife Yeault intrigued with Sir Tristram, one of the Knights of the Round Table.

Cuckold's Point. A spot on the riverside near Deptford. So called from a tradition that King John made there successful love to a labourer's wife.

Cuckoo. A cuckold. The cuckoo occupies the nest and eats the eggs of other birds; and Dr. Johnson says "it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out 'Cuckoo,' which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned." Green calls the cuckoo "the cuckold's quisirer" (Quip for an Upright Citizen, 1820). This is an instance of how words got in time perverted from their original meaning. The Romans used to call an adulterer a "cuckoo," as "Tee cuocumannu non ex lustuus raped" (Plut. Asinaria, v. 3), and the allusion was simple and correct; but Dr. Johnson's explanation will hardly satisfy anyone for the modern perversion of the word.

"The cuckoo, then, on every tree,
Mock's married men; for thus sings he,
Cuckoo!
Cuckoo! cuckoo! a word of fear,
Unlooking love married out!"
—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, i. 2

Cuckoo (A). A watch or clock. The French have the same slang word cognac for a watch or clock. Of course, the word is derived from the German cuckoo-clocks, which, instead of striking the hour, cry cuckoo.

Cuckoo Oats and Woodcock Hay. Cuckoo oats and woodcock hay make a farmer run away. If the spring is so backward that oats cannot be sown till the cuckoo is heard (i.e. April), or if the autumn is so wet that the aftermath of hay cannot be got in till woodcock shooting (middle of November), the farmer must be a great sufferer.

Cuckoo-N Spit, "Frog - Spit," or "Froth-Spit." The spume which forms the nidus of an insect called the Cicada Spumaria, or, more strictly speaking, the Cercoea Spumaria (one of the three divisions of the Ciadarina). This spume is found on lavender-bushes, rosemary, fly-catch, and some other plants. Like the cochinelle, the cicada spumaria exudes a foam for its own warmth, and for protection during its transition state. The word "cuckoo" in this case means spring or cuckoo-time.

Cucumber Time. The dull season in the tailoring trade. The Germans call it Die saure Gurken Zeit (pickled gherkin time). Hence the expression Tailors are vegetarians, because they live on "cucumber" when without work, and on "cabbage" when in full employ. (Notes and Queries.) (See Gurken.)

"Hast got thy breakfast, brother cuddy?"
—D. Wrode.

Cudgel One's Brains (To). To make a painful effort to remember or understand something. The idea is from taking a stick to beat a dull boy under the notion that dulness is the result of temper or inattention.

"Cudgel thy brains no more about it: for your dull ass will not mend his pace with beating."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 1.

Cudgels. To take up the cudgels. To maintain an argument or position. To fight, as with a cudgel, for one's own way.

"For some reason he did not feel as hot to take up the cudgels for Ainsworth with his mother."—M. K. Wilkins: A Modern Dragon.

Cue (I syl.). The tail of a sentence (French, queue), the catch-word which indicates when another actor is to speak; a hint; the state of a person's temper, as "So-and-so is in a good cue (or) bad cue." "When my cue comes, call me, and I will answer."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, v. 1.

To give the cue. To give the hint. (See above.)

Cuffy. A negro; both a generic word and proper name.

"Samba and Cuffy expand under every sky."—Mrs. Beecher Stone: Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Cui bono? Who is benefited thereby? To whom is it a gain? The more usual meaning attached to the words is, What good will it do? For what good purpose? It was the question of Judge Cassius. (See Cicero: Pro Milone, i., sec. 32.)

"Cui, that great and grave philosopher, old commons demand, when any new project was proposed unto him, cui bono, what good will ensue in case the same is effectuated?"—Fuller: Worthies (The Design, i.)

Cuirass. Sir Arthur's cuirass was "carved of one emerald, centred in a Cuishes. Or Cuises (2 syl.). Armour for the thighs. (French, cuisse, the thigh.)

"Soon o'er his thighs he placed the cuises bright."
"His cuises on his thighs, gaudily armed."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, iv. 1.

Cul de sac (French). A blind alley, or alley blocked up at one end like a sack. Figuratively, an argument, etc., that leads to nothing.

Cúideachta. A religious order of Ireland and Scotland, said to have been founded in the sixth century by St. Columba. So called from the Gaelic caille-cho (a house of cells) or ceileadh (servants of God, cell, a servant). Giraldus Cambrensis, going to the Latin for its etymology, according to a custom unhappily not yet extinct, derives it from colo-deus (to worship God).

Cullis. A very fine and strong broth, well strained, and much used for invalids. (French, condis, from couler, to strain.)

Cully. A top, a fool, a dupe. A contracted form of cullion, a despicable creature (Italian, cogliente). Shakespeare uses the word two or three times, as "Away, base cullions!" (2 Henry VI., i. 3), and again in Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2 —"And makes a god of such a cullion." (Compare GULL.)

"You base cullion, you!"
—Ben Jonson: Every Man in His Humour, ii. 2.

Culminate (3 syl.). Come to a crisis. The passage of a celestial body over the meridian at the upper transit is called its culmination. (Latin, culmen, the top.)

Culross Girdles. The thin plate of iron used in Scotland for the manufacture of oat cakes is called a "girllie" for which Culross was long celebrated.

"Loose and lars, plough-and-harrow
And why not grates and fireproofs, and Culver. Pigeon. (Old English, colver; Latin, columba; hence culver-house, a dove-cote.)

"On liquid wings,
The sounding culver snorts."
—Thomson: Spring 432.

Culverin properly means a serpent (Latin, culubrum, the coluber), but is applied to a long, slender piece of artillery employed in the sixteenth century to carry balls to a great distance. Queen Elizabeth's "Pocket Pistol" in Dover Castle is a culverin.

Culverkeys. The keys or flowers of the culver or columba, i.e. columbine. (Anglo-Saxon culfre, a dove.)

Cum Grano Salis. With its grain of salt; there is a grain of wheat in the bushel of chaff, and we must make the proper abatement.

Cum Hoc, Propter Hoc. Because two or more events occur consecutively or simultaneously, one is not necessarily the outcome of the other. Sequence of events is not always the result of cause and effect. The swallows come to England in the spring, but do not bring the spring.

"[Free trade and revival of trade] says Lord Penzance, rane simultaneously, but, he adds, 'there is no more dangerous form of reasoning than the cum hoc, propter hoc.'"—Nineteenth Century, April, 1868.

Cumberland Poet (Thw). William Wordsworth, born at Cockermouth. (1770-1850.)

Cummor. A gammer, gudewife, old woman. A variety of gammer which is grande-mère (our grandmother), as gaffer is grand-père or grandfather. It occurs scores of times in Scott's novels.

Cunetator [the delayer]. Quintus Fabius Maximus, the Roman general who baffled Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wearing him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. This was the policy by which Duguesclin forced the English to abandon their possessions in France in the reign of Charles V. (Le Sage).

(See FABIUS.)

Cuneiform Letters. Letters like wedges (Latin, cuneus, a wedge). These sort of letters occur in old Persian and Babylonian inscriptions. They are sometimes called Arrow-headed characters, and those found at Babylon are called nail-headed. This species of writing is the most ancient of which we have any knowledge; and was first really deciphered by Grotefend in 1802.

Cunning Man or Woman. A fortune-teller, one who professes to discover stolen goods. (Anglo-Saxon, cunning, to know.)

Cuneo. The ranger, father of Agatha, in Weber's opera of Der Freischutz.

Cùnobelin's Gold Mines. Caverns in the chalk beds of Little Thurrock, Essex; so called from the tradition that King Cùnobelin hid in them his gold. They are sometimes called Dane-holes, because they were used as lurking-places by the Norsemen.
Cunstance. A model of Resignation, daughter of the Emperor of Rome. The Sultan of Syria, in order to have her for his wife, renounced his religion and turned Christian; but the Sultan's mother murdered him, and turned Cunstance adrift on a raft. After a time the raft stranded on a rock near Northumberland, and the constable rescued Cunstance, and took her home, where she converted his wife, Hermegild. A young lord fell in love with her; but, his suit being rejected, he murdered Hermegild, and laid the charge of murder against Cunstance. King Ella adjudged the cause, and Cunstance being proved innocent, he married her. While Ella was in Scotland, Cunstance was confined with a boy, named Maurice; and Ella’s mother, angry with Cunstance for the introduction of the Christian religion, put her on a raft adrift with her baby boy. They were accidentally found by a senator, and taken to Rome. Ella, having discovered that his mother had turned his wife and child adrift, put her to death, and went to Rome in pilgrimage to atone for his crime. Here he fell ill with his wife and son. Maurice succeeded his grandfather as Emperor of Rome, and at the death of Ella, Cunstance returned to her native land. (Chaucer: The Man of Law's Tale.)

Cuntrur. A bird worshipped by the ancient Peruvians. It is generally called the “conun,” and by the Arabians the “roc.”

Cup. A deadly cup. Referring to the ancient practice of putting persons to death by poison, as Socrates was put to death by the Athenians.

“In the land of the Lord there is a cup [a deadly cup], the drugs whereof all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out and drink them.”—Psalm lxxv. 8.

Let this cup pass from me. Let this trouble or affliction be taken away, that I may not be compelled to undergo it. The allusion is to the Jewish practice of assigning to guests a certain portion of wine—as, indeed, was the custom in England at the close of the eighteenth century and the first quarter of the nineteenth. This cup is “full of the wine of God’s fury,” let me not be compelled to drink it.

Many a slip twixt the cup and the lip. (See ANGEUS.)

My [or his] cup runs over. My blessings overflow. Here cup signifies portion or blessing.

Cupboard Love. Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

“My cup raneth over... goodness and mercy follow me all the days of my life”—Psalm xxxiii. 5, 6.

We must drink the cup. We must bear the burden awarded to us, the sorrow which falls to our lot. The allusion is to the words of our Lord in the garden of Gethsemanie (Matt. xxvi. 39; also xx. 22). One way of putting criminals to death in ancient times was by poison; Socrates had hemlock to drink. In allusion to this it is said that Jesus Christ tasted death for every man (Heb. ii. 9).

Cup in the university of Cambridge, means a mixture of strong ale with spice and a lemon, served up hot in a silver cup. Sometimes a roasted orange takes the place of a lemon. If wine is added, the cup is called bishop; if brandy is added, the beverage is called cardinal. (See Bisnode.)

Cup Tossor. A juggler (French, jouer de goblet). The old symbol for a juggler was a goblet. The phrase and symbol are derived from the practice of jugglers who toss in the air, twist on a stick, and play all sorts of tricks with goblets or cups.

Cup of Vows. (The). It used to be customary at feasts to drink from cups of mead, and vow to perform some great deed worthy of the song of a skald. There were four cups: one to Odin, for victory; one to Frey, for a good year; one to Niord, for peace; and one to Bragi, for celebration of the dead in poetry.

Cups. He was in his cups. Intoxicated. (Latin, inter pocula, inter visa.) (Horace: 3 Odys, vi. 20.)

Cupar. He that will to Cupar man to Cupar. Ho that will have his own way, must have it even to his injury. The reference is to the Cistercian monastery, founded here by Malcolm IV.

Cupar Justice. Same as “Jedburgh Justice,” hang first and try afterwards. Abingdon Law is another phrase. It is said that Major-General Brown, of Abingdon, in the Commonwealth, first hanged his prisoners and then tried them.

Cupboard Love. Love from interested motives. The allusion is to the love of children to some indulgent person who gives them something nice from her cupboard.

“Cupboard love is seldom true.”—Poor Bobia.
Cupid. The god of love, and son of Venus. According to fable he wets with blood the grindstone on which he sharpen's his arrows.

"Fernus et Cupido,
Semper ardentes arvensis sacrates.
Horace: 2 Gedae, viii. 14, 15.

The best statues of this little god are "Cupid Sleeping," in Albano (Rome); "Cupid playing with a Swan," in the Capitol; "Cupid mounted on a Tiger," (Negrone); and "Cupid stringing his Bow," in the Louvre (Paris). Raphael's painting of Cupid is in the Farnesina (Rome).

Cupid and Psyche. An exquisite episode in the Golden Ass of Apuleius. It is an allegory representing the progress of the soul to perfection. Mrs. Tighe has a poem on the same subject; and Molière a drama entitled Psyche. (See Morris, Earthly Paradise [May].)

"De quo sagittis promisi duo tela pharetra Dherrimum operum; fugat huc, facta illud amorem.
Quod factum ad umatum est, et cupide fugebat arcus.—
Quod fugat obsessum est, et imberet sub arundine plumbum."

Ovid: Met. Apollo and Daphne.

"I swear to thee by Cupid's strongest bow;
By his best arrow with the golden head;
By that which killeth souls and prosperous love."—
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream.

Cupidon (Le Jeune). Count d'Orsay was so called by Lord Byron (1798-1852). The Count's father was styled Le beau d'Orsay.

Cur. A fawning, mean-spirited fellow; a crop-tailed dog (Latin, curritus, crop-tailed: French, cour; our cur). According to forest laws, a man who had no right to the privilege of the chase was obliged to cut off the tail of his dog. Hence, a dogenerate dog or man is called a cur.

"What would you have, you cur,
That likes not peace nor war?"
Shakespeare: Coriolanus, i. 1.

Curate. (See Clerical Titles.)

Curé de Meudon—i.e. Rabelais, who was first a monk, then a leech, then prebend of St. Maur, and lusty curé of Meudon. (1493-1553.)

Curettes (3 syll.). A mythical people of Crete, to whom the infant Zeus or Jupiter was entrusted by his mother Rhea. By clashing their shields they drowned the cries of the infant, to prevent its father (Cronus) from finding the place where the babe was hid.

Curfew Bell. The bell rung in the reigns of William I. and II. at sunset, to give notice to their subjects that they were to put out their fires and candles (French, couvre feu, cover-fire). The Klokans in Abo, even to the present day, traverse the towns crying the "go-to-bed time." Those abroad are told to "make haste home," and those at home to "put out their fires." Abolished, as a police regulation, by Henry I.

"The curfew tolls the knell of parting day."—
Gray: Elegy.

Curmudgeon (3 syll.). A grasping, miserly churl. Dr. Johnson gives the derivation of this word thus, "wear merchant, unknown correspondent." Dr. Ash, in his dictionary, says, "cur, un known; mercant; correspondent." a blunder only paralleled by the schoolboy translation of the Greek, me genwou, by μή (God) γίνεσθαι (forbid) (Luko xx. 6).

Currant. A corruption of Corni, hence called by Juvenal Cornitiaca avre.

Current. The drift of the current is the rate per hour at which the current runs.

The setting of the current is that point of the compass towards which the waters of the current run.

Currente Calamo (Latin). Offload; without premeditation; written off at once, without making a rough copy first.

Currex Bell. The nom de plume of Charlotte Brontë.

Curry Favour. The French courir, to hunt after, to seek, as courir une charge, courir un bénéfice, to sue for a living; courir les tables, to go spurning. Similarly, courir les faveurs, to sue for, court, or seek favours.

Cure or Cuss. Not worth a curse. I don't care a curse (or cuss). Here "curse" is a corruption of curse or serce. Similarly, the Latin mitt [mitte] is me hulm, not [worth] the black eye of a beam. Other phrases are "not a straw," "not a pin," "not a rap," "not a dam," "not a bit," "not a jot," "not a pin's point," "not a button." (Anglo-Saxon, curse, cress; German, kirsch, a cherry.)

Wisdom and wit nowce is not vorte a kerse!
Robert Langland: P. in Ploughman.

Curse of Scotland. The nine of diamonds. The two most plausible suggestions are these: (1) The nine of diamonds in the game of Pope Joan is called the Pope, the Antichrist of the Scotch reformers. (2) In the game of comette, introduced by Queen Mary, it is the great winning card, and the game was the curse of Scotland because it was the ruin of so many families.

Other suggestions are these. (3) The word "curse" is a corruption of cress, and the nine of diamonds is so arranged as to form a St. Andrew's Cross; but as the nine of hearts would do as well, this explanation must be abandoned. (4) Some say it was the card on which the "Butcher Duke" wrote his cruel order after the Battle of Culloden; but the term must have been in vogue at the period, as the ladies nicknamed Justice-Clerk Ormiston "The Nine of Diamonds" (1715). (5) Similarly, we must reject the suggestion that it refers to the arms of Dalrymple, Earl of Stair—viz., on a saltire azure, nine lozenges of the first. The Earl was justly held in abhorrence for the massacre of Glencoe; so also was Colonel Packer, who attended Charles I. on the scaffold, and had for his arms "gules a cross lozengy or."

Grose says of the nine of diamonds: "Diamonds . . . imply royalty . . . and every ninth King of Scotland has been observed for many ages to be a tyrant and a curse to the country."—Your Thre' Seddint, 1780.

"It is a pity that Grose does not give the names of these kings. Malcolm III. was assassinated in 1094 by Macbeth, William was taken prisoner by Henry II. (died 1154), James I. was assassinated in 1513.

Curses. Curses, like chickens, come home to roost. Curses fall on the head of the curser, as chickens which stray during the day return to their roost at night.

Cursing by Bell, Book, and Candle, is reading the anathema in the church, then closing the Bible, tolling the bell, and extinguishing all the candles, saying "Fiat, fiat! Do-to (close) the Book, quench the candles, ring the bell. Amen, amen."

Cursitor (Latin, clericae de cursu). Formerly a clerk of the course; a chancery clerk, who made out original writs for the beat, course, or part of the county allotted him. A Newgate solicitor was called a cursitor in depreciation of his office.

Curt. Curt cous hare curz hors. Angry men cannot do all the mischief they wish. Curt means "angry" or "fierce," and curt is "short." as curmantle, curt-hose. The Latin proverb is, "Dat Deus immittit cor'nae curta boci."

"You are called plain Kate.
And bonny Kate, and sometimes the curt."—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, II. 1.

Curtail. To cut short. (French, court taillier, to short cut, whence the old French courtail.)

Curtain (The). In fortification, the line of rampart which joins together the flanks of two "bastions" (q.v.).

Curtain. To ring down the curtain. To bring a matter to an end. A theatrical term. When the act or play is over, the bell rings and the green curtain comes down.

"A few more matters of routine will be accomplished, and then the curtain will be rung down on the Session of 1861."—Newspaper Paragraph, July 27th, 1862.

Curtain Lecture. The nagging of a wife after her husband is in bed. The lectures of Mrs. Caudle in French are first-rate caricatures of these "small cattle."

"Resolves what endless brawls by wives are bred. The curtain lecture makes a most awful bed."—Dryden.

Curtal Friar. A friar who served as an attendant at the gate of a monastery court. As a curtal dog was not privileged to hunt or course, so a curtal friar virtually meant a worldly-minded one.

"Some do call me the curtal Friar of Fountain Dale: others again call me in jest the Abbot of Fountain Abbey: others still again call me simply Friar Turk."—Howard Payne: The Merry Adventures of Robin Hood, II. p. 141.

Curtana. The sword of Edward the Confessor, which, having no point, was the emblem of mercy. The royal sword of England was so called to the reign of Henry III.

"But when Curtana will not do the deed,
You lay the pointless clergy-weapon by,
And to the laws, your sword of justice, lo!"

Curthoes (2 syl.). Robert II., Duc de Normandie (1087-1134).

Curtise (2 syl.). The little hound in the tale of Reynard the Fox, by Heinrich von Alkmam (1498). (High German, kurt; French, courte, short or small.)

Curtmantle. The surname of Henry II. He introduced the Anjou mantle, which was shorter than the robe worn by his predecessors. (1133, 1151-1189.) (See Caracalla.)

Curule Chair. Properly a chariot chair, an ornamental camp-stool made of ivory placed by the Romans in a chariot for the chief magistrate when he went to attend the council. As dictators, consuls, pretors, consors, and the chief ediles occupied such a chair, they were termed curule magistrates or Curzon Street. Horace calls the chair curule ebur (1 Epist., vi. 53).

Curzon Street (London). Named after the ground landlord, George August Curzon, third Viscount Howe.

Cussedness. Ungainliness; perversity; an evil temper; malice prepense. Haliwell gives cuss as surly.

"The turkey-cock is just as likely as not to trample on the young turkeys and smash them, or to split their skulls by a savage dig of his powerful beak. Whether this is 'cussedness' pure and simple . . . has not been satisfactorily determined."—Daily News, December 22nd, 1860.

Custard. A slap on the hand with a farula. The word should be custud, unless a play is meant. (Lat. custud, a club or stick.)

Custard Coffin. (See Coffin.)

Customer. A man or acquaintance. A run customer is one better left alone, as he is likely to show fight if interfered with. (A shop term. (See Card.)

"Hope may stick her old customers."—Shakespeare: Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

Custos Rotulorum (keeper of the rolls). The chief civil officer of a county, to whose custody are committed the records or rolls of the sessions.

Cut. To renounce acquaintance. There are four sorts of cut—

1. The cut direct is to stare an acquaintance in the face and pretend not to know him.
2. The cut indirect, to look another way, and pretend not to see him.
3. The cut sublime, to admire the top of some tall edifice or the clouds of heaven till the person cut has passed by.
4. The cut infernal, to stoop and adjust your boots till the party has gone past.

There is a very remarkable Scripture illustration of the word cut, meaning to renounce: "Jehovah took a staff and cut it asunder, in token that He would break His covenant with His people; and He cut another staff asunder, in token that He would break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel" (Zechar. xi. 7-14).

Cut.

Cut and come again. Take a cut from the joint, and come for another if you like.

To cut the ground from under one (or from under his feet). To leave an adversary no ground to stand on, by disproving all his arguments.

He has cut his eye-teeth. He is wide awake, he is a knowing one. The eye-teeth are the canine teeth, just under the eyes, and the phrase means he can bite as well as bark. Of course, the play is on the word "eye," and those who have cut their eye-teeth are wide awake.

Cut your wisdom teeth. Wisdom teeth are those at the extreme end of the jaws, which do not make their appearance till persons have come to years of discretion. When persons say or do silly things, the remark is made to them that "they have not yet cut their wisdom teeth," or reached the years of discretion.

Cut the knot. Break through an obstacle. The reference is to the Gordian knot (q.v.) shown to Alexander, with the assurance that whoever loosed it would be made ruler of all Asia; whereupon the Macedonian cut it in two with his sword, and claimed to have fulfilled the prophecy.

I must cut my stick—i.e. leave. The Irish usually cut a shillelah before they start on an expedition. Punch gives the following witty derivation:—"Pilgrims on leaving the Holy Land used to cut a palm-stick, to prove that they had really been to the Holy Sepulchre. So brother Francis would say to brother Paul, 'Where is brother Benedict?' 'Oh (says Paul), he has cut his stick!'—i.e. he is on his way home."

'Il cut your comb for you. Take your conceit down. The allusion is to the practice of cutting the combs of capons.

He'll cut ye well. He is rich, and his property will cut into good slices.

Cut Blocks with a Razor (To). To do something astounding by insignificant means; to do something more eccentric than inexpedient. According to Dean Swift, to "make pincushions of sunbeams." The tale is that Accius, or Attus Navius, a Roman augur, opposed the king Tarquin the Elder, who wished to double the number of senators. Tarquin, to throw ridicule on the augur, sneered at his pretensions of augury, and asked him if he could do what was then in his thoughts. "Undoubtedly," replied Navius; and Tarquin with a laugh, said, "Why, I was thinking whether I could cut through this whetstone with a razor." "Cut boldly," said Navius, and the whetstone was cleft in two. This story forms the subject of one of Don Gaulther's ballads, and Goldsmith refers to it in his Rivalization:

"In short, 'twas his [Burke's] fate, unemployed or in place, sir,
To cut motion cold, and cut blocks with a razor."
Cut neither Nails nor Hair at Sea.

Petronius says, "Non licere euiquum mortalium in navis neque uigneus neque capillos depomere, nisi cum pelago ventus irascitur." The cuttings of the nails and hair were votive offerings to Prosperpine, and it would excite the jealousy of Neptune to make offerings to another in his own special kingdom.

Cut Off with a Shilling. Disinherited. Blackstone tells us that the Romans sat aside those testaments which passed by the natural heirs unnoticed; but if any legacy was left, no matter how small, it proved the testator's intention. English law has no such provision, but the notion at one time prevailed that the name of the heir should appear in the will; and if he was bequeathed "a shilling," that the testator had not forgotten him, but disinherited him intentionally.

Cut out. Left in the lurch; superseded. In cards, when there are too many for a game (say whist), it is customary for the players to cut out after a [rubber], in order that another player may have a turn. This is done by the players cutting the cards on the table, and the lowest turn-up gives place to the new hand, who "supersedes" him, or takes his place.

? It does not refer to cutting out a ship from an enemy's port.

He is cut out for a sailor. His natural propensities are suited for the vocation. The allusion is to cutting out cloth, etc., for specific purposes.

Cut your Coat according to your Cloth. Stretch your arm no farther than your sleeve will reach.

"Little hawks must keep near shore, Larger ones may venture more."

French: "Sot la bourse nourris ta bouche," "Sot la pan il faut au couteau," "Fou est, qui plus dépense que sa rente ne vaut."

Italian: "Noi facciamo la spese secondo l'entrate."

Latin: "Ex quovis ligne non fit Mercurius." "Parvum parva desunt" (Horace). "Messe tenus propria vive" (Persius). "Cui multum est piperic, etiam cleribus imbuscol." "Sumpsum censuro ne supereat" (Plautus). "Si non possis facere velis, velis id quod possis." "Ne te questiveris extra" (Horace).

Cut a Dash. Make a show. Cut is the French couper, better seen in the noun coup, as a grand coup, a coup de main (a masterly stroke), so "to cut" means to make a masterly coup, to do something to be looked at and talked about. Dashing means striking — i.e. showy, as a "dashing fellow," a "dashing equipage." To cut a dash is to get one's self looked at and talked about for a showy or striking appearance.

Cut and Dry. Already prepared. "He had a speech all cut and dry." The allusion is to timber cut, dry, and fit for use.

"Sets of phrases, cut and dry." — Swift.

Cut and Run. Be off as quickly as possible. A sea phrase, meaning cut your cable and run before the wind.

Cut Away. Be off at once. This is a French phrase, couper (cut away) — i.e. to break through the enemy's ranks by cutting them down with your swords.

Cut Capers (To). To act in an unusual manner.

"The quietest fellows are forced to fight for their status quo, and sometimes to cut capers like the rest." — Fous: The House in the Churchnard, p. 143.

To cut capers (in dancing) is to spring upwards, and rapidly interlace one foot with the other.

Cut your capers! Be off with you! "I'll make him cut his capers, i.e. run his conduct."

Cut it Short. (See Audley.)

Cut of his Jib. The contour or expression of his face. This is a sailor's phrase. The cut of a jib or foresail of a ship indicates her character. Thus, a sailor says of a suspicious vessel, he "does not like the cut of her jib."

Cut Short is to shorten. "Cut short all intermission" (Macbeth, iv. 3). To cut it short means to bring to an end what you are doing or saying.

His life was cut short. He died prematurely. The allusion is to Atropos, one of the three Fates, cutting the thread of life spun by her sister Clo'thoo.

Cut up Rough (To). To be disagreeable or quarrelsome about anything.

Cuthbert. St. Cuthbert's head. Joints of the articulated stems of encrinites, used for rosaries. St. Cuthbert was a Scotch monk of the sixth century, and may be termed the St. Patrick of Great Britain. He is said to sit at night on a rock in Holy Island, and to use the opposite rock as his anvil while he forges.
the entrochites (en-tro-kītēs). (See Bede.)

"On a rock of Lindisfarne
St. Cuthbert sits, and tells to frame
The sea-born heads that bear his name."
Scott: Marrow.

St. Cuthbert’s Stone. A granite rock in Cumberland.
St. Cuthbert’s Well. A spring of water close by St. Cuthbert’s Stone.

Cuthbert Bede. A nom de plume of the Rev. Edward Bradley, author of Verdant Green. (1827-1880.)

Cutler’s Poetry. Mere jingles or rhymes. Knives had, at one time, a distich inscribed on the blade by means of aqua fortis.

"Whose porn was
For all the world like cutler’s poetry
Upon a knife."
Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

Cutpurse. Now called “pickpocket.”
The two words are of historical value. When purses were worn suspended from a girdle, thieves cut the string by which the purse was attached; but when pockets were adopted, and purses were no longer hung on the girdle, the thief was no longer a cutpurse, but became a pickpocket.

"To have an open ear, a quick eye, and a nimble hand, is necessary for a cutpurse."—Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale, v. 3.

Cutler’s Law. Not to see a fellow want while we have cash in our purse. Cutler’s law means the law of purse-cutters, robbers, brigands, and highwaymen.

"I must put you in cash with some of your old uncle’s bread-pieces. This is cutler’s law; we must not see a fellow want, if we have cash ourselves."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. x.

Cuttle. Captain Cuttle. An eccentric, kind-hearted sailor, simple as a child, credulous of every tale, and generous as the sun. He is immortalised by the motto selected by Notes and Queries, “When found make a note of.”—Dickens: Dombey and Son.

"Unfortunately, I neglected Captain Cuttle’s advice, and am now unable to find it."—W. H. Bank: Notes and Queries.

Cutty. Scotch for short, as a cutty pipe, cutty Sark. (A diminutive of cutt.)

Cutty Pipe. A short clay pipe. Scotch, cutty (short), as cutty spoons, cutty Sark, a cutty (little girl), etc., a cutty gun (a pop-gun).

Cutty Stool. A small stool on which offenders were placed in the Scotch church when they were about to receive a public rebuke.

Cut. is C wt.—i.e. C. centum, wt. weight, meaning hundred-weight. (See Dwz.)

Cyanean Rocks (The). The Symplegades at the entrance of the Euxine Sea. Said to close together when a vessel attempted to sail between them, and thus crush it to pieces. Cyanean means dark, and Symplegades means dashers together.

"Here are those hard rocks of trap, of a greenish-blue, coloured with copper, and hence called the Cyanean."—Ov. Mar.

Cyclo. A period or series of events or numbers which recur everlastingly in precisely the same order.

Cycle of the moon, called “Meton’s Cycle,” from Meton, who discovered it, is a period of nineteen years, at the expiration of which time the phases of the moon repeat themselves on the same days as they did nineteen years previously. (See Callippic Period.)

Cycle of the sun. A period of twenty-eight years, at the expiration of which time the Sunday letters recur and proceed in the same order as they did twenty-eight years previously. In other words, the days of the month fall again on the same days of the week.

The Platonic cycle or great year is that space of time which elapses between all the stars and constellations return to any given state. Tycho Brahe calculated this period at 25,816 years, and Riccioli at 25,920.

Cyclical Poets. Inferior epic poets. On the death of Homer a host of minstrels caught the contagion of his poems, and wrote continuations, illustrations, or additions thereto. These poets were called cyclical because they confined themselves to the cycle of the Trojan war. The chief were Agias, Arnięcia, Eugammon, Leschi, and Strásimus.

"Besides the Homerian poems, the Greeks of this age possessed those of the poets named Cyclic, as they sang a traditional cycle of events,..."—Knightly Greece, part i, chap. xiv, p. 150.

Cyclopædia. The living cyclopædia. Longinu’s, so called for his extensive information. (213-273.)

Cyclopean. Huge, massive, like the Cyclops of classic mythology.

Cyclopean Masonry. The old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Týrnu’s, the Gate of Lyons, the Treasury of Athena, and the Tomb of Phorúneus (3 syl.) and Danu’s. They are said to have been the work of the Cyclops. They are huge.
Cylops. One of a group of giants with only one eye, and that in the centre of their forehead, whose business it was to forge iron for Vulcan. They were probably Pelasgians, who worked in quarries, and attached a lantern to their forehead to give them light underground. The lantern was their one eye as big as the full moon. (Greek, "circular-eye." (See Arimaspians.)

"Round with the sound, the mighty family Of one-eyed brothers hasten to the shore, And gather round the blazing Polyphem." Addisson: Milton Imitated.

Cyllaros, according to Virgil, was the celebrated horse of Pollux (Geo., iii. 90), but, according to Ovid, it was Castor's steed (Met., xii. 408).

"He, O Castor, was a courser worthy thee . . . (Cal) black his colour, but like Jet it shone; His legs and flowing tail were white alone." Dryden: Ovid's Metamorphoses, xii.

Cymbeline. (See Imogen, Cymbera.)

Cymochles. A man of prodigious might, brother of Pyrochles, son of Malico (Acratès) and Despite, and husband of Acraia, the enchantress. He sets out to encounter Sir Guyom, but is ferried over the idle lake by Wantue, (Phèdre), and forgets himself; he is slain by King Arthur (canto viii.). The word means, "one who seeks glory in troubles." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, ii. 5.)

Cympodocoe (4 syl.). A sea nymph and companion of Venus. (Virgil: Georgics, iv. 338; and again, Aeneid, iv. 826.) The word means "wave-receiving."

The Garden of Cympodocoe. Sark, one of the Channel islands. It is the title of a poem by Swinburne, 1880.

Cynegiros. It is said that when the Persians were pushing off from shore after the battle of Marathôn, Cynegiros, the brother of Àeschylos, the poet, seized one of their ships with his right hand, which was instantly lopped off; he then grasped it with his left, which was cut off also; lastly, he seized hold of it with his teeth and lost his head. (See Benbow.)

Cynic. A smirking, curleash person, like a cynic. The Cynics were so called because Antisthenes held his school in the gymnasia called Cynosarges, set apart for those who were not of pure Athenian blood. Cynosarges means white dog, and was so called because a white dog once came away part of a victim which Diome of was offering to Hercules. The sect was often called the Dog-sect; and the effigy over Diogenes' pillar was a dog, with this inscription:

"Say, dog, I pray, what guard you in that tomb,"  "A dog." His name?" —"Diogenes." —Fromardy.

"Nothing." — What made a tub his home?  "The name: now dead, amongst the stars a star." —E. C. B.

Cynic Tub (The). The tub from which Diogenes lectured. Similarly we speak of the "Perch," that is, the Perch Poëtic, meaning Stoic philosophy; the "Garden," meaning Epicurean philosophy; the "Academy," meaning Platonist philosophy; the "Colonnade," meaning Aristotelian philosophy.

"[They] fetch their doctrines from the Cynic tub." Milton: Comus, lxxxii. 25.

Cynics. The chief were Antisthenes of Athens (the founder), Diogenes, Onesicritus, Menippus, Crates, and his wife Hipparchia, Metrocles, Menippus, and Menon whom the madman.

Cynosurus (3 syl.). The polar star; the observed of all observers. Greek for dog's tail, and applied to the constellation called Ursus Minor. As seamen guide their ships by the north star, and observe it well, the word "cynosure" is used for whatever attracts attention, as "The cynosure of neighbouring eyes" (Milton), especially for guidance in some doubtful matter, as—

"Richmond was the cynosure on which all Northern eyes were fixed in the American war." —The Times.

Cynthia. The moon; a surname of Artemis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who represented the moon, was called Cynthia from Mount Cynthia, where she was born.

"And from emblazed clouds emerging slow, Cynthia came riding on her silver car." —Hendley: Minstrel.

Cynthia. Pope, speaking of the inconsistent character of woman, "matter too soft a lasting mark to bear," says—

"Come, then, the colours and the ground prepare! Dip in the rainbow, trick her off in air; Choose a firm cloud, before it fall, and in it Catch, ere she change, the Cynthia of the minute." —Kytde II. 17-20.

Cypress (The) is a funeral tree, and was dedicated by the Romans to Pluto, because when once cut it never grows again.

"Cypress garlands are of great account at funerals amongst the gentler sort, but rosemary and Hayes are used by the common folk at funerals and weddings. They are plants which fade not a good while after they are gathered . . . and intimate that the remembrance of the present solemnity might not be the present." —Coles: Introduction to the Knowledge of Plants.
The magic cypress branch. In the opera of Roberto il Diavolo, after the "dance of love," in which Hélène seduces the duke, he removes the cypress branch, which has the power of imparting to him whatever he wishes. With this he enters the palace of Isabella, princess of Sicily, and transfixes the princess and her attendants in a magic sleep, but afterwards relenting, he breaks the branch, and is dragged away by the guards.

Cyprian Brass, or "as Cyprium," copper. Pliny (book xxxiv. c. ii.) says, "in Cyprio cuim prima eris inventio fuit."

Cypriote. A native of Cyprus; the dialect spoken on the island; pertaining or special to Cyprus.

D.

This letter is the outline of a rude archway or door. It is called in Hebrew de'ath (a door). In Egyptian hieroglyphics it is a man's hand.

D or d, indicating a penny or pence, is the initial letter of the Latin denarius, a silver coin equal to 8½ of during the commonwealth of Rome, but in the Middle Ages about equivalent to our penny. The word was used by the Romans for money in general.

D stands for 500, which is half a, a form of or M, which stands for mille.

D stands for 5,000.

D.O.M. Deo Optimo Maximo. Datur omnibus morti (It is allotted to all to die).

D.T. A contraction of delirium tremens.

"They get a look, after a touch of D.T., which nothing else that I know of can give them."—Julian Dale.

Da Cape or D.C. From the beginning—that is, finish with a repetition of the first strain. A term in music. (Italian.)

Dab. Clover, skilled; as "a dab-hand at it"; a corrupt corruption of the Latin adeptus (an adept). "Dabster" is another form. Adept is a related word.

An eton stripping training for the law, A ducaet learning, but a dab at law (marbles)

Anon. : Logio; or, The Better Bit.

Dab, Din, etc.

"Hab Dab" and David Din

Ding the dell o'er Dobson's Linn."

"Hab Dab" means Halbert Dobson; "David Din" means David Dun; and "Dobson's Linn," or Dob's Linn, is a waterfall near the head of Moffat Water.

Dobson and Dun were two Camerons who lived for security in a cave in the ravine. Here, as they said, they saw the devil in the form of a pack of dried hides, and after feeding the "foul feed" for some time, they dashed him into the waterfall.

Dabafr. An idol of the savages of Panama, to whose honour slaves are burnt to death. (American mythology.)

Dabat [the Beast]. The Beast of the Apocalypse, which the Mahometans say will appear with Antichrist, called by them dagb'at. (Rev. xix. 19; xx. 10.)

Dabble. To dabble in the funds; to dabble in politics—i.e. to do something in them in a small way. (Dutch, dabbelen, our dip and tap.)

Dab'chick. The lesser grebe. Dab is a corruption of dep, the old participle of dip, and chick (any young or small fowl), literally the dipping or diving chick.

Da'ctyl (Will). The "smallest of pedants." (Steele: The Tatler.)

Da'ctyls (The). Mythic beings to whom is ascribed the discovery of iron. Their number was originally three—the Smelter, the Hammer, and the Anvil; but was afterwards increased to five males and five females, whence their name Da'ctyls or Fingers.

Dad or Daddy. Father. The person who acts as father at a wedding; a stage-manager. The superintendent of a casual ward is termed by the inmates "Old Daddy." (A Night in a Workhouse, by an Amateur Casual [J. Greenwood].)

In the Fortunes of Nigel, by Sir W. Scott, Steenie, Duke of Buckingham, calls King James "My dear dad and gossip." (Welsh, tai; Irish, daid, father; Sanskrit, tada; Hindu, dada.)

Daddy Long-legs. A crane-fly; sometimes applied to the long-legged spiders called "harvestmen."

Da'sdalea. A Greek who formed the Cretan labyrinth, and made for himself wings, by means of which he flew from Crete across the Archipelago. He is said to have invented the saw, the axe, the gimlet, etc.

Daffodil (The) or "Lent Lily," was once white; but Persephone, daughter of Demeter (Ceres), delighted to wander about the flowery meadows of Sicily. One spring-tide she tripped over the meadows, wrested her head with wild lilies, and, throwing herself on the grass, fell asleep. The god of the Infernal Regions, called by the Romans Pluto, fell in love with the beautiful maid, and carried her off for his bride. His touch turned the white flowers to a golden yellow, and some of them fell in Acheron, where they grew luxuriantly; and ever since the flower has been planted on graves. Theophillus and Pliny tell us that the ghosts delight in the flower, called by them the Asphodel. It was once called the Affodil. (French, asphodele; Latin, asphodillus; Greek, asphodilos.)

"Fleur de daffodil is a cure for madness."—Med. Ms. Lincoln Cathedral, p. 262.

Dag (day). Son of Natt or night. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dagger or Long Cross (+), used for reference to a note after the asterisk (*), is a Roman Catholic character, originally employed in church books, prayers of exorcism, at benedictions, and so on, to remind the priest where to make the sign of the cross. This sign is sometimes called an obelisk—that is, "a spit." (Greek, oeblos, a spit.)

Dagger, in the City arms of London, commemorates Sir William Walworth's dagger, with which he slew Wat Tyler in 1381. Before this time the cognisance of the City was the sword of St. Paul.

"Brave Walworth, knight, lord mayor, that slew rebellions Tyler in his armes. The king, therefore, did give him in lieu the dagger to the city armes."— Fourth year of Richard II. (1381), Fashions in Hall.

Dagger Ale is the ale of the Dagger, a celebrated ordinary in Holborn.

"My lawyer's clerk I lighted on last night in Holborn, at the Dagger."— Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, 1. 1.

Dagger-scene in the House of Commons. Edmund Burke, during the French Revolution, tried a bit of bunksim by throwing down a dagger on the floor of the House, exclaiming as he did so, "There's French fraternity for you! Such is the weapon which French Jacobins would plunge into the heart of our beloved king." Sheridan spoilt the dramatic effect, and set the House in a roar by his remark, "The gentleman, I see, has brought his knife with him, but where is his fork?"—(See Coup de Théâtre.)

Daggers. To speak daggers, To look daggers. To speak or look so as to wound the sensibilities.

"I will speak daggers to her; but will use none."—Shakespeare: Hamlet, III. 2.

Daggers Drawn (At). At great enmity, as if with daggers drawn and ready to rush on each other.

Daggletail or Draggle-tail. A slovenly woman, the bottom of whose dress trails in the dirt. Dag (Saxon) means loose ends, mire or dirt; whence dag-locks, the soiled locks of a sheep's fleece, and dag-wool, refuse wool. (Compare Tag.)

Dogobert. King Dogobert and St. Elig. There is a French song very popular with this title. St. Elig tells the king his coat has a hole in it, and the king rep lices, "C'est vrai, le tien est bon; prête-le moi," Next the saint complains of the king's stockings, and Dogobert makes the same answer. Then of his wig and cloak, to which the same answer is returned. After seventeen complaints St. Elig said, "My king, death is at hand, and it is time to confess," when the king replied, "Why can't you confess, and die instead of me?"

Dagon (Hebrew, dag On, the fish On). The idol of the Philistines; half woman and half fish. (See ATEKBOATA.)

"Dagon his name: sea-monster, upward man And downward fish; yet had his temple high Heard in Asia Minor, dreaded through the coast Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon, And Avron and Gaza's frontier bounds."— Milton: Paradise Lost, book I. 462.

Dagonet (Sir). In the romance La Mort d'Arthur he is called the fool of King Arthur, and was knighted by the king himself.

"I remember at Mile-Kind Green, when I lay at *Chateau's Inn, I was then Sir Dagonet in Arthur's show."—2 Henry IV., II. 2. (Another Shallow).

"Dagonet" is the patronym of Mr. G. R. Sims.

Daguerreotype (4 syl.). A photographic process. So named from M. Daguerre, who greatly improved it in 1839. (See TALLOTYPE.)

Dagun. A god worshipped in Pegu. When Kiak'ank destroyed the world, Dagun reconstructed it. (Indian mythology.)

Dahak. The Satan of Persia. According to Persian mythology, the ages of the world are divided into periods of 1,000 years. When the cycle of "chil- inas" (1,000-year periods) is complete, the reign of Ormuzd will begin, and men
Dahlia
A flower. So called from Andrew Dahl, the Swedish botanist.

Dalhousie is not derived from Dah, the founder of the palace so called, but is a corruption of Daugh-homen, "Daugh's Belly." The story is as follows: Ardrah divided his kingdom at death between his three sons, and Dah, one of the sons, received the northern portion. Being an enterprising and ambitious man, he coveted the country of his neighbour Danh, King of Gedavin, and first applied to him for a plot of land to build a house on. This being granted, Dah made other requests in quick succession, and Danh's patience being exhausted, he exclaimed, "Must I open my belly for you to build on?" On hearing this, Dah declared himself insulted, made war on Danh, and slew him. He then built his palace where Danh fell, and called it Danh-homen. (Nineteenth Century, October, 1890, pp. 605-6.)

Dairi (3 syl.): A Japanese idol of colossal size. Each of her hands is full of hands. (Japanese mythology.)

Dairi (4 syl.): The god invoked specially by the artisans of Japan. He sits on a ball of rice, holding a hammer in his hand, with which he beats a sack; and every time he does so the sack becomes full of silver, rice, cloth, and other useful articles. (Japanese mythology.)

Dairi (3 syl.): The royal residence in Jupon; the court of the mikado, used by metonymy for the sovereign or chief pontiff himself.

Dairy. A corrupt form of "dey-ery." Middle English dierie and deyryere, from deye, a dairymaid.

"The dey or farm-woman entered with her pitchers, to deliver the milk for the family."—Scott: Fair Maid of Perth, chap. xxvii.

Dal. The raised floor at the head of a dining-room, designed for guests of distinction (French, das, a canopy). So called because it was used to be decorated with a canopy. The proverb "Sous le dal" means "in the midst of grandeur."

Daisies: Slang for boots. Explained under CHIVAL.

Daisy. Ophelia gives the queen a daisy to signify "that her light and fickle love ought not to expect constancy in her husband." So the daisy is explained by Greene to mean a Quisp for an upstart courtier. (Anglo-Saxon deyes edge, day's eye.)

The word is Day's eye, and the flower is so called because it closes its pinky lashes and goes to sleep when the sun sets, but in the morning it expands its petals to the light. (See Violet.)

"That well by reason men calle it male,
The daisy, or else the eye of the dale."—Chaucer.

Daisy (Solomon). Parish clerk of Chigwell. He had little, round, black, shiny eyes like beads; wore rusty black breeches, a rusty black coat, and a long-flapped waistcoat with queer little buttons. Solomon Daisy, with Phil Parkes, the ranger of Epping Forest, Tom Cobb, the Chandler and post-office keeper, and John Willet, mine host, formed a quadrilateral or village club, which used to meet night after night at the Maypole, on the borders of the forest. Daisy's famous tale was the murder of Mr. Reuben Hardale, and the conviction that the murderer would be found out on the 19th of March, the anniversary of the murder. (Dickens: Barnaby Rudge, chap. i., etc.)

Daisy-cutter (A). In cricket, a ball that is bowled all along the ground.

Daisy-roots, like dwarf-elder berries, are said to stunt the growth; hence the fairy Milkah fed her royal foster-child on this food, that his stature might not exceed that of a pigmy. This superstition arose from the notion that everything had the property of bestowing its own speciality on others. (See FERN SEED.)

"She robbed dwarf-elders of their fragrant fruit,
And fed him early with the daisy root,
Whence through his veins the powerful juices ran
And formed the beauteous miniature of man."—Tickell: Kensington Gardens.

Dala'i-Lama [grand lama]. Chief of the two Tārta-prêtres—a sort of incastrate deity. The other lama is called the "Tseho-lama."

Daldah. Mahomet's favourite white mule.

Dalgar'no (Lord). A heartless profligate in Scott's Fortunes of Nigel.

Dalgetty (Dungald). Jeffrey calls him "a compound of Captain Flueuen and Bob'adill," but this is scarcely just. Without doubt, he has all the pedantry.
and conceit of the former, and all the vulgar assurance of the latter; but, unlike Bobadill, he is a man of real courage, and wholly trustworthy to those who pay him for the service of his sword, which, like a thrifty mercenary, he lets out to the highest bidder. (Scott: Legend of Montrose.)

"Neither Schiller, Strada, Thamus, Monroe, nor Douglas Dalgerty makes any mention of it." — Carlyle.

Dalkey (King of). A kind of "Mayor of Garrat" (q.v.) at Kings-town, in Ireland. A full description is given of this mock mayor, etc., in a book entitled Ireland Ninety Years Ago.

Dalle (French), écu de six francs (3s.). Money generally.

"Quiroconque parleroit de paix . . . payeroit a la houres de l'Union certaine quantité de dales, pour l'entretenue des docteurs." — Sénage Monneppe, 1621, p. 152.

Dalmatia or Dalmatie. A robe, open in front, reaching to the knees; worn at one time by deacons over the alb or stole, when the Eucharist was administered. It is in imitation of the regal vest of Dalmatia, and was imported into Rome by the Emperor Commodus. A similar robe was worn by kings, in the Middle Ages, at coronations and other great solemnities, to remind them of their duty of bountifulness to the poor. The right sleeve was plain and full, but the left was fringed and tasseled. Deacons had broader sleeves than sub-deacons, to indicate their duty to larger generosity: for a similar reason the sleeves of a bishop are larger than those of a priest. The two stripes before and behind were worn to show that the wearer should exercise his charity to all.

Dam. An ancient Indian copper coin, of which 1,600 went to a rupee. Hence some compare the expression "Not worth a dam," though wrongly, with "not worth a farthing," "not worth a sou." [Twopenny Dam.]

Damage. What's the damage? What have I to pay? how much is the bill? The allusion is to the law assessing damages in remuneration to the plaintiff.

Damask Linen. So called from Damascus, where it was originally manufactured.

Damaskening. Producing upon steel a blue tinge and ornamental figures, sometimes inlaid with gold and silver, as in Damascus blades; so called from Damascus, which was celebrated in the Middle Ages for this class of ornamental art.

Dambéa or Dambéa. A lake in Gojam, Abyssinia, the source of the Blue Nile. Captain Speke traced the White Nile to Lake Victoria N'yana, which, no doubt, is fed by the Mountains of the Moon.

Dame du Lac. A fay, named Vivienne, who plunged with the infant Lancelot into a lake. This lake was a kind of mirage, concealing the domes of the lady "en la marche de la petite Bretagne." (See Vivienne.)

"En ce lieu . . . a voit la dame moult de belles maisons et moult riches ; et un nain dessous elle avoit une gente petite rivière." (Percy: Reliques.)

Damien's Bed of Steel. R. F. Damien, in 1737, attempted the life of Louis XV. He was taken to the Conciegerie; an iron bed, which likewise served as a chair, was prepared for him, and to this he was fastened with chains. He was then tortured, and ultimately torn to pieces by wild horses. (Smollett: History of England, v. 12, p. 39.)

"The uplifted axe, the mournful wheel, Luka's iron crown, and Damien's bed of steel." (Goldsmith: The Traveller 1768.)

Damn with Faint Praise. To praise with such a voice and in such measured terms as to show plainly secret disapproval.

"Damn with faint praise, assent with civil leer, And, without successor, teach the rest to speak," — Pope: An Essay to Doctrine of Ariost a.

Dameolé's Sword. Evil foreboded or dreaded. Dameolés, the sycophant of Dionysius the elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accordingly he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Dameolés was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalising torment to him. (Cicero.)

"These fears hang like Damesol's sword over every feast, and make enjoyment impossible." — Chambers's Cyclopaedia.

Damon and Musidora. Two lovers in Thomson's Summer. One day Damon caught Musidora bathing, and his delicacy so won upon her that she promised to be his bride.

Damon and Pythias. Inseparable friends. They were two Syracusan youths. Damon, being condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs.
if Pythias became his security. Damon being delayed, Pythias was led to execution, but his friend arrived in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honourable friendship that he pardoned both of them.

DAMPER (A). A snap before dinner, which damps or takes off the edge of appetite. "That's a damper," also means a wet-blanket influence, a rebuff which damps or cools one's courage.

Also a large thin cake of flour and water baked in hot ashes. The mute of a stringed instrument to deaden the sound is also called a "damper."

DAMSEL. (See DAMESELL.)

DAMSON. A corruption of Damascene, a fruit from Damascus.

DAMYAN (3 syl.). A "silke squerier," whose illicit love was accepted by May, the youthful bride of January, a Lombard knight, sixty years old. (Chaucer: The Marchaundes Tale.)

DAN. A title of honour, common with the old poets, as Dan Phæbus, Dan Cupid, Dan Neptune, Dan Chaucer, etc. (Spanish, don.)

"Dan Chaucer, well of English unaffected, On Fama's eternal beardless worthy to be felt."—Spenser: Faerie Queen, book iv., canto ii. 32.

From Dan to Beersheba. From one end of the kingdom to the other; all over the world; everywhere. The phrase is Scriptural. Dan being the most northern and Beersheba the most southern city of the Holy Land. We have a similar expression, "From John o' Groat's to the Land's End."

Dan Tucker. Out o' de way, old Dan Tucker. The first Governor of Bermuda was Mr. Moore, who was succeeded by Captain Daniel Tucker. These islands were colonised from Virginia.

Dan'ace (3 syl.). A coin placed by the Greeks in the mouth of the dead to pay their passage across the ferry of the Lower World.

Dan'â. An Argive princess whom Zeus (Jupiter) seduced under the form of a shower of gold, while she was confined in an inaccessible tower. She thus became the mother of Perseus (2 syl).

Danaïdes (4 syl.). Daughters of Danaos (King of Argos). They were fifty in number, and married the fifty sons of Egyptus. They all but one murdered their husbands on their wedding-night, and were punished in the infernal regions by having to draw water everlastingly in sieves from a deep well.

This is an allegory. The followers of Danaos taught the Argives to dig wells, and irrigate their fields in the Egyptian manner. As the soil of Argos was very dry and porous, it was like a sieve.

The names of the fifty Danaïdes and their respective husbands are as follows:

"Lyneus (2 syl.), the one saved by his wife, is marked with an asterisk (*)."

Danaos. According to the Roman de Rose, Denmark means the country of Danaos, who settled here with a colony after the siege of Troy, as Brutus is said by the same sort of name-legend to have settled in Britain. Saxo-Germanicus, with equal absurdity, makes Dan, the son of Humble, the first king, to account for the name of the country.

Danaw. The Danube (German).

"To pass Rhone or the Danaw."

DANCE. The Spanish danza was a grave and stately court dance. Those of the seventeenth century were called the Turdion, Pabona, Madame Orleans, Piedegibbo, El Rey Don Alonso, and El Caballero. Most of the names are taken from the ballad-music to which they were danced. The light dances were called Baylé (q.v.).
Dance

Dance (Pyrrhic). (See Pyrrhic).
St. Vitus's Dance. (See St. Vitus).

Dance of Death. A series of woodcuts, said to be by Hans Holbein (1538), representing Death dancing after all sorts of persons, beginning with Adam and Eve. He is beside the judge on his bench, the priest in the pulpit, the nun in her cell, the doctor in his study, the bride and the beggar, the king and the infant; but is “swallowed up at last.”

This is often called the Dance Macabre, from a German who wrote verses on the subject.

On the north side of Old St. Paul’s was a cloister, on the walls of which was painted, at the cost of John Carpenter, town clerk of London (15th century), a “Dance of Death,” or “Death leading all the estate, with speeches of Death and answers, by John Lydgate” (Stow). The Death-Dance in the Dominican Convent of Basle was retouched by Holbein.

"Plutarch.

"I'll lead you a pretty dance, i.e. I'll bother or put you to trouble. The French say, Dommez le bal et guizqu’un. The reference is to the complicated dances of former times, when all followed the leader.

To dance attendance. To wait obsequiously, to be at the beck and call of another. The allusion is to the ancient custom of weddings, where the bride on the wedding-night had to dance with every guest, and play the amiable, though greatly annoyed.

"Then must the poor bride keep her feet with a dancer, and refuse none, how scolded, jotted, dromeked, rude, and shameless manner he be." - Chaucer: State of Matrimony, 1663.

"I had thought they had parted so much harmony among them (at least, good manners) not thus to suffer. A man of his place, and so near our favour.

To dance attendance on their lordships’ pleasures." - Shakespeare: Henry VIII, v 2.

To dance upon nothing. To be hanged.

Dances (National Dances):

Bohemian: the rebozo.

English: the hornpipe and la verrue.

French: the contredanse (country dance), cotillon, and quadrille.

German: the gallopade and waltz.

Irish: the Jig.

Newsham: the tarantella.

Polish: the majurka and krakowiak.

Russian: the cosac.

Scotch: the reel.

Spanish: the bolero and fandango.

When Handel was asked to point out the peculiar taste of the different nations of Europe in dancing, he ascribed the minuet to the French, the saraband to the Spaniard, the arietta to the Italian, and the hornpipe and the morris-dance to the English.

Dances (Religious Dances):

Astronomical dances, invented by the Egyptians, designed (like our orreries) to represent the movements of the heavenly bodies.

The Bacchic dances were of three sorts: grave (like our minuet), gay (like our gavotte), and mixed (like our minuet and gavotte combined).

The dance Champsaur, invented by Pan, quick and lively. The dancers (in the open air) wore wreaths of oak and garlands of flowers.

Children's dances, in Lacedemon in honour of Diana. The children were nude: and their movements were grave, modest, and graceful.

Coruscating dances, in honour of Bacchus, accompanied with timbrels, flutes, and tambourines, noise produced by the clashing of swords and lances against broken ladders.

Funeral dances, in Athens, slow, solemn dances in which the priests took part. The performers wore long clothe robes, and carried cypress slips in their hands.

Hymsaous dances were lively and joyous. The dancers were crowned with flowers.

Of the Lapeith, invented by Pirithous. These were exhibited after some famous victory, and were designed to imitate the contests of the Centaurs and Lapiths. These dances were both difficult and dangerous.

May-day dances at home. At daybreak lads and lasses went out to gather "May" and other flowers for themselves and their elders; and the day was spent in dances and festivites.

Military dances. The oldest of all dances, executed with swords, javelins, and bucklers. Said to be invented by Minerva to celebrate the victory of the god over the Titans.

Nuptial dances. A Roman pantomimic performance resembling the dances of our barouquen and columbine.

Sacred dances (among the Jews). David danced in certain religious processions (2 Sam. vi. 14). The people sang and danced before the golden calf (Exod. xxxii. 16). And in the book of Psalms (xi. 4) we read, "Let the people praise [the Lord] with timbrel and dance." Miriam, the sister of Moses, after the passage of the Red Sea, was allowed by all the women with timbrels and dances (Exod. xv. 20).

Sole dances, instituted by Numa Pompilius in honour of Mars. They were executed by twelve priests selected from the highest of the nobility, and the dances were performed in the temple while sacrifices were being made and by ins sung to the god.

The Dancing Durvishes celebrated their religious rites with dances, which consist chiefly of spinning round and round a little allotted space, not in couples, but each one alone.

In ancient times the Gauls, the Germans, the Spaniards, and the English too had their sacred dances. In fact, in all religious ceremonies the dance was an essential part of divine worship. In India dancing is a part of religious worship in which the priests join.

See DANCE.

Dancing-water (The), which beautiful ladies, makes them young again, and enriches them. It fell in a cascade in the Burning Forest, and could only be reached by an underground passage. Prince Chery fetched a bottle of this water for his beloved Fair-star, but was aided by a dove. (Fairy Tales, by the Comtesse d'Aulnoy.) (See Yellow Water.)

Dandellion. A flower. The word is a corruption of the French dent de lion (lion's tooth). Also called Leontodon (lion-tooth, Greek), from a supposed resemblance between its leaves and the teeth of lions.

Dander. Is your dander up or riz? Is your angry passion up? This is generally considered to be an Americanism; but Halliwell gives, in his Archiecal Dictionary, both dander (anger) and dandy (distraught), the latter common to several counties, and the latter peculiar to Somersetshire.

Dandie Dinmont. A jovial, true-hearted store-farmer, in Sir Walter Scott's Guy Mannering. Also a Hardy hairy short-legged terrier.

"From this dog descended Davidson of Wyndham's breed, the original Dandie-Dinmont."--T. Brown: Our Dogs, p. 104.

Dandin (French). A ninny, a snob. From Molière's comedy of George Dandin. (See GANDIN.)

Dandin (George). A French cit, who marries a spring of nobility, and lives with his wife's parents. Madame appeals on all occasions to her father and mother, who, of course, take her part against her husband. Poor George is in a sad plight, and is for ever lamenting his fate with the expression, Vos Pèrez ruind, George Dandin ('Tis your own fault, George Dandin). George Dandin stands for anyone who marries above his sphere, and is pecked by his wife and mother-in-law. The word means "a ninny." (Molière's comedy so called.)

Perrin Dandin. A sort of Lynch judge in Rabelais, who seated himself on the trunk of the first tree he came to, and there decided the causes submitted to him.

Dan'diprat or Dandiprat, according to Camden, is a small coin issued in the reign of Henry VII. Applied to a little fellow, it is about equal to our modern expression, a little "twopenny-ha'penny" fellow.

Dando (A). One who frequents hotels, eating-houses, and other such places, satisfies his appetite, and decamps without payment.

Dandy. A coxcomb; a fop. The feminine of "dandy" is either dandilly or danditzett. Egan says the word was first used in 1813, but examples of the word occur at least one hundred years before that date. (French, dandin, a ninny, a vain, conceited fellow.)

Dandy-horse. (See VELOCIPED.)

Dandyism. The manners, etc., of a dandy; like a dandy.

Dane's Skin (A). A freckled skin. Red hair and a freckled skin are the traditional characteristics of Danish blood.

Dangle. A theatrical amateur in Sheridan's Critic. It was designed for Thomas Vaughan, a playwright.

Daniel Lambert weighed 739 lbs. In 1841 eleven young men stood within his waistcoat buttoned. (1770-1809.)

Danism. Lending money on usury. (Greek, danieisma, a loan.)

Dan'rebro or Danebro. The old flag of Denmark. The tradition is that Waldemar II. of Denmark saw in the heavens a fiery cross which betokened his victory over the Esthonian (1219). This story is very similar to that of Constantine (q.v.), and of St. Andrew's Cross. (See ARMH, St.)

The order of Danebro. The second of the Danish orders. Brog means "cloth" or banner.

Dan'neck's. Hedging-gloves. A corruption of Tonnay, where they were originally manufactured.

Danzse. La danse commence à bas, fighting has broken out yonder.

"Mon Caporal, there is great news: *La danse commence à bas. *"—Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap. xxv.

A la danse. On the march.

"The regiment was ordered out à la danse there was fresh war in the batteries."—Ouida: Under Two Flags, chap. xxv. (See DANSK.)

Dansker. A Dane. Denmark used to be called Danske. Hence Polonius says to Reynaldo, "Inquire me first what Danskers are in Paris." (Hamlet, ii. 1.)

Dante and Beatrice—i.e. Beatrice Portinaï, who was only eight years old when the poet first saw her. His abiding love for her was chaste as snow and pure as it was tender. Beatrice married a nobleman named Simo’ne de Bardi, and died young, in 1290. Dante married Gemma, of the powerful house of Donati. In the Divina Commedia the poet is conducted first by Virgil (who represents human reason) through hell and purgatory; then by the spirit of Beatričis (who represents the wisdom of faith); and finally by St. Bernard (who represents the wisdom from on high).
Dantesque

Dantesque (2 syl.). Dante-like—that is, a minute life-like representation of the infernal horrors, whether by words, as in the poet, or in visible form, as in Dore’s illustrations of the Inferno.

Daphnaída. An elegy on Douglas Howard, daughter and heiresses of Lord Howard. (Spruner, 1561.)

Daphne. Daughter of a river-god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favourite tree of the sun-god.

“Nay, lady, sit. If I but wave this wand,
Your nerves are all churn’d up in alabaster,
And your stature, or, as Daphne was,
Root-bound, that fed Apollo.”
Milton: Comus, 678-681.

Daphnis. A Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry.

Daphnès. The lover of Chloe in the exquisite Greek pastoral romance of Longos, in the fourth century. Daphnis was the model of Allan Ramsay’s Gentle Shepherd, and the tale is the basis of St. Pierre’s Paul and Virginia.

Dapper. A little, nimble, spruce young clerk in Ben Jonson’s Alchemist.

Dapple. The name of Sancho Panza’s donkey in Cervantes’ romance of Don Quijote. Bailey derives dapple from the Teutonic dappor (streaked or spotted like a pippin). A dapple-grey horse is one of a light grey shaded with a deeper hue; a dapple-bay is a light bay spotted with bay of a deeper colour. (Icelandic, dæpfl, a spot.)

Darbies (2 syl.). Handcuffs. This is derived from “Darby and Joan,” because originally two prisoners were linked together as Darby and Joan.

“Hark ye! Jim Clink will fetch you the darbies.”—Sir W.Scott: Peveril of the Peak.

Johnny Darbies, policeman, is a perversion of the French genasarmes, in conjunction with the above.

Darby and Joan. A loving, old-fashioned, virtuous couple. The names belong to a ballad written by Henry Woodfall, and the characters are those of John Darby, of Bartholomew Close, who died 1730, and his wife, “As chaste as a picture cut in alabaster. You must sooner move a Scythian rock than shoot fire into her bosom.” Woodfall served his apprenticeship to John Darby.

“Perhaps some day or other we may be Darby and Joan.”—Lord Lytton.

* The French equivalent is C’est St. Roch et son chien.

Darbys (3 syl.). The Plymouth Brethren are so called on the Continent from Mr. Darby, a barrister, who abandoned himself to the work, and was for years the “organ” of the sect.

Darius (or State’s Darvi). Celebrated Persian coins. So called from Darius. They bear on one side the head of the king, and on the other a chariot drawn by mules. Their value is about twenty-five shillings.

Dariolet, Dariolette (French). An intriguing, a confidant, a go-between, a pandar. Originally a dariole meant a little sweetmeat or cake rued with little bands of paste.

“Dariolette, employée comme un des nombreux brouillards pour entrer dans l’affaire particulière de donnner les vuesures de roman.”—Romol de Villarceaux.

Darius. A classic way of spelling Darawes (king), a Persian title of royalty. Gushthaap or Kishthaap assumed the title of darawes on ascending the throne, and is the person generally called Darius the Great.

Darius. Seven princes of Persia agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; as the horse of Darius was the first to neigh, Darius was proclaimed king.

Darius, conquered by Alexander, was Dara, surnamed kuchek (the younger). When Alexander succeeded to the throne, Dara sent to him for the tribute of golden eggs, but the Macedonian returned for answer, “The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Dara must seek them.” The Persian king then sent him a list and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers, with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master’s hand. Lastly, Dara sent him a bitter melon, as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the Shah cat his own fruit.
Dark. To keep dark. To lie perdu; to lurk in concealment. (Ang.-Sax. deor.)

"We'd get away to some of the far-out stations... where we could keep in the dark."—Boldrewood: Robbery Under Arms, xvi.

Keep it in the dark. Keep it a dead secret; don’t enlighten anyone about the matter.

Dark Ages. The era between the death of Charlemagne and the close of the Carolingian dynasty.

Dark Continent (The). Africa, the land of the dark race or darkies.

Dark Horse (A). A racing term for a horse of good pretensions, but of which nothing is positively known by the general public. Its merits are kept dark from better and book-makers.

"At last a Liberal candidate has entered the field at Croydon. The Conservatives have kept their candidate back, as a dark horse."—Newspaper paragraph, January, 1866.

Darkest Hour is that before the Dawn (The). When Fortune’s wheel is lowest, it must turn up again. When things have come to their worst, they must mend. In Latin, Post nubia, Phoebus.

Darky. A negro.

Darley Arabians. A breed of English racers, from an Arab stallion introduced by Mr. Darley. This stallion was the sire of the Flying Childers, and great-grand sire of Eclipse.

Daron, Daronno (French). The sobriquet given at the present day, by workmen to shopkeepers and cobblers.

"Il est maître de tout, jusqu’à lancer l’argent de la daronne."—Histoire de Guillaume, cocher.

Daronne. The confidant of Elisene, mother of Amadis, and wife of Perion des Gaules. (Amadis de Gaule.)

Dart. (See Aharis.)

Darwinian Theory. Charles Darwin, grandson of the poet, published in 1859 a work entitled Origin of Species, to prove that the numerous species now existing on the earth spring originally from one or at most a few parental forms; and that the present diversity is due to special development and natural selection. Those plants and creatures which are best suited to the conditions of their existence survive and become fruitful; certain organs called into play by peculiar conditions of life grow with their growth, and strengthen with their strength, till they become so much a part and parcel of their frames as to be transmitted to their offspring. The conditions of life being very diverse, cause a great diversity of organic development, and, of course, every such diversity which has become radical is the parent of a new species. (See Evolution.)

Dash. in printer’s copy. One dash under a word in MS. means that the part so dashed must be printed in italics; two dashes means small capitals; three dashes, large capitals.

Cut a dash. (See Curt.)

Dash my Wig! Dash my Buttons. Dash is a euphemism for a common oath; and wig, buttons, etc., are relics of a common fashion at one time adopted in comedies and by “mashers” of swearing without using profane language.

Date. Not quite up to date. Said of books somewhat in arrears of the most recent information.

Daughter. Greek, thugter, contracted into thugier; Dutch, dogter; German, tochter; Persian, dochtar; Sanskrit, dugter; Saxon, dothter; etc.

Daughter of Peneus (The). The bay-tree is so called because it grows in greatest perfection on the banks of the river Peneus (3 syl.).

Daughter of the Horseleech. One very exigant; one for over sponging on another. (Prov. xxx. 15.)

"Such and many such like were the morning attendants of the Duke of Buckingham—all genuine descendants of the daughter of the horseleech, whose cry is ‘Give, give’..."—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxix.

Dauphin. The heir of the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. (Guy VIII., Count of Vienne, was the first so styled, because he wore a dolphin as his cognisance. The title descended in the family till 1349, when Hurbert II., de la tour de Pisa, sold his seigneurie, called the Dauphine, to King Philippe VI. (de Valois), on condition that the heir of France assumed the title of le dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; and the last was the Duc d’Angoulême, son of Charles IX., who renounced the title in 1630.

Grand Dauphin. Louis, Duc de Bourgogne, eldest son of Louis XIV., for whose use was published the Latin classics entitled Ad Usum Delphinis. (1661-1711.)

Second or Little Dauphin. Louis, son of the Grand Dauphin. (1682-1712.)

Davenport. A kind of small writing-desk with drawers each side, named after the maker.
Davenport (The: Brothers), from America. Two impostors, who professed that spirits would unite them when bound with cords, and even that spirits played all sorts of instruments in a dark cabinet. The imposition was exposed in 1805.

David, in Dryden's satire called Absalom and Achitophel, represents Charles II.; Absalom, his beautiful but rebellious son, represents the Duke of Monmouth; Achitophel, the traitorous counsellor, is the Earl of Shaftesbury; Barzillai, the faithful old man who provided the king sustenance, was the Duke of Ormond; Hushai, who defeated the counsel of Achitophel, was Hyde, Duke of Rochester; Zadok the priest was Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury; Shimei, who cursed the king in his flight, was Bethel, the lord mayor; etc. etc. (2 Sam. xvii.-xix.)

"Once more the godlike David was restored,
And willing nations knew their lawful lord."—Dryden: Absalom and Achitophel, part 1.

David (St.) or David, was son of Xanthus, Prince of Ceretius, now called Cardiganshire; he was brought up a priest, became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight, preached to the Britons, confuted Pelaugius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon, since called St. David's. He died 544. (See Taffy.)

St. David's (Wales) was originally called Menevia (i.e. main ave, narrow water or frith). Here St. David received his early education, and when Dyvrig, Archbishop of Caerleon, resigned to him his see, St. David removed the archiepiscopal residence to Menevia, which was henceforth called by his name.

David and Jonathan. Inseparable friends. Similar examples of friendship were Pythias and Orestes (q.v.); Damon and Pythias (q.v.); etc.

"I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan, very pleasant hast thou been to me. Thy love to me was wonderful, passing the love of women."—2 Sam. 1. 26.

Davideus. An epic poem in four books, describing the troubles of King David. (Abraham Cowley [1618-1667].)

There is another sacred poem so called, by Thomas Eliwood (1712).

Davus. Davus sum, non Edipus (I am a plain, simple fellow, and no solver of riddles, like Edipus). The words are from Terence's Andria, i. 2, 23.

Non te credas Davum ludere. Don't imagine you are deluding Davus. "Do you see any white in my eye?" I am not such a fool as you think me to be.

Day. I'll take my day of it. I'll take my "affidavit" it is true.

Davy (Snuffy). David Wilson. (See Sir Walter Scott, The Antiquary, chap. iii. and note.)

Davy Jones's Locker. He's gone to Davy Jones's locker, i.e. he is dead. Jones is a corruption of Jonah, the prophet, who was thrown into the sea. Locker, in earnest's phrase, means any receptacle for private stores; anduffy is a ghost or spirit among the West Indian negroes. So the whole phrase is, "He is gone to the place of safe keeping, whereuffy Jonah was sent to."—Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, xiii.

"This same Davy Jones, according to the mythology of sailors, is the fiend that preys upon all the evil spirits of the deep, and is seen in various shapes... warning the devoted wretch of death and woe."—Smollett: Peregrine Pickle, xiii.

Davy's Sow. Drunk as Davy's sow. Grose says: One David Lloyd, a Welshman, who kept an ale-house at Hereford, had a sow with six legs, which was an object of great curiosity. One day David's wife, having indulged too freely, lay down in the sty to sleep, and a company coming to see the sow, David led them to the sty, saying, as usual, "There is a sow for you! Did you ever see the like?" One of the visitors replied, "Well, it is the drunkenest sow I ever beheld." Whence the woman was ever after called "Davy's sow." (Classical Dictionary of the Vulgar Tongue.)

Dawson (Bully). A noted London sharpner, who swaggered and led a most abandoned life about Blackfriars, in the reign of Charles II. (See Jimmy Dawson.)

"Bully Dawson: kicked by half the town, and half the town kicked by Bully Dawson."—Charles Lamb.

Day. When it begins. (1) With sun-set: The Jews in their "sacred year," and the Church—hence the eve of feast-days; the ancient Britons "non die'sum m'nerum, ut non, sed susum com'punctum," says Tacitus—hence "so'-night" and "fort'night;" the Athenians, Chinese, Mahometans, etc., Italians, Austrians, and Bohemians. (2) With sun-rise: The Babylonians, Syrians, Persians, and modern Greeks. (3) With noon: The ancient Egyptians and modern astronomers. (4) With midnight: The English, French, Dutch, Germans, Spanish, Portuguese, Americans, etc.

A day after the fair. Too late; the fair you came to see is over.

Day in, day out. All day long.

"Sewing as she did, day in, day out."—W. E. Wilkins: The Honest Soul.
Day

Every dog has its day. (See under Dog.)

I have had my day. My prime of life is over; I have been a man of light and leading, but am now "out of the swim."

"Old Joe, sir... was a bit of a favourite... once, but he has had his day."—Dickens.

I have lost a day (Perdidi diem) was the exclamation of Titus, the Roman emperor, when on one occasion he could call to mind nothing done during the past day for the benefit of his subjects.

To-day a man, to-morrow a nonce. In French, "Aujourd'hui la roi, demain rien." Fortune is so fickle that one day we may be at the top of the wheel, and the next day at the bottom.

Day of the Barricades. (See Barricades.)

Day of the Dupes, in French history, was November 11th, 1830, when Marie de Medici and Gaston Duc d'Orléans extorted from Louis XIII, a promise that he would dismiss his minister, the Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went in all speed to Versailles, the king repented, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. Marie de Medici and Gaston were the dupes who had to pay dearly for their short triumph.

Day-dream. A dream of the imagination when the eyes are awake.

Daylight, in drinking bumper's, means that the wine-glass is not full to the brim; between the wine and the rim of the wine-glass light may be seen. Toastmasters used to cry out, "Gentlemen, no daylight nor heel-taps"—the heel-tap being a little wine left at the bottom of the glass. The glass must be filled to the rim, and every drop of it must be drunk.

Daylights. The eyes, which let daylight into the sensorium.

To darken one's daylights. To give one such a blow on the eyes with the fist as to prevent seeing. (Pugilistic slang.)

Days set apart as Sabbaths.
Sunday by Christians; Monday by the Greeks; Tuesday by the Persians; Wednesday by the Assyrians; Thursday by the Egyptians; Friday by the Turks; Saturday by the Jews.

Dayman. An umpire, judge, or intercessor. The word is dais-man (a man who sits on the dais); a sort of lit de justice. Hence Pier Ploughman—

"And at the day of doom
At the height Days sits."

Dayspring. The dawn: the commencement of the Messiah's reign.

"The dayspring from on high hath visited us.
—Luke i. 78.

Daystar (The). The morning star. Hence the emblem of hope or better prospects.

"Again over the vine-covered regions of France, see the day-star of liberty rise."

De Bonne Grâce (French). Willingly; with good grace.

De Die in Diem. From day to day continuously, till the business is completed.

"The Ministry have elected to go on de die in diem."—Newspaper paragraph, December, 1803.

De Facto. Actually, in reality; in opposition to de jure, lawfully or rightfully. Thus John was de facto king, but Arthur was so de jure.

De Haut en Bas. Superciliously.

"She used to treat him a little de haut en bas."—C. Reade.

* * But Du haut en bas. From top to bottom.

De Jure (Latin). By right, rightfully, lawfully, according to the law of the land. Thus a legal axiom says: "De jure Judices, de facto Juratores; respondunt" (Judges look to the law, juries to the facts).

De Lunático Inquirendo (Latin). A writ issued to inquire into the state of a person's mind, whether it is sound or not. If not of sound mind, the person is called non compos, and is committed to proper guardians.

De Mortuis Nil Nisi Bonum. Of the dead speak kindly or not at all.

De Nihilo Nihil Fit (Latin). You cannot make anything out of nothing.

De Novo (Latin). Afresh; over again from the beginning.

De Profundis [Out of the depths]. The 130th Psalm is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It is sung by Roman Catholics when the dead are committed to the grave.

De Rigueur. Strictly speaking, quite comme il faut, in the height of fashion.
De Trop, (French). Supererogatory, more than enough. *Rien de trop, let nothing be in excess. Preserve in all things the golden mean. Also "one too many," in the way; when a person's presence is not wished for, that person is de trop.

Dead. Dead as a door-nail. The door-nail is the plate or knob on which the knocker or hammer strikes. As this nail is knocked on the head several times a day, it cannot be supposed to have much life left in it.

"Come thou and the five men, and if I do not leave you all as dead as a door-nail, I pray God I may never eat grapes more."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., iv. 19. (Jack Cade.)

"Fuscoff, what is the old king dead?"—Pistol. Ass nain in door.

Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 3.

Dead as a herring. (See Herrings.)

Dead. He is dead. "Gone to the world of light." "Joined the majority." The wind is dead against us. Directly opposed to our direction. Instead of making the ship more lively, its tendency is quite the contrary. It makes a "dead set" at our progress.

Dead. Let the dead bury the dead. Let bygones be bygones. Don't take up old and dead grievances.

"Let me entreat you to let the dead bury the dead, to cast behind you every recollection of bygone evils, and to cherish, to love, to sustain one another through all the vicissitudes of human affairs in the times that are to come."—Gladstone: Home Rule Bill (February 13th, 1893).

Dead Drunk. So intoxicated as to be wholly powerless.

"Pitman,man has finely observed, that a man is not to be considered dead drunk till he lies on the floor and stretches out his arms and legs to prevent his going lower."—Waller.

Dead-eye, in nautical phrase, is a block of wood with three holes through it, for the lanyards of rigging to pass through, without sheaves, and with a groove round it for an iron strap. (Dana: Seamen's Manual, p. 92.)

* The holes are eyes, but they are dead eyes.

Dead-flat (A), in ship architecture, one of the bends amidship. (Dana.)

Dead Freight. That part of a cargo which does not belong to the freight. Dead freight is not counted in the freight, and when the cargo is delivered is not to be reckoned.

Dead Hand (A). A first-rate. One that would dead-beat. (See Mortmain.)

"First-rate work it was too; he was always a dead hand at splitting."—Baldwin: Robbery Under Arms, 2v.
use of the person who carries the bread out is called a "dead man."

Dead Men's Shoes. Waiting for dead men's shoes. Looking out for legacies; looking to stand in the place of some moneymaker when he is dead and buried.

Dead Pan (The). A poem founded on the tradition that at the crucifixion a cry swept across the ocean in the hearing of many, "Great Pan is Dead," and that at the same time the responses of the oracles ceased for ever. Elizabeth Barrett Browning has a poem so called (1844).

Dead reckoning. A calculation of the ship's place without any observation of the heavenly bodies. A guess made by consulting the log, the time, the direction, the wind, and so on. Such a calculation may suffice for many practical purposes, but must not be fully relied on.

Dead hopes. Those which are fixed or do not run on blocks; so called because they have no activity or life in them.

Dead Sea. So the Romans called the "Salt Sea." Josephus says that the vale of Siddim was changed into the Dead Sea at the destruction of Sodom (Antiq. i. 8, 3, etc.). The water is of a dull green colour. Few fish are found therein, but it is not true that birds which venture near its vapours fall down dead. The shores are almost barren, but hyenas and other wild beasts lurk there. Called the "Salt Sea" because of its saltness. The percentage of salt in the ocean generally is about three or four, but of the Salt Sea it is twenty-six or more.

Dead Sea fruit. Fair to the eye, but nauseous to the taste; full of promise, but without reality. (See Apples of Sodom.)

Dead set. He made a dead set at her. A pointed or decided determination to bring matters to a crisis. The allusion is to a setter dog that has discovered game, and makes a dead set at it.

To be at a dead set is to be set fast, so as not to be able to move. The allusion is to machinery.

To make a dead set upon someone is to attack him resolutely, to set upon him; the allusion being to dogs, bulls, etc., set on each other to fight.

Dead Shares. In theatrical sharing companies three or more supernumerary shares are so called. The manager has one or more of these shares for his expenses; a star will have another; and sometimes a share, or part of a share, is given to an actor who has brought down the house, or made a hit.

Dead water. The milky-water closing in with the ship's stern, as she passes through the water. It shifts its place, but is like taking money from one pocket and putting it into another.

Dead weight. The weight of something without life; a burden that does nothing towards easing its own weight; a person who encumbers us and renders no assistance. (See Dead lift.)

Dead wind. A wind directly opposed to a ship's course; a wind dead ahead.

Dead wood, in shipbuilding. Blocks of timber laid on the ship's keel. This is no part of the ship, but it serves to make the keel more rigid.

Dead works, in theology. Such works as do not earn salvation, or even assist in obtaining it. For such a purpose their value is nil. (Heb. ix. 14.)

Def.

Def as an adder. (See below, Deaf Adder.)

Def as a post. Quite deaf; or so inattentive as not to hear what is said. One might as well speak to a gate-post or log of wood.

Def as a white cat. It is said that white cats are deaf and stupid. None so deaf as those who won't hear. The French have the same locution: "Il n'y a de pire sourd que celui qui ne veut pas entendre."

Deaf Adder. "The deaf adder stoppeth her ears, and will not hearken to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely" (Psalm lvi. 4, 5). Captain Bruce says, "If a viper enters the house, the charmer is sent for, who entices the serpent, and puts it into a bag. I have seen poisonous vipers twist round the bodies of these pyelli in all directions, without having their fangs extracted." According to tradition, the nap stops its ears when the charmer utters his incantation, by applying one ear to the ground and twisting its tail into the other. In the United States the copperhead is so called.

Deal. A portion. "A tenth deal of flour." (Exodus xxix. 40.) (German, Deal-fish. So called because of some fancied resemblance to a deal-board, from its length and thinness.

Dean (the Latin Decan̄us). The chief over ten prebends or canons.
The Dean (Il Piova'no). Arlott, the Italian humorist. (1385-1483.)
Jonathan Swift, Dean of St. Patrick. (1667-1745.)

Deans (Effie), in Scott's Heart of Midlothian, is Helen Walker. She is abandoned by her lover, Georgie Robertson [Staunton], and condemned for child-murder.

Jeanie Deans. Half-sister of Effie Deans, who walks all the way to London to plead for her sister. She is a model of good sense, strong affection, and disinterested heroism. (See Walker.)

"We follow Pilgrim through his progress with an interest not inferior to that with which we follow Elizabeth from Serbia to Moscow, and Jeanie Deans from Edinburgh to London."—Lord Macaulay.

Dear. Oh, dear me! Regarded, but without evidence, as a corruption of the Italian O Dio mio!

Dear Bought and Far Brought or Dear bought and far fell. A gentle reproof for some extravagant purchase of luxury.

Dearest. Most hateful, as dearest foe. The word dear, meaning "beloved," is the Saxon deor (dear, rare); but dear, "hateful," is the Anglo-Saxon dervan (to hurt), Scotch dree (to annoy).

"Would I had met my dearest foe in heaven, or ever I had seen that day, Horatio! Shakespeare. Hamil. i. 2.

Death, according to Milton, is twinkelkeeper with Sin, of Hell-gate.

"The other shape (if shape it might be called that shape had more Distinguishable of member, joint, or limb. One substance might be called that shadow seemed); The likeness of a king's crown had on." Milton: Paradise Lost, i. 412, 413.

Death. (See BLACK DEATH.)

Death stands, like Mercenaries, in every way. (See MERCURY.)

Till death we do part. (See DEPART.)

Angel of Death. (See ABOU-JAHIl, AZZAB.)

At death's door. On the point of death; very dangerously ill.

In at the death. Present when the fox was caught and killed.

Death and Doctor Hornbook.

Doctor Hornbook was John Wilson the apothecary, whom the poet met at the Torbolton Masonic Lodge. (Burns.)

Death from Strange Cause.

As chylus was killed by the fall of a tortoise on his bald head from the claws of an eagle in the air. (Valerius Maximus, ix. 12, and Pliny: History, vii. 7.)

Agathocles (4 syl.), tyrant of Sicily, was killed by a toadpick at the age of ninety-five.

Anad'vion was choked by a grapestone. (Pliny; History, vii. 7.)

Bassus (Quintus Lucanus) died from the prick of a needle in his left thumb.

Chalcus, the soothsayer, died of laughter at the thought of having outlived the predicted hour of his death.

Charles VII., of France, conducting his queen into a tennis-court, struck his head against the lintel, and it caused his death.

Fabius, the Roman pretor, was choked by a single goat-hair in the milk which he was drinking. (Pliny; History, vii. 7.)

Frederick Lewis, Prince of Wales, died from the blow of a cricket-ball.

Gallus (Cornelius), the pretor, and Titus Haterius, a knight, each died while kissing the hand of his wife.

Gabrielle (La belle), the mistress of Henri IV., died from eating an orange.

Hadasch died of thirst in the harvest-field because (in observance of the rule of St. Patrick) he refused to drink a drop of anything.

Lapidius (Quintus Aflviius), going out of his house, struck his great toe against the threshold and expired.

Louis VI. met with his death from a pig running under his horse and causing it to stumble.

Marqule died of laughter on seeing a monkey trying to pull on a pair of boots.

Otley, the poet, in a starving condition, had a guinea given him, on which he bought a loaf of bread, and died while swallowing the first mouthful.

Pampillus (Pamur Babius), a man of pretorian rank, died while asking a boy what o'clock it was.

Phalacron (1 syl.) died of laughter at seeing an ass eating the figs provided for his own dessert. (Valerius Maximus.)

Pharon (Philus) dropped down dead while in the act of paying a bill. (Boscoberry the Elder.)

Quenelaud, a Norman physician, of Montpellier, died from a slight wound made in his hand in extracting a splinter.
Sausfran (Appius) was choked to death supping up the white of an under-boiled egg. (Pliny: History, vii. 33.)

Torquatus (Aulus Manius), a gentleman of consular rank, died in the act of taking a cheesecake at dinner.

Valla (Lucius Tuccius), the physician, died in the act of taking a draught of medicine.

William III. died from his horse stumbling over a mole-hill.

Zucchi, the great painter, died of laughter at sight of a hog which he had just described.

It will be observed that four of the list died of laughter. No doubt the reader will be able to add other examples.

Death in the Pot. During a death in Gilgal, there was made for the sons of the prophets a pottage of wild herbs, some of which were poisonous. When the sons of the prophets tasted the pottage, they cried out, "There is death in the pot." Then Elisha put into it some meal, and its poisonous qualities were counteracted. (2 Kings iv. 40.)

Death under Shield. Death in battle.

"Her imagination had been familiarised with wild and bloody events ... and had been trained up to consider an honourable death under shield a desirable termination to the life of a warrior."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 6.

Death-bell. A tinkling in the ears, supposed by the Scotch peasantry to announce the death of a friend.

"O lady, 'tis dark, an' I heard the death-bell. An' I scarce can endure for grief any more."—James Hogg: Mountain Bard.

"Death-meals, as they were termed, were spread in honour of the deceased."—Sir W. Scott: The Betrothed, chap. 7.

Death-watch. Any species of Anobium, a genus of wood-boring beetles that make a clicking sound, once supposed to presage death.

Death's Head. Bawds and procurers used to wear a ring bearing the impression of a death's head in the time of Queen Elizabeth. Allusions not uncommon in plays of the period.

"Sell some of my deeds to buy thee a death's head, and put it upon thy middle finger. Your least considering bawds do so much."—Messenger: Old Love, iv. 1.

Death's Head on a Mopstick. A thin, sickly person, a mere anatomy, is so called. When practical jokes were more common it was by no means unusual to mount on a mopstick a turnip with holes for eyes, and a candle's inside, to scare travellers at night time.

Deaths-man. An executioner; a person who kills another brutally but lawfully.

"Great Hector's deaths-man."—Heywood: Iron Age.

Debatable Land. A tract of land between the Eek and Sark, claimed by both England and Scotland, and for a long time the subject of dispute. This tract of land was the hotbed of thieves and vagabonds.

De'bou. One of the heroes who accompanied Brute to Britain. According to British fable, Devonshire is the county or share of Debon. (See Devonshire.)

Debonair [Le Débonnaire]. Louis I. of France, sometimes called in English The Melk, son and successor of Charlemagne; a man of courteous manners, cheerful temper, but effeminate and deficient in moral energy. (778, 814-840.)

Debris. The débris of an army. The remnants of a routed army. Débris means the fragments of a worn-down rock. It is a geological term (débriser, to break down).

Debt of Nature. To pay the debt of Nature. To die. Life is a loan, not a gift, and the debt is paid off by death.

"The slender debt to Nature's quickly paid."—Quarles: Emblems.

Decameron. A volume of tales related in ten days (Greek, deka, hemeron), as the Decameron of Boccaccio, which contains one hundred tales related in ten days.

Decamp. He decamped in the middle of the night. Left without paying his debts. A military term from the Latin de-campus (from the field); French, décamper, to march away.

Decanillar. To be off, to decamp, to escape. A curious instance of argot. Canille is old French for chenille, a pupe, imago, or chrysalis. These afterwards become winged insects and take their flight. So a visitor says in France, "I must decaniller," or "I must decamper," I must be off.

December. (Latin, the tenth month.) So it was when the year began in March with the vernal equinox; but since January and February have been inserted before it, the term is quite incorrect.
Deception.

"Doubtless the pleasure is as great
Of being cheated as to cheat;
As lookers-on feel most delight."

That least perceive a juggler's sleight,
And still the less they understand.

The more they admire his sleight of hand."

Butler: Hudibras, part ii. 3.

Deceit (2 syl.) means "to knock out." Several things being set before a person, he eliminates all but one, which he selects as his choice. A derided man is one who quickly eliminates every idea but the one he intends to adhere to.

Decimo. A man in decimo—i.e. a hobby-de-boy. Jonson uses the phrase in decimo-secto.

Deck. A pack of cards, or that part of the pack which is left after the hands have been dealt.

"But whilst he thought to steal the single 'ten,'
The 'king' was skillfully fingered from the deck."

Shakespeare: 3 Henry VI, v. 1.

To sweep the deck. To clear off all the stakes. (See above.) To deck is to decorate or adorn. (Anglo-Saxon, decoan; Dutch, dekken, to cover.)

"I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
And not have strewed thy grave."

Clear the decks—i.e. got out of the way; your room is better than your company; I am going to be busy. A sea term. Decks are cleared before action.

Decking Churches. Isaiah (lx. 13) says: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee; the fir-tree, the pine-tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary." The "glory of Lebanon" is the cedar-tree. These are not the evergreens mainly used in church decorations. At Christmas the holly is chiefly used, though those mentioned by Isaiah abound.

Décolléte [da-coal-ta]. Nothing even décolleté should be uttered before ladies—i.e. bearing the least semblance to a double entendre. Décolleté is the French for a "dress cut low about the bosom."

Decoration Day. May 30th: set apart in the United States for decorating the graves of those who fell in the "War of the Union" (1861-5).

Decoy Duck. A bait or lure; a duck taught to allure others into a net, and employed for this purpose.

Decrepit. Unable to make a noise. It refers rather to the mute voice and silent footstep of old age than to its broken strength. (Latin, de-crepo.)

Deeman Gate. The gate where the 10th cohorts of the legion were posted. It was opposite the Praetorian gate, and farthest from the enemy. (Latin, decem, ten.)

Dedalian. Intricate; variegated. So called from Dedalos, who made the Cretan labyrinth.

Dedlock (Sir Leicester). An honourable and truthful gentleman, but of such fossilized ideas that no "tongue of man" could shake his prejudices. (Charles Dickens: Bleak House.)

Dee—i.e. D for a detective. Look sharp! the dees are about.

Dee (Dr. John). A man of vast knowledge, whose library, museum, and mathematical instruments were valued at £2,000. On one occasion the populace broke into his house and destroyed the greater part of his valuable collection, under the notion that Dee held intercourse with the devil. He ultimately died a pauper, at the advanced age of eighty-one, and was buried at Mortlake. He professed to be able to raise the dead, and had a magic mirror, afterwards in Horace Walpole’s collection at Strawberry Hill (1527-1608).

Dee’s spectacula or mirror, in which persons were told they could see their friends in distant lands and how they were occupied. It is a piece of solid pink-tinted glass about the size of an orange. It is now in the British Museum.

Dee Mills. If you lend the rent of Dee Mills, you would spend it all. Dee Mills, in Cheshire, used to yield a very large annual rent. (Cheshire proverb.)

"There was a jolly miller
Lived on the river Dee;
He worked and sung from morn to night—
No lark so blithe as he;
And this the burden of his song
For ever used to be—
I care for nobody, no, not I;
If nobody cares for me!"

Bickerstaff: Love in a Village (1732).

Deer. Supposed by poets to shed tears. The drops, however, which fall from their eyes are not tears, but an oily secretion from the so-called tear-pits.

"A poor sequestered stag
Did come to languish
Cursed one another down his innocent nose
In pitious chase."

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 2.

Small deer. Any small animal; and used metaphorically for any collection of trifles or trifling matters.

"But mice and mites, and such small deer,
Have been Tom’s food for seven long years."

Shakespeare: Lear, iii. 4.
Deerslayer. The hero of a novel so called, by F. Cooper. He is the beau-ideal of a man without cultivation—honourable in sentiment, truthful, and brave as a lion; pure of heart, and without reproach in conduct. The character appears, under different names, in five novels—The Deerslayer, The Pathfinder,
The Last of the Mohicans, The Pioneers, and The Prairie. (See Natty Bumpo.)

Deos (The). (See above Deo.)

Deus-Binder. Tamnuras, King of Persia, who defeated the Deev king and the fierce Demrush, but was slain by Houndkonz, another powerful Deev.

Default. Judgment by default is when the defendant does not appear in court on the day appointed. The judge gives sentence in favour of the plaintiff, not because the plaintiff is right, but from the default of the defendant.

Defeat. “What though the field be lost? all is not lost.” (Milton: Paradise Lost, i. line 105-6.)

“All is lost but honour” (Tout est perdu, madame, jors l’honneur) is what François I. is said to have written to his mother, after the Battle of Pavia in 1525.

Defeat. There is a somewhat strange connection between de-feat and de-feature. Defeat is the French de-fait, un-made or un-done; Latin, de-factus (defectus, our “defect”); and feature is the Norman failure, Latin factura, the make-up, frame, or form. Hence old writers have used the word “defeat” to mean disfigure or spoil the form.

“Defeat thy favour [face] with an unsymp.
heard.”—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Defender of the Faith. A title given by Pope Leo X. to Henry VIII.
of England, in 1521, for a Latin treatise On the Seven Sacraments. Many previous kings, and even subjects, had been termed “defenders of the Catholic faith,” “defenders of the Church,” and so on, but no one had borne it as a title.
The sovereign of Spain is entitled Cathoic, and of France Most Christian.

“God bless the king! I mean the ‘faith’s de-lider!”
God bless—no harm in blessing the Pretender.
But who Pretender is, or who is King
God bless us all!” That’s quite another thing.”
         John Byron: Shornhead Writer

“Richard II.,” in a writ to the sheriffs, uses these words: “Ecclesia ejus nec defensor annum.” If Henry VII., in the Black Book, is called “Defender of the Faith:” but the pope gave the title to Henry VIII., and from that time to this it has been perpetuated. (See Graceless Floresin.)

Deffait (Madame). Marie Antoinetta.
So called because she was always demanding money of her ministers, and never had any. According to the Revolutionary song:

  “La Boulangère a des ecus,
  Qui ne lui content guère.”

(See Baken.)

Degenerate (4 syl.) is to be worse than the parent stock. (Latin, de genus.)

Dei Gratia. By God’s grace. Introduced into English charters in 1106; as much as to say, “dei non hominum gratia,” by divine right and not man’s appointment. The archbishops of Canterbury from 676 to 1170 assumed the same style.

† From the time of Offa, King of Mercia (A.D. 780), we find occasionally the same or some similar assumption as,
Dei dono, Christo donante, etc. The Archbishop of Canterbury is now divina providentia.

Dei Gratia omitted on a florin. (See Graceless Floresin.)

Dei Judicium (Latin). The judgment of God; so the judgment by ordeal was called, because it was supposed that God would deal rightly with the appellants.

Deiānira. Wife of Hercules, and the inadvertent cause of his death.
Nessos told her that anyone to whom she gave a shirt steeped in his blood, would love her with undying love; she gave it to her husband, and it caused him such agony that he burnt himself to death on a funeral pile. Deiānira killed herself for grief.

Deiphobus (4 syl.). One of the sons of Priam, and, next to Hector, the bravest and boldest of all the Trojans.
On the death of his brother Paris, he married Helen; but Helen betrayed him to her first husband, Menelaos, who slew him. (Homer’s Iliad and Virgil’s Eneid.)

Deities.

Ait: Ariel, Eileas (singular, Elf).
Cores or Cousins: Hill-people (Högfolk, hög = hill). (Corn: CORE (2 syl.) (Greek, Demon).)
Domestic Life: Vesta.
Eloquence: Mercurio (Greek, Hermēs).
Enchantment: Venus.
Fate: (The): Three in number (Greek, Pare Nómis, 3 syl., Kēros).
Fire: Vulcan (Greek, Herōs, 3 syl.), Vesta, Munster.
Fate: (syl.): Uranus.
Four: Three in number (Greek, Euneus, 4 syl., Erinnīyes).
Dejeuner

Gardens: Priapus, Vertumnus with his wife Pomona.
Graces (Tha): Three in number (Greek, Charites).
Helle: Trolls. There are also Wood Trolls and Water Trolls. (See below Mountains.)
Home Spirits (q.v.): Penates (3 syl.), Larves (2 syl.).
Hunting: Diana (Greek, Artemis).
Infernal Regions: Pluto, with his wife Proserpine (3 syl., Greek, Amede and Penelope).-Justice: Themis, Anara, Nemesis.
Lares: Cupid (Greek, Eros).
Marriage: Hygeia.
Medicine: Asclepius.
Minos: Trolls.
Morning: Aurora (Greek, Eos).
Mountains: Oreades or Graces (4 syl.), from the Greek, spae, a mountain; Trolls.
Ocean (Tha): Oceanides.
Poetry and Music: Apollo, the nine Muses.
Reindeer (Tha): Iris.
Ritches: Plutus. Shakespeare speaks of "Plutus' mine" (Julius Caesar, iv. 3).
Rivers and Streams: Fluvialides, 4 syl. (Greek, Potamides, 3 syl.).
Sea (Tha): Nereus, Poseidon, 3 syl.). His son Triton, Nereus, Nereidae, 3 syl. (See Sea).
Shepherds and their Flocks: Pan, the Satyrs, Springs, Lakes, Brooks, etc.: Nereides or Naiads (2 syl.).
Time: Saturn (Greek, Chronos).
War: Mars (Greek, Ares), Bellona, Thor.
Waters-nymphs: Naiads, 3 syl., Undines (2 syl.).
Winds (Tha): West.
Wine: Bacchus (Greek, Dionysus).
Wood: Minerva, Minerva (Greek, Pallus, Athene), or Pallas-Atlante.
Woods: Dryads (A Hama-Dryad presides over some fir tree), Wood-Trolls.
Youth: Hesiod.

7. Of course this is not meant for a complete list of heathen and pagan deities. Such a list would require a volume.

Déjeuner à la Fourchette (French), Breakfast with forks; a cold collation; a breakfast in the middle of the day, with meat and wine; a lunch.

Delaware, U.S. America, was granted by charter in 1701 to Lord De la Ware, who first explored the bay into which the river empties itself.

Delectable Mountains (Tha), in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, are a range of mountains from which the "Celestial City" may be seen. They are in Immanuel's land, and are covered with sheep, for which Immanuel had died.

Delf, or more correctly Inrlt. A common sort of pottery made at Delft in Holland, about 1310.

Delia, of Pope's line, "Slander or poison dread from Delia's rage," was Lady Deloraine, who married W. Windam of Carsham, and died 1744. The person said to have been poisoned was Miss Mackenzie. (Satires and Epistles, i. 81.)

Delia is not better known to our yard-dog—i.e. the person is so intimate and well known that the yard-dog will not bark at his approach. It is from Virgil, who makes his shepherd Menalces-boat "That his sweetheart is as well known to his dog as Delia the shepherdess." (Eclogues, iii. 67.)

Delias. The sacred vessel made by Theseus (2 syl.) and sent annually from Athens to Delos. This annual festival lasted 30 days, during which no Athenian could be put to death, and as Socrates was condemned during this period his death was deferred till the return of the sacred vessel. The ship had been so often repaired that not a stick of the original vessel remained at the time, yet it was the identical ship. So the body changes from infancy to old age, and though no single particle remains constant, yet the man 6 feet high is identical with his infant body a span long. (Sometimes called Theor.)

Delight is "to make light." Hence Shakespeare speaks of the disembodied soul as "the delight spirit . . . blown with restless violence round about the pendant world" (Measure for Measure, iii. 1). So again he says of gifts, "the more delayed, delighted" (Cymbeline, v. 5), meaning the longer they are delayed the "lighter" or less valuable they are esteemed. Delighted, in the sense of "pleased," means light-hearted, with buoyant spirits.

The delight of mankind. So Titus, the Roman emperor, was entitled (40, 79-81).

Delirium. From the Latin tis (the ridge left by the plough), hence the verb de-liv're, to make an irregular ridge or bank in ploughing. Delirium is one whose mind is not properly tilled or cultivated, a person of irregular intellect; and de-lirium is the state of a person whose mental faculties are like a field full of banks or irregularities. (See PREVARICA-

Della Cruscan or Della Cruscan School. So called from Crusca, the Florentine academy. The name is applied to a school of poetry started by some young Englishmen at Florence in the latter part of the eighteenth century. These silly, sentimental affectations, which appeared in the World and the Oracle, created for a time quite a furor. The whole affair was mercilessly gibed at in the Breviar and Merian of Gifford. (Academia della Crusca literally means, the Academy of Chaff, and its object was to sift the chaff from the Italian language, or to purify it.)
Delmonico. The great American cuissiner, of New York.

"The table service is of heavy silver, French cut glasses, and handsome china; and the meals are worthy of Delmonico."—The Oracle, August 22d, 1884, p. 465.

Delos. A floating island ultimately made fast to the bottom of the sea by Poseidon (Neptune). Apollo having become possessor of it by exchange, made it his favourite retreat. It is one of the Cyclades.

Delphi or Delphos. A town of Phocis, famous for a temple of Apollo and for an oracle celebrated in every age and country. So called from its twin peaks, which the Greeks called brothers (adelpheis).

Delphi Classics. A set of Latin classics edited in France by thirty-nine scholars, under the superintendence of Montausier, Bossuet, and Huet, for the use of the son of Louis XIV., called the Grand Dauphin. Their chief value consists in their verbal indexes or concordances.

Delta. The island formed at the mouth of a river, which usually assumes a triangular form, like the Greek letter (Δ) called delta; as the delta of the Nile, the delta of the Danube, Rhine, Ganges, Indus, Niger, Mississippi, Po, and so on.

Deluge. After me the Deluge ["Après nous le déluge"]. When I am dead the deluge may come for naught I care. Generally ascribed to Prince Metternich, but the Prince borrowed it from Mme. Pompadour, who laughed off all the remonstrances of ministers at her extravagance by saying, "Après nous le déluge" (Ruin, if you like, when we are dead and gone).

Deluges (3 syl.). The chief, besides that recorded in the Bible, are the following:—The deluge of Fohi, the Chinese; the Satyavutta, of the Indians; the Xisuthrus, of the Assyrians; the Mexican deluge; and the Greek deluges of Deucalion and Deukippos.

* The most celebrated painting of Noah's Flood is by Poussin, in Paris; and that by Raphael is in the Vatican (Rome).

Demerit has reversed its original meaning (Latin, demerere, to merit, to deserve). Hence Plautus, Demerétas durr lusadas (to accord due praise): Ovid, Numine culta demerrière; Livy, demerēri beneficō civitatem. The de- is intensive, as in "de-mand," "de-scribe," "de-claim," etc.; not the pri-vative deorsum, as in the word "de-fame.

"My dements [deserts] May speak unbosomed."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 2.

Demijohn ( Δ ). A glass vessel with a large body and small neck, enclosed in wickerwork like a Florence-flask, and containing more than a bottle. (French, dame-jeanne, "Madam Jane," a corruption of Damaghan, a town in Persia famous for its glass works.)

Demi-monde. Loretto, courtisans. Le beau monde means "fashionable society," and demi-monde the society only half acknowledged.

"Demi-monde implies not only recognition and a status, but a certain social standing."—Saturday Review.

Demi-rep. A woman whose character has been blown upon. Contraction of demi-reputation.

Demijurge (3 syl.), in the language of Platonists, means that mysterious agent which made the world and all that it contains. The Logos or Word spoken of by St. John, in the first chapter of his gospel, is the Demiurgus of Platonising Christians. In the Gnostic systems, Jehovah (as an eon or emanation of the Supreme Being) is the Demiurg.

"The power is not that of an absolute cause, but only a world-maker, a demiurge; and this does not answer to the human idea of deity."—Winchell: Science and Religion, chap. v. p. 255.

Demobilisation of troops. The disorganisation of them, the disarming of them. This is a French military term. To "demobilise" troops is to render them liable to be moved on service out of their quarters; to "demobilise" them is to send them home, so that they cannot be moved from their quarters against anyone. To change from a war to a peace footing.

Democracy. A Republican form of government, a commonwealth. (Greek, demos-krátia, the rule of the people.)

Democritos. The laughing philosopher of Abdera. He should rather be termed the deriding philosopher, because he derided or laughed at people's folly or vanity. It is said that he put out his eyes that he might think more deeply.

"Democritus, dear Drell, revisit earth.
And with our follies stint thy lightened mirth."—Prior.

Demodocos. A minstrel who, according to Homer, sang the amours of Mars and Venus in the court of Alcinous while Ulysses was a guest there.

Demogorgon. A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. Hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" (Paradise Lost, ii. 965). This tyrant king of the elves and fays lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. Sponser (book iv. 2) says, "He dwells in the deep abyss where the three fatal sisters dwell." (Greek daimon, demon; gorgon, terrible.)

"Must I call your master to my aid, At whose dread name the trembling furies quake, Hell stands aghast, and earth's foundations shake?"—Rove: Lucan's Pharsalia, i.

"When the morn aisoome none are found, For true! Demogorgon walks by his round, And if he finds a fairy in light, He drives the wretch before, and lashes into sight."—Dryden: The Flower and the Lea, 862, 4.

Demon of Matrimonial Unhappiness. Asmodeus, who slew the seven husbands of Sara. (Yebit.) (See ASMODEUS.)

Prince of Demons. Asmodeus. (Talmud.)

Demos (King). The electorate; the proletariat. Not the mob, but those who choose and elect our senators, and are therefore the virtual rulers of the nation.

Demosthenes' Lantern. A charmed monument erected by Lycurgus in Athens, originally surrounded by the tripod won by Lysicrates. A "tripod" was awarded to everyone in Athens who produced the best drama or choral piece of his tribe. The street in which Demosthenes' Lantern stood was full of these tripods.

Demurage. An allowance made to the master or owners of a ship by the freighters for detaining her in port longer than the time agreed upon. (Latin, demorari, to delay.)

"The extra days beyond the lay days . . . are called days of demurage."—Kent: Commentaries, vol. iii. part v. lecture xlviii. p. 169.

Demy. A size of paper between royal and crown. Its size is 22½ in. × 17¼ in. It is from the French word demi (half), and means demi-royal (a small royal), royal being 25 in. × 20 in. The old watermark is a fleur-de-lis.

A Demy of Magdalen College, Oxford, is a "superior" sort of scholar, half a Fellow.

Deo Gratias. Evening. God ye good den!—i.e. God (give) ye good evening. This is the final d of good joined to the "en," a contraction of evening.

Denuarius. A Roman silver coin, equal in value to ten asses (deni-asses). The word was used in France and England for the inferior coins, whether silver or copper, and for ready money generally. Now d (denuarius) stands for money less than a shilling, as £ s. d.

"The denarius . . . shown to our Lord . . . was the tribute-money payable to the Jews to the Roman emperor, and must not be confounded with the tribute paid to the Temple."—F. H. Madden: Jewish Coinage, chap. xi. p. 214.

Denuarius Dei [God's penny], An earnest of a bargain, which was given to the church or poor.

Denuarius St. Petri [Peter's Pence]. One penny from each family, given to the Pope.

Denuarius tertius comitatus. One-third of the pence of the county, which was paid to the lord. The other two-thirds belonged to the Crown. (See D.)

Denizen. A native citizen—i.e. an alien who has been naturalised by letters patent. (Old French demenster; Latin de-intus, from within.)

"A denizen is a kind of middle state, between an alien and a natural-born subject, and partakes of both."—Blackstone: Commentaries, book 1, chap. x. p. 374.

Dennis (John), called the "best abused man in England." Swift and Pope both satirised him. He is called Zoilus.

Denuement (3 syl.). The untying of a plot; the winding-up of a novel or play. (French dénouer, to untie.)

Denys (St.), according to tradition, carried his head, after martyrdom, for six miles, and then deliberately laid it down on the spot where stands the present cathedral bearing his name. This absurd tale took rise from an ancient painting, in which the artist, to represent the martyrdom of the bishop, drew a headless body; but, in order that the trunk might be recognised, placed the head in front, between the martyr's hands.

Sir Denys Brand, in Crabbe's Borough, is a country magnate who apos humility. He rides on a sorry brown pony "not worth £5," but mounts his lackey on a racehorse, "twice victor for a plate." Sir Denys Brand is the type of a character by no means uncommon.

Deo Gratias (Latin). Thanks to God.
Deo Juvante (Latin). With God's help.

Deo, non Fortuna (Latin). From God, not from mere luck; [I attribute it] to God and not to blind chance.

Deo Volente, contracted into D. V. (Latin). God being willing; by God's will.

Deodand means something "given to God" (deo-dandum). This was the case when a man met with his death through injuries inflicted by some chattel, as by the fall of a ladder, the toss of a bull, or the kick of a horse. In such cases the cause of death was sold, and the proceeds given to the Church. The custom was based on the doctrine of purgatory. As the person was sent to his account without the sacrament of extreme unction, the money thus raised served to pay for masses for his repose. Deodands were abolished September 1st, 1846.

Depart. To part thoroughly; to separate effectually. The marriage service in the ancient prayer-books had "till death us depart," or "till alimony or death us do part," a sentence which has been corrupted into "till death us do part."

"Before they settle hands and hearts, Till alimony or death depart."

Diderot: Histoire, m. 3.

Departiment. France is divided into departments, as Great Britain and Ireland are divided into counties or shires. From 1768 it was divided into gouvernements, of which thirty-two were grand and eight petit. In 1790, by a decree of the Constituent Assembly, it was mapped out de novo into eighty-three departments. In 1804 the number of departments was increased to 107, and in 1812 to 130. In 1815 the territory was reduced to eighty-six departments, and continued so till 1889, when Savoy and Nice were added. The present number is eighty-seven.

Dependence. An existing quarrel. (A term used among swordsmen.)

"Let us pause... until I give you my opinion on this dependence... for if we could examine the state of our dependence, we may be better able to determine whether the sisters three have done us to expiate the pains with our blood." — Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xxi.

Depincingas (2 syll.) or Escaping. A breadth of netting to be sewed on a hobbly (nct) to make it sufficiently large. Sometimes the breadth is called a depth, and the act of sewing one depth on another is called deepening the net. In 1674 the Dutch settlers at Yarmouth were required "to provide themselves with twine and depingas in foreign places."

Deputations. The year of deputations. The eighth of the Hej'rah, after Mahomet's victory over the Arabs near Ta'if, when deputations from all parts flocked to do him homage.

Depute (2 syll.). To depute means to prune or cut off a part; deputation is the part cut off. A deputation is a slip cut off to represent the whole. (Latin, deputa.)

Derbend [iron]. A town on the Caspian, commanding the coast road. D'Herbelot says: "Les Turcs appellent cetto ville 'Demir Capi' (porte de fer); ce sont les Caspia Porta des anciens."

"Beyond the Caspian's iron gates."

Derby Stakes. Started by Edward Smith Stanley, the twelfth Earl of Derby, in 1780, the year after his establishment of the Oaks stakes (q.v.).

The Derby Day is the day when the Derby stakes are run for; it is the second Wednesday of the great Epsom Spring Meeting, in May.

The Derby Day.

"The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger are called 'The Classic Races.' The Oaks is the classic race for fillies only, three years' old (£1,000); the Derby (Darby) for colts and fillies three years' old; the St. Leger for colts and fillies, those which have run in the Oaks or Derby being eligible.

Derive (2 syll.) means "back to its channel or source" (Latin, de vire). The Latin viris (a river) does not mean the stream or current, but the source whence it flows, or the channel through which it runs. As Ulpian says, "Fons sive locus per longitudinem depressus, quo aqua decurrat."

Dernier Ressort (French). A last resource.

Derrick. A hangman; a temporary crane to remove goods from the hold of a vessel. So called from Derrick, the Tyburn hangman early in the seventeenth century, who for more than a hundred years gave his name to gibbets. (Sv HANGMAN.)

"He rides cursed with the devil, and Derrick must be his host, and Tyburne the inn at which he will light." —Bellman of London, 1616.

Derwentwater. Lord Derwentwater's lights. The Aurora borealis; so called from James, Earl of Derwentwater, beheaded for rebellion February 1689.
24th, 1716. It is said that the northern lights were unusually brilliant on that night.

Desdemona (in Shakespeare's Othello). Daughter of Brabantio. She fell in love with Othello, and eloped with him. Iago, acting on the jealous temper of the Moor, made him believe that his wife had an intrigue with Cassio, and in confirmation of this statement told the Moor that she had given Cassio a pocket-handkerchief, the fact being that Iago's wife, to gratify her husband, had purloined it. Othello asked his bride for it, but she was unable to find it; whereupon the Moor murdered her and then stabbed himself.

"She... was ready to listen and weep, like Desdemona, at the stories of his dangers and campaigns."—Thackeray.

Desmas. (See Dysmas.)

Despair. The Giant Despair, in Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, lived in "Doubting Castle."

Dessert means simply the cloth removed (French, dessert, to clear the cloth); and dessert is that which comes after the cloth is removed.

Destruction. Prince of Destruction, Tamerlane or Timour the Tartar (1335, 1390-1405.)

Destructives (The), as a political term, arose in 1832.

"The Times newspaper, altar to the most effective advocate of the Reform bill, has been obliged to designate those whom it formerly glorified as Radicals, by the more appropriate and emphatic title of the Destructives."—Quarterly Review (Dec., 1832, p. 642.)

Desultory. Those who rode two or more horses in the circus of Rome, and used to leap from one to the other, were called desultores; hence desulator came in Latin to mean one inconstant, or who went from one thing to another; and desultory means after the manner of a desultor.

Detest' is simply to witness against. (Latin, de-testor.)

Decaulion, after the Deluge, was ordered to cast behind him the bones of his mother (i.e. the stones of mother earth). Those thrown by Decaulion became men, and those thrown by his wife, Pyrrha, became women. For the interchange between λάς (people), and λίας (a stone), see Pandar: Olympic Games, ix. 66.

Deculation's flood. According to Greek mythology, Decaulion was a king of Thessaly, in whose reign the whole world was covered with a deluge in consequence of the great impiety of man. (See Deluge.)

Dence. The Kelts called wood-demons dus. (Compare the Latin deus.)

"In the popular mythology both of the Kelts and Teutons there were certain hairy wood-demons, called by the former dus, and by the latter went (German). The common names of Dence and 'Old scratch' are plainly derived from these."—Lowell: Among my Books (Witchcraft), p. 109.

It played the dence with me. It made me very ill; it disagreed with me; it almost ruined me.

The dence is in you. You are a very demon.

Dence take you. Get away! you annoy me.

What the dence is the matter? What in the world is amiss?

Dence-sce. A throw of two dice, one showing one spot and the other showing two spots.

Dence of Cards (The). The two (French, deux). The three is called "Tray" (French, trois; Latin, trece).

"A gentleman being punched by a butcher's tray, exclaimed, 'Dence take the tray.' 'Well,' said the boy, 'I don't know how the dence is to take the tray.'"—Jest Book.

Deus (2 syl.). Deus ex machina. The intervention of a god, or some unlikely event, in order to extricate from difficulties in which a clumsy author has involved himself; any forced incident, such as the arrival of a rich uncle from the Indies to help a young couple in their pecuniary embarrassments. Literally, it means "a god (let down upon the stage or flying in the air) by machinery."

Deva's Vale. The valley of the river Deri or Deva, in Cheshire, celebrated for its pastures and dairy produce.

"He chose a farm in Deva's vale,
Where his long alleys paved upon the main."—Thomson: Castle of Indolence, cant. iii.

Development. (See Evolution.)

Devil. Represented with a cloven foot, because by the Rabbinical writers he is called sevissin (a goat). As the goat is a type of uncleanness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

Devil among the Tailors (The). On Downton's benefit at the Haymarket, some 7,000 journeymen tailors congregated in and around the theatre to prevent a burlesque called The Tailors: a Tragedy for Warm Weather, which they considered insulting to the trade. Fairburn's edition of this play is headed The Devil among the Tailors, and contains an account of this fracas. (See also Biographia Dramatica, article Tailors.) There is a Scotch reel so called.

Devil and Bag o' Nails (The). The public-house by Buckingham Gate was so called, but the sign was The Blackmoor's Head and the Woolpack. (Remarkable Trials, ii. p. 14; 1765.)

Devil and Dr. Faustus (The). Faust was the first printer of Bibles, and issued a large number in imitation of those sold as manuscripts. These he passed off in Paris as genuine, and sold for sixty crowns apiece, the usual price being five hundred crowns. The uniformity of the books, their rapid supply, and their unusual cheapness excited astonishment. Information was laid against him for magic, and, in searching his lodgings, the brilliant red ink with which his copies were adorned was declared to be his blood. He was charged with dealings with the Devil, and condemned to be burnt alive. To save himself, he revealed his secret to the Paris Parlement, and his invention became the admiration of the world. N.B.—This tradition is not to be accepted as history.

Devil and his Dam (The). Either the Devil and his mother, or the Devil and his wife. Numerous quotations may be adduced in support of either of these interpretations. Shakespeare uses the phrase six times, and in King John (ii. 1) dam evidently means mother; thus Constance says that her son Arthur is as like his father as the Devil is like his dam (mother); and in Titus Andronicus Tamora is called the "dam" of a black child. We also read of the Devil's daughter and the Devil's son.

In many mythologies the Devil is supposed to be an animal: Thus in Cuzotte's Diable Amoureux he is a camel: the Irish and others call him a black cat; the Jews speak of him as a dragon (which idea is carried out in our George and the Dragon); the Saints of Japan call him a species of fox; others say he is a goat; and Dante associates him with dragons, swine, and dogs. In all which cases dam for mother is not inappropriate.

On the other hand, dam for leman or wife has good support. We are told that Lilith was the wife of Adam, but was such a vixen that Adam could not live with her, and she became the Devil's dam. We also read that Belphégor "came to earth to seek him out a dam."

"As women when they go wrong are for the most part worse than the other sex, the phrase at the head of this article means the Devil and something worse."

Devil and the Deep Sea (Between the). Between Scylla and Charybdis; between two evils, each equally hazardous. The allusion seems to be to the herd of swine and the devils called Legion.

"In the matter of passing from one part of the vessel to another when she was rolling, we were indeed between the devil and the deep sea."—Nineteenth Century, April, 1891, p. 561.

Devil and Tom Walker (The). An American proverb, used as a caution to usurers. Tom Walker was a poor, miserly man, born at Massachusetts in 1727, and it is said that he sold himself to the Devil for wealth. Be this as it may, Tom suddenly became very rich, and opened a counting-house at Boston during the money panic which prevailed in the time of Governor Belcher. By usury he grew richer and richer; but one day, as he was foreclosing a mortgage with a poor land-jobber, a black man on a black horse knocked at the office door. Tom went to open it, and was never seen again. Of course the good people of Boston searched his office, but all his coffers were found empty; and during the night his house caught fire and was burnt to the ground. (Washington Irving: Tales of a Traveler.)

Devil catch the Hindmost (The). In Scotland (Salamanca) it is said when a class of students have made a certain progress in their mystic studies, they are obliged to run through a subterranean hall, and the last man is seized by the devil, and becomes his imp.

Devil in Dublin City (The). The Scandinavian form of Dublin was Phœnix[æ], and the Latin Dubhlinn. (See Notes and Queries, April 9th, 1881, p. 296, for another explanation.)

"It is just as true the devil's in hell or Dublin city."—Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.

Devil looking Over Lincoln (The). Sir W. Scott in his Kenilworth has, "Like the Devil looking over Lincoln." A correspondent of Notes and Queries, September 10th, 1892, says—

"The famous devil that used to overlook Lincoln College, in Oxford, was taken down (Wednesday, December 15th) two years since (previously) lost his head in a storm."—Gentleman's Magazine, 1881, p. 602.

"We have other similar phrases, as "The devil looking over Durham."
Devil loves Holy Water (As the). That is, not at all. The Roman Catholos teach that holy water drives away the Devil. The Latin proverb is, “Sicut sus amaricinum amat” (as swine love marron); Lucretius, vi. 974, says “amaricinum fugit sus.”

Devil-may-care (4). A reckless fellow.

Devil must be Striking (The) (German). Said when it thunders. The old Norse Doner means Thor, equal to Jupiter, the god of thunder, and doner is the German for thunder or Devil, as may be seen in the expression, “The runaway goose is gone to the Devil” (doner).

Devil on the Neck (4). An instrument of torture used by persecuting papists. It was an iron winch which forced a man’s neck and legs together.

Devil rides on a Fiddlestick (The). Much ado about nothing. Beaumont and Fletcher, Shakespeare, and others, use the phrase. “Fiddlesticks!” as an exclamation, means rubbish! nonsense! When the prince and his merry companions are at the Bear’s Head, first Bardolph rushes in to warn them that the sheriff’s officers are at hand, and anon enters the hostess to put her guests on their guard. But the prince says, “Here’s a devil of a row to make about a trifle” (or “The devil rides on a fiddlestick!”) (1 Henry IV., ii. 2), and hiding some of his companions, he stoutly faces the sheriff’s officers and browbeats them.

Devil Sick would be a Monk (The).

“Harman langubat, monachus bonus non est; debat. Sed cum conservat, manet ut austus est.”

“When the Devil was sick, the devil a monk would be; When the Devil got well, the devil a monk was he.”

Said of those persons who in times of sickness or danger make pious resolutions, but forget them when danger is past and health recovered.

Devil to Pay and no Pitch Hot (The). The “devil” is a seam between the garboard-strake and the keel, and to “pay” is to cover with pitch. In former times, when vessels were often careened for repairs, it was difficult to call and pay this seam before the tide turned. Hence the location, the ship is careened, the devil is exposed, but there is no pitch hot ready, and the tide will turn before the work can be done. (French, payer, from paix, poir, pitch.)

The Devil to Pay is the name of a farce by Jobson and Nelly.

Here’s the very devill to pay. Is used in quite another sense, meaning: Here’s a pretty kettle of fish. I’m in a pretty mess; this is confusion worse confounded.

Proverbial Phrases.

Cheating the Devil. Minting an oath; doing evil for gain, and giving part of the profits to the Church, etc. It is by no means unusual in monkish traditions. Thus the “Devil’s Bridge” is a single arch over a cataract. It is said that his Satanic Majesty had knocked down several bridges, but promised the abbot, Giraldus of Einsiedel, to let this one stand, provided the abbot would sign to him the first living thing that crossed it. When the bridge was finished, the abbot threw across it a loaf of bread, which a hungry dog ran after, and “the rocks re-echoed with peals of laughter to see the Devil thus defeated.” (Longfellow: Golden Legend, v.)

“Give the devil his due. Give even a bad man or one hated like the devil the credit he deserves.

Gone to the Devil. To ruin. The Devil and St. Dunstan was the sign of a public house, No. 2, Fleet Street, at one time much frequented by lawyers.

“Into the Devil Tavern three booted troopers strode.”

Pull devil, pull baker. Lie, cheat, and wrangle away, for one is as bad as the other. (In this proverb baker is not a proper name, but the trade.)

Talk of the devil and he’s sure to come. Said of a person who has been the subject of conversation, and who unexpectedly makes his appearance. An older proverb still is, “Talk of the Duke and he’ll put out his horns;” but the modern euphemism is, “Talk of an angel and you’ll see its wings.” If “from the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh,” their hearts must be full of the evil one who talk about him, and if the heart is full of the devil he cannot be far off.
Devil's

"Forthwith the devil did appear,
For name him, and he's always near."
Prior: Hans Carol.

To hold a candle to the devil is to abut an evildoer out of fawning fear.
The allusion is to the story of an old woman who set one wax taper before the image of St. Michael, and another before the Devil whom he was trampling under foot. Being reproved for paying such honour to Satan, she naïvely replied:
"Ye see, your honour, it is quite uncertain which place I shall go to at last, and sure you will not blame a poor woman for securing a friend in each."

To kindle a fire for the devil is to offer sacrifice, to do what is really sinful, under the delusion that you are doing
God service.

To play the every devil with [the matter]. To so puzzle and mix it as to spoil it utterly.

When the devil is blind. Never. Referring to the utter absence of all disloyalty and evil.

"Ay, Tib, that will be [i.e. all will be true and loyal] when the devil is blind; and his eyes no sight!" — Sir W. Scott: Theat. Manuscript (Johanne Dimmon to Tib Manpre), chap. viii.

Devil (A), in legal parlance, is a leader's fag which gets up the facts of a brief, with the laws bearing on it, and arranges everything for the pleader in methodical order.

These juniors have surplus briefs handled to them by their seniors. A good fag is a good devil and is sure to get on.

The Attorney-General's devils are the Counsel of the Treasury, who not unfrequently get promoted to the bench.

A printer's devil. Formerly, the boy who took the printed sheets from the tympan of the press. Old Moxon says:
"They do commonly so black and beaumont themselves that the workmen do jeocously call them devils."

The errand-boy is now so called. The black slave employed by Aldo Manuzio, Venetian printer, was thought to be an imp. Hence the following proclamation:

"I, Aldo Manuzio, printer at the Dome, have this day made public exposure of the printer's devil. All who think he is not flesh and blood may come and pinch him. — Pronuntiation of Aldo Manuzio, 1490.

Robert the Devil, of Normandy. (See
Robert Le Diable.

The French Devil. Jean Bart, an intrepid French sailor, born at Dunkirk. (1650-1702.)

Son of the Devil. Ezzeleino, chief of the Gibelins, and Governor of Vicenza, was so called for his infamous cruelties. (1216-1259.)

"Fierce Ezzeleino, that most inhuman lord,
Who shall be deemed by men the child of hell." Roosevelt: Orlando Pantou, 115, 52.

The White Devil of Wallachia. George
Castriota was so called by the Turks. (1404-1467.)

Devil's Advocate (The). In the Catholic Church when a name is suggested for canonisation, some person is appointed to oppose the proposition, and is expected to give reasons why it should not take place. This person is technically called Advocatus Diabol.
Having said his say, the concile decides the question.

Devil's Apple. The mandrake.

Devil's Arrows (Yorkshire). Three remarkable "Druid" stones near Boroughbridge, like Harold's Stones, and probably marking some boundary.

Devil's Bird (The). The yellow bunting; is so called from its note, dei.

Devil's Bones. Dice, which are made of bones and lead to ruin.

Devil's Books. Playing cards. A Presbyterian phrase, used in reproof of the term King's Books, applied to a pack of cards, from the French livre des quatre rois (the book of the four kings).
Also called the Devil's Bibli.

Devil's Cabinet (The). Belphego, the Devil's ambassador in France; Hutgin, in Italy; Belin, in Turkey; Tharung, in Spain; and Martinet, in Switzerland.
His grand almoner is Dagon; chief of the eunuchs is Succor Benoth; banker is Asmodeus; theatrical manager is Kabal; master of ceremonies, Verdelet; court fool is Nybbas. (Victor Hugo: Thiels of the Sen.)

Devil's Candle. So the Arabs call the mandrake, from its shining appearance at night. (Richardson.)

"These hellish fires that light
The mandrake's charnel leaves at night."
P. Moore: Fare Woshippers.

Devil's Current (The). Part of the current of the Bosporus is so called, from its great rapidity.

Devil's Daughter's Portion (The).
The saying is
"Deaf, Dover, and Harwich,
The devil gave with his daughter in marriage," because of the scandalous impositions practised in these seaports on sailors and occasional visitors. (Grose: Classical Dictionary, etc.)
Devil's Den. A cromlech in a valley, near Marlborough. It now consists of two large uprights and an impost. The third upright has fallen. Some of the farm labourers, a few years ago, fastened a team of horses to the impost, and tried, but without effect, to drag it down.

Devil's Dust. Old rags torn up by a machine called the "devil," and made into shoddy by gum and pressure. Mr. Ferrand brought the subject before Parliament, March 4th, 1842. It is so called from the dishonesty and falsehood which it covers. (Latimer's Sermons.)

Devil's Dyke (The). A ravine in the South Downs, Brighton. The legend is, that St. Cuthman, walking on the downs, plumed himself on having Christianised the surrounding country, and having built a nunnery where the dyke-house now stands. Presently the Devil appears and tells him all his labour is vain, for he would swamp the whole country before morning. St. Cuthman went to the nunnery and told the abbess to keep the sisters in prayer till after midnight, and then illuminate the windows. The Devil came at sunet with mattock and spade, and began cutting a dyke into the sea, but was seized with rheumatic pains all over the body. He flung down his mattock and spade, and the cocks, mistaking the illuminated windows for sunrise, began to crow; whereupon the Devil fled in alarm, leaving his work not half done.

Devil's Four-Poster (The). A hand at whist with four clubs. It is said that such a hand is never a winning one.

Devil's Frying-pan (The). A Cornish tin-mine worked by the Romans.

Devil's Luck (The). Astounding good luck. Persons always lucky were thought at one time to have compounded with the Devil.

"You won't have to pay his annuity very long; you have the devil's luck in large sums, always." Dickens.

Devil's Mass (The). Swearing at everybody and everything.

"When a hag goes out at the door, she says the devil's mass.... an' names every' man in town from the commander-in-chief down to the four-copral." Soldiers' Songs, p. 90.

Devil's Noses (The). Two vast caverns separated by a huge pillar of natural rock in the mainland of the Zetland Islands. (See The Pirate, chap. xxxii.)

Devil's Own. (Connaught Boys.) The 88th Foot. So called by General Picton from their bravery in the Peninsular War, 1809-1814.

Applied also to the Inns of Court Volunteers, the members of which are lawyers.

Devil's Paternoster (To say the). To grumble; to rail at providence.

Devil's Snuff-box (The). A puff-ball; a fungus full of dust; one of the genus Lycopodion.

Devil's Tattoo (The). Tapping on the table with one's finger a wearisome number of times; tapping on the floor with one's foot in a similar manner; repeating any sound with wearisome pertinacity, giving those who hear the "blue devils" or the "fidgets."

Devil's Throat (The). Cromer Bay. So called from its danger to navigation.

Devils (in Dante's Divine Comedy):

Alberico. (The alurer.)
Barbariccia. (The malicious.)
Colocbrius. (The grace-acceptor.)
Crepazio. (The snarer.)
Cristofo Romano. (The tusked bear.)
Dragnigauza. (The fell dragon.)
Furfaneu. (The scaldalmonger.)
Grafiasca. (The dogshag.)
Libriccoci. (The ill-tempered.)
Rubiconcino. (The red with rage.)
Scarniglione. (The hateful.)
The blue Devils. The fidgets or megrius.

Devonshire, according to English mythology, is a corruption of Debou's-share. This Debou was one of the heroes who came with Brute from Troy. One of the giants that he slew in the south coasts of England was Coulen, whom he chased to a vast pit eight leagues across. The monster trying to leap this pit, fell backwards, and lost his life in the chasm. When Brutus allotted out the island, this portion became Debou's-share.

"And eke that ample pit, yet far renowned For the large leap which Debou did compass Coulen to make, being eight miles in ground. Into the which returning back he fell, In medio of the seven compasses in them yet. Fortunes had that that mones among west. And Debou's shire was that in Devonshire." Spenser: Faerie Queen, book ii, canto x, l. 17.

Devonshire Foot. O. Jones, a journeyman wool-comber, who lived at the close of the 18th century. Edward Capern, called "The rural Postman of Bideford," born 1719, and John Gay, author of the Beggar's Opera, etc. (1688-1732), of Burnstaple (Devonshire).

Dew-beaters. The feet; shoes to resist the wet.

"Hold out your dew-beaters till I take off the ditches (iron shoes or fetters)." Peter of the Peak.

Dew-drink. A draught before breakfast. In harvest the men are allowed, in some counties, a drink of beer before they begin work.

Dexterity means right-handed skill (Latin, dexter, the right hand). “Awkward” (q.v.) means left-handed; gaucher is the French, and sinister the Latin for the left hand. Certainly the German left-handed marriages are sinister ones.

Djellahbæan. The Persian era. Djella Eddin, son of Togrou Beg, appointed eight astronomers to reform the calendar. The era began A.D. 1075, and is followed to this day.

Dhul’dul. (See Horse.)

Diable (La). Olivier Leclain, the tool of Louis XI., and once the king’s barber. So called because he was as much feared as his Satanic Majesty, and even more disliked. (Hanged 1484.)

Robert le Diable. Meyerbeer’s grand opera. (See Robert.)

D’adam meant, originally, a fillet wound round the head. The diadem of Bacchus was a broad band, which might be unfolded so as to make a veil. Hieronymus, king of Syracuse (u.c. 216-215), wore a diadem. Constantine the Great (306-337) was the first of the Roman emperors who wore a diadem. After his time it was set with rows of pearls and precious stones. (Greek, dia-adoe, to bind entirely.)

Dialectics. Metaphysics: the art of disputation; that strictly logical discussion which leads to reliable results. The product or result is ideas, which, being classified, produce knowledge; but all knowledge being of the divine types, must conduct more or less to practical results and good morals. (Greek, dia-loge, to speak thoroughly.)

* Kant used the word to signify the theory of fallacies, and Hegel for that concept which of necessity develops its opposite.

The following questions from John of Salisbury are fair specimens of the Middle-age subjects of discussion:—

(1) When a person buys a whole cloak, does the cowl belong to the purchase?
(2) When a hog is driven to market with a rope round its neck, does the man or the rope take him?

Diamond. A corruption of adamant. So called because the diamond, which cuts other substances, can be cut or polished with no substance but itself. (Greek, a damas, what cannot be subdued. Latin, adamas, gen. adaman’tis; French, diamant.)

Diamond (3 syl.). Son of Agapæ, a fairy. He was very strong, and fought either on foot or horse with a battle-axe. He was slain in single combat by Cambalo. (See Triamond.) (Spenser: Faerie Queen, book iv.)

A diamond of the first water. A man of the highest merit. The colour or lustre of a pearl or diamond is called its “water.” One of the “first water” is one of the best colour and most brilliant lustre. We may also, “A man of the first water.”

A rough diamond. An uncultivated genius; a person of excellent parts, but without society manners.

“...as for Warrington, that rough diamond had not had the polish of a dancing-master, and he did not know how to walk.”—Thackeray.

Diamond cut diamond. Cunning outwitting cunning; a hard bargain overreached. A diamond is so hard that it can only be ground by diamond dust, or by rubbing one against another.

Diamond (Newton’s favourite little dog). One winter’s morning, while attending early service in Trinity College, Newton inadvertently left Diamond shut up in his room. On returning from chapel he found that the little fellow had upset a candle on his desk, by which several papers containing minutes of many years’ experiments, were destroyed. On perceiving this irreparable loss, he exclaimed, “Oh, Diamond, Diamond, thou little knowerest the mischief thou hast done!” (Diffusion of Useful Knowledge: Life of Newton, p. 25, col. 2.)

* Huegens, ibid., referring to this accident says: “Newtonum incidunt in pudentum aulicum anno nox meminisse. An ex minus studio assiduam, ut dolore infortunii, quod in incendio laboratorium chemicum ex specta quidam annum.”

Diamond Hammer (4). A hammer or pick for “whetting” millstones. The diamond hammer is provided with several sharp-pointed teeth to give a uniform roughness to the surface of the stone. Also to a steel pick with diamond-shaped point at each extremity to recut grooves in stone.

Diamond Jousts (Thb). Jousts instituted by King Arthur, “who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize.” Ere he was king, he came by accident to a glen in Lyonneese, where two brothers had met in combat. Each was slain; but one had worn a crown of diamonds, which Arthur picked up, and when he became king offered the nine diamonds as the prize to several jousts, "one every year, a joust for one." Lancilot had won eight, and intended to present them all to the queen "when all were won." When the knight laid them before the queen, Guinevere, in a fit of jealousy, flung them out of the palace window into the river which ran below. (Idyls of the King; Elaine.)

Diamond Necklace (The) (1785). A necklace presented, through Mme. de Lamotte, by Cardinal de Rohan (as he supposed) to Marie Antoinette. The cardinal, a profiteering churchman, entertained a sort of love passion for the queen; and the Countess de Lamotte induced him to purchase for the queen, for £55,000, a diamond necklace, made for Mme. Dubarry. The cardinal handed the necklace to the countess, who sold it to an English jeweller and kept the money. When the time of payment arrived Boehmer, the jeweller, sent his bill in to the queen, who denied all knowledge of the matter. A trial ensued, which lasted nine months, and created immense scandal.

Diamond Sculls (The), or "The Diamond Challenge Sculls" of the Henley Royal Regatta, are a pair of crossed silver sculls not quite a foot in length, surmounted by an imitation wreath of laurel, and having a pendant of diamonds. They lie in a box lined with velvet, which contains also the names of all the winners. The prize is rowed for every year, and the sculls pass from winner to winner; but each winner receives a silver cup, which becomes his own absolute property. Established 1844 by the Royal Regatta Committee.

Diamonds. (See Black Diamonds.)

Diana (3 syl.) The temple of Diana at Ephesus, built by Dinockhres, was set on fire by Herosstratos, for the sake of perpetuating his name. The Ionians decreed that any one who mentioned his name should be put to death, but this very decree gave it immortality. The temple was discovered in 1872 by Mr. Wood.

Diana of Ephesus. This statue, we are told, fell from heaven. If so, it was an aerolite; but Minucius says he saw it, and that it was a wooden statue (second century. A.D.). Pliny, a contemporary of Minucius, tells us it was made of ebony. Probably the real "image" was a meteorite, and in the course of time a wooden or ebony image was substituted.

"The palladium of Troy, the sacred shield of the Romans, the shrine of our Lady of Loreto, and other similar religious objects of veneration, were said to have been sent from heaven. The statue of Cybele (3 syl.) "fell from heaven"; and Elagabalus, of Syria-Phoenicia, was a great conical stone which fell from heaven.

Great is Diana of the Ephesians. Nothing like leather; self-interest blinds the eyes. Demetrios was a silversmith of Ephesus, who made gold and silver shrines for the temple of Diana. When Christianity was preached in the city, and there was danger of substituting the simplicity of the Gospel for the grandeur of idolatry, the silversmiths, headed by Demetrios, stirred the people to a riot, and they cried out with one voice for the space of two hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" (Acts xix. 24-28.)

Dian's Worshipers. Midnight revellers. So called because they return home by moonlight. Dian means the moon.

Diana'ra was the wife of Gilberto of Friuli, but was passionately beloved by Ansalto. In order to get rid of his importance, she told him she would never grant his suit and prove untrue till he made her garden at midwinter as full of flowers and odours as if it were midsummer. By the aid of a magician, Ansalto accomplished this, and claimed his reward. Diana'ra went to meet him, and told him she had obeyed the command of her husband in so doing. Ansalto, not to be outdone in courtesy, released her; and Gilberto became the firm friend of Ansalto from that day to the end of his life. (Boccaccio: Decameron, day x. 5.) (See DORGEN.

Diasp'ason. Dryden says—

"From harmony, from heavenly harmony
The universal frame began;
From harmony to harmony
Thro' all the compass of the notes it ran,
The dissonance closing full in man."

Songs for St. Cecilia's Day.

According to the Pythagorean system, the world is a piece of harmony, and man the full chord.

Diap'or. A sort of cloth said to be corrupted from Yproi (where it is manufactured), on analogy with calico from Calicut, muceum from Nankin, worsled from Worsted, in Norfolk, and other similar words. But the French diapre, variegated (connected with Lat.
Diavolo (Fr.). Michele Pozza, an insurgent of Calabria (1760-1806). Scribe wrote a libretto on this hero for Aubert.

Dibs or Dibbs. Money. (Compare tips, gifts to schoolboys; and diabolus. Compare also dot with tot, jot, and yod.)

The huckle-bones of sheep used for gambling purposes are called dibbs; and Locke speaks of stones used for the same game, which he calls dibstones.

Diceurs' Oaths. False as diceurs' oaths. Worthless or untrustworthy, as when a gambler swears never to touch dice again. (Shakespeare: Hamlet, iii. 4.)

Didilla (in Orlando Furioso). One of Logistilla's handmaids, famous for her chastity.

Dick. That happened in the reign of Queen Dick—i.e. never; there never was a Queen Richard.

Dick's Hatband. (Richard Cromwell, 1626-1712.)

1. Dick's hatband, which was made of sand. His regal honours were "a rope of sand."

2. As fine as Dick's hatband. The crown of England would be a very fine thing for anyone to get.

3. As queer as Dick's hatband. Few things have been more ridiculous than the exaltation and abdication of the Protector's son.

4. As tight as Dick's hatband. The hatband of Richard Cromwell was the crown, which was too tight for him to wear with safety.

Dick = Richard. The diminutive "Dicky" is also common.

"Jockey of Norfolk [Lord Howard, be not too bold, For Dick's sake, Dickon, thy master, is bought and sold."

(Shakespeare: Richard III, v. 3.)

Dickens. (See Boz.)

Dickens is a perverted oath corrupted from "Nick." Mrs. Page says—

"I cannot tell what the dickens his name is." (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, m.)

"The three poets who express a configuration are "Dickens! How-lett, Burns!"

Dicky or Dicky. A donkey; anciently called a Dick-ass, now termed Jack-ass. It is a term of endearment, as we call a pet bird a dicky-bird. The ass is called Dick-y (little Richard), Cuddy (little Cuthbert), Neddy (little Edward), Jack-ass, Moko or Mule, etc.

Dicky. The rumble behind a carriage; also a leather apron, a child's bib, and a false shirt or front. All these are from the same root. (Dutch, dekkie; German, decken; Anglo-Saxon, thecan; Latin, tegio, to cover.)

Dicky (A), in George III.'s time, meant a flannel petticoat. It was afterwards applied to what were called false shirts—i.e. a shirt front worn over a dirty shirt, or in lieu of a shirt. These half-shirts were first called Tommies.

"A hundred instances I could pick ye—Without a cap we view the fair, The bosom heaving aloft bare. The lips abashed, forsooth, to wear a dicky." Peter Pindar: Lord Auckland's Triumph.

So again:

"And sister Peg, and sister Joan,
With scars a flannel dicky on . . . ."

Middlesex Election, letter iv.

(Hair, whalebone, or metal vestments, called dress-improvers, are hung on women's backs, as a "dicky" is hung on a coach behind.)

Dicky Sam. A native-born inhabitant of Liverpool, as Tim Bobbin is a native of Lancashire.

Dictator of Letters. Francois Marie Arouet de Voltaire, called the Great Turk. (1694-1778.)

Didactic Poetry is poetry that teaches some moral lesson, as Pope's Essay on Man. (Greek, didasko, I teach.)

Diddle (To). To cheat in a small way, as "I diddled him out of . . . ." Edgar Allan Poe has an article on the art of "Diddling." Rhyming slang is very common. (See Curvy.) Fiddle andiddle rhyme. "Fiddle" is slang for a sharper, and "diddle" is the act of a sharper. The suggestive rhyme was

"If diddle diddle
The cat and the fiddle"

"A certain portion of the human race
Has certainly a taste for being diddled"

Dread: A black jack, stanza 1.

Diddler (Jeremy). An artful swindler; a clever, seedy vagabond, borrowing money or obtaining credit by his wit and wiles. From Kenny's farce called Raising the Wind.

Diderick. (See DiETRICH.)

Di'do. It was Porson who said he could rhyme on any subject: and being asked to rhyme upon the three Latin gerunds, gave this couplet—

"When Dido found Eneas would not come, She mourned in silence, and was Di'do dum(l)."

" In the old Eton Latin grammar the three gerunds are called -di, -do, Die

-dum. In modern school primers they are -dum, -di, -do.
When Dido saw Anchises needs must go,
She wept in silence, and was dum(b) Di-do.
K. G. B.

7 Dido was queen of Carthage, who fell in love with Anchises, driven by a storm to her shores. After abiding a while at Carthage, he was compelled by Mercury to leave the hospitable queen. Dido, in grief, burnt herself to death on a funeral pile. (Virgil: from Aeneid, i. 494 to iii. 550.)

Dies. The die is cast. The step is taken, and I cannot draw back. So said Julius Caesar when he crossed the Rubicon.

"I have set my life upon the cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die."

Dies. Whom the gods love die young. This is from Menander's fragments (Hon hoiv theoi philousin apothénasei now). De&mouliénes has a similar apothegm. Plautus has the line, "Quem Di diliigit adolescens moritur." (See Byron: Don Juan, canto iv. 12.) Those who die young are "taken out of the miseries of this sinful life" into a happy immortality.

Die-hard. The 57th Foot. Their colonel (Inglis) in the battle of Albuera (1811), addressing his men, said, "Die hard, my lads; die hard!" And they did die hard, for their banner was pierced with thirty bullets. Only one officer out of twenty-four survived, and only 165 men out of 304. This fine regiment is now called the West Middlesex; the East Middlesex (the Duke of Cambridge's own) is the old 77th.

Diego (Sun). A corruption of Santiago (St. James), champion of the red cross, and patron saint of Spain.

Dios Allienis. (See Allienis.)

Dios Irae. A famous medieval hymn on the last judgment, probably the composition of Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. Sir Walter Scott has introduced the former part of it into his Lay of the Last Minstrel.

"Dies irae, dies illa,
Sol est ardens in fenestra.
Te est David cum Sibilo!"
On that day, that wrathful day,
David and the Sibyl say.
Heaven and earth shall melt away.
E. C. B.

Dies Non. A non-business day. A law phrase, meaning a day when the courts do not sit, as on Sundays; the Purification, in Hilary term; the Ascension, in Easter term; St. John the Baptist, in Trinity term; and All Saints, with All Souls, in Michaelmas term. A contracted form of "Dies non juridicus," a non-judicial day.

Dias San'gunis. The 24th March, called Bello'na's Day, when the Roman votaries of the war-goddess cut themselves and drank the sacrificial blood to propiti ate the deity.

Dieterich (2 syll.), of Bern or Vero'na, a name given by the German minnesingers (ministrel) to Theodorico the Great, king of the Ostrogoths. One of the liegemen of King Eitel. In the terrible broil stirred up by Queen Kriemhild in the banquet-hall of the Hunnish king, after the slaughter of Sir Rudiger, his friend Dietrich interfered, and succeeded in taking prisoners the only two surviving Burgundians, kings Gunther and Hagan, whom he handed over to Kriemhild, praying that she would set them free, but the angry queen cut off both their heads with her own hands. (The Nibelungen-Lied.)

Dien. Dien et mon droit (God and my right). The parole of Richard I, at the battle of Gisors (1198), meaning that he was no vassal of France, but owed his royalty to God alone. As the French were signally beaten, the battle-word was adopted as the royal motto of England.

Difference. Ophelia says to the queen, "You may wear your rue with a difference." In heraldry differences, or marks of cadency indicate the various branches of a family.

(1) The oldest son, during the lifetime of his father, bears a label (or lambel), i.e. a piece of silk, stuff, or linen, with three pendants, broader at the bottom than at the top.

(2) The second son bears a crescent.

(3) The third, a mallet (or star with five points).

(4) The fourth, a martlet.

(5) The fifth, an annulet.

(6) The sixth, a fleur-de-lis.

(7) The seventh, a rose.

(8) The eighth, a cross-pontine.

(9) The ninth, a double quatrefoil.

Ophelia says both she and the Queen are to wear rue: the one as the allianced of Hamlet, eldest son of the late king; the other as the wife of Claudius his brother, and the cadet branch. The latter was to have a "difference," to signify it was a cadet branch. "I [says Ophelia] shall wear the rue, but you [the Queen] must now wear it with a 'difference,'"

Digest (The). The collection of all the laws of Rome compiled by Tribonian and sixteen assistants, by order of Justinian. It amounted to 2,000 volumes, and was finished in three years (A.D. 533). (See {Pandects}.)

Diggings. Come to my diggings. To my rooms, residence, office, sanctum. A word imported from California and its gold diggings.

"My friend here wants to take diggings; and as you were complaining that you would get someone to go halves with you, I thought I had better bring you together."—A. G. Doyle: A Study in Scarlet, chap. 1.

Diggory. A barn labourer, taken on grand occasions for butter and footman to Mr. and Mrs. Hardcastle. He laughs and talks while serving, and is as gauche as possible. (Goldsmith: She Stoops to Conquer.)

Digit. The first nine numerals; so called from the habit of counting as far as ten on the fingers. (Latin, digitus, a finger.)

Dignitary (A). A clergyman who holds preferment to which jurisdiction is annexed, as bishops, deans, archdeacon, canons, etc.

Dignus Vin'dice No'dus (Latin). A knot or difficulty worthy of such hands to untie. Literally, a knotty point worthy to be made a civil action. The person who brought a civil action was called in Roman law a rindex, and the action was called a vindicatio. If the rightful possessor was a matter of dispute, the question became a tu vindicatio, and was referred to the pretor to determine. A knotty point referred to the pretor was a "dignus vindice nodus."

Di' Penatōs (Latin). Household gods; now used for such articles of furniture or decoration as the lady of the house especially prizes.

Dilemma. The horn of a dilemma. "Lemma" means a thing taken for granted (Greek, lēmāabo, to take). "Dilemma" is a double lemma, a two-edged sword which strikes both ways, or a bull which will toss you whichever horn you lay hold of. A young rhetorician said to an old sophist, "Teach me to plead, and I will pay you when I gain a cause." The master sued for payment, and the scholar pleaded, "If I gain the cause I shall not pay you, because the judge will say I am not to pay; and if I lose my cause I shall not be required to pay, according to the terms of our agreement." To this the master replied, "Not so; if you gain your cause you must pay me according to the terms of our agreement; and if you lose your cause the judge will condemn you to pay me."

Dilettantē (Italian). An amateur of the fine arts, in opposition to a professor. Plural, dilettanti.

"These gentlemen are to be judged, not as dilettanti, but as professors."—Athenaeum.

Diligence is that energy and industry which we show when we do what we like (Latin, diligo, I like); but idleness is that listless manner with which we do what thoroughly vexes us. (Latin, in, intensive; doleo, to grieve.)

Diligence. A four-wheeled stage-coach, drawn by four or more horses. Common in France before the introduction of railroads. The pun is well known.

Si vis placere magistro, utere diligentia (i.e., his dilectio).

Dilly (plural, Dillies). Stage-coaches. They first began to run in 1779. An abbreviation of the French word diligence (q.v.). "Derby dilly."

Dim and Distant Future (The). In November, 1885, Mr. W. E. Gladstone said that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Anglican Church were questions in "the dim and distant future."

Dimanche (Monsieur). A dun. The term is from Molière's Don Juan, and would be, in English, Mr. Monday. The word dimanche is a corruption and contraction of dieu Dominica (the Lord's day).

Dimetās. The ancient Latin name for the inhabitants of Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimissory. A letter dimissory is a letter from the bishop of one diocese to some other bishop, giving leave for the bearer to be ordained by him. (Latin, di-mitto, to send away.)

Dimity. A cloth said to be so called from Damietta, in Egypt, but really from the Greek di-mitos (double-thread). (See Samite.)

Dinah (Aunt). In Sterne's Tristram Shandy. She leaves Mr. Walter Shandy Dinde (3 syl.) Venus, who sprang from the froth of the sea, after the Dinnerless. Their hosts are the cross-legged knights. That is, the stone effigies of the Round Church. In this church at one time lawyers met their clients, and here a host of vagabonds used to loiter about all day, under the hope of being hired as witnesses. Dining with the cross-legged knights meant much the same thing as dining with Duke Humphrey (q.v.).

Dinos. (See Horses.)

Dint. By dint of war; by dint of argument; by dint of hard work. Dint means a blow or striking (Anglo-Saxon, dynt); whence perseverance, power exerted, force; it also means the indentation made by a blow.

Dioecletian. The Roman Emperor, noted for his fierce persecu tion of the Christians, 303. The Emperor Constantine, on the other hand, was the "nursing father" of the Church.

"To make the Church's glory shine, Should Dioecletian reign, not Constantine."—Crabbé: Borough.

Dioecletian was the king, and Eras tus the prince, his son, in the Italian version of the Seven Wise Masters (q.v.).

Diog'enes (4 syl, q = —). The cynic philosopher is said to have lived in a tub.

"The whole world was not half so wide To Alexander, when he cried Because he had but one to subdue, As was a filthy narrow tub to Diogenes."—Butler: Hudibras, I, 3.

Dioned's Horses. Dinos (dreadful) and Lampon (bright-eyed). (See Horses.)

Diomede's Swop. An exchange in which all the benefit is on one side. This proverbial expression is founded on an incident related by Homer in the Iliad. Glauclus recognises Diomed on the battle-field, and the friends change armour.

"For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device, For which nine oxen paid (a vulgar price), He (Glaucus) gave his own, of gold divinely wrought. An hundred beavers the shining purchase bought."— Pope: Iliad, vii.

Diomé'dé or Dioméd. King of Ætolia, in Greece, brave and obedient to authority. He survived the siege of Troy; but on his return home found his wife living in adultery, and saved his life by living an exile in Italy. (Homer: Iliad.)

Dio(né) (3 syl.).
mutated body of Uranus (the sky) had been thrown there by Saturn.

"So young Dionysus, nursed beneath the waves,
And rocked in Nereids' coral caves . . .
Lipped her sweetest tones, and tried her tender smiles." —DARWIN: Economy of Vegetation, ii.

Dionysius (the younger), being banished a second time from Syracuse, retired to Corinth, where he turned schoolmaster for a living. Posternity called him a tyrant. Byron, in his Ode to Napoleon, alludes to these facts in the following lines:

"Corinth's pedagogue hath now Transferred his byword to thy brow."

That is, Napoleon is now called tyrant, like Dionysius.

Diophantine Analysis. Finding commensurate values of squares, cubes, triangles, etc.; or the sum of a given number of squares which is itself a square; or a certain number of squares, etc., which are in arithmetical progression. The following examples will give some idea of the theory:

1. To find two whole numbers, the sum of whose squares is a square;
2. To find three square numbers which are in arithmetical progression;
3. To find a number from which two given squares being severally subtracted, each of the remainders is a square.

Diophantus was an Alexandrian Greek (6th cent. A.D.)

 Dioscuri. Castor and Pollux.

(Greek, Dios kouros, young men of Zeus; dios is gen. of Zeus.)

The horses of the Dioscuri. Cyllaxes and Harpagos. (See Horse.)

Diotrephes. One who loves to have the pre-eminence among others. (3 John 9.)

"Neither a desolate Judea, like the prelate of St. Andrews, who was murdered, nor a sanctuary-breaking Holofemes, like the bloody-minded Clavereuse; nor an ambitious Diotrephes, like the late (Lord) Stanhope . . . . shall rant the arrows that are whetted and the bow

Dip (A). A tallow-chandler, one who makes or sells candles or "dips." These candles are made by dipping into melted tallow the cotton which forms the wick. (Anglo-Saxon dippen, to dip.)

Diphtheria. The skin of the goat Amalthea, on which Jove wrote the destiny of man. Diphtheria is an infectious disease of the throat; so called from its tendency to form a false membrane.

Diploma literally means something folded (Greek). Diplomas used to be written on parchment, folded, and sealed. The word is applied to licences given to graduates to assume a degree, to clergymen, to physicians, agents, and so on.

Diplomacy. The tact, negotiations, privileges, etc., of a diplomatist, or one who carries a diploma to a foreign court to authorize him to represent the Government which sends him out.

Diplomatic Cold (A). An excuse to get over a disagreeable engagement. Mr. Healy, M.P. (1889), said that Lord Hartington and Mr. Gladstone had "diplomatic colds," when they pleaded indisposition as an excuse for not giving addresses at public meetings in which they were advertised to speak. The day after the meetings both gentlemen were "much better."

Diplomasties. The science of paleography—that is, deciphering old charters, diplomas, titles; investigating their authenticity and genuineness, and so on. Papelbrich, the Bollandist, originated the study in 1675; but Mabillon, another Bollandist, reduced it to a science in his work entitled De re Diplomatica, 1681. Toustant and Tasin further developed it in their treatise entitled Nouveau Traité de Diplomatique, 1750-1760.

Diptych [dip'tik]. A register folded into two leaves, opening like our books, and not like the ancient scrolls. The Romans kept in a book of this sort the names of their magistrates, and the Roman Catholics employed the word for the registers in which were written the names of those bishops, saints, and martyrs who were to be specially commemorated when oblations were made for the dead. (Greek, diphtchos, folded in two.)

"The Greeks executed small works of great elegance, as may be seen in the diptychs, or ivory covers to conceal records, or sacred volumes used in the church service." —C. Pliny: Letters on Sculpture, iii. p. 90.
Dircesan Swan. Pindar; so called from Dirces, a fountain in the neighbourhood of Thebes, the poet's birthplace (a.c. 518-442).

Direct Tax is one collected directly from the owner of property subject to the tax, as when the tax-gatherer goes direct to the owner of a house and demands five, ten, or twenty pounds, as it may be, for Government uses. Indirect taxes are taxes upon marketable commodities, such as tea and sugar, the tax on which is added to the article taxed, and is paid by the purchasers indirectly.

Directory. The French constitution of 1795, when the executive was vested in five persons called directors, one of whom retired every year. After a sickly existence of four years, it was quashed by Napoleon Bonaparte. An alphabetical list of the inhabitants, etc., of a given locality, as a "London Directory."

Dirlston. Doubting with Dirlston, and resolving those doubts with Stewart. Doubting and answering those doubts, but doubting still. It applies to law, science, religion, morals, etc. Sir John Nisbett of Dirlston's Doubts on points of law, and Sir James Stewart's Doubts Resolved, are works of established reputation in Scotland, but the Doubts hold a higher place than the Solutions.

Dirlos (Count). A Paladin, the beau-ideal of valour, generosity, and truth. The story says he was sent by Charlemagne into the East, where he conquered Aliar'de, a great Moorish prince. On his return he found his young wife, who thought he was dead, betrothed to Ceili'nos, another of Charlemagne's peers. The matter being set right, the king gave a grand banquet. Dirlos is D'Yrlos.

Dirt is matter in the wrong place. (Lord Palmerston.) This is not true: a diamond or sovereign lost on a road is matter in a wrong place, but certainly is not dirt.

Throw plenty of dirt and some will be sure to stick. Scandal always leaves a trail behind.

Dirt cheap. Very low-priced. Dirt is so cheap that persons pay others to take it away.

To eat dirt is to put up with insults and mortification. An Eastern method of punishment.

"If dirt were trumps what a capital hand you would hold!"—Charles Lamb to Martin Burney.

Dirty Half-Hundred. The 50th Foot, so called from the men wiping their faces with their black cuffs. Now called "The Queen's Own."

Dirty Lane. Now called Abingdon Street, Westminster.

Dirty Shirts (The). The 101st Foot, which fought at Delhi in their shirt-sleeves (1857). Now called "The Royal Bengal Fusiliers."

Dis. Pluto.

"Proserpine gathering flowers, Persephone a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis was gathered."

Milton: Paradise Lost, iv. 270.

Disaster is being under an evil star (Greek, dus-aster, evil star). An astrological word.

"The stars in their courses fought against Sisera."—J u n e s v. 29.

Disastrous Peace (La Paix Malheureuse). It followed the battle of Gravelinos (2 syl.), and was signed at Cateau-Cambresis. By this treaty Henri II. renounced all claim to Genoa's, Naples, Milan, and Corsica (1559).

Disbar (To). To deprive a barrister of his right to plead. The bar is the part barred off in courts of law and equity for barristers or pleaders.

Discharge Bible (The). 1806. "I discharge [charge] thee before God." (1 Tim. v. 21.)

Discipline (A). A scourge used by Roman Catholics for penitential purposes.

"Before the cross and altar a lamp was still burning, ... and on the floor lay a small discipline or penitential scourge of small cord and wire, the lashes of which were stained with recent blood."—Sir W. Scott: The Talisman, chap. iv.

Dis'ord means severance of hearts (Latin, discordiae). It is the opposite of concord, the coming together of hearts. In music it means disagreement of sounds, as when a note is followed by another which is disagreeable to a musical ear. (See APPEAL.)

Discount. At a discount. Not in demand; little valued; less esteemed than formerly; less than their nominal value. (Latin dis-compo, to depreciate.)

Discuss. To discuss a bottle. To drink one with a friend. Same as "crush" or "crack a bottle." (Discuss is the Latin dis-quatius; French, esser. The Latin quaesitio vasa is to break a drinking-vessel.)

"We all...drew round the table, an austere silence prevailing, while we discussed our meal."—E. Brontë: Wuthering Heights, chap. ii.
Disease, meaning discomfort, want of ease, mal aise, as "In the world ye shall have disease."—Wyche: John xvi. 33.

Dished (1 syl.). I was dished out of it. Cheated out of it; or rather, some one else contrived to obtain it. A contraction of disherit. The heir is dish't out of his inheritance when his father marries again and leaves his property to the widow and widow's family.

"Where's Brumnel? Dished!" Byron: Don Juan.

Dish-washer (.1). A scullery-maid.

Dismal. Daniel Finch, second earl of Nottingham.

"No sooner was Dismal among the Whigs... but Lady Charlotte is taken knitting in St. James's Chapel [i.e. Lady Charlotte Finch, his daughter]."—Emmonns, April 20-24th, 1718, No. 44.

Dismas (St.). The penitent thief. [DYSMAS.]

Disney Professor. The Professor of Archaeology in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1851 by John Disney, Esq., of the Hyde, Ingatstone.

Disorder, says Franklin, "breakfasts with Plenty, dines with Poverty, sups with Misery, and sleeps with Death."

Dispensation. The system which God chooses to dispense or establish between Himself and man. The dispensation of Adam was that between Adam and God; the dispensation of Abraham, and that of Moses, were those imparted to these holy men; the Gospel dispensation is that explained in the Gospels. (Latin, dis-pensus, to spread forth, unroll, explain, reveal.)

A dispensation from the Pope. Permission to dispense with something enjoined; a licence to do what is forbidden, or to omit what is commanded by the law of the Church, as distinct from the moral law.

"A dispensation was obtained to enable Dr. Barrow to marry." WARD.

Dispute (2 syl.) means, literally, to "lop down" (Latin, dis-puto): debate means to "knock down" (French,สถาบัน); discuss means to "shake down" (Latin, dis-qualio); object is to "cast against" (Latin, ob-justio); content is to "pull against" (Latin, contendo); quarrel is to throw darts at each other (Welsh, cerred, a dart); and wrangle is to strain by twisting (Swedish, oranger; Anglo-Saxon, wringan).
Distract. "Distract" means to divert the mind, and "distraction" means recreation or amusement (Latin, dis-tranx). (See Slate.)

Distract (French). Absent-minded.

Dithyrambic. The father of dithyrambic poetry. Arion of Lesbos.

Dittany. When Godfrey was wounded with an arrow, an "odorous pan'scy" distilled from dittany was applied to the wound; whereupon the arrow-head fell out, and the wound healed immediately. (Kasse, Jerusalem Delivered, book xi.)

Ditto. (See Do.)

Dittoes (A suit of). Coat, waistcoat, and trousers all alike, or all ditto (the same).

Divan' (Arabic and Persian, diwan) means a register kept on a white table exactly similar to our board. Among the Orientals the word is applied to a council-chamber or court of justice; but in England we mean a coffee-house where smoking is the chief attraction.

Divers Colours [in garments]. We are told, in 2 San. xiii. 18, that king's daughters were arrayed in a garment of divers colours, and Dr. Shaw informs us that only virgins wore drawers of needle-work; so that when the mother of Sisera (Judges v. 30) says, "Have they not spoil? Have they not divided the spoil? To Sisera a prey of divers colours, of divers colours of needle-work?" she means—"is not the king's daughter allotted to Sisera as a portion of his spoil?" (See Coat of Many Colours.)

Divert. To turn aside. Business is the regular walk or current of our life, but pleasure is a diversion or turning aside for a time from the straight line. What we call diversion is called in French distraction, drawing aside. (Latin, di-recte, to turn aside; dis-trakto, to draw aside.)

Dives (1 syl.), Dives or Divine. Demons of Persian mythology. According to the Koran, they are ferocious and gigantic spirits under the sovereignty of Ebils.

"At Lahore, in the Mogul's palace, are pictures of Daws and Dives with long horns, glaring eyes, snarly hair, great fangs, ugly jaws, long tails, and such horrible deformity, that I wonder the poor women are not frightened."—William Finch: Purchas Pilgrims, vol. I.

Dicta (2 syl.). The name popularly given to the rich man in our Lord's parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Luke xvi.). The Latin would be Dics et Lazarus.

Divide (2 syl.). When the members in the House of Commons interrupt a speaker by crying out divide, they mean, bring the debate to an end and put the motion to the vote—i.e. let the eyes divide from the noes, one going into one room or lobby, and the others into another.

Divide and Govern. Divide a nation into parties, or set your enemies at loggerheads, and you can have your own way. A maxim of Machiavelli, a noted political writer of Florence (1493-1527).

"Every city or house divided against itself shall not stand."—Matthew xii. 23.

Divination. There are numerous species of divination referred to in the Bible. The Hebrew word is added in italics.

Judicial Anthology (M RHS).

Agnery (MHS). WITCHCRAFT (MHS). ENCHANTMENT (MHS).

CANTINO (Junction). By INTOXICATING SPIRITS.

By NEUROMANCY (1 Sam. xxxvii. 12). B. (Hos. v. 12).

By THRESHOLD of household idols. By HEPATOMANCY or inspecting the liver of animals.

By DREAMS and their interpretations. Divination by fire, air, and water; thunder, lightning, and meteors; etc.

The Zeus and Themis was a prophetic consecrated robe worn by the High Priest. (Consult: Gen. xxxvii. 2-11; Ex. xi. 1; 1 Sam. xxxvi. 12; 2 Chron. xxvii. 6; Prov. xlii. 30; Ezek. xxii. 21; Hos. iv. 13. etc.)

Divine. The divine right of kings. The notion that kings reign by divine right, quite independent of the people's will. This notion arose from the Old Testament Scriptures, where kings are called "God's anointed," because they were God's vicars on earth, when the Jews changed their theocracy for a monarchy.

"The right divine of kings to govern wrong."—Pope.

Divine (The). Fernand de Herre'ra, a Spanish poet (1516-1695). Raphael, the painter, is Divino (1483-1520).

Luis Moral'kav, Spanish painter, et Divino (1509-1866).

Divine Doctor. Jean de Ruysbroek, the mystic (1294-1381).

Divine Pagan (The). Hypatia, who presided over the Neoplatonic School at Alexandria. She was infamously torn to pieces (A.D. 415) by a Christian mob, not without the concurrence of the Archbishop Cyril.
Divine Plant (The). Vervain, called by the Romans Herba Sacra (q.e.v.).

Divine Speaker (The). So Aristotle called Tyr'tamos, who therefore adopted the name of Theophrastos (n.c. 370-287).

Divining Rod. A forked branch of hazel, suspended by the two prongs between the balls of the thumbs. The inclination of the rod indicates the presence of water-springs, precious metal, and anything else that simpletons will pay for. See DOWSTERSWIVEL.

Divinity in Odd Numbers. Falstaff tells us (in The Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 1) that this divinity affects "naturivity, chance, and death." A Trinity is by no means confined to the Christian creed. The Brahmins represent their god with three heads; the Greeks and Romans had three Graces, three Fates, three Furies, and a threefold Hecate. Jupiter had his three thunderbolts, Neptune his trident, and Pluto his three-headed dog. The Muses were three times three. Pythagoras says God is threefold—"the beginning, middle, and end of all things." Then, again, there are five features, five parts to the body, five vowels, five lines in music, five acts to a play, etc.; seven strings to a harp, seven planets (anciently, at any rate), seven musical notes, etc.

Chance. There's luck in odd numbers "Numerus Deus impare gaudent" (Virgil: Eclogue viii, 75). The seventh son of a seventh son was always held notable. Baalam would have seven altars, and sacrificed on them seven bullocks and seven rams. Naaman was commanded to dip seven times in Jordan, and Elijah sent his servant seven times to look out for rain. Climacteric years are seven and nine with their multiples by odd numbers.

Death. The great climacteric year of life is 63 (i.e. 7 × 9), and Saturn presides over all climacteric years.

Divino Lodevico. Ariosto, author of Orlando Furioso, an epic poem in twenty-four books. (1474-1533.)

Division. The sign + for division was invented by John Pell of Cambridge in 1668.

Divorceament. A writing, or bill of divorceament. "Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorceament" (Matt. v. 31).

Adalet tells in the Nineteenth Century (July, 1892, p. 137):

"A woman [in Turkey] divorced from her husband is not treated with contempt... and often marries again... A man simply states to his wife that he has divorced her, on which she will go away; and the man, having repeated the same to the mail, will receive an act of divorce written, which he will send to her. If it is the first or second time that this has occurred, he may take her back again without any formality ensuing, but, after a third divorce, she will be lost to him for ever. Seeing the ease with which this may be done, it is not surprising if men abuse the licence, and sometimes divorce their wives for [a very small] fault... as a ladycooked dinner, or a button unsawed, knowing very well that if he repeats of it she can have her back before evening. I know a lady who has been divorced from five husbands, and is now living with a sixth."

Divus in Latin, attached to a proper name, does not mean divine, but simply deceased or canonised; excellently translated in Notes and Queries (May 21st, 1892, p. 421), "of blessed memory." Thus, Divus Augustus means Augustus of blessed memory, not divine Augustus. Of course, the noun "divus" opposite to a proper noun = a god, as in Horace, 3 Odes v. 2, "Præsens divi s habebitur Augustus." While living, Augustus will be accounted a god. Virgil (Ecl. i. 6) says, "Deus nobis haec ota fecit;" the "deus" was Augustus.

Dixie Land. Nigger land. Mason and Dixon drew a line which was to be the northern limit of slavery. In the third quarter of the 19th century the southern part of this line was called Dixie or nigger land.

Diary. A nickname of Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield) (1805-1881).

Djinnestan. The realm of the djinns or genii of Oriental mythology.

Do. A contraction of ditto, which is the Italian dèito (said), Latin dictus.

How do you do? i.e. How do you fare? It should be, How do you do? (Anglo-Saxon, dug-an = ræfær); in Latin, Quemadmodum rarus.

Will to do. This, again, is not the transitive verb (fæcēr) but the intransitive verb (ræfær), and means "well to fare." (Anglo-Saxon, dug-an = ræfær.)

To do. i.e. cheat or trick a person out of something.

I have done the Jew, i.e. over-reached him. The same as outdo = excel.

Do (to rhyme with go). The first or tonic note of the solfeggio system of music.

Do, re, mi, fa, sol, la, Italian; ut, re, mi, fa, sol, la, French. The latter are borrowed from a hymn by Paulus Piaconus, addressed to St. John, which Guido, in the eleventh century, used in teaching singing:

"Ubi questant irax, Re-sounare fibris,
Multa gestorum Pa-muill tumurum,
Sed ro politria Le-his restum."

Saint Joan af.

"Ut eterne be thy wondrous story,
Prophaneous through I be.
Me make mindful of thy glory,
Famous son of Zacharias;"

"Soluce to my spirit living, La-bouring thy praise to sing."

E. C. B.

(See Weisht in Heortologia, p. 263.) Le Maire added si (seventeenth century).

(See Arezinian Syllables.)

Do for. I'll do for him. Ruin him; literally, provide for him in a bad sense.

"Taken in and done for," is taken in and provided for; but, jocosely, it means "cheated and fleeced."

Do up (To). To set in order; to make tidy. "Dup the door." (See Dup.)

Dobd (Indian). A tract of land between two rivers. (Pronounce dun-ab.)

Dobbin. A steady old horse, a child's horse. Dobby, a silly old man. Dobbies, house-elves similar to brownies. All these are one and the same word. The dobies lived in the house, were very thin and shaggy, very kind to servants and children, and did many a little service when people had their hands full.

"Sober Dobbin lifts his clumsy heel."

Bloomfield: Farmer's Boy. (Winter, Winter.)

Dobbins (Humphrey). The valet-de-chambre and factotum of Sir Robert Bramble, of Blackbury Hall, in the county of Kent. A blunt, rough-spoken old retainer, full of milk of human kindness, and most devoted to his master. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Dobby's Walk. The goblin's haunt or beat. Dobby is an archaic word for a goblin or brownie. (See Washington Irving's Bracebridge Hall, ii. 183 6.)

Dobby also means an imbecile old man.

"The Dobby's walk was within the inhabited domains of the Hall."—Sir W. Scott: Pictur of the Peak, chap. x.

Doco'tes (3 syr). An early heretical sect, which maintained that Jesus Christ was only God, and that His visible form was merely a phantom: that the crucifixion and resurrection were illusions. (The word is Greek, and means phantomiaste.)

Dock-Alfæ. The dark Alfæ whose abode is underground. They are in appearance blacker than pitch. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dr. Diafoirus

Dock-side Lumper (A). One engaged in delivering and loading ships' cargoes.

"Judging of my historic powers by my outward form, I probably thought me more fit for a dock-side 'lumper than an actor."—C. Thomson: Autobiography, p. 191.

Doctor. A seventh son used to be so dubbed from the notion of his being intuitively skilled in the cure of agues, the king's evil, and other diseases.

"Plusieurs croyent qu'en France les septièmes garçons, nez de légitimes mariages (sans que la suite des sept alt. soit interrompue par la naissance d'une fille) peuvent aussi guérir des fièvres tierces, des fièvres quartes, et même des cœlomeules, après avoir jeté trois ou neuf jours avant que de toucher les malades."—Jean Baptiste Thiers: Traité des superstitions, etc., p. 498.

Doctor (The). The cook on board ship, who "doctors" the food. Any adulterated or doctored beverage; hence the mixture of milk, water, nutmeg, and a little rum, is called Doctor; the two former ingredients being "doctored" by the two latter.

Doctor (The). Brown sherry, so called because it is concocted from a harsh, thin wine, by the addition of old boilded mosto stock. Mosto is made by heating unfermented juice in earthen vessels, till it becomes as thick and sweet as treacle. This syrup being added to fresh "must" fermenta, and the luscious produce is used for doctoring very inferior qualities of wine. (Shaw: On Wine.)

To doctor the wine. To drug it, or strengthen it with brandy. The fermentation of cheap wines is increased by fermentable sugar. As such wines fail in aroma, connoisseurs smell at their wine. To doctor wine is to make weak wine stronger, and "sick" wine more palatable.

Doctored Dice. Loaded dice.

To doctor the accounts. To falsify them. They are ill (so far as you are concerned) and you falsify them to make them look better. The allusion is to drugging wine, beer, etc., and to adulteration generally.

Dr. Diafoirus in Molière's Malade Imaginaire. A man of fossilised ideas, who, like the monk, refused to change his time-honoured humphmus (g.c.), for the new-fangled Humphmus. Dr. Diafoirus used to say, what was good enough for his forefathers was good enough for their posterity, and he had no patience with the modern fads about the rotundity of the earth, its motion round the sun, the circulation of the blood, and all such stuff.

Dr. Dove. The hero of Southey’s Doctor.

Dr. Fell. I do not like thee, Dr. Fell. A correspondent of Notes and Queries says the author was Tom Brown, who wrote Dialogues of the Dead, and the person referred to was Dr. Fell, Dean of Christchurch (1625-1886), who expelled him, but said he would remit the sentence if he translated the thirty-third Epigram of Martial:

> “Non amo te, Zabith. nec possum dicere quare; > Hoc genus possum dicere, non amo te.”

> “I do not like thee, Dr. Fell,”  > “The reason why I cannot tell;  > But this I know, I know full well.  > I do not like thee, Dr. Fell.”  > T. Brown.

Doctor Mirabilis. Roger Bacon (1214-1292).

Doctor My-Book. Dr. John Abernethy, so called because he used to say to his patients, “Read my book”—on Surgical Observations. (1765-1830.)

Dr. Bené or Pedro Rezio of Agweña. The doctor of Buratária, who forbade Sancho Panza to taste any of the meats set before him. Roasted partridge was forbidden by Hippocrates; podridia was the most pernicious food in the world; rabbits are a sharp-hair diet; veal is prejudicial to health; but the governor might eat a few wafers, and a thin slice or two of quince.” (Don Quixote, part ii, book iii, chap. 10.)

Dr. Sangradora, of Valladolid, a tall, meagre, pale man, of very solemn appearance, who weighed every word he uttered, and gave an emphasis to his sage dicta. “His reasoning was geometrical, and his opinions angular.” He said to the licentiate Sedillo, who was sick, “If you had drunk nothing else but pure water all your life, and eaten only such simple food as boiled apples, you would not now be tormented with gout.” He then took from him six porringers of blood to begin with; in three hours he repeated the operation; and again the next day, saying: “It is a gross error to suppose that blood is necessary for life.” With this depletion, the patient was to drink two or three pints of hot water every two hours. The result of this treatment was death “from obstinacy.” (Gil Blas, chap. ii.)

Doctor Slop. An enthusiast, who thinks the world hinges on getting Uncle Toby to understand the action of a new medical instrument. (Tristram Shandy.)

A nickname given by William Hone to Sir John Stoddart, editor of the New Times. (1773-1866.)

Doctor Squintum. George Whitefield, so called by Foot in his farce entitled The Minor. (1714-1770.)

Theodore Hook applied the same sobriquet to the Rev. Edward Irving, who had an obliquity of the eyes. (1792-1834.)

Doctor Syntax. A simple-minded, pious butpecked clergyman, very simple-minded, but of excellent taste and scholarship, who left home in search of the picturesque. His adventures are told in eight-syllable verse in The Tour of Dr. Syntax, by William Combe. (Duke Combe.

Dr. Syntax’s horse. Grizzle, all skin and bone. (Horse.)

Doctors. False dice, which are doctorable, or made to turn up winning numbers.

> “The whole ante-chamber is full, my lord—knights and squires, doctors and dukes.”

> “The deers with their doctors in their pockets, I presume.” —Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. XXXIII.

> “Or chaired at White’s, under the doctors sit.” —Dundas, book i. 293.

Doctors. The three best doctors are Dr. Quirt, Dr. Diet, and Dr. Merryman.

> St. tibi deficiente medicis, medicus tibi manet.

> Hec etsi: Mens-laxa, Requere, Morutatas-Blata.

Doctors’ Commons. A locality near St. Paul’s, where the ecclesiastical courts were formerly held, and wills preserved. To “common” means to dine together: a term still used at our universities. Doctors’ Commons was so called because the doctors of civil law had to dine together four days in each term. This was called eating their terms.

Doctors Disagree. Who shall decide when doctors disagree. When authorities differ, the question and justice must be left undecided. (Pope: Moral Essays, epistle iii, line 1.)

Doctor’s Stuff. Medicine: stuff sent from the doctor.

Doctored Wine. (To Doctor.)

Doctour of Phisikes Tale, in Chaucer, is the Roman story of Virginius, given by Livy. There is a version of this tale in the Roman de la Rose, vol. ii. p. 74; and another, by Gower, in his Confessio Amantis, book vii.
Doctrinists

Doctrinists or Doctrinaire. A political party which has existed in France since 1815. They maintain that true liberty is compatible with a monarchical Government; and are so called because they advocate what is only a doctrine or dream. M. Guizot was one of this party.

Dodge (1 syl.). An artful device to evade, deceive, or bilk some one. (Anglo-Saxon, deogian, to conceal or colour.)

The religious dodge. Seeking alms by trading on religion.

The tidy dodge. To dress up a family clean and tidy so as to excite sympathy, and make passers-by suppose you have by misfortune fallen from a respectable state in society.

Dodge About (To), in school phrase, is to skip about and not go straight on through a lesson. A boy learns a verb, and the master does not hear him conjugate it straight through, but dODges him about. Also in class not to call each in order, but to pick a boy here and there.

Dodger. A “knowing fellow.” One who knows all the tricks and ways of London life, and profits by such knowledge.

Dodger. The Artful Dodger. John Dawkins, a young thief, up to every artifice, and a perfect adept in villainy. A sobriquet given by Dickens to such a rascal, in his Oliver Twist, chap. viii.

Dodgington, whom Thomson invokes in his Summer, was George Bubb Dodgington, Lord Melcomb-Regis, a British statesman, who associated much with the wits of the time. Churchill and Pope ridiculed him, while Hogarth introduced him in his wig into his picture called the Orders of Periwigs.

Dod’ipoll. As wise as Dr. Dodipoll (or) Doddipole—i.e., not wise at all; a dunce. (Doddy in dodi-poll and doddypate is probably a variant of tatty, small, puny. Doddy-poll, one of puny intellect.)

Dodman or Doddiman. A snail. A word still common in Norfolk; but Fairfax, in his Bulk and Selvedge (1674), speaks of “a snail or dodman.”

“Dodman, doddiman, put out your hand, Here comes a thing to steal your own.” Norfolk rhyme.

Dodona. A famous oracle in Epirus, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus (Jupiter), and situate in the village of Dodona.

* The tale is, that Jupiter presented his daughter Thebe with two black pigeons which had the gift of human speech. Lempriere tells us that the Greek word peleiai (pigeons), means, in the dialect of the Epirots, old women; so that the two black doves with human voice were two black or African women. One went to Libya, in Africa, and founded the oracle of Jupiter Ammon: the other went to Epirus, and founded the oracle of Dodona. We are also told that plates of brass were suspended on the oak trees of Dodona, which being struck by thongs when the wind blew, gave various sounds from which the responses were concocted. It appears that this suggested to the Greeks the phrase Kalkos Dodonês (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbler, or one who talks an infinite deal of nothing.

Dods (May). The old landlady in Scott’s novel called St. Roman’s Well. An excellent character, made up of consistent inconsistencies; a mosaic of oddities, all fitting together, and forming an admirable whole. She was so good a housewife that a cookery book of great repute bears her name.

Dodson and Fogg. The lawyers employed by the plaintiff in the famous case of “Barrell v. Pickwick,” in the Pickwick Papers, by Charles Dickens.

Doe (1 syl.). John Doe and Richard Roe. Any plaintiff and defendant in an action of ejectment. They were sham names used at one time to save certain “niceties of law;” but the clumsy device was abolished in 1852. Any mere imaginary persons, or men of straw. John Doe, Richard Roe, John o’ Noakes, and Tom Styles are the four sons of “Mrs. Harris,” all bound apprentices to the legal profession.

Doeg (2 syl.), in the satire of Aesop and Achitophel, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Elkanah Settle, a poet who wrote satires upon Dryden, but was no match for his great rival. Doeg was Saul’s herdsman, who had charge of his mules and asses. He told Saul that the priests of Nob had provided David with food; whereupon Saul sent him to put them to death, and eighty-five were ruthlessly massacred. (1 Sam. xxii. 7; xxiii. 18.)

“Doeg, though without knowing law or why, Made still a blundering kind of melody. . . . .

Let him rail on; let his invective Muse

Have four and twenty letters to abuse,

Which if he jumbles to one line of sense,

Indict him of a capital offence.”

Aesop and Achitophel, part ii.
Doff is do-off, as "Doff your hat."
So Don is do-on, as "Don your clothes."
Dup is do-up, as "Dup the door" (q.v.).
  "Doff thy harness, youth...
  And tempt not yet the brushes of the war."
  Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, V.3.

Dog. This long article is subdivided into eleven parts:
  1. Dogs of note.
  2. Dogs of noted persons.
  3. Dogs models of their species.
  4. Dogs in phrases.
  5. Dogs used metaphorically, etc.
  6. Dogs in Scripture language.
  7. Dogs in art.
  8. Dogs in proverbs and fables.
  10. Dogs the mate of animals.
  11. Dogs inferior plants.

(1) Dogs of Note:
  Barry. The famous mastiff of Great St. Bernard's, in the early part of the present century instrumental in saving forty human beings. His most memorable achievement was rescuing a little boy whose mother had been destroyed by an avalanche. The dog carried the boy on his back to the hospice. The stuffed skin of this noble animal is kept in the museum of Berne.
  Tonton, q.v.
  Tray — i.e. Tray — runner, or else from the Spanish isquier, to fetch.

(2) Dogs of noted persons:
  Artaxo're's fifty dogs. Ales (strength), Amayrutho (from Amayruthia, in Euboea), Asbolos (soot - colour), Ban'os, Bore's, Can'ache (ringwood), Chedistas, Cissies, Co'ran (cropped, crop - eared), Cyllol (half), Cylltopotes (zig-zag runner), Cyprios (the Cyprian), Draco (the dragon), Dromas (the courser), Dromios (seize - on), Ech'nohas, Pudromos (good - runner), Harpale (porcupine), Harpie (beak - rim), Ichnothatos (track - follower), Lai'dros (furiously), Lacinna (fourness), Lach'ne (glowing - redness), Layron (Nymphon), Lai'don (from Lardon, in Arvernian), Laps (hurricane), Lampons (shining - one), Leus'cos (grey), Lyric'na, Lycen'in, Mach'imos (haver), Melamp'ni (black), Mel'ante (black - right), Mel'ant (black), Menele'a, Molossos (from Molosses), Na'pa (begotten by a wolf), Nebroph'ones (fawn - killer), Oc'yrdoma (swift - runner), Or'esitrophos (mountain - bred), Oris'basos (mountain - ranger), Pachytos (thick - skinned), Pamphapers (ravenous), Pater'sis (leader), Peres'las (winged), Pers'tis (spot), Therid'amas (beast - tamer or subdue), Thermon (savage - faced), Thoos (sooty), Uranis (heavenly - one).

Several modern names of dogs are of Spanish origin, as Ponto (pointer), Tray (fetch), etc.
  King Arthur's favourite hound. Caull.

Aubrey's dog. Aubrey of Montdidier was murdered, in 1371, in the forest of Bondy. His dog, Dragon, showed a most unusual hatred to a man named Richard of Macaire, always snarling and ready to fly at his throat whenever he appeared. Suspicion was excited, and Richard of Macaire was condemned to a judicial combat with the dog. He was killed, and in his dying moments confessed the crime.

Belgrade, the camp - sutler's dog: Clumby.

Browning's (Mrs.) little dog Flush, on which she wrote a poem.

Lord Byron's favourite dog. Boatswain, buried in the garden of Newstead Abbey.

Catherine de Medicis's favourite lap - dog was named Phoebé.

Cathulin's hound was named Luath (q.v.).

Douglas's hound was named Luffra or Lufra (q.v.).

Elizabeth of Bohemia's dog was named Apollon.

Fingal's dog was named Bran.

"Mar e Bran, is a brother' (if he be not Bran, it is Bran's brother) was the proverbial reply of Macrumbuch."

Frederick of Wales had a dog given him by Alexander Pope, and on the collar were these words —

  "I am his Richness' dog at Kew:
  Pray tell me, sir, whose dog are you?"

Geryon's dogs. Gargantua and Oristos. The latter was the brother of Cerberus, but had one head less. Hercules killed both these monsters.

Icarus's dog. Mena (the glutney). Icarus was slain by some drunken peasants, who buried the body under a tree. His daughter Erigone, searching for her father, was directed to the spot by the howling of Mena, and when she discovered the body she lunched herself for grief. Icarius became the constellation Comets, Erigone the constellation Virgo, and Mena the star Peryton, which rises in July, a little before the Dog - star.

Greek, pro - known.

Kenilworth's (Sir) famous hound was called Roswall. (Sir W. Scott: The Talisman.)

Lamb's (Charles) dog was named Dush.

Landor's (Savage) dog was named Giallo.

Landseer's greyhound was named Brutus. "The Invader of the Larder."
Dog

Llewelyn’s greyhound was named Gelert (q.v.).

Ludlam’s dog. (See Lazy.)

Lurgan’s (Lord) greyhound was named Master McGrath, from an orphan boy who reared it. It won three Waterloo Cups, and was presented at Court by the express desire of Queen Victoria, the very year it died (1866–1871).

Neville’s dog. It ran away whenever it was called. In the corresponding Italian proverb the dog is called that of the Vicar Arlottto. (See Chièv.)

Mauthe dog. (See Mauthe.)

Sir Isaac Newton’s, Diamond (q.v.).

Dog of Montargis. The same as Aubry’s dog. A picture of the combat was for many years preserved in the castle of Montargis. (See Aubry’s Dog.)

Ori’s dog’s name was Arcoph’ones (bear-killer), and Prophe’senoses’ (Pitom-glutton). (Pitom is in Bostia.)

Pope’s dog was named Bounce.

Punch’s dog is Toby.

Richard II’s greyhound was named Mathe. It deserted the king and attached itself to Bolingbroke.

Roderick’s Goth’s dog was named Theron.

Rupert’s (Prince) dog, killed at Marston Moor, was named Boy.

Scott’s (Sir Walter) dogs: his fur-jurite deerhound was named Maida; his jet-black greyhound was called Hamlet. He also had two Dandy Dinmont terriers.

Seven Sleepers (Dog of the). This famous dog, admitted by Mahomet to heaven, was named Kutmir. The seven noble youths that fell asleep for 309 years had a dog, which accompanied them to the cavern in which they were walled up. It remained standing for the whole time, and neither moved from the spot, ate, drank, nor slept. (Nal’s Koran, xviii., note.)

Tristan’s dog was named Leon or Lion.

Ulysses’ dog, Argos, recognised him after his return from Troy, and died of joy.

(3) Dogs, models of their species:

Argoss (a Russian terrier); Baroness Cardiff (a Newfoundland); Black Prince (a mastiff); Bou-woor (a schipperke); Corney (a bull-terrier); Countess of Warwick (a great Dane); Dan O’Connor (an Irish water-spaniel); Dude (a pug); Excitation (a black cocker-spaniel); Fritz (a French poodle); Judah (a bloodhound); Kitter (a Scotch terrier); King Lud (a bulldog); King of the Heather (a dandie-dinmont); Mike (a Japanese spaniel); Olga (a deerhound); Rotorio (a King Charles’ spaniel); Royal Kruger (a beagle); Scottish Leader (a smooth-coated St. Bernard); Sensation (a pointer); Sir Bedivere (a rough-coated St. Bernard); Spinaway (a greyhound); Toledo Blade (an English setter); Woodmansterne Trefoil (a collie).

(4) Dog in phrases:

A dog in a doublet. A bold, resolute fellow. In Germany and Flanders the boldest dogs were employed for hunting the wild boar, and these dogs were dressed in a kind of buff doublet buttomed to their bodies. Rubens and Sneyd’s represent several in their pictures. A false friend is called a dog in one’s doublet.

Between dog and wolf. “Entre chien et loup.” St. Roch and his dog. Two inseparables. “Toby and his dog.” One is never seen without the other.

They lead a cat and dog life. Always quarrelling.

To lead the life of a dog. To live a wretched life, or a life of debauchery.

(5) Dog, used metaphorically or symbolically:

The dog. Diogenes, the Cynic (B.C. 412–323). When Alexander went to see him, the young King of Macedon introduced himself with these words: “I am Alexander, summoned the Great,” to which the philosopher replied: “And I am Diogenes, summoned the Dog.” The Athenians raised to his memory a pillar of Parian marble, surmounted by a dog. (See Cynic.)

Dog of God. So the Laplanders call the bear. The Norwegians say it “has the strength of ten men and the wit of twelve.” They never presume to speak of it by its proper appellation, guonstiga, lest it should revenge the insult on their flocks and herds, but they call it Middaangjia (the old man with a fur cloak).

A dead dog. Something utterly worthless. A phrase used two or three times in the Bible. (See (6).)

A dirty dog. In the East the dog is still held in abhorrence, as the scavenger of the streets. “Him that dieth in the city shall the dogs eat” (1 Kings xiv. 11). The French say, l’homme comme un barbier (muddy or dirty as a poodle), whose hair, being very long, becomes filthy with mud and dirt. Generally speaking, “a dirty dog” is one morally filthy, and is applied to those who talk and act nastily. Mere skin dirt is quite another matter, and those who are so defiled we call dirty pigs.

A surly dog. A human being of a surly temper, like a surly dog.

Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing? (2 Kings viii. 12, 13). Hazael means, “Am I such a brute as to set on fire the strongholds of Israel, slay the young men with the sword, and dash their children to the ground, as thou, Elijah, sayest I shall do when I am king?”

Sydney Smith being asked if it was true that he was about to sit to Landseer, the animal painter, for his portrait, replied, in the words of Hazael, “What! is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?”

The Thracian dog. Zoilus.

“Like curs, our critics haunt the poet’s feast.
And feed on praise. They feast on every guest:
From the old Thracian dog they learned the way.
To snarl in want, and grumble o’er their prey.”

Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

Dogs of war. The horrors of war, especially famine, sword, and fire.

“And Caesar’s spirit, ranging for revenge,
With his blessed lips, come hot from hell.
Shall in these confusions, with a monarch’s voice,
Cry ‘Havoc’ and let slip the dogs of war.”

Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, iii. 1.

(6) Dog (in Scripture language), whether dead or living, is a most degrading expression: “After whom is the King of Israel come out? After a dead dog?” (1 Sam. xxiv. 14.) “Beware of dogs” (Phil. iii. 2), i.e., sourd, noisy professors. Again, “Without are dogs” (Rev. xxii. 15), i.e., false teachers and sinners, who sin and return to their sins (2 Peter ii. 21).

There is no expression in the Bible of the fidelity, love, and watchful care of the dog, so highly honoured by ourselves.

(7) Dog in art.

Dog, in medieval art, symbolises fidelity.

A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. Bernard, St. Bonifacius, and St. Wendelin, as licking the wounds of St. Roch; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. Dominic.

Dogs in monuments. The dog is placed at the feet of women in monuments to symbolise affection and fidelity, as a hawk is placed at the feet of men to signify courage and magnanimity. Many of the Crusaders are represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as a dog follows the footsteps of his master.

(8) Dog in proverbs, fables, and proverbial phrases:

Barking dogs seldom bite. (See Barren.)

Dog don’t eat dog. Ecclesia eclesiast non decidat; government letters are not taxed; church lands pay no tithes to the church.

A black dog has walked over him. Said of a sullen person. Horace tells us that the sight of a black dog with its pups was an unlucky omen. (See Black Dog.)

A dog in the manger. A churlish fellow, who will not use what is wanted by another, nor yet let the other have it to use. The allusion is to the well-known fable of a dog that fixed his place in a manger, and would not allow an ox to come near the hay.

Every dog has his day. In Latin, “Hodie miki, cras tibi.” “Nunc miki, nunc tibi, benigna” (fortuna). In German, “Heute mir, morgen dir.” You may crow over me to-day, but my turn will come by-and-by. The Latin proverb, “Hodie miki,” etc., means, “I died to-day, your turn will come in time.” The other Latin proverb means, fortune visits every man once. She favours me now, but she will favour you in your turn.

Thus every dog at last will have his day—
He who this morning smiled, at night may sorrow;
The grab today’s a butterfly tomorrow.”

Peter Pindar: Odes of Condolence.

Give a dog a bad name and hang him. If you want to do anyone a wrong, throw dirt on him or rail against him. Gone to the dogs. Gone to utter ruin; impoverished.

He has not a dog to lick a dish. He has quite cleared out. He has taken away everything.

He who has a mind to beat his dog will easily find a stick. In Latin, “Qui cult cardes canes caner facit succit sistem.” If you want to abuse a person, you will easily find something to blame. Dean Swift says, “If you want to throw a stone, every lane will furnish one.”

“To him who wills, ways will not be wanting.” “Where there’s a will there’s a way.”

Hungry dogs will eat dirty pudding. Those really hungry are not particular about what they eat, and are by no means dainty. When Darius in his flight from Greece drank from a ditch defiled with dead carcasses, he declared he had never drunk so pleasantly before.

It was the story of the dog and the shadow—i.e., of one who throws good money, after bad; of one who gives certa per inermis. The allusion is to the well-known fable.

"Nulla species, ac deni'tas secat mordit." (Down sank the meat in the stream for the flies to board it.)

"Vous licez mon dog. "Qui m'aime aime mon chien," or "Qui aime Bertrand aime son chien."

Old dogs will not learn new tricks.
People in old age do not readily conform to new ways.

To call off the dogs. To break up a disagreeable conversation. In the chase, if the dogs are on the wrong track, the huntsman calls them off.
(French, rompre les chiens.)

Throw it to the dogs. Throw it away, it is useless and worthless.

What! keep a dog and bark myself!
Must I keep servants and myself do their work?

You are like Nero's dog, which runs away when it is called. (See CHIEN.)

(9) Dog, Dogs, in Superstitions:
-Dogs howl at death. A widespread superstition.

"In the rabblement book it saith
The dogs howl when, with my breath,
Great Samson, the angel of death,
Taketh up the town he fight":
Longfellow: Golden Legend, 33.

The hair of the dog that bit you. When a man has had a debauch, he is advised to take next morning "a hair of the same dog," in allusion to an ancient notion that the burnt hair of a dog is an antidote to its bite.

(10) Dog, to express the mate of animals, as dog-ape, dog-fox, dog-otter.

(11) Dog, applied to inferior plants:
dog-briar, dog-berry, dog-cabbage, dog-daisy, dog-fennel, dog-leek, dog-lichen, dog-mercury, dog-parsley, dog-violets
(while no perfume), dog-wheat.
(See below, Dog-grass, Dog-rose.

Dog and Duck. A public-house sign, to announce that ducks were hunted by dogs within. The sport was to see the duck dive, and the dog after it. At Lambeth there was a famous pleasure-resort so called, on the spot where Bethleham Hospital now stands.

Dog-cheap. A perversion of the old English god-chepe (a good bargain).
French, bon marché (good-cheap or bargain).

"The neck... would have brought lights as good-cheap at the drapers' chandler's in Europe."
- Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, ii. 3.

Dog-days. Days of great heat. The Romans called the six or eight hottest weeks of the summer canicularés dies.

According to their theory, the dog-star or Sirius, rising with the sun, added to its heat, and the dog-days bore the com-ined heat of the dog-star and the sun.
(July 3rd to August 11th.)

Dog-fall (in wrestling), when both wrestlers fall together.

Dog-grass (triticum repens). Grass eaten by dogs when they have lost their appetite; it acts as an emetic and pur-gative.

Dog-head (in machinery). That which bites or holds the gun-flint.

Dog-headed Tribes of India. Mentioned in the Italian romance of Giustino Moschiino.

Dog-Latin. Pretended or mongrel Latin. An excellent example is Stevens' definition of a kitchen:

As the law classically expresses it, a kitchen is a camera necessaria pro usu coctionis: eum sacer pansus, steans pansus, scullion, dressero, cantholo, staves, sawck-jack: præramantium, holandum, frandum, et plun-padding-ramandum...—A

Formerly applied to a medical practi-citioner; it expresses great contempt.

Dog-rose. Botanical name, cypnor-Rhodes — i.e. Greek kuno-rodou, dog-rose; so called because it was supposed to cure the bite of a mad dog (Rosa canina, wild brier).

"A morum vero [i.e. of a mad dog uniform medium omnium super repertos, radix
Rosa canina rosea, que cynorrhodon appellatur.
Pliny: Natural History, viii. 63 & vii. 6.

Dog-sick. Sick as a dog. We also say "Sick as a cat." The Bible speaks of dogs "returning to their vomit again" (Prov. xxvi. 11; 2 Pet. ii. 22).

Dog-sleep. (A). A pretended sleep,
Dogs seem to sleep with "one eye open."

Dog-star. The brightest star in the firmament. (See Dog-days.)

"Dog-vane is a term familiarly applied to Dog-watch. A corruption of dodge-watch: two short watches, one from four to six, and the other from six to eight in the evening, introduced to dodge the routine, or prevent the same men always keeping watch at the same time. (See Watch.)

Dog-whipper. (A). A beadle who whips all dogs from the precincts of a church. At one time there was a church officer so called. Even so recently as 1856 Mr. John Pickard was appointed
Dog-whipping "dog-whipper" in Exeter Cathedral, "in the room of Mr. Charles Reynolds, deceased." (Exeter Gazette.)

Dog-whipping Day. October 18th (St. Luke's Day). It is said that a dog once swallowed the consecrated wafer in York Minster on this day.

Dogs (a military term). The 17th Lancers or Duke of Cambridge's Own Lancers. The crest of this famous cavalry regiment is a Death's Head and Cross-bones, OH GLORY, whence the acronym Death Or Glory (D.O.G.).

The Spartan injunction, when the young soldier was presented with his shield, was, "With this, or On this," which meant the same thing.

Dogs, in Stock-Exchange phraseology, means Newfoundland Telegraph shares—that is, Newfoundland dogs. (See Stock-Exchange Slang.)

Dogs. Isle of Dogs. When Greenwich was a place of royal residence, the kennel for the monarch's hounds was on the opposite side of the river, hence called the "Isle of Dogs."

Dogs (Green). Extinct like the Dodo. Brander said to Count Louis, "I would the whole race of bishops and cardinals were extinct, like that of green dogs." (Motley: Dutch Republic, part ii. 6.)

Dogs' ears. The corners of leaves crumpled and folded down.

Dogs' eared. Leaves so crumpled and turned up. The ears of many dogs turn down and seem quite limp.

Dogs' meat. Food unfit for consumption by human beings.

Dogs' meat and cats' meat. Food cheap and nasty.

Dogs' nose. Gin and beer.

"'Dogs' nose, which is, I believe, a mixture of gin and beer.'"

"'So it is,' said an old lady."—Pickwick Papers.

Dogged. He dogged me, i.e. followed me about like a dog; shadowed me.

Dogged (2 syl.). Sullen, snappish, like a dog.

Do'gare'sa (y = j). The wife of a doge.

Dogs (1 syl., g = j). The chief magistrate in Venice while it was a Republic. The first duke or doge was Anastfesto Paoluccio, created 897. The chief magistrate of Genoa was called a doge down to 1797, when the Republican form of Government was abolished by the French. (Latin, dux, a "duke" or "leader."

"For six hundred years . . . . her [Venice's] government was an elective monarchy, her . . . . doge possessing, in early times at least, as much independent authority as any other European sovereign."—Rusten: Stories of Venice, vol. i. chap. 1. p. 3.

Dog. The ceremony of wedding the Adriatic was instituted in 1174 by Pope Alexander III., who gave the doge a gold ring from off his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istra over Frederick Barbarossa, in defence of the Pope's quarrel. When his Holiness gave the ring he desired the doge to throw a similar one into the sea every year on Ascension Day, in commemoration of the event. (See Bucenaurb.)

Dotty dog. (See under Dog, No. 5.)

This alludes more to the animal called a dog, but implies the idea of badness.

Dogget. Dogget's coat and badge. The first prize in the Thames rowing-match, given on the 1st of August every year. So called from Thomas Dogget, an actor of Drury Lane, who signalised the accession of George I. to the throne by giving a waterman's coat and badge to the winner of the race. The Fishmongers' Company add a guinea to the prize. The race is from the "Swan" at London Bridge to the "Swan" at Chelsea.

Doggerel. Inferior sort of verse in rhymes.

Dogma (Greek). A religious doctrine formally stated. It now means a statement resting on the verbo diezir of the speaker. Dogmatic teaching used to mean the teaching of religious doctrines, but now dogmatic means overbearing and dictatorial. (Greek dogma, gen. dogmatos, a matter of opinion; verb dokeis, to think, whence dogmatize.)

Dogmatic Facts.

(1) The supreme authority of the Pope of Rome over all churches.

(2) His right to decide arbitrarily all controversies.

(3) His right to convokc councils at will.

(4) His right to revise, repeal, or confirm decrees.

(5) His right to issue decrees bearing on discipline, morals and doctrine.

(6) The Pope is the centre of communion, and separation from him is excommunication.
(7) He has ultimate authority to appoint all bishops.
(8) He has power to depose any ecclesiastic.
(9) He has power to judge every question of doctrine, and pronounce infallibly what the Church shall or shall not accept.

Domatic School of Medicine. Founded by Hippocrates, and so called because it set out certain dogmas or theoretical principles which it made the basis of practice.

Domastic Theology is that which treats of the dogmatica (doctrines) of religion.

Dolley. (See DOLEY.)

Dolt (1 syl.). Not a dolt. The dolt was a Scotch silver coin = one-third of a farthing. In England the dolt was a base coin of small value prohibited by 3 Henry V. c. 1.

"When they will not give a dolt to relieve a lame beggar, they will lay our ten to see a dead Indian." —Shakespeare: The Tempest, ii. 2.

Dolabra. A Roman axe.
Dolabra fossaria. The pickaxe used by miners and excavators.
Dolabra pontificalis. The priest's hatchet for slaughtering animals.

Dolce far Niente (Italian). Delightful idleness. Pliny has "Inaudidam tamen multa agere" (Ep. viii. 9).

Doldrums (The). The name given to that region of the ocean near the equator noted for calms, squalls, and howling winds, between the N.E. and S.E. trade-winds.

"But from the bluff head, where I watched to day, I saw her in the doldrums.

In the doldrums. In the dumbs.

Dole, lamentation, from the Latin doleo, to grieve.

"He [the dwarf] found the dead bodies, wherefore he made great dole." —Lawes: King Arthur, book i. chap. viii.

Dole, a portion allotted, is the Anglo-Saxon dol, a portion.

"Haven has in store a precious dole."

Kabb: Canadian Year (4th Sunday of Trinity).

"Happy man be his dole. May his share or lot be that of a happy or fortunate man,

"Whereon, happy man be his dole, I trust that I shall not speed worse, and that very quickly."

-Damon and Pithias, i. 177.

Dolefish. The share of fish allotted to each one of a company of fishermen in a catch. Dole = the part dealt to anyone. (Anglo-Saxon, dōl or dōl, from the verb dēl-an, to divide into parts.)

Doll Money. A lady of Duxford left a sum of money to be given away annually in the parish, and to be called Doll Money. Doll is a corruption of dole, Saxon dōl (a share distributed).

Dollar. Marked thus $, either scutum or $, a dollar being a "piece of eight" [real]. The two lines indicate a contraction, as in lb.

The word is a variant of thalar (Low German, dahler; Danish, daler), and means "a valley," our dole. The counts of Schlick, at the close of the fifteenth century, extracted from the mines at Joachim's thal (Joachim's valley) silver which they came into ounces. These pieces, called Joachim's thalars, gained such high repute that they became a standard coin. Other coins being made like them were called thalars only. The American dollar equals 100 cents, in English money a little more than four shillings.

Dolly Murrey. A character in Crabbe's Borough, who died playing cards.

"'A vole! a vole!' she cried, 'the fault was mine.'... They said she, greatly, with a sable staff, Died as one taught and pruet to die." —Crabbe: Borough.

Dolly Shop. A shop where rags and refuse are bought and sold. So called from the black doll suspended over it as a sign. Dolly shops are, in reality, no better than unlicensed pawn-shops. A black doll used to be the sign hung out to denote the sale of silks and muslins which were fabricated by Indians.

Dolmen. A name given in France to what we term "cromlechs." These ancient remains are often called by the rural population devils' tables, fairies' tables, and so on. (Celtic, ston tablet.) It consists of a slab resting on unhewn upright stones. Plural dolmens (dol, a table; men, a stone).

"The Indian dolmens... may be said to be identical with those of Western Europe."

Dolopa'tos. A French metrical version of Sanudahah's Parables, written by Hebers or Herbers or Prince Philippe, afterwards called Philippe le Hardi. Dolopa'tos is the Sicilian king, and Virgil the tutor of his son Lucien. (See SEVEN WISE MASTERS.

Dolorous Dettie (The). John Skelton wrote an elegy on Henry Percy, fourth Earl of Northumberland, who fell a victim to the avarice of Henry VII. (1489). This elegy he entitled thus: "Upon the Dolorous Dettie and Dolphin. Called a sea-goose (oie de mer) from the form of its snout, termed in French bec d'oie (a goose's beak). The dolphin is noted for its changes of colour when taken out of the water.

"Parting day
Dies like the dolphin, whom each sang moves
With a new colour as it glides away,
The last still loveliest." Byron: Childe Harold, canto iv. stanza 29.

Dolphin (The), in medieval art, symbolises social love.

Dom. A title applied in the Middle Ages to the Pope, and at a somewhat later period to other Church dignitaries. It is now restricted to priests and choir monks among the Benedictines, and some of the other monastic orders, as Dom Mabillon, Dom Calmet. The Spanish don, Portuguese dom, German von, and French de, are pretty well equivalent to it. (Latin, dominus.)

Dombey (Florence). A motherless child, hungering and thirsting to be loved, but regarded with frigid indifference by her father, who thinks that sons alone are worthy of his regard. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Mr. Dombey. A self-sufficient, purse-proud, frigid merchant, who feels satisfied there is but one Dombey in the world, and that is himself. (Dickens: Dombey and Son.)

Dom-Daniel. The abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, somewhere "under the roots of the ocean," but not far from Babylon. (Continuation of the Arabian Tales.)

"In the Dom-daniel caverns
Under the roots of the ocean." Bowbey.

Domesday Book consists of two volumes, one a large folio, and the other a quarto, the material of each being vellum. It was formerly kept in the Exchequer, under three different locks and keys, but is now kept in the Record Office. The date of the survey is 1086.

Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and Durham are not included in the survey, though parts of Westmoreland and Cumberland are taken.

The value of all estates is given, firstly, as in the time of the Confessor; secondly, when bestowed by the Conqueror; and, thirdly, at the time of the survey. It is also called The King's Book, and The Winchester Roll because it was kept there. Printed in facsimile in 1783 and 1816. Stow says the book was so called because it was deposited in a part of Winchester Cathedral called Domus-des, and that the word is a contraction of Domus-dei book; more likely it is connected with the previous surveys made by the Saxon kings, and called dom-boc (libri judiciales), because every case of dispute was decided by an appeal to these registers.

"Then sayde Gamelyn to the Justes...
Thou laste givene domes that bun evil light,
I will siten in thy sete, and dressen thyn aright." Chaucer: Canterbury Tales (The Cook's Tale).

Domestic Poultry, in Dryden's Hind and Panther, means the Roman Catholic clergy. So called from an establishment of priests in the private chapel at Whitehall. The nuns are termed "sister partlet with her hooded head."

Domicalary Visit (4). An official visit to search the house.

Dominic (St.). (1170-1221.) A Spanish priest who founded the Inquisition, and the order called the Dominicans or Preaching Friars. He was called by the Pope "Inquisitor-General," and was canonised by Gregory IX.

Some say the Inquisition existed in 1184, when Dominic was under fourteen years of age.

He is represented with a sparrow at his side, and a dog carrying in its mouth a burning torch. The devil, it is said, appeared to the saint in the form of a sparrow, and the dog refers to a dream which his mother had during pregnancy. She dreamed that she had given birth to a dog, spotted with black and white spots, which lighted the world with a burning torch.

He is also represented sometimes with a city in his hand and a star either on his forehead or on his breast; sometimes also with a sword in his hand and a pile of books burning beside him, to denote his severity with heretics.

Dominical Letters. The letters which denote the Sundays or dies dominica. The first seven letters of the alphabet are employed; so that if A stands for the first Sunday in the year, the other six letters will stand for the other days of the week, and the octave Sunday will come round to A again. In this case A will be the Sunday or Dominical Letter for the whole year.

Dominicans. Preaching friars founded by Dominic de Guzman, at Toulouse, in 1215. Formerly called in England Black Friars, from their black dress, and in France Jaco’bins, because their mother-establishment in Paris was in the Rue St. Jacques.

Donnic’ie Sampson. A village schoolmaster and scholar, poor as a church mouse, and modest as a girl. He writes Latin like a porcus litera’rum, and exclaims "Prodigious!" (Scott: Guy Mannering.) (See STILLING.)

Dominions: One of the orders of angels, symbolised in Christian art by an ensign.

Domino (A). A hood worn by canons; a mask. "Ce nom, qu'on donnait autrefois, par allusion à quelque passage de la liturgie, au canons dont les prêtres se couvrent la tête et les cheveux pendant l'office, ne désigne aujourd'hui qu'un habits de degré pour les laits marcoux."--Bouillet: Dictionnaire des Sciences, etc.

Dominoes (3 syl.). The teeth; also called ivories. Dominoes are made of ivory.

Domisel’ins. The son of a king, prince, knight, or lord before he has entered on the order of knighthood. Also an attendant on some abbot or nobleman. The person domiciled in your house. Hence the king's body-guards were called his domo’ins or dano’ins.

Froissart styles Richard II. le jeune damoisel Richart. Similarly Louis VII. (Le Jeune) was called the royal damoisel.

"Damoisel ou Danoisieu designait autrefois les fille de chevaliers, de laïques, et toutes les jeunes gentilshommes qui n'étaient pas encore chevaliers. On le donnait aussi aux filles des rois qui n'étaient pas encore en état de porter les armes."--Bouillet: Diction. Universel.

Domisselius and domissella are diminutives of dominus, a lord. In old French we find danoisieu and danoisel. The word Ma-damoiselle is ma domissella or danoiselle.

Don is do-on, as “Don your bonnet.” (See DOFF, DUR.)

"Then up he rose, and donned his clothes,
And dipp'd the chamber door."--Shakespeare: Hamlet, iv. 5.

Don. A man of mark, an aristocrat. At the universities the masters, fellows, and noblemen are termed dons. (Spanish.)

Don Giovanni. Mozart's best opera. (See DON JUAN.)

Don Juan. A native of Seville, son of Don José and Donna Inez, a blue-stocki ng. When Juan was sixteen years old he got into trouble with Donna Julia, and was sent by his mother, then a widow, on his travels. His adventures form the story of the poem, which is incomplete. (Byron: Don Juan.)

A Don Juan. A libertine of the aristocratic class. The original of this character was Don Juan Tenorio of Seville, who lived in the fourteenth century. The traditions concerning him have been dramatised by Tieco de Molins; thence passed into Italy and France. Gluck has a musical ballet of Don Juan, and Mozart has immortalised the character in his opera of Don Giovanni (1787).

Don Quixote (2 syl.). A gaunt country gentleman of La Mancha, gentle and dignified, affectionate and simple-minded, but so crazed by reading books of chivalry-errantry that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world, and actually goes forth to avenge the oppressed and run a tilt with their oppressors. The word Quixote means The wind-armed. (See QUIXONIC.)

A Don Quixote. A dreamy, unpractical man, with a “bee in his bonnet.”

Donation of Pepin (Thé). When Pepin conquered Ataulf the ex-archate of Ravenna fell into his hands. Pepin gave both the ex-archate and the Republic of Rome to the Pope, and this munificent gift is the famous “Donation” on which rested the whole fabric of the temporal power of the Popes of Rome (a.d. 755).

Victor Emmanuel, King of Italy, dispossessed the Pope of his temporal dominions, and added the Papal States to the united kingdom of Italy (1870).

Donatista. Followers of Donatus, a Numidian bishop who opposed Cecilia'nus. Their chief dogma is that the outward church is nothing, “for the letter killeth, it is the spirit that giveth life.” (Founded 314.)

Doncaster. Sigebert, monk of Gemblours, in 1100, derived this word from Thong-ceaster, the “Castle of the thong,” and says that Hugues and Horse purchased of the British king as much land as he could encompass with a leather thong. The thong was cut into strips, and encompassed the land occupied by the city of Doncaster.

This is the old tale of Dido and the hide, and so is the Russian Yakutaka. (See BURSA.)

"Of course it means the "City on the river Don." (Celtic, Don, that which spreads.)

Dondasch'. An Oriental giant contemporary with Seth, to whose service he was attached. He needed no weapons, as he could destroy anything by the mere force of his arms.
Done Brown. He was done brown. Completely bamboozled or made a fool of. This is a variety of the many expressions of a similar meaning connected with cooking, such as "I gave him a roasting," "I cooked his goose," "I cut him into mince-meat," "I put him into a pretty stew," "I settled his hash," "He was dished up," "He was well dressed" [rubbed], "He was served out," etc. (See Cooking.)

Done For or Regularly done for. Utterly ruined. This "for" is the adverb—thoroughly, very common as a prefix.

Done Up. Thoroughly tired and wearied out. Up means ended, completed, as in "gave it up" (over, finishing) and adverbially it means "completely," hence to be "done up" is to be exhausted completely.

Don'egild (3 syl.). The wicked mother of Allia, King of Northumberland. Hating Cuistanse because she was a Christian, she put her on a raft with her infant son, and turned her adrift. When Allia returned from Scotland and discovered this cruelty of his mother, he put her to death. (Chaucer: Man of Law's Tale.)

"The tradition of St. Mungo resembles the Man of Law's Tale in many respects.

Donkey. An ass. It was made to rhyme with "monkey," but is never now so pronounced. The word means a little tawny or dun-coloured animal.

Donkey. The cross of the donkey's back is popularly attributed to the honour conferred on the beast by our Lord, who rode on an ass in "His triumphal entry" into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday. (See Christian Traditions.)

The donkey means one thing and the driver another. Different people see from different standpoints, their own interest in every case directing their judgment. The allusion is to a fable in Phedrus, where a donkey-driver exhorts his donkey to flee, as the enemy is at hand. The donkey asks if the enemy will load him with double pack-saddles. "No," says the man. "Then," replies the donkey, "what care I whether you are my master or someone else?"

To ride the black donkey. To be pig-headed, obstinate like a donkey. Black is added, not so much to designate the colour, as to express what is bad.

Two more, and up goes the donkey—i.e. two pennies more, and the donkey shall be balanced on the top of the pole or ladder. It is said to a braggart, and means—what you have said is wonderful, but if we admit it without gainsaying we shall soon be treated with something still more astounding.

Who ate the donkey? When the French were in their flight from Spain, after the battle of Vittoria, some stragglers entered a village and demanded rations. The villagers killed a donkey, and served it to their hated foes. Next day they continued their flight, and were waylaid by the villagers, who assaulted them most murderously, jeering them as they did so with the shout, "Who ate the donkey?"

Who stole the donkey? This was for many years a jcar against policemen. When the force was first established a donkey was stolen, but the police failed to discover the thief, and this failure gave rise to the laugh against them.

Who stole the donkey? Answer: "The man with the white hat." It was said, in the middle of the nineteenth century, that white hats were made of the skins of donkeys, and that many donkeys were stolen and sold to hatters.

Donkey Engine (A). A small engine of from two to four horse-power.

Dony. Florimel's dwarf. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii, canto 6.)

Donzel (Italian). A squire or young man of good birth.

"He is esquire to a knight-errant, donzel to the damsels."—Hatter: Characters.

Doo'lin of Mayence. The hero of a French romance of chivalry, and the father of Ogier the Dane.

Doolin's Sword. Mervilluse (wonderful). (See Sword.)

Doom. The eynk of doom. The signal for the final judgment.

Doom Book (doum-bou) is the book of dooms or judgments compiled by King Alfred. (See Doomsday Book.)

Doom-rings, or Circles of Judgment. An Irishland term for circles of stones resembling Stonehenge and Avebury.

Doomsday Sedgwick. William Sedgwick, a fanatical prophet and preacher during the Commonwealth. He pretended to have had it revealed to him in a vision that doomsday was at hand; and, going to the house of Sir Francis Russell, in Cambridgeshire, he called upon a party of gentlemen playing at bowls to leave off and prepare for the approaching dissolution.
Doomstead. The horse of the Scandinavian Nornes or Fates. (See Horse.)

Door. (Greek, thura; Anglo-Saxon, dora.)
The door must be either shut or open. It must be one way or the other. This is from a French comedy called Le Grondeur, where the master scolds his servant for leaving the door open. The servant says that he was scolded the last time for shutting it, and adds: “Do you wish it shut?”—“No.”—“Do you wish it open?”—“No.”—“Why,” says the man, “it must be either shut or open.”
He laid the charge at my door. He accused me of doing it.
Next door to it. As, if not so, it was next door to it, i.e. very like it, next-door neighbour to it.
Sin lieth at the door (Gen. iv. 7). The blame of sin lies at the door of the wrong-doer, and he must take the consequences.

Door Nail. (See Dean.) Scrooge’s partner is “dead as a door-nail.” (Dickens: Christmas Carol, chap. i.)

Door-opener (Thre). So Crates, the Theban, was called, because every morning he used to go round Athens and rebuke the people for their late rising.

Door-tree (A). The wooden bar of a door to secure it at night from intruders. Also a door-post.

Doors [house]. As, come indoors, go indoors. So Virgil: “Tuum foribus dive... [indo]... vendit.” (Then Dido seated herself in the house or temple of the goddess.) (Envid, i. 505.)
Out of doors. Outside the house; in the open air.

Doorm. An earl called “the Bull,” who tried to make Enid his handmaid; but, when she would neither eat, drink, nor array herself in bravery at his bidding, “he smote her on the cheek;” whereupon her lord and husband, Count Gemint, starting up, slew the “russet-bearded earl” in his own hall. (Tennyson: Idylls of the King; Enid.)

Dora. The first wife of David Copperfield; she was a child-wife, but no help-meet. She could do nothing of practical use, but looked on her husband with idolatrous awe. Tennyson has a poem entitled Dora.

Dorado (El). (See El Dorado.)

Dorax. A Portuguese renegade, in Dryden’s Don Sebastian—by far the best of all his characters.

Dorcas Society. A society for supplying the poor with clothing. So called from Dorcas, mentioned in Acts ix. 39.

Dorchester. As big as a Dorchester butt. Very corpulent, like the butts of Dorchester. Of Toby Filpit it is said: “His breath-doors of life on a sudden were shut, And he died full as big as a Dorchester butt.”
(Old House: Poor Soldier.)

Doric. The oldest, strongest, and simplest of the Grecian orders of architecture. So called from Doris, in Greece, or the Dorians who employed it. The Greek Doric is simpler than the Roman imitation. The former stands on the pavement without fillet or other ornament, and the flutes are not scalloped. The Roman column is placed on a plinth, has fillets, and the fluting, both top and bottom, are scalloped.

Doric Dialect. The dialect spoken by the natives of Doris, in Greece. It was broad and hard. Hence, any broad dialect.

Doric Land. Greece, Doris being a part of Greece.

“Through all the bounds
Of Doric land.”
(Milton: Paralde Enoth, book 1. 512.)

Doric Reed. Pastoral poetry. Everything Doric was very plain, but cheerful, chaste, and solid. The Dorians were the pastoral people of Greece, and their dialect was that of the country rustics. Our own Bloomfield and Robert Burns are examples of British Doric.

“The Doric rest once more Well pleased, I trust.”
(Thomson: Autumn, 3-4.)

Dor’icourt. A sort of Tremaine of the eighteenth century, who, having over-refined his taste by the “grand tour,” considers English beauties insipid. He falls in love with Letitia Hardy at a masquerade, after character aversion to her in her assumed character of a hoyden. (Mrs. Cowley: The Belle’s Stratagem.)

Dor’igen. A lady of high family, who married Arviragus out of pity for his love and meekness. She was greatly beloved by Aurelius, to whom she had been long known. Aurelius, during the absence of Arviragus, tried to win the heart of the young wife; but Dorigen made answer that she would never listen to him till the rocks that beset the coast of Britain are removed “and there n’is no stone ye seen.” Aurelius, by the aid of a young magician of Orleans, caused all the rocks to disappear, and claimed his reward. Dorigen was very sad, but her husband insisted that she should keep her word, and she went to meet Aurelius. When Aurelius saw how sad she was, and heard what Arviragus had counselled, he said he would rather die than infect her so true a wife and noble a gentleman. So she returned to her husband happy and untainted. (See Diana.) (Chauier: Franklin’s Tale.)

Dom’dant. Drawn from the Earl of Rochester; a witty, aristocratic libertine, in Etheridge’s Man of Mode.

Dorinda, in the verses of the Earl of Dorset, is Catherine Sedley, Countess of Dorchester, mistress of James II.

Dormer Window. The window of an attic standing out from the slope of the roof. (O. French, dormer = a sleeping room formerly fitted with windows of this kind.)

"Thatched were the roofs, with dormer windows." Longfellow: Evangeline, part 1, stanza 1.

Dornock. Stout figured linen for tablecloths; so called from a town in Scotland, where it was originally made.

Dorothea. St. represented with a rose-branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side; sometimes with an angel carrying a basket with three apples and three roses. The legend is that Theophilus, the judge’s secretary, scoffingly said to her, as she was going to execution, “Send me some fruit and roses, Dorothea, when you get to Paradise.” Immediately after her execution, while Theophilus was at dinner with a party of companions, a young angel brought to him a basket of apples and roses, saying, “From Dorothea, in Paradise,” and vanished. Theophilus, of course, was a convert from that moment.

Dorset. Once the seat of a British tribe, calling themselves Duro-trigs (water-dwellers). The Romans colonised the settlement, and Latinised Duro-trigs into Durotriges. Lastly came the Saxons, and translated the original words into their own tongue, dov-sattla (water-dwellers).

Dorsetian Downs. The Downs of Dorsetshire.

"Spread the pure Dorsetian downs in boundless prospect." Thomson: Autumn.

Dosti’chens. A religious sect which sprang up in the first century; so called because they believed that Dosti’chens had a divine mission superior to that of prophets and apostles.

Do’son. A promise-maker and a promise-breaker. Antigonus, grandson of Demetrius the bestriger, was so called.

Doss. A hassock stuffed with straw; a bed—properly, a straw bed; whence the cant word for a lodging-house is a dosingken. Dossel is an old word for a bundle of hay or straw, and dosser for a straw basket. These words were common in Elizabeth’s reign. The French dossier means a “bundle.”

Doss-house. (f.) A cheap lodging-house where the poorer classes sleep on bundles of straw. (See above.)

In the New Review (Aug., 1894) there is an article entitled “In a Woman’s Doss-house,” which throws much light on the condition of the poor in London.

Dossor. One who sleeps in a low or cheap hired dormitory. The verb doss = to sleep.

Do-the-Boys’ Hall. A school where boys were taken in and done for by a Mr. Squeers, a pouting, ignorant, overbearing brute, who starved them and taught them nothing. (Dickens: Nicholas Nickleby.)

It is said that Mr. Squeers is a caricature of Mr. Shaw, a Yorkshire schoolmaster; but Mr. Shaw was a kind-hearted man, and his boys were well fed, happy, and not ill-taught. Like Squeers he had only one eye, and like Squeers he had a daughter. It is said that his school was run by Dickens’s caricature.

Dot and go One. (f.) An infant just beginning to toddle; one who limps in walking; a person who has one leg longer than the other.

Dot’terel or Dottrel. A doting old fool; an old man easily cajoled. The bird thus called, a species of plover, is said to be so fond of imitation that any one who excites its curiosity by strange antics may catch it.

To dor the dottrel. Dor is an archaic word meaning to trick or cheat. Whence the phrase to “dor the dotterel” means to cheat the simpleton.

Dou’ay Bible. The English translation of the Bible sanctioned by the Roman Catholic Church. The Old Testament was published by the English college at Douay, in France, in 1589; but the New Testament was published at Rheims in 1582. The English college at Douay was founded by William Allen (afterwards cardinal) in 1568. The Douay Bible translates such words as repentance by the word penance, etc., and Double (To). To pass or sail round, as "to double the cape." The cape (or point) is twice between the ship and the land. (French, doubler; Latin, du-plus.)

"What capes he doubled, and what continent.
The gulf and straits that strangely he had past" Dryden. Idea, stanza 1.

Double Dealing. Professing one thing and doing another inconsistent with that promise.

"[She] was quite about double-dealing. She had no moral reservation"—Man in Hope.

Double Dutch. Gibberish, jargon, or a foreign tongue not understood by the hearer. Dutch is a synonym for foreign; and double is simply excessive, in a twofold degree.

Double-edged Sword. Literally, a sword which cuts either way; metaphorically, an argument which makes both for and against the person employing it, or which has a double meaning.

"Your Delphic sword, the panther then replied, In double-edged, and cuts on either side." Dryden. Hind and Panther, part iii. 191–2.

Double Entendre (English-French for Un mot à double entende, or à deux entendre). Words which secrety express a rude or coarse covert meaning, generally of a licentious character. "Entendre" is the infinitive mood of a verb, and is never used as a noun.

Double First (A). In the first class of both the classical and mathematical final examination in the Oxford University; or of the classical and mathematical triposes of the University of Cambridge.

Double-headed Eagle (To). The German eagle has its head turned to our left hand, and the Roman eagle to our right hand. When Charlemagne was made "Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire," he joined the two heads together, one looking east and the other west.

Double-tongued. One who makes contrary declarations on the same subject at different times; deceitful.

"Be grave, not double-tongued."—1 Tim. iii. 8

Double up (To). To fold together.

"To double up the flat" is to fold the fingers together so as to make the hand into a fist.

I doubled him up. I struck him in the wind, so as to make him double up with pain, or so as to leave him "all of a heap."

Double X. (See XX.)

Douglas

Double or Quita. The winner stakes his stake, and the loser promises to pay twice the stake if he loses again; but if he wins the second throw he pays nothing, and neither player loses or wins anything. This is often done when the stake is 3d., and the parties have no copper: if the loser loses again, he pays 0d.; if not, the winner does not claim his 3d.

Doubles or Double-walkers. Those aerial duplicates of men or women who represent them so minutely as to deceive those who know them. We apply the word to such persons as the Dromio brothers, the Coriscan brothers, and the brothers Antipholus. The "head centre Stephens" is said to have had a double, who was perpetually leading astray those set to hunt him down.

Doubling Castle. The castle of the giant Despair, in which Christian and Hopeful were incarcerated, but from which they escaped by means of the key called "Promise." (Bunyan: Pilgrim’s Progress.)

Douceur. (French.) A gratuity for service rendered or promised.

Douglas. The tutelary saint of the house of Douglas is St. Bridget. According to tradition, a Scottish king in 770, whose name had been broken by the fierce onset of the Lord of the Isles, saw the tide of battle turned in his favour by an unknown chief. After the battle the king asked who was the "Du-glass" chief-tain, his deliverer, and received for answer Shokto Du-glass: (Behold the dark-grey man you inquired for.) The king then rewarded him with the Clyde-valley vale for his services.

"Let him not cross or thrust me," said the page, "for I will not yield him an inch of way, had he in his body the soul of all Britain that has lived since the time of the Duke of Maer—it must be. The Abbots, chap. xxxiii.

Black Douglas, introduced by Sir Walter Scott in Castle Dangerous, is James, eighth Lord Douglas, who twice took Douglas Castle from the English by stratagem. The first time he partly burnt it, and the second time he utterly razed it to the ground. The castle, says Goddresor, was nicknamed the hazardous or dangerous, because every one who attempted to keep it from the "gud schyr James" was in constant jeopardy by his wiles.

"The Good Sir James, the dreadful black Douglas,
That in his days so wise and worthy was,
Wha here and on the isindels of Spain,
Such honour, praise, and triumphs did obtain."—Gordon.
Douglas

The person generally called "Black Douglas" is William Douglas, lord of Nithsdale, who died in 1390. It was of this Douglas that Sir W. Scott said—

"The name of this indefatigable chief has become so formidable, that women used, in the northern counties, to still their froward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas."—History of Scotland, chap. xi.

Douglas Tragedy (The). A ballad in Scott's Border Minstrelsy. Lord William steals away Lady Margaret Douglas, but is pursued by her father and two brothers. Being overtaken, a fight ensues, in which the father and his two sons are sore wounded. Lord William, wounded, creeps to his mother's house, and there dies; the lady before sunrise next morning dies also.

Douse the Glim. Put out the light; also knock out a man's eye. To douse is to lower in haste, as "Douse the top-sail" Glim, gleam, glimmer, are variants of the same word.

"And so you would turn honest, Captain Goffe, amazin', would ye, said an old weather-beaten pirate who had bit one eye: 'What though he made my eye down the gim ... he is an honest man.'"—The Pirate, chap. xxxiii.

Dousterswivel. A German swindler, who obtains money under the promise of finding buried wealth by a divining-rod. (Scott: Antiquary.)

Dout. A contraction of do-on, as don is of do-on, doff of do-off, and dup of do-up.

In Devonshire and other southern counties they still say Dout the candle and Dout the fire. In some counties extinguishers are called douters.

"The drum of base
Both all the noble substance dou't."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, 1. 4.

Dove—i.e., the diver-bird; perhaps so called from its habit of ducking the head. So also columba (the Latin for dove) is the Greek columbus (a diver).

Dove (The). The dove, in Christian art, symbolises the Holy Ghost. In church windows the seven rays proceeding from the dove signify the seven gifts of the Holy Ghost. It also symbolises the human soul, and as such is represented coming out of the mouth of saints at death.

A dove with six wings is emblematic of the Church of Christ.

The seven gifts of the Holy Ghost are: (1) counsel, (2) the fear of the Lord, (3) fortitude, (4) piety, (5) understanding, (6) wisdom, and (7) knowledge.

Doves or pigeons not eaten as food in Russia. (See Christian Traditions.)

Doves or pigeons. The clergy of the Church of England are allegorised under this term in Dryden's Hind and Panther, part iii. 947, 988-1002.

"A sort of doves were houseted 'neath near the hall ... [i.e. the private chapel at Whitehall] our pampered pigeons, with malignant eye. Beheld those inmates [the Roman Catholic clergy]." The hard their fate, at evening and at morn, A cruse of water and an ear of corn. Yet still they grudged that modicum."

Soiled doves. Women of the demi-monde.

Doves' Dung. In 2 Kings vi. 25, during the siege of Samaria, "there was a great famine ... and ... an ass's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and the fourth part of a cab of dove's dung [haryonum] for five pieces of silver." This "haryonum" was a plant called chickpea, a common article of food still sold to pilgrims on their way to Mecca.

"In Damascus there are many tradesmen whose sole occupation is preparing [haryonum] for sale. They have always been esteemed as provision meet for a lengthy journey, and are a necessary part of the outfit of all who travel in the remote parts of Syria and Asia Minor."—Bible Flowers, p. 71.

Dover. A réchauffé or cooked food done over again. In the professional slang of English cooks a reservation dish is still called a dover (do over again).

Dover. When Dover and Calais meet—i.e. never.

A jack of Dover. A "jack" is a small drinking vessel made of waxed leather, and a "jack of Dover" is a bottle of wine made up of fragments of opened bottles. It is customary to pour the refuse into a bottle, cork it up, and sell it as a fresh bottle. This is called dovering, a corruption of do-over, because the cork is done over with wax or resin.

"Many a jack of Dover hast thou sold,"

Chaucer: Canke's Prologue.

Dovers (Stock Exchange term). The South-Eastern railway shares. The line runs to Dover. (See Claras; Stock Exchange Slang.)

Dovercourt or Dovercourt. A confused gabble: a Babel. According to legend, Dover Court church, in Essex, once possessed a cross that spoke; and Poxe says the crowd to the church was so great "that no man could shut the door." The confusion of this daily throng gave rise to the term.

"And now the rood of Dovercourt did speak, Confirming his opinions to be true."

Collier of Croydon.

Dovetail. Metaphorically, to fit on or fit in nicely; to correspond. It is a word in carpentry, and means the fitting one board into another by a tenon in the shape of a dove’s tail, or wedge reversed.

Dowgate Ward (London). Some derive it from Dour (water), it being next to the Thames, at the foot of the hill; others say it is “Down-gate,” the gate of the down, dune, or hill, as Brighton Downs (hills), South-downs, etc.

Dowlas (Mr.). A generic name for a linendraper, who sells dowlas, a coarse linen cloth, so called from Doulens in Picardy, where it is manufactured.

Dowling (Captain). A character in Crabbe’s Borough; a great drunkard, who died in his cups.

“'Comes tell thy glass.' He took it and he went” (i.e. died). Letter xvi.

Down. He is quite down in the mouth. Out of spirits; disheartened. When persons are very sad and low-spirited, the corners of the mouth are drawn down. “Down in the jib” is a nautical phrase of the same meaning.

Down in the Dumps. Low-spirited.

Down on Him (To be). I sat down on him in a minute. I pounced on him directly; I detected his trick immediately. Also to treat harshly. The allusion is to birds of prey.

Down on his Luck. In ill-luck.

“'I guess, stranger, you'll find me an ex-president down on his luck.'” — A. Ayment Hale: Paris Originals (Professor of Languages).

Down to the Ground. That suits me down to the ground. Entirely.

Down - hearted. Without spirit; the heart prostrated.

Down Town. I am going down town, i.e. to the business part of the town.

Down the country properly means down the slope of the land, or as the rivers run.

“'We say 'I am going up to town' when we mean out of the country into the chief city.

Down-trod. Despised, as one trodden under foot.

“I will lift The down-trod Mortimer as high as the air As this ungrateful knave.” Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV., i. 2.

Downfall (A). A heavy shower of rain; a loss of social position.

Downing Professor. The Professor of the Laws of England in the University of Cambridge. This chair was founded in 1890 by Sir George Downing, Bart.

Downing Street (London). Named after Sir George Downing, who died 1684. He was elected M.P. for Morpeth in 1661.

Downpour (A). A very heavy shower of rain. “A regular downpour.”

Downright. Thoroughly, as “downright honest,” “downright mad”; outspoken; utter, as a “downright shame.” The word means from top to bottom, throughout.

Downright Dunstable. Very blunt, plain speaking. The present town of Dunstable is at the foot of the Chiltern Hills, in Bedfordshire. There was somewhere about the same site a Roman station called Magonium or Magintum, utterly destroyed by the Danes, and afterwards overgrown by trees. Henry I. founded the present town, and built there a palace and priory.

“If this is not, plain speaking, there is no such place as downright Dunstable.” — Sir W. Scott: Beguylament, chap. xii.

Downstairs. Stairs leading from a higher to a lower floor; on the lowest floor, as “I am downstairs.”

Downy (The). Bed. Gone to the downy, gone to bed. Bed being stuffed with down.

Downy Cove (A). A knowing fellow, up to every dodge. On the “lucus a non lucendo” principle, contraries are often substituted in slang and facetious phrases. (See Lucus a non Lucendo.)

Dou’stabbell. Daughter of Cassamen, a knight of Arden, who fell in love with a shepherd. The two make love with Arcadian simplicity, and vow eternal fidelity.

“With that she bent her snow-white knee,
Down by the shepherd kneeled she,
And him she sweetly kiss’d,
With that the shepherd whoop’d for joy.
Quoth he, 'There's never shepherd but
That ever was so high.'
Drayton: Dou’stabbell (a ballad).

Dows on the Chops (A). A ding or blow on the face. “A dows on the blubber-chops of my friend the baronet” means a setting down, a snubbing.

Doxy. A baby; a plaything; a paramour. In the West of England babies are called doxies.

Doyleys. Now means a small cloth used to cover dessert plates; but originally it had a much wider meaning. Thus Dryden speaks of “doyley petticoats;”
and Steele, in No. 102 of the Tatler, speaks of his "doiley suit." The Doyles were linen-drappers, No. 346, east corner of Upper Wellington Street, Strand, from the time of Queen Anne to the year 1850.

Dozen. (See Baker's Dozen.)

D. P. or Dom. Proc. The House of Lords. (Latin, domus procœrum.)

Drac. A sort of fairy in human form, whose abode is the caverns of rivers. Sometimes these dracs will float like golden cups along a stream to entice women and children bathing, and when they attempt to catch the prize drag them under water. (South of France mythology.)

"Fare le drac, same as "Faire le diable." Irish, "Play the Puck;" English, "Play the dace."

"Bolomen qu'vouz sacro le Drac Se j'ayant treed din un sac
Cinc o siez milante pistules
Espresso comme de rodeo."

Goudesim: Canto en l'Ayer.

Drachenfels. (Dragon-rocks.) So called from the legendary dragon killed there by Siegfried, the hero of the Nibelungen-Lied.

"The castled crag of Drachenfels
Frowned o'er the wide and winding Rhine,
Whose breast of waters broadly swells,
Between the banks which bear the vine."

Byron: Childe Harold, iv. 55.

Draco'nian Code. One very severe. Draco was an Athenian law-maker. As every violation of a law was made in this code a capital offence, Demades the orator said "that Draco's code was written in human blood."

Draft. The Druids borrowed money on promises of repayment after death (Patricia). Purchas tells us of some priests of Pekin, who barter with the people in bills of exchange, to be paid in heaven a hundredfold.

Draft on Aldgate (A), or A draft on Aldgate pump. A worthless note of hand; a fraudulent draft or money order. The pun is between draft of draught of drink, and draft a money order on a bank.

Drag in, Neck and Crop, or To drag in, head and shoulders. To introduce a subject or remark abruptly. (See A Propos de Bottes.)

Draggie-tail. A slut; a woman who allows her petticoats to trail in the dirt. The word should be "daggit-tail" (q.v.), from the Scotch dog (dew on the grass), daggle (wet with the grass-dew), like the Latin collis tule irro're.

Drag'oman. (plural, Dragomans.) A cicerone; a guide or interpreter to foreigners. (Arabic targum, an interpreter; whence targum.)

"My dragoman had me completely in his power, and I resolved to become independent of all interpreters." —Baker: Albert Nyamus, chap. i. p. 4.

Dragon. The Greek word drakos comes from a verb meaning "to see," to "look at," and more remotely "to watch" and "to flash."

The animal called a dragon is a winged crocodile with a serpent's tail; whence the words serpent and dragon are sometimes interchangeable.

From the meaning a watcher we get the notion of one that watches; and from the meaning "to flash," we connect the word with meteors.

"Swift, swift, ye dragons of the night!—that dawn, that dawning morn may hari the raven's eye."

Shakespeare: Cymbeline, ii. 2.

Dragon. This word is used by ecclesiastics of the Middle Ages as the symbol of sin in general and paganism in particular. The metaphor is derived from Rev. xii. 9, where Satan is termed "the great dragon." In Ps. cxi. 13 it is said that the saints "shall trample the dragon under their feet." In the story of the Fall, Satan appeared to Eve in the semblance of a serpent, and the promise was made that in the fulness of time the seed of the woman should bruise the serpent's head.

Another source of dragon legends is the Celtic use of the word for "a chief." Hence pen-dragon (summus rex), a sort of dictator, created in times of danger. Those kings who slew a chief by battle slew a dragon, and the military title soon got confounded with the fabulous monster. Dragon, meaning "quick-sighted," is a very suitable word for a general.

Some great inundations have also been termed serpents or dragons. Hence Apollo (the sun) is said to have destroyed the serpent Python (i.e. dried up the overflow). Similarly, St. Romanaus delivered the city of Rouen from a dragon, named Gargouille (waterspout), which lived in the river Seine.

From the idea of watching, we have a dragon placed in the garden of the Hesperides; and a duenna is poetically called a dragon:

"In England the garden of beauty is kept
By a dragon of jewelry placed within cell;
But so oft as an unamiable dragon hath slept,
That the garden's but carelessly watched after all."

T. Moore: Irish Melodies, No. 2 ("We may roam through this world," etc.).
A spiteful, violent, tyrannical woman is called a dragoness.

The blind dragon, the third party who plays propriety in flirtations.

"This state of affairs was baled with undisguised thankfulness by the rector, whose feeling the harmony had been rudely jars by the necessity of his acting the blind dragon."

Dragon in Christian art symbolises Satan or sin. In the pictures of St. Michael and St. Margaret it typifies their conquest over sin. Similarly, when represented at the feet of Christ and the Virgin Mary. The conquest of St. George and St. Silvester over a dragon means their triumph over paganism. In the pictures of St. Martha it means the inundation of the Rhone, spreading pestilence and death; similarly, St. Romanus delivered Rouen from the inundation of the Seine, and Apollo's conquest of the python means the same thing. St. John the Evangelist is sometimes represented holding a chalice, from which a winged dragon is issuing.

Ladies guarded by dragons. The walls of feudal castles ran winding round the building, and the ladies were kept in the securest part. As adventurers hr to scale the walls to gain access to the ladies, the authors of romance said they overcame the serpent-like defence, or the dragon that guarded them. Sometimes there were two walls, and then the bold invader overcame two dragons in his attempt to liberate the captive damsels. See Enchanted Castles.

A flying dragon. A meteor.

The Chinese dragon. In China, the drawing of a five-clawed dragon is not only introduced into pictures, but is also embroidered on state dresses and royal robes. This representation is regarded as an amulet.

The Green Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to St. George.

The Red Dragon. A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VII., who adopted this device for his standard at Bosworth Field. It was the ensign of Cadwallader, last of the British kings, from whom the Tudors descended.

Dragon Slayers.

1. St. Philip the Apostle is said to have destroyed a huge dragon at Hierapolis, in Phrygia.
2. St. Martha killed the terrible dragon called Tarasque at Aix (la Chapelle).
3. St. Florent killed a dragon which haunted the Loire.
5. St. Keynes of Cornwall slew a dragon.
6. St. Michael, St. George, St. Margaret, Pope Sylvester, St. Samson (Archbishop of Dol), Donatus (fourth century), St. Clement of Metz, and many others, killed dragons.
7. St. Romain of Rouen destroyed the huge dragon called La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine.

Dragon of Wantley (i.e. Warmdill, in Yorkshire). A monster slain by More, of More Hall, who procured a suit of armour studded with spikes; and, proceeding to the well where the dragon had his lair, kicked it in the mouth, where alone it was vulnerable. Dr. Percy says this dragon was an overgrown, rascally attorney, who cheated some children of their estate, but was made to disgorge by a gentleman named More, who went against him, "armed with the spikes of the law," after which the dragon attorney died of vexation. (Reliques.)

Dragon’s Hill (Berkshire) is where the legend says St. George killed the dragon. A bare place is shown on the hill, where nothing will grow, and there the blood of the dragon run out.

In Saxon annals we are told that Cedric, founder of the West Saxon kingdom, slew there Naud, the pen-drion, with 5,000 men. This Naud is called Natan-leod, a corruption of Naud-an-ludh (Naud, the people’s refuge).

Dragon’s Teeth. Subjects of civil strife; whatever rouses citizens to rise in arms. The allusion is to the dragon that guarded the well of Ares. Cadmus slew it, and sowed some of the teeth, from which sprang up the men called Spartans, who all killed each other except five, who were the ancestors of the Thebans. Those teeth which Cadmus did not sow came to the possession of Aeetes, King of Colchis; and one of the tasks he enjoined Jason was to sow these teeth and slay the armed warriors that rose therefrom.

"Citizens rising from the soil, richly sown with dragon’s teeth, for the right of their several states." —The Times.

To sow dragons’ teeth. To foment contentions; to stir up strife or war. The reference is to the classical story of Jason or that of Cadmus, both of whom sowed the teeth of a dragon which he had slain, and from these teeth sprang up armies of fighting men, who attacked each other in fierce fight. Of course, the figure means that quarrels often arise out of a contention supposed to have been allayed (or slain). The Philistines sowed dragons’ teeth when they took Samson, bound him, and put out his eyes. The ancient Britons sowed dragons’ teeth when they massacred the Danes on St. Bryce’s Day.

Drag'nonades (3 syl.). A series of religious persecutions by Louis XIV., which drove many thousand Protestants out of France. Their object was to root out “heresy;” and a bishop, with certain ecclesiastics, was sent to see if the heretics would recant; if not, they were left to the tender mercies of the dragons who followed these “ministers of peace and goodwill to man.”

"France was drifting toward the fatal atrocities of the dragonade."—F. Parkman: The Old Régime, chap. iv. p. 137.

Dragoons. So called because they used to be armed with dragons, i.e. short muskets, which spouted out fire like the fabulous beast so named. The head of a dragon was wrought on the muzzle of these muskets.

Drake means the "duck-king." The old English word end means a duck, and end-rig becomes "drig, drake. Similarly the German tauber-rich is a male dove, and ganser-rich, a male goose, or gander.

Drama. Father of the French drama. Etienne Jodelle (1552-1573).
Father of the Greek drama. Thespis (sixth century B.C.).
Father of the Spanish drama. Lopú de Ve’ga (1562-1635).

Drama of Exile (A). A poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning (1844). The exile is Eve, driven out of Paradise into the wilderness. Lucifer, Gabriel, and Christ are introduced into the poem, as well as Adam and Eve.

Dramatic Unities (The three). One catastrophe, one locality, one day. These are Aristotle’s rules for tragedy, and the French plays strictly follow them.

The French have added a fourth, one style. Hence comedy must not be mixed with tragedy. Addison’s Cato is a good example. Unity of style is called the Unity of Uniformity. Shakespeare disregards all these canons.

Dramatis Personae. The characters of a drama, novel, or actual transaction.

"The dramatic persons were nobles, country gentlemen, justices of the quorum, and custodes rotulorum [keepers of the rolls]."—The Truce.

Drap. One of Queen Mab’s maids of honour. (Drayton.)

Drawback

Dra'pier’s Letters. A series of letters written by Dean Swift to the people of Ireland, advising them not to take the copper money coined by William Wood, by patent granted by George I. These letters crushed the infamous job, and the patent was cancelled. Dean Swift signed himself M. B. Dra-pier in these letters.

Drat 'em! A variant of Od rot 'em! The first word is a minced form of the word God, as in “Od’s blood!” “Od sounds!”—God’s wounds, “Od’s bodi-kins,” etc. (See Od’s.) A correspondent in Notes and Queries suggests “[May] God out-root them!” but we have the words drill and throttle (to choke) which would better account for the a and the o, which are also imprecations.

Draught of Thor (The). The ebb of the sea. When Asa Thor visited Jötunheim he was set to draw a bowl of liquor. He took three draughts, but only succeeded in slightly reducing the quantity. On leaving Jötunheim, the king, Giant Skrymir, told him he need not be ashamed of himself, and showed him the sea at low ebb, saying that he had drunk all the rest in his three draughts. We are told it was a quarter of a mile of sea-water that he drank.

Draupnir. Odin’s magic ring, from which every ninth night dropped eight rings equal in size and beauty to itself.

Draw. To draw amsis. To follow scent in the wrong direction. Fox-hunting term, where to draw means to follow scent.
To draw a furrow. To plough or draw a plough through a field so as to make a furrow.
To draw a person out. To entice a person to speak on any subject, often with the intention of ridiculing his utterances.

Draw it Mild (To). We talk of remarks being highly flavoured, of strong language, of piquant remarks, of spicy words; so that to “draw it mild” refers to liquor; let it be mild, not too highly-flavoured, not too spicy and strong.

Draw the Long Bow (To). To exaggerate. Some wonderful tales are told of Robin Hood and other foresters practised in the long bow. (See Bow.)

Drawback. Something to set against the profits or advantages of a concern. In commerce, it is duty charged on goods paid back again when the goods are exported.
Dravoanair

“It is only on goods into which duttable commodities have entered in large proportion, and obvious ways that drawbacks are allowed.”—J. George: Protection or Free Trade? chap ix. p. 25

Dravoanair. A burlesque tyrant in The Rehearsal, by G. Villiers, Duke of Buckingham (1672). He kills every one, “sparing neither friend nor foe.” The name stands for a blustering braggart, and the farce is said to have been a satire on Dryden’s inflated tragedies. (See BAYES, BORADIL.)

“[He] frights his mistress, smacks up kings, batters armies, and does what he will, without regard to numbers, good sense, or justice.”—Bayes: The Rehearsal.

Drawing-room. A room to which ladies withdraw or retire after dinner. Also a levee where ladies are presented to the sovereign.

Drawing the Cork. Giving one a bloody nose. (See CLARET.)

Drawing the King’s (or Queen’s) Picture. Coining false money.

Drawing the Nail, i.e., absolving oneself of a vow. In Cheshire, two or more persons would agree to do something, or to abstain from something, say drinking beer; and they would go into a wood, and register their vow by driving a nail into a tree, swearing to keep their vow as long as that nail remained in the tree. If they repented of their vow, some or all of the party went and drew out the nail, whereupon the vow was cancelled.

Drawn. Hunged, drawn, and quartered, or Drawn, hunged, and quartered. The question turns on the meaning of drawn. The evidence seems to be that traitors were drawn to the place of execution, then hunged, then “drawn” or disembowelled, and then quartered. Thus the sentence on Sir William Wallace was that he should be drawn (detrahatur) from the Palace of Westminster to the Tower, etc., then hunged (suspensarius), then disembowelled or drawn (deltatun), then beheaded and quartered (deolcubtruc et decapitun). (See Notes and Queries, August 15th, 1891.)

If by “drawn” is meant conveyed to the place of execution, the phrase should be “Drawn, hanged, and quartered;” but if the word is used as a synonym of disembowelled, the phrase should be “Hanged, drawn, and quartered.”

“Lord Ellenborough used to say to those condemned, ‘You are drawn on hurdles to the place of execution, where you are to be hanged, but not till you are dead; for, while still living, your body is to be taken down, your bowels torn out and burnt before your face; your head is then cut off, and your body divided into four quarters.”—Gentlemen’s Magazine, 1660, part i. pp. 177, 278.

Drawn Battle. A battle in which the troops on both sides are drawn off, neither combatants claiming the victory.

Dreadnought. The Seaman’s Hospital Society; a floating hospital.

Dream Authorship. It is said that Coleridge wrote his Kubla Khan, a poem, in a dream. Coleridge may have dreamt these lines, but without doubt Purchas’s Pilgrimage haunted his dreams, for the resemblance is indubitable.

Dreng. A servant boy, similar to the French gronon and Latin page. A Danish word, which occurs in Domesday Book.

Dress your Jacket (or hide). I’ll dress your jacket for you. I’ll give you a beating. I’ll give you a dressing, or a good dressing. To dress a horse is to curry it, rub it, and comb it. To dress ore is to break it up, crush it, and powder it in the stamping mill. The original idea of dressing is preserved, but the method employed in dressing horses, ore, etc., is the prevailing idea in the phrases referred to.

Dreyfusard’, Dreyfusite. An advocate of the innocence of Capt. Dreyfus, a Jewish officer of the French artillery, condemned in 1895 for betraying military secrets, degraded and sent to Devil’s Island. In 1899 the first trial was annulled. He was brought back to France, retried, and again condemned, but shortly afterwards pardoned. It was believed that he was sacrificed to save the General Staff.

Drink Doop. Drink a deep draught. The allusion is to the pegg tankards. Those who drank deep, drank to the lower pegs. (Hamlet, i. 2.) (See Peg.)

Drinke and Welcome. One of the numerous publications of John Taylor, the Water Poet (1637). The subject is thus set forth: “The famous Historie of the most parts of Drinks in use now in the Kingdomes of G. Britaine and Ireland; with an especiall declaration of the potency, vertue, and operation of our English Ale. With a description of all sorts of Waters, from the Ocean-sea to the Teares of a Woman. As also the causes of all sorts of weather, faire or foule, sleet, raine, halle, frost, snow, foggies, mists, vapours, clouds, stormes, windes, thunder, and lightning. Compiled first in High Dutch Tongue by the paineful and industrious Huldrick van Speagel, a grammatical brewer of Lubeck; and now most learnedly enlarged, amplified, and translated into English verse and prose, by John Taylor, the Water Poet.”

Drink like a Fish (To). To drink abundantly. Many fish swim with their mouths open.

Drinking Healths was a Roman custom. Thus, in Plautus, we read of a man drinking to his mistress with these words: “Bene veo, bene nos, bene to, bene me, bene nostrum etiam Stephani nius” (Here’s to you, here’s to us all, here’s to thee, here’s to me, here’s to our dear ——). (Stich. v. 4.) Persius (v. 1, 20) has a similar verse: “Bene nisi, bene nobis, bene amica nostra” (Here’s to myself, here’s to you, and here’s to I shan’t say who). Martial, Ovid, Horace, etc., refer to the same custom.

The ancient Greeks drank healths. Thus, when Theraménès was condemned by the Thirty Tyrants to drink hemlock, he said: “Hoc pulcro Crītico” — the man who condemned him to death.

The ancient Saxons followed the same habit, and Geoffrey of Monmouth says that Hengist invited King Vortigern to a banquet to see his new levies. After the meats were removed, Rowe’s, the beautiful daughter of Hengist, entered with a golden cup full of wine, and, making obeisance, said, “Lauerd kiving, wacht heï” (Lord King, your health). The king then drank and replied, “Drinc heï” (Here’s to you). (Geoffrey of Monmouth, book vi. 12.) Robert de Brunne refers to this custom:

> “This is ther custom and bey gest / When they are at the ale or feast: / Ik kn in that levies give him drink / Salle say ‘Wonsiel’ to him drink / He last bids the say ‘Woonsiel’ / The tother salle say again ‘Drinkaille’ / That says ‘Woonsiel’ drinks of the cup / Kiss and his felaw he gives it in.” — Robert de Brunne.

> ? In drinking healths we hold our hands up towards the person toasted and say, “Your health...” The Greeks handed the cup to the person toasted and said, “This to thee,” “Greeci in epulis postum aliqui tradidiri, cum nominare solent.” Our holding out the wine-glass is a relic of this Greek custom.

Drinking Song. The oldest in the language is in the second act of Gummer Gurton’s Needle, by John Still, called The Jolly Bishop. It begins:

> “I cannot eat but little meat, / My stomach is not good.”

Drinking at Freeman’s Quay, that is, drinking gratis. At one time, all porters and carmen calling at Freeman’s Quay, near London Bridge, had a pot of beer given them gratis.

Drive. (Anglo-Saxon drif-an.)

> To drive a good bargain. To exact more than is quite equable.

> To drive a roaring trade. To be doing a brisk business. The allusion is to a coachman who drives so fast that his horses pant and roar for breath.

> To drive the swine through the bank: of yarn. To spoil what has been painfully done; to squander thrift. In Scotland, the yarn wrought in the winter (called the gude-wife’s thrift) is laid down by the burn-side to bleach, and is peculiarly exposed to damage from passing animals. Sometimes a herd of pigs driven along the road will run over the hanks, and sometimes they will stray over them from some neighbouring farm-yard and do a vast amount of harm.

Drive at (To). What are you driving at? What do you want to prove? What do you want me to infer? We see the “wind drove against the sails,” i.e. rushed or moved violently against them. Falsstaff tells us of “four or five rogues in buckram [who] let drive at him,” where at means against or towards. “What are you driving at?” is, against or towards what object are you driving or moving?

Drive Off. To defer, to procrastinate. The idea is, running away or drawing off from something that ought to be done, with the promise of coming to it at a future time.

Driveller. An idiot, an imbecile, whose saliva dribbles out of his mouth.

Drivelling Dottage. In weak old age saliva drops unconsciously from the mouth.

> “This exhibition of drivelling dottage was attended with many other incoherent expressions.” — J. F. Kennedy: The Swallow Burns, chap. zivil. p. 462.
Driver of Europe (Le Cochere de l'Europe). So the Empress of Russia used to call the Duc de Choiseul, minister of Louis XV., because he had spies all over Europe, and thus ruled its political cabals.

Drivers, in the Irish uprising about 1843, were persons engaged by landlords to drive all the live stock of defauling tenants and lodge them in a pound [like that at Carrickmacross]. They were resisted by the Molly Maguires.

Drives fat Oxen (Who). Brook, in his Gustaves Vasa, says: "Who rules o'er freemen should himself be free," which Dr. Johnson parodied thus: "Who drives fat oxen should himself be fat." (Boswell's Life, 1754.)

Driving for Rent, in Ireland, was a summary way of recovering rent by driving cattle to a pound, and keeping them till the rent was paid, or selling them by auction.

"It was determined that I and the bailiffs should go out in a body and 'drive for rent.'"—Trench: Realities of Irish Life, chap. v.

Driving Pigs. He is driving pigs, or driving pigs to market — i.e., snoring like pigs, whose grunt resembles the snore of a sleeper.

Droit d'Aubaine. In France the king was entitled, at the death of foreign residents (except Swiss and Scots), to all their movable estates; the law was only abolished in 1819. Aubaine means "alien," and droit d'aubaine the "right over an alien's property."

"Had I died that night of an Indigestion, the whole world could not have excused the effects of the droit d'aubaine; my sister and black pair of breeches, pantaloons, and all, must have gone to the king of France."—Sterne: Sentimental Journey (Introduction).

Drôle. "C'est un drôle," or "C'est un drôle d'homme" (he is a rum customer). "Un joyeux drôle" means a boon companion. "Une drôle de chose" means a queer thing; something one can make neither head nor tail of.

Dromio. The brothers Dromio. Two brothers exactly alike, who serve two brothers exactly alike, and the mistakes of masters and men form the fun of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, based on the Menachi of Plautus.

Drone (l. syl.). The largest tube of a bagpipe; so called because it sounds only one continuous note. (German, drohne, verb, drohnen, to groan or drone.) A drone. An idle person who lives on the means of another, as drones on the honey collected by bees; a saggard. (Anglo-Saxon, dræn, a male bee.)

Drop. To take a drop. A euphemism for taking what the drinker chooses to call by that term. It may be anything from a sip to a Dutchman's draught.

A drop of the crater. In Ireland means a drink of whisky, or "creature-comfort."

To take a drop too much. To be intoxicated. If it is the "last feather which breaks the camel's back," it is the drop too much which produces intoxication.

To take one's drops. To drink spirits in private.

Drop (To). To drop an acquaintance is quietly to cease visiting and inviting an acquaintance. The opposite of picking up or taking up an acquaintance.

Drop in (To). To make a casual call, not invited; to pay an informal visit. The allusion is to fruit and other things falling down suddenly, unexpectedly, or accidentally. It is the intransitive verb, not the transitive, which means to "let fall."

Drop off (To). "Friends drop off," fall away gradually. "To drop off to sleep," to fall asleep (especially in weariness or sickness).

Drop Serene (gutta serena). An old name for amaurosis. It was at one time thought that a transparent, watery humour, distilling on the optic nerve, would produce blindness without changing the appearance of the eye.

"So thick a 'drop serene' hath quenched these orbs."—Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 35.

Drown the Miller (To). To put too much water into grog or tea. The idea is that the supply of water is so great that even the miller, who uses a water wheel, is drowned with it.

Drowned Rat. As wet as a drowned rat — i.e., soaking wet. Drowned rats certainly look deplorably wet, but so also do drowned mice, drowned cats, and drowned dogs, etc.

Drowned in a Butt of Malmsey. George, Duke of Clarence, being allowed to choose by what death he would die, chose drowning in malmsey wine (1477). See the continuation of Monstrelet, 196; Fulgens, ix. 12; Martin du Bellais's Memoirs (year 1514).

Admitting this legend to be an historic fact, it is not unique: Michael Harleson, of Berlin, wished to meet death in a similar way in 1671, if we Drowning Men

Drowning Men. Drowning men catch at straws. Persons in desperate circumstances cling in hope to trifles wholly inadequate to rescue or even help them.

Drows or Trows. A sort of fairy race, residing in hills and caverns. They are curious artificers in iron and precious metals. (Zelanda superstition.)

"I hung about thy neck that gifted charm, which all in our lands know was wrought by no earthly artist, but by the Drows in the secret recesses of their caverns."—Scott: The Pirate, chap. x.

Drab, Drubbing. To fog, a fogging. Compare Greek tribo, to rub, bruise; Anglo-Saxon, drepan, to beat.

Drug. It is a mere drug in the market. Something not called for, which no one will buy. French drogue = rubbish, as Ce n’est que de la drogue; hence droquet (drugget), inferior carpet-cloth made of rubbish or inferior wool, etc.

Druid. A chief priest (Celtic; der, superior; wydd, priest or instructor). In Taliasen we read, Buam gwydded yngwarfed an (at length I became a priest or wydd). It was after this period that the wydds were divided into two classes, the Derwydd and the Go-wydds (D’Druids and Ovids). Every chief had his druid, and every chief druid was allowed a guard of thirty men (Strabo). The order was very wealthy. (Not derived from the Greek drus, an oak.)

"Patrick tells us that the Druids were wont to borrow money to be repaid in the life to come. His words are, 'Druides pecuniam mutuo accipiant in posteriore vita redditi." 1

1 Take money by the Druids borrowed.

In FIELD world to be restored.

Butler: Hudibras, 111. canto...

Drum. A crowded evening party, a contraction of "drawing-room" (dr”-room’). Cominges, the French ambassador, writing to Louis XIV., calls these assemblies drewms and drawromes. (See ROTT, HURRICANE.)

"The Comte de Broglie ... goes sometimes to the drawms, and sometimes to the drawrome of the Princess of Wales."—Nineteenth Century : Comte de Cominges; Sept., 1891, p. 461.

"It is impossible to live in a drum."—Lady M. W. Montagu.

John Drum’s entertainment. Turning an unwelcome guest out of doors. The allusion is to drumming a soldier out of a regiment.

Drunkeness. The pulpit cushion, often vigorously thumped by what are termed "rouging preachers."

"When Gospel trumpeter, surrounded with long-armed ruff, to battle sounded ; And pulpit, drum ecclesiastic, Was beat with fist instead of a stick."—Butler: Hudibras, part i. canto I.

Drum-head Court-martial. One held in haste; like a court-martial summoned on the field round the big drum to deal summarily with an offender.

Drummers. So commercial travelers are called in America, because their vocation is to drum up recruits or customers.

Drummond Light. The limelight. So named from Captain Thomas Drummond, R.E.

"Wisdom thinks, and makes a solar Drummond Light of a point of dull time."—Gosse: Entering on Life (reading, p. 211).

Drumsticks. Legs. The leg of a cooked fowl is called a drumstick.

Drunk. (Anglo-Saxon, divne-an.)

Drunk as a fiddler. The reference is to the fiddler at wakes, fairs, and on board ship, who used to be paid in liquor for playing to rustic dancers.

Drunk as a lord. Before the great temperance movement set in, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, those who could afford to drink thought it quite comme it fust to drink two, three, or even more bottles of port wine for dinner, and few dinners ended without placing the guests under the table in a hopeless state of intoxication. The temperate habits of the last quarter of the nineteenth century renders this phrase now almost unintelligible.

Drunk as blazes. "Blazes" of course means the devil.

Drunk as Chloe. Chloe, or rather Cloe (2 syl.), is the cobbler’s wife of Linden Grove, to whom Prior, the poet, was attached. She was notorious for her drinking habits.

Drunk as Hurl’d]s Sow. (See Davy’s Sow.)

Drunken’s Cloak (. A) A tub with holes for the arms to pass through. At one time used for drunkards and scolds by way of punishment.

Drunken Deddington. One dead drunk. The proper name is a play on the word dead.

Drunkeness. The seven degrees:

(1) Ape drunk; (2) Lion drunk; (3)
Drunkenness. It is said that if children eat owl's eggs they will never be addicted to strong drinks.

"Tous les oiseaux [i.e. to Bacchus] étaient agréables, excepté la chouette dont les œufs aiguisent, et qui nous rendirent les enfants qui les mangerent sans vin."—Noël: Dictionnaire de la Table, Vol. I. p. 236.

Drupner [the dripper]. A gold ring given to Odin; every ninth night other rings dropped from it of equal value to itself. (The Edda.)

Drury Lane (London) takes its name from the habitation of the great Drury family. Sir William Drury, K.G., was a most able commander in the Irish wars. Drury House stood on the site of the present Olympic theatre.

Drusee (2 syll.). A people of Syria governed by emirs. Their faith is a mixture of the Pentateuch, the Gospel, the Koran, and Sufism. They offer up their devotions both in mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and yet observe the fast of Ramadán. Their language is pure Arabic. (Hakem, the incarnate spirit, was assailed by Darasí in propounding his religion to these Syrians; and the word Druse is said to be derived from Darasí, shortened into D'raš.)

Dry. Thirsty. Hence to drink to "wet your whistle" (i.e. throat); and malt liquor is called "heavy wet." (Anglo-Saxon dryg, dry.)

Dry Blow (A). A blow which does not bring blood.

Dry Goods (in mercantile), such as cloths, stuffs, silks, laces, and drapery in general, as opposed to groceres.

Dry Lodgings. Sleeping accommodation without board. Gentlemen who take their meals at clubs live in dry lodgings.

"Dry Lodgings of seven weeks. 60. 4s. 1d."—Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality (Intr. Note. Patterson ed.).

Dry-nurse. When a superior officer does not know his duty, and is instructed in it by an inferior officer, he is said to be dry-nursed. The inferior nurses the superior, as a dry-nurse rears an infant.

Dry Rot. The spontaneous rot of timber or wall-paper, not unfrequently produced by certain fungi attaching themselves thereto. It is called dry rot because the wood is not purposely exposed to wet, although, without doubt, damp from defective ventilation is largely present, and the greenness of wood employed contributes greatly to the decay.

Dry Sea (A). A sandy desert. The camel is the ship of the desert. We read of the Persian sea of sand.

"The see that men sippen the bravely see, that is alle gravalle and solde with outen any drope of watre."—Mandeville: Travels.

Dry Shave (A). A shave without soaping the face; to scrape the face with a piece of iron hoop; to scratch the face; to box it and bruise it. Sometimes it means to beat and bruise generally; ill usage.

"The fellow will get a dry shave."—Peter Pindar: Great Dry and Little Wool, Ep. I.

"I'll shave her, like a punished soldier, dry."—Peter Pindar: The Lusied, canto li.

Dry Style (of writing). Without pathos, without light and shade; dull level, and unamusing.

Dry Wine. Opposed to sweet or fruity wine. In sweet wine some of the sugar is not yet decomposed; in dry wine all the sugar has been converted into alcohol. The doctoring of wine to improve its quality is called dosage.

"Upon the nature and amount of the dosage, the character of the wine (whether it be dry or sweet, light or strong) very much depends."—Vinetelli: Facts about Champagne, chap. v. p. 39.

Dryads. Nymphs of the trees. (Greek, dréa, any forest tree.) They were supposed to live in the trees and die when the trees died. Eurydicos, the wife of Orpheus (2 syll.) the poet, was a dryad.

Dryasdust (Rev. Dr.). A heavy, plodding author, very prosy, very dull, and very learned; an antiquary. Sir Walter Scott employs the name to bring out the prefatory matter of some of his novels.

"The Prussian Dryasdust . . . excels all other 'Dryasdusts' yet known."—Cuthg.

Dualism. A system of philosophy which refers all things that exist to two ultimate principles. It is eminently a Persian doctrine. The Orphic poets made the ultimate principles of all things to be Water and Night, or Time and Necessity. In theology the Manichean doctrine is dualistic. In modern philosophy it is opposed to monism (q.v.), and insists that the creator and creation, mind and body, are distinct entities. That creation is not deity, and that mind is not an offspring of matter. (See Monism.)
Dub. To make a knight by giving him a blow. Dr. Toler says, “The ancient method of knightings was by a box on the ear, implying that it would be the last he would receive, as he would henceforth be free to maintain his own honour.” The present ceremony is to tap the shoulder with a sword. (Anglo-Saxon, dubbin, to strike with a blow.)

Dub Up! Pay down the money. A dub is an Anglo-Indian coin, hence “down with your dubs,” money down. A “doubloun” is a double pistole.

Dublin (the Irish dubh-linn, the “black pool”). The chief part of the city stands on land reclaimed from the river Liffey or the sea. True as the Diril is in Dublin city. (Burns: Death and Dr. Hornbook.) Probably Burns refers to the Scandinavian name Dirvl, which suggested first Diril and then Diril or Deil.

Dubs in “marbles” is a contraction of double or doublets. Thus, if a player knocks two marbles out of the ring, he cries “dubs”, before the adversary cries “no dubs,” and claims them both.

Ducat. A piece of money; so called from the legend on the early Sicilian pieces: Sit tibi Christe, datis quem tu regis, sed ducatun (May this duchy [ducal-ity] which you rule be devoted to you, O Christ).

Duchesse (2 syll.). Le père Duchêne, Jacques Réuné Herbet, chief of the Cordelier Club in the French Revolution, the members of which were called Hébertists. He was called “Father Duchêne,” from the name of his vile journal. (1755-1791.)

Duchess. The wife or widow of a duke; but an old woman is often facetiously termed an old duchess or a regular old duchess. The longevity of the peers and peeresses is certainly very striking.

Duck. A lame duck. A stock-jobber who will not, or cannot, pay his losses. He has to “waddle out of the alley like a lame duck.”

Like a dying duck in a thunderstorm. Quite chop-fallen.

To get a duck. A contraction of duck’s egg or 0, in cricket. A player who gets no run off his bat is marked down 0.

Duck Lane. A row for old and second-hand books which stood formerly near Smithfield, but has given way to city improvements. It might be called the Holywell Street of Queen Anne’s reign.

“Scotsmen and Thomists now in peace remain Amidst their kindred convenies in Duck Lane.”
Pope: Essay on Criticism.

Duck’s Egg. Broke his duck’s egg. Took his first school prize. In cricket a “duck’s egg” or 0 in a score is broken by a run.

What a proud and happy day it was to Lucy when little Herbit, in public-school parlance, broke his duck’s egg—otherwise, took his first prize.—A Néfril of Tristiny, chap. 12.

Duck’s-foot Lane [City.] A corruption of Duke’s Foot Lane; so called from the Dukes of Suffolk, whose manor-house was there.

Ducks and Drakes. The ricocheting or rebounding of a stone thrown from the hand to skim along the surface of a pond or river.

To make ducks and drakes of one’s money. To throw it away as stones with which “ducks and drakes are made on water. The allusion is to the sport of throwing stones to skim over water for the sake of seeing them ricocheting or rebounding.

What drenched states are best to make On watery surface duck and drake.”
Butler: Hudibras, ii. 3.

“Mr. Locke Harper found out, a month after his marriage, that somebody had made ducks and drakes of his wife’s money.”—Dinah M. Craik: Apothecary’s Husband, chap. xxx.

Duckie. Diminutive of “duck,” a term of endearment = darling or beloved one. (Norwegian and Danish, duke, a doll, a baby.)

Ducking (A). A drenching. (German, dunken, to dive under water.)

Duckwood. A weed which floats on the surface of stagnant water and forms a harbour for insects which ducks feed on. Its Latin name is “Lemna;” Greek, limne (a stagnant pool).

Dude. A masher. One who renders himself conspicuous by affectation of dress, manners, and speech. The word was first familiarised in London in 1881, and is a revival of the old word dudes (clothes). We have several derivations, as dudder, one who sells dress-pieces; dudery, a rag-shop; dudder, to wrap up warmly (Hullswell), etc. It is not of American origin.

“I should just as soon expect to see Mercutio smoke a cigarette, as to find him amusing about the stage with the prancing manners of a dude.”—Jefferson: Century Magazine, January, 1880, p. 383.

Dudeism (3 syll.). The tomfoolery of a dude (2 syll.).

Dudgeon (Thre). The handle of a dagger, at one time made of box-wood root, called "dudgeon-wood;" a dagger with such a handle. Shakespeare does not say, "and on the blade of the dudgeon gouts of blood," but "on the blade and dudgeon . . .," both blade and handle.

Dudman and Ramhead. When Dudman and Ramhead meet. Never. Dudman and Ramhead (now spelt Ramhead) are two forelands on the Cornish coast, about twenty miles asunder. (See Never.)

"Make yourself scarce! depart! vanish! or we'll have you summoned before the mayor of Harrogate, and that before Dudman and Ramhead meet."—Scott: Kenilworth, iv. .

Duda. Old clothes, tattered garments (Gaelic, _dud_, a rag; Dutch, _doed_; Italian, _tovale_). A dudder or dudsman is a scarecrow, or man of straw dressed in cast off garments to frail birds; also a pedlar who sells duds or gown-pieces. (Compare the Greek _doou_, to put on _clothes_; Latin, _in-duo_, to clothe.)

Dudu. A pensive maiden of seventeen, "who never thought about herself at all." (Byron: _Don Juan_, vii. vii.)

Duende (3 syl.). A Spanish goblin or house-spirit. Calderon has a comedy called _La Donna Duenda_. (See FAIRY.)

Duenna [Lady]. The female of don. The Spanish _don_ is derived from the Latin _dominus_—a lord, a master. A duenna is the chief lady-in-waiting on the Queen of Spain; but in common parlance it means a lady who is half companion and half governess, in charge of the younger female members of a nobleman's or gentleman's family in Portugal or Spain.

"There is no duenna so rigidly prudent and extremely decorous as a superannuated coquette."—W. Irving: Sketch-Book (Spectre Bridegroom).

Duerger (2 syl.). Dwarfs who dwell in rocks and hills; noted for their strength, subtlety, magical powers, and skill in metallurgy. They are the personification of the subterranean powers of nature. According to the Gothen-German myth, the duergar were first maggots in Ymir's flesh, but afterwards assumed the likeness of men. The first duergar was Modoogner, the next Dyrin, N.B.—The Giant Ymir is Chaos. (See HELDENBUCH.)

Duessa (Double-mind or False-faith). Daughter of Falsehood and Shame, who assumes divers disguises to beguile the Red Cross Knight. At one time she takes the name of Fiella, and entices the knight into the Palace of Pride (_Lucifera_). The knight having left the palace, is overtaken by Duessa, and drinks of an enchanted fountain, which paralyses him, in which state he is taken captive by the giant Orgoglio. Prince Arthur slays the giant and rescues the knight; Duessa, being stripped of her gorgeous disguise, is found to be a hideous hag, and flees into the wilderness for concealment. She appears again in book ii. (Spenser: _Faerie Queene_, book i. 2-7; v. 3.)

Dufarge. Jacques and Madame Dufarge are the presiding genii of the Faubourg St. Antoine, and chief instigators of many of the crimes committed by the Red Republicans in Dickens's _Tale of Two Cities._

Duffer (A) now means a person easily bamboozled, one of slow wit; but originally it meant one who cheated or bamboozled. To _duff_—to cheat. Persons who sell inferior goods as "great bargains," under the pretence of their being smuggled, are duffers; so are hawkers generally. At the close of the eighteenth century passers of bad money were so called. Now the word is applied to persons taken in, and by artists to inferior pictures.

"Robinson a thorough duffer is."—Alexander Smith: Number Idyll.

Duglas, the scene of four Arthurian battles. It is a river which falls into the Ribble. Mr. Whitaker says, "six cwt. of horse-shoes were taken up from a space of ground near the spot during the formation of a canal."

Duke Coombe. William Coombe, author of _Dr. Syntax, The Derelict upon Two Sticks_, etc., who, in the days of his prosperity was noted for the splendour of his dress, the profusion of his table, and the magnificence of his deportment. Having spent all his money he turned author, but passed the last fifteen years of his life in the King's Bench. (1743-1823.)

Duke Ernest. (See ERNEST.)

Duke Humphrey. (See HUMPHREY.)

Duke Street (Strand), so named from George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham.

Duke and Duchess in _Don Quixote_, who play so many tricks on the Knight of the Woeful Countenance, were Don Carlos de Borja, Count of Ficallo, who married Donna Maria of Aragon, Duchess of Villahermosa, in whose right the Count had extensive estates on the head of the Brook; among others he had a country seat called Buxbœa, which was the place Cervantes referred to.

Duke or Darling. Heads or tails; pitch and toss. When the scandals about the Duke of York and Mrs. Clarke were the common talk of the town, the street boys, instead of crying Heads or tails, used to say Duke or Darling. (Lord Colchester: Diary, 1861.)

Duke's. A fashionable theatre in the reign of Charles II. It was situated in Portugal Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. It was named from its great patron, James, Duke of York, afterwards James II. The modern Duke's theatre.

Duke's Walk. To meet one in the Duke's Walk. An invitation to fight a duel. In the vicinity of Holyrood House is a place called the Duke's Walk, from being the favourite promenade of the Duke of York, afterwards James II., during his residence in Scotland. This walk was the common rendezvous for settling affairs of honour, as the site of the British Museum was in England.

"If a gentleman shall ask me the same question, I shall regard the incivility as equivalent to an invitation to meet him in the Duke's Walk."—Scott: Bride of Lammermoor, chap. xxxiv.

Dukeries. A district in Nottinghamshire, so called from the number of ducal residences in the vicinity, including Welbeck Abbey, Thoresby, Clumber, Worksop, Kiveton Hall, etc.

Dulcar'nein. The horns of a dilemma (or Sylogismum contrarium); at my wits' end; a puzzling question. Dulcar'nein is the Arabic dul'karnein (double-horned, having two horns). Hence the 47th proposition of the First Book of Euclid is called the Dulcar'nein, as the 5th is the yon axiornum. Alexander the Great is called Iscander Dulcar'nein, and the Macedonian era the era of Dulcar'nein. Chaucer uses the word in Troilus and Cressida, book iii. 126, 127.

"The horns of the 47th proposition are the two squares which contain the right angle. To be in Dulcar'nein. To be in a quandary, or on the horns of a dilemma. To send one to Dulcar'nein. To daze with puzzles.

Dulce Domum. The holiday song of Winchester school. Mr. Brandon says it was composed by a boy of St. Mary's College, Winchester, who was confined for misconduct during the Whitsun holidays, "as report says, tied to a pillar." On the evening preceding the Whitsun holidays, "the master, scholars, and choristers of the above college walk in procession round the pillar, chanting the six stanzas of the song." In the March number of the Gentleman's Magazine, 1796, a translation, signed "J. R.," was given of the song; and Dr. Milner thinks the original is not more than a century old. It is rather remarkable that the author has made "domum" a neuter noun. (See Anese Fidesker.)

Dulce est Desipere in Loco. It is delightful to play the fool occasionally; it is nice to throw aside one's dignity and relax at the proper time. (Horace: Odes, xii. 28.)

Dulce et Decorum est pro Patria Mori (Latin). It is sweet and becoming to die on our country's behalf, or to die for one's country.

Dulce'mer (Italian dolcimello), according to Bishop (Musical Dictionary, p. 45), is "a triangular chest strung with wires, which are struck with a little rod held in each hand;" but the word "symphonia," translated dulcimer in Daniel iii. 5, was a species of bagpipe. Fürst deduces it from the Hebrew sum (a pipe).

"The sound of cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, symphony or dulcimer, and all kinds of music."—Dan. iii. 5.

Dulc'ina. A lady-love. Taken from Don Quixote's amie du cœur. Her real name was Aldonza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcinea del Toboso.

"I must ever have some Dulcineas in my head—it harmonizes the soul."—Bérne.

Dulc'initists. Heretics who followed the teaching of Dulciu, who lived in the fourteenth century. He said that God reigned from the beginning to the coming of Messiah; and that Christ reigned from His ascension to the fourteenth century, when He gave up His dominion to the Holy Ghost. Dulcin was burnt by order of Pope Clement IV.

Dul'a. An inferior degree of worship or veneration, such as that paid by Dull Catholics to saints and angels; Hyper-dull's is a superior sort of veneration reserved for the Virgin, but that worship which is paid to God alone is called Latra. "Dulce" means that sort of veneration which slaves pay to their lords (Greek, doulos, a slave); "Latra" means that sort of veneration which mortals pay to the gods (Greek, latenō, unto worship the gods).

Dull as a Frog. A frow or fio is a kind of wedge for splitting wood. It is not a sharp-edged instrument like a chisel, but a blunt or dull one.

Dull as Ditch-water. Uninteresting, ditch-water is stagnant and has no in it.

Dullness. King of dulness. Colley
Cibber, poet laureate after Addison

God save king Cibber mounts in every boat
So when Jones block descended from hugh
I could thunder to the bottom of the sky
And the house nation cried O d may king
Log
Ps 4 Dum and took

Dum Solo (Latin). While single or unmarried.

Dum Spiro. Spero. While I live, I hope, I hope, while there's life, there's hope.

Hope while you live, while you live with the small hope while told with the hope in an hour in the hour

Dum Vivimus, Vivamus (Latin)
While we live, let us enjoy life. The motto of Dr Doddrudge's coat of arms, which he converted into the burned epitaph—

Live while you live the same would be
And seize the pleasures of the present day
Live while you live the world in your hand:
And give to God a moment and it dies

Now in my vanishing instant die
I live in pleasure when I live to that Dumachus. The impenitent thief, called Dymas in the apocryphal Gospel of Nicodemos. In Longfellow's Golden Legend, Dumachus and Titus were two of a band of robbers who attacked Joseph in his flight into Egypt. Titus said, "Let these good people go in peace," but Dumachus replied, "First let them pay for them release." Up in thus Titus gave his fellow-robbins forty gruits, and the infant Jesus said—

When thirty shekels have gone 1
1 at Jerusalem shall die
On the accursed tree
Then on my right and my left side
These thieves shall not be executed,
And Titus therefore shall abide
In Paradise with me

The Miracle Play, in

Dum-barge (A) A barge without sails, used for a pter, and not for conveying merchandise up and down a river

Dum-bell Nebula (Th) A still condensing mass, so called from being of the shape of a dumb-bell

Dum-bells. A corruption of Dumpels or Dumps, the same word as Dumplings, and meaning heavy (weights) (German and Danish, dump, heavy, dull, mound, dumpling, a heavy, misshapen pudding; dump, heavy, stupid, moroseness)
(See DUMP)

Dum-bells. In New College, Oxford, there still is an apparatus for developing the muscles similar to that which sets church-bells in motion. It consists of a fly-wheel with a weight attached, and the gymnast is carried by it up and down to bring his muscles into play. The present apparatus was substituted for it, and answers a similar purpose, though the name is greatly obscured.

Dumb-bidding. A sale by auction affected thus: The owner fixes an upset price on an article, writes it on a slip of paper, and covers the slip up. The article is then offered to the bidders, and withdrawn unless some bid reaches the upset price.

Dumb-cow (Io) To know, heat, to cook (Anglo-Indian)

Dumb Crambo. (Ye Crambo)

Dumb Dog (J) One who remains silent when he ought to speak

Dumb Ox of Cologne (J) Thomas Aquinas (1224-1274), known afterwards as "the Angelic Doctor" or "Angel of the Schools." Albertus Magnus, the Bishop of Cologne, named the "dumb ox" and said of him, "The dumb ox will on one day till the world with his labour." He was born at Naples, but was a student in the monastery of Cologne.

Dumb-waiter. A piece of dining-room furniture, fitted with shelves, to hold glasses, dishes, and plate. So called because it unawares all the pur-purposes of a waiter, and is not possessed of an insulant tongue, a lift for carrying food from kitchen to the dining-room, etc.

Dum my. In three-handed what the exposed hand is called dummy.

Dum'mies (2 syl) Empty bottles or drawers in a druggist's shop. wooden heads in a hairdresser's shop, toy figures in a tailor's shop; persons on the stage who appear before the lights, but have nothing to say. These all are dumb, actually or figuratively.

Dump. A Brazilian copper coin, worth about 2½d.; also a round flat lump of lead used on board ship for playing quoits and chuck-penny. Hence dumpy or dumpty (squat or small). An egg is called a humpty-dumpty in the nursery verses beginning with "Humpty Dumpty sat on a wall," etc.

"Death saw two players playing cards,
- But the game was not worth a dumpy.
  Hood: Death's lullaby, stanza 14.

Dumps. To be in the dumps. Out of spirits; in the "sulles." According to theymological fable, it is derived from Dumps, King of Egypt, who built a pyramid and died of melancholy. Gay's Third Pastoral is Wednesday, or the Dumps. (German, dummi, stupid, dull.)

"Why, how now, daughter Katharine? in your dumps?—Shakespeare: Taming of the Shrew, ii. 1.

Dun. One who importunes for payment of a bill (Anglo-Saxon, dunan, to din or clamour). The tradition is that it refers to Joe Dun, a famous bullfinch of Lincoln in the reign of Henry VII. The British Apollo says he was so active and dexterous in collecting bad debts that when anyone became "slow to pay" the neighbours used to say to the creditors, "Dun him" (send Dun after him).

"An Universal dunce ... is an inferior credit of some ten shillings or downwards, contracted for house hire, or per chance drinks too weak to be put in suite."—Bishop Earle: Microcosmographia (1601-1605).

Squire Dun. The hangman between Richard Branden and Jack Ketch.

"And presently a letter got,
Made of the best strong hempen leer;
And, ere a cat could lick his ear,
Had tied him up with as much art
As Dun himself could do for a heart."

Dun Cow. The dun cow of Dunsmore heath was a savage beast slain by Sir Guy, Earl of Warwick. A huge tusk, probably that of an elephant, is still shown at Harwich Castle as one of the horns of the dun-cow. (See Guy.)

The fable is that this cow belonged to a giant, and was kept on Mitchell Fold (middle fold), Shropshire. Its milk was inexhaustible; but one day an old woman who had filled her pail, wanted to fill her sieve also. This so enraged the cow, that she broke loose from the fold and wandered to Dunsmore heath, where she was slain by Guy of Warwick.

—Isaac Taylor, in his Words and Places (p. 269), says the dun cow is a corruption of the Dena Gau or Danish settlement in the neighbourhood of Warwick. Gau, in German, means region, country. If this explanation is correct, the great achievement of Guy was a victory over the Danes, and taking from them their settlement near Warwick.

Dun in the Mire. To draw Dun out of the mire. To lend a helping hand to one in distress. The allusion is to an English game, explained by Mr. Gifford in his edition of Ben Jonson, vii. 283. A log of wood is brought into a room. The log, called Dun, is supposed to have fallen into the mire, and the players are to pull him out. Every player does all he can to obstruct the others, and as often as possible the log is made to fall on someone's toes. Constant allusion is made to this game.

"Sires, what? Dun is in the mire."—Chaucer: *Prologue to Canterbury Tales.

"If thou art dun, we'll draw thee from the mire."
  Shakespeare: *Romeo and Juliet. i. 4.

"Well done, my masters, lend your hands
Draw Dun out of the ditch.
Draw, pull, help all, no, no; well done."
  Duchess of Suffolk (1481).

Dunce. A dolt; a stupid person. The word is taken from Duns Scotus, the learned schoolman and great supporter of the immaculate conception. His followers were called Dunscers. Tyncladin says, when they saw that their hair-splitting divinity was giving way to modern theology, "the old barking curs raged in every pulpit" against the classics and new notions, so that the name indicated an opponent to progress, to learning, and hence a dunce.

"He know what's what, and that's as high
As metaphysic we can fly . . . .
A second Thomas, or at once
To name them all, another Dunce."
  Butler: * Hudibras, i. 1."

Dunciad. (See ABBERDAN, ARCADIAN, BGOTTIAN.)

Dunciad. The duncé-epic, a satire by Alexander Pope. Euden, the poet lurateau, being dead, the goddess of Dulness elects Colley Cibber to be his successor. The installation is celebrated by games, the most important being the proposal to read, without sleeping, two voluminous works—one in verse and the other in prose; as everyone falls asleep, the games come to an end. King Cibber is now taken to the temple of Dulness, and is lulled to sleep on the lap of the goddess; and, during his slumber, sees in a vision the past, present, and future triumphs of the empire. Finally, the Dunderhead. A blockhead, or, rather, a muddle-headed person. Dunder is the less or dregs of wine, etc.; more correctly, the overflow of fermented liquors (yeast). (Spanish, undar, to overflow or froth over.)

"The use of Dunder in the making of rum answers the purpose of yeast in the fermentation of flour."—Edwards: West Indies.

Dundreary (Lord) (3 syll.) The impersonation of a good-natured, indolent, blundering, empty-headed swell. The chief character in Tom Taylor's dramatic piece called Our American Cousin. Mr. Sothern created the character of Lord Dundreary by the power of his conception and the genius of his acting. (See Brother Sam.)

Dungaree. A coarse blue cloth worn by sailors; coarse and vulgar. Dungaree is the Wapping of Bombay.

Dunghill! Coward! Villain! This is a cockpit phrase; all cocks, except gamecocks, being called dunghills.

"Out, dunghill! dar'st thou brave a nobleman?"

Shakespeare: King John, iv. 3.

That is, Dare you, a dunghill cock, brave a thoroughbred gamecock?

Dunghill. Thou hast it, ad dunghill, at thy fingers' ends. To this Holinshes replies: "Oh, I smell false Latin; 'dunghill' for 'enygere.'" (Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, v. 1.)

Dunkers. (See Tuners.)

Dunmow. To eat Dunmow bacon. To live in conjugal unity, without even wishing the marriage knot to be less firmly tied. The allusion is to the institution of Robert Fitzwalter, between 1244 and 1772 eight claimants have been admitted to eat the fish. Their names merit immortality: 1445. Richard Wright, labourer, Borough, Norwich.

1467 Steven Samuel, of Little Ays ton, Essex.

1510. Thomas Ley, fuller, Coggeshall, Essex.

1701. William and Jane Parsley, butcher, Much-Easton; Essex. Same year, John and Ann Reynolds, Hatfield Regis.

1761. Thomas Shakeshaft, woolcomber, Weathersfield, Essex.

1763. Name unknown!

1772. John and Susan Gilder, Tarring, Essex.

The attempt to revive this "premium for humming" is a mere "get-up" for the benefit of the town.

"Ah, madam! I cease to be mistaken; Few married fowl perk Dunmow bacon." Prior: Turtle and Sparrows, 333.

Dunmow ditch. The oath administered was in the doggerel subjoined:

"You shall swear, by the custom of our communion, That you never made any nuptial transgression Since you were married man and wife, By household braves or contentious strife: Or, since the parish clerk said 'Amen,' Wished yourself as unmarried again; Or, in a twelvemonth and a day, Repented not in thought any way. If to these terms, without all fear, Of our own accord you will freely swear, A gallon of bacon you shall receive, And hear it hence with our good hear.

For this is our custom at Dunmow well known— The sport is ours, but the bacon's your own."

Duns Scotus. A schoolman, called Duns from Dunce in Berwickshire. (1265—1308.) Not John Scotus, Ereghén, the schoolman, who died a.D. 875.

Dunstable. Bailey, as if he actually believed it, gives the etymology of this word Dun's stable: adding Duns or "Dunus was a robber in the reign of Henry I., who made it dangerous for travellers to pass that way." (Dunus or dun tavell, our table—i.e. the tablo-land or flat of the hills.)

Downright Dunstable. (See Downright.)

Plain as the road to Dunstable; or, as Shakespeare says, "Plain as way to parish church." The road leading to Dunstable is the confluence of many leading to London, but the play is on the word dune.

Dunstan (St.). Patron saint of goldsmiths, being himself a noted worker in gold. He is represented generally in pontifical robes, but carrying a pair of pincers in his right hand. The pontifical refer to his office as Archbishop of Canterbury, and the pincers to the legend of his holding the Devil by the nose till he promised never to tempt him again.

St. Dunstan and the devil. Dunstan was a painter, jeweller, and blacksmith. Being expelled from court, he built a cell near Glastonbury church, and there he worked at his handicrafts. It was in this cell that tradition says the Devil had a gossip with the saint through the lattice window. Dunstan went on talking till his tongs were red hot, when he turned round suddenly and caught his Satanic Majesty by the nose. One can trace in this legend the notion that all knowledge belonged to the Black Art; that the "saints" are always more than conquerors over the spirits of evil; and the singular cunning which our forefathers so delighted to honour.

Duodecimo. A book whose sheets are folded into twelve leaves each. This word, which differs from both the Italian and French, is from the Latin duodecim (twelve). It is now called twelvemo, from the contraction 12mo. The term is still applied to books that are the same size as the old duodecimo, irrespective of the number of leaves into which the sheet is folded.

A man un duodecimo is a dwarf. (See Decimo.)

Duomo (The). The cathedral.

"The supreme executive of Florence suspended Savonarola from preaching in the 'Duomo.'"—Sympson: Renaissance in Italy.

Dup is do up. Thus Ophelia says, in one of her snatches, he "dup the chamber door," i.e. did up or pushed up the latch, in order to open the door, that he might "let in the maid." (Hamlet, iv. 1). A portcullis and some other doors were lifted up or dupped.

"I hope weene the porter are drunk. Will they not dup the gate to-day."—Edwards: Daemon and Fatales (111).

Dupes. (See DAY OF THE DUPES.)

Durandana or Durin'dana. Orlando's sword, given him by his cousin Malagigi. It once belonged to Hector, and was made by the fairies. It could cleave the Fyreneus at a blow. N.B.—In French romance Orlando is called Roland, Malagigi Maugis, and the sword durandal or durin dal. (See SWORD.)

"Nor plaited abed, nor tempered casque defends,

Du'randartha. A knight who fell at Roncesvalles, cousin to Montesi'nos. The tale says he loved Belerma, whom he served seven years, at the expiration of which time he was slain. In his last breath he told Montesi'nos to take his heart and give it to Belerma. He is described by Lewis as

"Sweet in manner, fair in favour,

Mild in temper, fierce in fight."—

Durante. Durante tene placito (Latin). During pleasure.

Durante minore estate (Latin). During minority.

Durante viduitate (Latin). During widowhood.

Durante vita (Latin). For life.

Durbar (Indian word). A levee.

"Durbar which might rival in splendour of colour and whoredom the glories of the court of Byzantium."—Mccarthy: England under Gladstone, chap. iv. p. 80.

Dur'den (Dame). A notable housewife. Dame Durden, of the famous English song, kept five serving girls to carry the milking pails, and also kept five serving men to use the spade and flail. The five men loved the five maids.

"Twas Moll and Bet, and Doll and Kate, and Dorothy Draggletail;

And John and Dick, and Joe and Jack, and Humphrey with his ball."—Anon.

Dürer (Albert), of Nürnberg, called by his countrymen "the prince of artists," and by many the "Chaucer of painting." (1471-1528.)

* Dürer's portraits of Charlemagne and other emperors are unrivalled; but Lucas Cranach's (1472-1553) portraits of Luther and other reformers are said to run them very close in merit.

Duresley. You are a man of Duresley, i.e. a great liar and cheat. Duresley is a market-town in Gloucestershire, famous for its broadcloth manufactory. Now called Dursley. (See Fuller: Worthies.) The word "cabbage," connected with tailors, seems to confirm the notion that our forefathers had no very high opinion of their honesty.

Durham Book. By Eadfrid, Bishop of Lindisfarne, who died in 721, one of the most splendid examples of illumination in the world.

Durham Mustard. So called from the residence of Mrs. Clements, who first conceived the idea of grinding mustard in a mill, instead of pounding it in a mortar. George I. stamped it with his approval, hence the pots labelled "Durham mustard" bear the royal initials in a medallion.

Dus or Dance. The chief god of the Brigan'tes, one of whose altars, bearing an inscription, was discovered at Grestland. (Camden: Britannia.)

Du'aiens. The name given by the Gauls to those demons that produce nightmares.

"Desmones quos 'duricius' Gallos nuncupant."—St. Augustine: De Civitate Dei, chap. xxiii.

Dust. Money; so called because it is made of gold-dust. It is said that Dean Swift took for the text of a charity sermon, "He who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord." Having thrice repeated his text, he added, "Now, brethren, if you like the security, down with your dust." That ended his sermon.
Dustman. The wild Irish peasantry believe that dust is raised on roads by fairies on a journey, and raise their hats to it, saying, "God speed you, gentlemen." The Arabs think the whirlwind and waterspout are caused by evil jinns.

I'll dust your jacket for you. Give you a good beating. The allusion is to dusting carpets, etc., by beating them with a stick.

To raise a dust, To kick up a dust. To make a commotion or disturbance.

To throw dust in one's eyes. To mislead. The allusion is to a Mahometan practice of casting dust into the air for the sake of "confounding" the faith. This was done by Mahomet on two or three occasions, as in the battle of Horsein; and the Koran refers to it when it says, "Neither didest thou, O Mahomet, cast dust into their eyes; but it was God who confounded them." But the following incident will suffice: One day the Korishites surrounded the house of Mahomet, resolved to murder him. They peeped through the crevice of his chamber-door, and saw him lying asleep. Just at this moment his son-in-law Ali opened the door silently and threw into the air a handful of dust. Immediately the conspirators were confounded. They mistook Ali for Mahomet, and Mahomet for Ali; allowed the prophet to walk through their midst uninjured, and laid hands on Ali. No sooner was Mahomet safe, than their eyes were opened, and they saw their mistake.

"When the English king pursued the Imam who had stolen the daughter of Allah, Allah threw dust in his eyes to check his pursuit."—Legend at Sari (respecting the beauty of the Georgians).

Dustman has arrived (The), or "The sandman is about." It is bedtime, for the children rub their eyes, as if dust or sand was in them.*

Dusty. Well, it is none so dusty, or Not so dusty. I don't call it bad; rather smart. Here dusty is the opposite of neat, and neat = spruce. "None so dusty," or "Not so dusty" means therefore, Not so unspruce, or rather smart.*

Dusty-foot. (See Pre Poudre.)

Dutch. The Dutch have taken Holland. A quiz when anyone tells what is well known as a piece of wonderful news. Similar to Queen Bass (or Queen Anne) is dead; the Ark rested on Mount Ararat; etc.

Dutch Auction. An "auction" in which the bidders decrease their bids till they come to the minimum price. Dutch gold is no gold at all; Dutch courage is no real courage; Dutch concert is no music at all, but mere hubbub; and Dutch auction is no auction, or increase of bids, but quite the contrary.

Dutch Clocks. i.e. German clocks, chiefly made in the Black Forest. As many as 180,000 are exported annually from Friburg. (German, Deutsch, German.)

"A woman, that is like a German clock. Still a reposing, ever out of frame, And never going right."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, iii. 1.

Dutch Comfort. 'Tis a comfort it was no worse. The comfort derivable from the consideration that how bad soever the evil which has befallen you, a worse evil is at least conceivable.

Dutch Concert. A great noise and uproar, like that made by a party of Dutchmen in sundry stages of intoxication, some singing, others quarrelling, specchifying, wrangling, and so on.

Dutch Courage. The courage excited by drink; pot valour.

"In the Dutch wars (in the time of Charles 11.), . . . the captain of the Hollander man-of-war, when about to engage with our ships, usually set . . . a hoghead of brandy aroach before the mast, and bat the men drink . . . and our men fell the force of the brandy to their cost."—Notes and Queries (Oct. 15, 1888, p. 394).

Dutch Gleeck. Tippling. Gleeck is a game, and the phrase means the game loved by Dutchmen is drinking.

"Nor could be partaker of any of the good cheer except it were the liquor part of it, which they call 'Dutch Gleeck.'"—Gayton.

Dutch Gold. Deutsche or German gold. An alloy of copper and zinc, invented by Prince Rupert of Bavaria.

Dutch Nightingales. Frogs. Similarly, Cambridgeshire nightingales; Liège nightingales, etc.

Dutch School of painting is a sort of "pre-Raphaelite" exactness of detail without selection. It is, in fact, photographing exactly what appears before the artist, as faithfully as his art will allow. The subjects are generally the lower classes of social life, as pottage scenes, drunken orgies, street groups, Dutch houses, etc., with landscapes and still-life. The greatest of the Dutch masters are: for portraits, Rembrandt, Bol, Flinck, Hals, and Vanderhelft; for conversation pieces, Gerhard Douw, Tenburg, Metzu, Miers, and Netscher; for low life, Ostade, Brower, and Jan Steen; for landscapes, Ruysdael, Hobbema, Cuyp, Vanderneer, Berchem, and A. Both; for battle scenes, Wouverman* and Huchtenburg; for marine pieces, Vendevelde and Bakhuizen; for still-life and flowers, Kalf, A. van Utrecht, Van Huysem, and De Heem.

Dutch Toys, chiefly made in Moeinigen, part of the duchy of Coburg-Gotha. (Dutch, i.e. Deutch, German.)

Dutch Uncle. I will talk to you like a Dutch uncle. Will reprove you smartly. Uncle is the Latin notion of patr us, an uncle, a severe guardian, or stern castigator. Hence Horace, 3 Od. xii. 3, "Metueles patr us verbera linguas" (dreaded the castigations of an uncle's tongue); and 2 Sat. iii. 88, "Ne sis patr us wilt:" (Don't come the uncle over me).

Dutchman. I'm a Dutchman if I do. A strong refusal. During the rivalry between England and Holland, the word Dutch was synonymous with all that was false and hateful, and when a man said, "I would rather be a Dutchman than do what you ask me," he used the strongest term of refusal that words could express.

If not, I' am a Dutchman, means, I will do it or I will call myself a Dutchman.

Well, I'm a Dutchman! An exclamation of strong incredulity.

Duty means what is due or owing, a debt which should be paid. Thus obedience is the debt of citizens to rulers for protection, and service is the debt of persons employed for wages received.

"Strictly considered, all duty is owed originally to God only; but... duties to God may be distributed... into duties towards self, towards mankind, and towards God." - Gregory: Christian Ethics, part ii. division 1. p. 172.

Duum'vir (3 syl.) or Duuma Vīrī. Certain Roman officers who were appointed in pairs, like our London sheriffs. The chief were the two officers who had charge of the Sibyl, the two who had the supervision of the municipal cities, and the two who were charged with naval matters.

Dwarf (The). Richard Gibson, painter (1615-1690), a page of the backstairs in the court of Charles I. He married Anne Shepherd, a dwarf also, and the King honoured the wedding with his presence. Each measured three feet ten inches.

The Black Dwarf. A fairy of the most malignant character; a genuine northern Duergar, and once held by the dalesmen of the border as the author of all the mischief that befall their flocks and herds. Sir Walter Scott has a novel so called, in which the "black dwarf" is introduced under the names of Sir Edward Mauley; Elshander, the recluse; Annie Elsie; and the Wise Wight of Mucklestone Moor.

Dwarf Albertich (in the Nibelungen Lied) is the guardian of the famous "hoard" won by Siegfried from the Nibelungs. The dwarf is twice vanquished by the hero, who gets possession of his Turn-kappé (cloak of invisibility). (See Elberich.)

Dwarf Peter (das Peter Mauchen). An allegorical romance by Ludwig Tieck. The dwarf is a castle spectre that advises and aids the family; but all his advice turns out evil, and all his aid productive of trouble. The dwarf represents that corrupt part of human nature called by St. Paul the "law in our members which wars against the law of our minds, and brings us into captivity to the law of sin."

Dwarfs (under three feet in height).

Andromeda, 2 ft. 4 in. One of Julia's free maids. (See below, Cononopan.)

Aréthuhas, the poet was so small that Athenians said, "no one could see him."

Berenice, or Nicholas Ferry, 2 ft. 9 in. A native of France (1714-1755). He had a brother and sister, both dwarfs.

Boruvmla (Count Joseph), 2 ft. 4 in. At the age of twenty. (1730-1757.)

Buckingham (Matthew), a German, born 1674. He was born without hands, legs, or feet. Facsimiles of his writing are amongst the Harleian MSS.

Che-Mah (a Chinese), 2 ft. 1 in. Weight 53 lbs. Exhibited in London in 1850.

Coloetis (Boche), 2 ft. 1 in. Weight 85 lbs. Exhibited in London in 1851.

Cononopan (Cononopan), 2 ft. 4 in. One of the dwarfs of Julia, niece of Albertich. (See above, Andromeda.)

Coppernix, the dwarf of the Princess of Wales, mother of George III. The last court dwarf in England.

Ch'ach'amu (Caroline). Born at Palermo; 2 ft. 8 in. at death. (1814-24.) Exhibited in Bond Street, London, 1824.

Drucker of Ducker (John), 2 ft. 6 in. An Englishman (1690).

Fairy Queen (The), 1 ft. 4 in. Weight 4 lbs. Exhibited in Regent Street, London, 1830. Her feet were less than two inches.

Gibson (Richard), a good portrait painter. His wife's maiden name was Anne Shepherd. Each measured 2 ft. 14 in. Walker sang their praises. (In the reign of Charles I.)

Hudson (Sir Jeffrey). Born at Berwick, Berwickshire; 2 ft. 1 in. at the age of thirty (1660-70).

Jarrish (John), 2 ft. Page of honour to Queen Mary (1562-56).

Lulken (William), 2 ft. 2 in. Weight 57 lbs. Exhibited at Astley's in 1790.

M'rus, 2 ft. 2 in. Weight 17 lbs. The dwarf of the Emperor Augustus.

Marine (Lizzie), 2 ft. 9 in. Weight 45 lbs.

Midgert, the Lucas Zarate, the eldest sister, 1 ft. 8 in. Weight 43 lbs. At the age of eighteen. Her sister was a little taller. Exhibited in London, 1801.

Miller (Miss), of Virginia, 2 ft. 2 in.

Mith (General), 1 ft. 6 in. (Weight 6 lbs.) at the age of seventeen. Exhibited in London, 1801.

Pflap (Simon). A Dutch dwarf, 2 ft. 4 in., weight 27 lbs.

MURAT (King of Naples): "Soldiers, save my face; aim at my heart. Farewell."

(Napoleon I.): "Mon Dieu! Je m'abandonne."

(Napoleon III.): "Were you at Sedan?"

(To Dr. Connois.)
Dynamite (3 syl.). An explosive compound consisting of some absorbent (as infusorial earth) saturated with nitroglycerine. (Greek, δαμαίνω, power.)

'S Dynamite Saturday. January 24th, 1885, when great damage was done to the Houses of Parliament and the Tower of London by explosions of dynamite. The Law Courts and some other public buildings were to have been attacked by the dynamiters, but happily were well guarded. (See CLAN-NA-GAEL.)

Dytch Street, Bloomsbury Square, London; now called George Street, St. Giles. Made familiar by a well-known song in Bomastes Furioso:

"My lodging is in heather lane,
A parlour that's next to the sky...

Rhodes.

Dysce. The deities who conduct the souls of the deceased to the palace of Odin. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Dy'vour. The deutor's badge in Scotland (French, drover, to own). Bankrupts were compelled to wear an upper garment, half yellow and half brown, with a parti-coloured cap. This law was abolished in the reign of William IV.

Dyx'enas Day. Tithe day. (Portuguese, diz'imas, tithes; Law Latin, decima.)

E.

E. This letter represents a window; in Hebrew it is called he (a window).

E.G. or e.g. (Latin for exempli gratia). By way of example; for instance.

E Pluribus Unum (Latin). One unity composed of many parts. The motto of the United States of America.

Eager or engra. Sharp, keen, said; the French aigre. (Latin, crude form, acer - 'acerb', sharp.)

"It doth posses
And eul, like eager droppins into milk."

Shakespeare: Hamlet, i. 5.

"Ye'x him with eager words.

Shakespeare: Henry VI., ii. 4.

Eagle (in royal banners). It was the ensign of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and Seleucidès. The Romans adopted it in conjunction with other devices, but Marcius made it the ensign of the legion, and confined the other devices to the cohorts. The French under the Empire assumed the same device.

Eagle (in Christian art) is emblematic of St. John the Evangelist, because, like the eagle, he looked on "the sun of glory"; the eagle was one of the four figures which made up the cherub (Esck. i. 10).
Eagle (in funerals). The Romans used to let an eagle fly from the funeral pile of a deceased emperor. Dryden alludes to this custom in his stanzas on Oliver Cromwell after his funeral, when he says, "Officier haste did let too soon the sacred eagle fly."

Eagle (in heraldry) signifies fortitude.

Eagle (for lecterns in churches). The eagle is the natural enemy of the serpent. The two Testaments are the two outspread wings of the eagle.

* Pliny in his Natural History (book x, chap. 3) enumerates six kinds of eagles: (1) Melenactos, (2) Pygargus, (3) Morphnos, which Homer (Iliad, xxiv. 315) calls perknos, (4) Percniporos, (5) Gnesios, the royal eagle, and (6) Haliecetus, the sparrow.

Eagle (in phrases). Thy youth is renewed like the eagle's (Ps. ciii. 5). This refers to the superstition feigned by poets that every ten years the eagle soars into the fiery region, and plunges thence into the sea, where, moulding its feathers, it acquires new life.

she saw where he upstartet hir self out of the well . . .

As eagle break out of the ocean wave,

Where he hath left his plumes all hony dry,

And decks himself with feathers youthful gay.

Spenser: Faerie Queen, i. 11. 31.

Eagle, a public-house sign, is in honour of Queen Mary, whose badge it was. She put it on the dexter side of the shield, and the sun on the sinister—a conjugal compliment which gave great offence to her subjects.

The Golden Eagle and the Spread Eagle are commemorative of the crusades; they were the devices of the emperors of the East.

Eagle. The Spread Eagle. A device of the old Roman or Eastern Empire, brought over by the crusaders.

Eagle of the doctors of France. Pierre d’Ailly, a French cardinal and great astrologer, who calculated the horoscope of our Lord, and maintained that the stars foretold the great deluge. (1350-1425.)

Eagle of Brittany. Bertrand Duguesclin, Constable of France. (1320-1380.)

Eagle of Meaux [me]. Jacques Benigne Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, the grandest and most sublime of the pulpits of France. (1627-1704.)

Eagle. The two-headed eagle. Austria, Prussia (representing Germany), and Russia have two-headed eagles, one facing to the right and the other to the left. The one facing to the west indicates direct succession from Charlemagne, crowned the sixty-ninth emperor of the Romans from Augustus. In Russia it was Ivan Basiliwits who first assumed the two-headed eagle, when, in 1472, he married Sophia, daughter of Thomas Paleologus, and niece of Constantine XIV., the last Emperor of Byzantium. The two heads symbolise the Eastern or Byzantine Empire and the Western or Roman Empire.

Eagle-stones or Actites (aerisy). Yellow clay ironstones supposed to have sanative and magical virtues. They are so called because they are found in eagles’ nests. Epiphanius says, "In the interior of Scythia there is a valley inaccessible to man, down which slaughtered lambs are thrown. The small stones at the bottom of the valley adhere to these pieces of flesh, and eagles, when they carry away the flesh to their nests, carry the stones with it." The story of Sindbad in the Valley of Diamonds will occur to the readers of this article (Epiphanius: De duodecim gemmis, etc., p. 30; 1743).

It is said that without these stones eagles cannot hatch their eggs.

Ear. (Anglo-Saxon, ēor.)

A deaf ear. One that refuses to listen; as if it heard not.

Bow down Thine ear. Condescend to hear or listen. (Ps. xxxi. 2.)

By ear. To sing or play by ear means to sing or play without knowledge of musical notes, depending on the ear only.

Give ear to . . . Listen to; give attention to.

I am all ear. All attention.

And look in strains that might create a soul under the rise of death.

Milton: Comus, 574.

I’ll send you off with a flea in your ear. With a cuff or box of the ear. The allusion is to domestic animals, who are sometimes greatly annoyed with these "tiny tormentors." There seems also to be a pun implied—flea and flee.

The French equivalent is "Mettre la pues à l’oreille," to give one a good jolatation.

In at one ear, and out at the other. Forgotten as soon as heard.

No ear. A bad ear for musical intonations; "ear-blind" or "sound-blind."

Dionysius’s Ear. A bell-shaped chamber connected by an underground passage with the king’s palace. Its object was that the tyrant of Syracuse might overhear whatever was passing in the prison.

Ear-finger. The little finger, which is thrust into the ear if anything tickles it.

Ear-marked. Marked so as to be recognised. The allusion is to marking cattle and sheep on the ear, by which they may be readily recognised.

"The increase [of these wild cattle] were duly branded and ear-marked each year."—Sembert Century (May, 1898), p. 765.

"The late president [Balæone] took on board a large quantity of silver, which had been ear-marked for a particular purpose."—Newspaper paragraphs, Sept. 1, 1891.

Ear-shot. Within ear-shot. Within hearing. The allusion is palpable.

Ears.

About one's ears. Causing trouble. The allusion is to a house falling on one, or a hornet's nest buzzing about one's head.

Bring the house about your ears. Set the whole family against you.

"If your ears burn, people say some one is talking of you." This is very old, for Pliny says, "When our ears do grow wide and tingle, some do talk of us in our absence." Shakespeare, in Much Ado About Nothing (iii. 1), makes Beatrice say, when Ursula and Hero had been talking of her, "What fire is in mine ears?" Sir Thomas Browne ascribes this conceit to the superstition of guardian angels, who touch the right ear if the talk is favourable, and the left if otherwise. This is done to cheer or warn.

"One ear tingleth; some there be That are stung not at all."—Herbert: Hermetica.

Little pitchers have large ears. (See Pitchers.)

Mince ears hast thou bored. Thou hast accepted me as thy bond-slave for life. If a Hebrew servant declined to go free after six years' service, the master was to bring him to the doorpost, and bore his ear through with an awl, in token of his voluntary servitude. (Exod. xxxi. 6.)

Over head and ears (in love, in debt, etc.). Wholly, desperately.

"He is over head and ears in love with the maid. He loves her better than his own life!"—Terence in English.

To give one's ears [to obtain an object]. To make a considerable sacrifice for the purpose. The allusion is to the ancient practice of cutting off the ears of those who loved their own offensive opinions better than their own ears.

To have itching ears. Loving to hear news or current gossip. (2 Tim. iv. 3.)

To prick up one's ears. To listen attentively to something not expected, as horses prick up their ears at a sudden sound.

"At which, like unbacked colts, they pricked their ears."—Shakespeare: The Tempest, iv. 1.

To set people together by the ears. To create ill-will among them; to set them quarrelling and pulling each other's ears.

"When civil dungeons first grew high, And men fell out, they knew not why: When hard words, jealousies, and fears, Set folks together by the ears."—Butler: Hudibras (The opening).

To tickle the ears. To gratify the ear either by pleasing sounds or flattering words.

Walls have ears. Things uttered in secret get rumoured abroad. Chaucer says, "That field hath eyen, and the wood hath ears." (Cant. Canterbury Tales, v. 1,624.)

Ears to ear Bible (The). (1810.)

"Who hath ears to ear, let him hear." (Matt. xiii. 43.) (See Bible.)

Earing. Ploughing. (Anglo-Saxon, e_erian, to plough; Latin, are.)

"And yet there are five years, in which there shall neither be earing nor harvest."—Genesis xliv. 6.

"In earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest."—Exodus xxxiv. 21.

Earl (Anglo-Saxon, e_arl, a man of position, in opposition to coerl, a churl, or Freeman of the lowest rank; Danish, far). William the Conqueror tried to introduce the word Count, but did not succeed, although the wife of an earl is still called a countess.

"The sheriff is called in Latin vice-comes, as being the deputy of the earl or comice, to whom the custody of the shire is said to have been committed."—Blackstone: Commentaries, book i. chap. ix. p. 236.

Earl of Mar's Grey Breeks. The 21st Foot are so called because they wore grey breeches when the Earl of Mar was their colonel. (1678-1686.)

The 21st Foot is now called the "Royal Scots Fusiliers."

Early to Bed. "Early to bed and early to rise, makes a man healthy, wealthy, and wise."

"Lever à cinq, diner à neuf, Supper à cing, coucheur à neuf. Fuit vivre d'ans romante neuf." (The elder of the two.)

"Lever à six, diner à dix, Supper à six, coucheur à dix, Fait vivre l'homme dix fois dix." (The younger of the two.)

Earth. To gather strength from the earth. The reference is to Antioch, son of Poseidon and Ge, a giant and wrestler of Libby (Africa). So long as he touched the earth his strength was irresistible. Hercules, knowing this, lifted him into the air and crushed him to death. Near the town of Tinga, in Mauritania, is a hill in the shape of a man, and called The hill of Antaeus. Tradition says it is the wrestler’s tomb. (See MALEGEA.)

Earthmen (The). Gnomes and fairies of the mines: a solemn race, who nevertheless can laugh most heartily and dance most merrily.

“Ye feeblest God of the mines for men; we put the oar in readiness for the miners.”—Benedict and Bice: Titanico’s Funeral.

Earthquakes. According to Indian mythology, the world rests on the head of a great elephant, and when, for the sake of rest, the huge monster refreshes itself by moving its head, an earthquake is produced. The elephant is called “Muha-pudma.”

“Having penetrated to the south, they saw the great elephant Muha-pudma, equal to a huge mountain, sustaining the earth with its head.”—Hansayana (section xxxiii.).

The Lamas say that the earth is placed on the back of a gigantic frog, and when the frog stretches its limbs or moves its head, it shakes the earth. Other Eastern mythologists place the earth on the back of a tortoise.

Greek and Roman mythologists ascribe earthquakes to the restlessness of the giants which Jupiter buried under high mountains. Thus Virgil (Enniid, iii. 578) ascribes the eruption of Elma to the giant Enceladus.

Earwig. A corruption of the Saxon ear-wigga (ear-insect); so called because the hind wings resemble in shape the human ear. The word has engendered the notion that these insects are apt to get into our ears.

An earwig, metaphorically, is one who whispers into our ears all the news and scandal going, in order to curry favour; a flatterer.

“Court earwigs haunt from your ears.”—Political Ballads.

Ease. (Anglo-Saxon, eath; Latin, oti-um.)

At ease. Without pain or anxiety.

Ill at ease. Uneasy, not comfortable, anxious.

Stand at ease! A command given to soldiers to rest for a time. The “gentlemen stood at ease” means in an informal manner.

To ease one of his money or purse. To steal it. (See LITTLE EASE.)

Ease (Chapel of). (See CHAPEL.)

Ease Her! A command given on a steamer to reduce speed. The next order is generally “Stop her!”—i.e., the steamboat.

East. The custom of turning to the east when the creed is repeated is to express the belief that Christ is the Day-spring and Sun of Righteousness. The altar is placed at the east end of the church to remind us of Christ, the “Day-spring” and “Resurrection”; and peregrine are buried with their feet to the east to signify that they died in the hope of the Resurrection.

The ancient Greeks always buried their dead with the face upwards, looking towards heaven; and the feet turned to the east or the rising sun, to indicate that the deceased was on his way to Elysium, and not to the region of night or the inferno. (Diogenés Laertius: Life of Solomon, in Greek.)

East Indies.

1. He came safe from the East Indies, and was drowned in the Thames. He encountered many dangers of great magnitude, but was at last killed where he thought himself secure.

2. To send to the East Indies for Kentish pippins. To go round about to accomplish a very simple thing. To crush a fly on a wheel. To send to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for a penny postage-stamp.

Easter. April was called Ostermonth—the month of the Ost-end wind (wind from the east). Easter is therefore the April feast, which lasted eight days. Our Easter Sunday must be between March 21st and April 25th. It is regulated by the paschal moon, or first full moon between the vernal equinox and fourteen days afterwards. (Teutonic, ostara; Anglo-Saxon, eastre.)

Easter. The Saxon goddess of the east, whose festival was held in the spring.

Easter-day Sun. It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day. Sir Thomas Browne combats the notion in his Vulgar Errors.

“But oh, she dances such a way,
No sun upon an Easter day
In half an hour a sight.”

Sir John Buckling.

Easter Eggs, or Pasch eggs, are symbolical of creation, or the re-creation of spring. The practice of presenting eggs to our friends at Easter is Magian or Persian, and bears allusion to the mundane egg, for which Ormuzd and Ahriman were to contend till the consummation of all things. It prevailed not only...
A horse which stands in the stable unemployed eats his head off.

Eating One's Terms. To be studying for the bar. Students are required to dine in the Hall of the Inns of Court at least three times in each of the twelve terms before they are "called" [to the bar]. (See Doctors' Commons.)

Eating Together. To eat together in the East was at one time a sure pledge of protection. A Persian nobleman was once sitting in his garden, when a man prostrated himself before him, and implored protection from the rabble. The nobleman gave him the remainder of a peach which he was eating, and when the incensed multitude arrived, and declared that the man had slain the only son of the nobleman, the heart-broken father replied, "We have eaten together; go in peace," and would not allow the murderer to be punished.

Eau de Cologne. A perfumed spirit, prepared at Cologne. The most famous maker was Jean Maria Farina.

Eau de Vie. Brandy. A French translation of the Latin aqua vitae (water of life). This is a curious perversion of the Spanish agua de vie (water or juice of the vine), rendered by the monks into aqua vitae instead of agua vitae, and confounding the juice of the grape with the alchemists' elixir of life. The same error is perpetuated in the Italian acqua viva; the Scotch whisky; the Celtic nighe-bhith; and the Irish uisge-beatha, which is the Gaelic and Irish uisge-beatha. (See Aqua Vitae.)

Eaves-dropper. One who listens stealthily to conversation. The derivation of the term is not usually understood. The owners of private estates in Saxon times were not allowed to cultivate to the extreme of their possessions, but were obliged to leave a space for eaves. This space was called the gyle-dryp (eaves-drip). An eaves-dropper is one who places himself in the eaves-drip to overhear what is said in the adjacent house or field. "Under our tents I'll play the eaves-dropper, To hear if any mean to shrink from me." Shakespeare: Richard III. v. 3.

Ebionites. The doctrine that the poor only shall be saved. Ebion, plural ebionism (poor).

"At the end of the second century the Ebionites were treated as heretics, and a pretended leader (Ebion) was invented by Tertullian to explain the name." Roman: Life of Jesus, chap. xi.

Ebionites (4 syl.). A religious sect of the first and second centuries, who... maintained that Jesus Christ was merely an inspired messenger, the greatest of all prophets, but yet a man and a man only, without any existence before His birth in Bethlehem. (See above.)

Ebisus or Ebisus. A jinn, and the ruler of the evil genii, or fallen angels. Before his fall he was called Azaz'el or Hha'a'is. When Adam was created, God commanded all the angels to worship him; but Ebisus replied, "Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" God was very angry at this insolent answer, and turned the disobedient fiay into a Sheytan (devil), and he became the father of devils.

"His majesty was a hundred feet in height; his skin, striped with red, was covered with small scales, which made it glitter like armour; his hair was so long and curly a snake much; he lost his way in it; his hat nose was pierced with a ring of a durable workman; his small eyes assumed all the prismatic colours; his ears, which resembled those of an elephant, flapped on his shoulders; and his tail, sixty feet long, terminated in a hooked claw."—Croquisantias, ii. 16.

"When he saw unto the uncle, "Wish, to Adam," all worshipped him except Ebisus."—H Koran, ii.

Ebony. God's image done in ebony. Negroes. Thomas Fuller gave birth to this expression.

Ebn'uz. The Hebrides. (Avosio: Orlando Envisus.)

Ecco Homo. A painting by Correggio of our Lord crowned with thorns and bound with ropes, as He was shown to the people by Pilate, who said to them, "Ecco Homo!" (Behold the man!) (John xix. 5.)

Other conceptions of this subject, either painted or engraved, are by Albert Durer (1471-1528), Titian (1477-1576), Cigoli (1559-1613), Guido (1571-1642), Albani (1578-1660), Vandyck (1590-1641), Rembrandt (1606-1669), Poussin (1613-1675), and some others.

Ecco Sigmaum. See it, in proof! Behold the proof!

"I saw eight times through the diamond, four through the hose; my buckler cut through and through; my sword lacked like a hand saw—ecco sigillum."—Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, n. 4.

Eccentric means deviating from the centre; hence irregular, not according to rule. Originally applied to those planets which wander round the earth, like comets, the earth not being in the centre of their orbit. (Latin, ex centrum.)

Eccentric Sensation. The sensations of the brain transferred to objects without. For example: we see a tree; this tree is a reflection of the tree on the retina transferred to the brain; but the tree seen is the tree without, not the tree in the brain. This transferred perception is called an "Eccentric Sensation."

Eccentric Theory (The) in astronomy. A theory which uses an eccentric instead of an epicycle in accounting for the sun's motion.

Ecclesiastes (5 syl.). One of the books in the Old Testament, arranged next to Proverbs, generally ascribed to Solomon, because it says (verse 1), "The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem." This seems, so far, to confirm the authorship to Solomon; but verse 12 says, "I, the Preacher, was king over Israel, in Jerusalem," which seems to intimate that he was once a king, but was so no longer. If so, it could not be Solomon, who died king of the twelve tribes. "Son of David" often means a descendant of David, Christ himself being so called.

Ecclesiastics is so called, not because the writer was a priest, but because the book (in the opinion of the fathers) was the chief of the apocryphal books, designated by them Ecclesiastici Libri (books to be read in churches), to distinguish them from the canonical Scriptures.

Echidna (E-kid'n-a). Half-woman, half-serpent. She was mother of the Chimera, the many-headed dog Orthos, the hundred-headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberus, Scylla, the Gorgons, the Lernaean Hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean lion. (Hesiod.)

"[She] seemed a woman to the view, and fair but ended foul in many a scaly fold, Voluminous and vast."—Milton: Paradise Lost, book ii. 620-2.

Echo. The Romans say that Echo was a nymph in love with Narcissus, but her love not being returned, she pine away till only her voice remained. We use the word to imply similarity of sentiment: as You echo my ideas; That is an echo to my opinion.

"Sweet Echo, sweetest nymph, that liv'st unseen Within thy airy shell: By slow Mourn'der's margin green, ... Canst thou not tell me of a gentle pair That liketh thy Narcissus?"—Milton: Comus, 132, 133.

Echo. (Gr., écho; verb, écho, to sound.) To applaud to the echo. To applaud so loudly as to produce an echo.
Eckhardt. A faithful Eckhardt, who warns every one (German). Eckhardt, in German legends, appears on the evening of Maundy Thursday to warn all persons to go home, that they may not be injured by the headless bodies and two-legged horses which traverse the streets on that night.

Eclectics. Ancient philosophers, who selected what they thought best in all other systems, and made a patchwork therefrom. There is the eclectic school of painters, of which Paul Delaroche was the founder and best exponent; the eclectic school of modern philosophy, founded by Victor Cousin; the eclectic school of architecture; and so on. (Greek, ek-lego, to pick out.)

Eclectic or Modern Platonists. A Christian sect which arose in the second century. They professed to make truth their sole object of inquiry, and adopted from existing systems whatever, in their opinion, was true. They were called Platonists because they adopted Plato's notions about God and the human soul.

Eclipses were considered by the ancient Greeks and Romans as bad omens. Nicias, the Athenian general, was so terrified by an eclipse of the moon, that he durst not defend himself from the Syracusans; in consequence of which his whole army was cut to pieces, and he himself was put to death.

The Romans would never hold a public assembly during an eclipse. Some of their poets feign that an eclipse of the moon is because she is gone on a visit to Endymion.

A very general notion was and still is among barbarians that the sun or moon has been devoured by some monster, and hence the custom of beating drums and brass kettles to scare away the monster.

The Chinese, Lapps, Persians, and some others call the evil beast a dragon. The East Indians say it is a black griffin.

The notion of the ancient Mexicans was that eclipses were caused by sun and moon quarrels, in which one of the litigants is beaten black and blue.

Eclipstic. The path apparently described by the sun in its annual course through the heavens. Eclipses happen only when the moon is in or near the same plane.

Eclogue (2 syl.). Pastoral poetry not expressed in rustic speech, but in the most refined and elegant of which the language is capable. (Greek, meaning "elegant extracts," "select poetry.")
Economy of Nature. The laws of nature, whereby the greatest amount of good is obtained; or the laws by which the affairs of nature are regulated and disposed.

Écorcheurs. Freebooters of the twelfth century, in France; so called because they stripped their victims of everything, even their clothes. (French, écorcher, to flay.)

Ecstasy (Greek ἐκστασις, from ἐκστασις, to stand out of [the body or mind]). To stand out of one’s mind is to lose one’s wits, to be beside oneself. To stand out of one’s body is to be disembodied. St. Paul refers to this when he says he was caught up to the third heaven and heard unutterable words, “whether in the body, or out of the body, I cannot tell” (2 Cor. xii. 2-4). St. John also says he was “in the spirit”—i.e., in an ecstasy—when he saw the apocalyptic vision (i. 10). The belief that the soul left the body at times was very general in former ages, and is still the belief of many. (See Ecstatic.)

Ecstatic Doctor (Thir). Jean de Ruysbrock, the mystic (1264-1381).

Ecstatic (Thir). A class of diviners among the ancient Greeks, who used to lie in trances, and when they came to themselves gave strange accounts of what they had seen while they were “out of the body.” (Greek, eckistein.)

Ector (Sir). The foster-father of King Arthur.

Edda. There are two religious codes, so called, containing the ancient Scandinavian mythology. One is in verse, composed in Iceland in the eleventh century by Snæmund Sigfusson, the Sage; and the other in prose, compiled a century later by Snorri Sturluson, who wrote a commentary on the first edda. The poetical edda contains an account of creation, the history of Odin, Thor, Freyr, Balder, etc., etc. The prose one contains the exploits of such conquerors as Fælings, Sigmund, Atli, etc., and is divided into several parts. The first part contains historical and mythological traditions; the second a long poetical vocabulary; and the third Scandinavian prosody, or the modes of composition adopted by the ancient Skalds. The poetical compilation is generally called Njámul’s Edda, and the prose one Snorri’s Edda.

Eden. Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. ii. 15). The word means delight, pleasure.

Eden Hall. The luck of Eden Hall. An old painted drinking-glass, supposed to be sacred. The tale is that the butler once went to draw water from St. Cuthbert’s Well, in Eden Hall garden, Cumberland, when the fairies left their drinking-glass on the well to enjoy a little fun. The butler seized the glass, and ran off with it. The goblet is preserved in the family of Sir Christopher Musgrave. Longfellow wrote a poem on the subject. The superstition is—

“If that glass either break or fall,
Farewell the luck of Eden Hall.”

Readers of the Golden Butterfly, by Besant and Rice, will remember how the luck of Gideon P. Beck was associated with a golden butterfly.

Edinburgh, i.e. Edwin’s burgh. The fort built by Edwin, king of Northumbria (616-633). Dun Eden or Dunedin, is a Saxon form; Edina a poetical one.

Edgar or Edgar’s. Master of Ravenswood, in love with Lucy Ashton (Lucia di Lammermoor). While absent in France on an important embassy, the lady is led to believe that her lover has proved faithless to her, and in the torrent of her indignation consents to marry the laird of Bucklaw, but stabs him on the wedding-night, goes mad, and dies. In the opera Edgardo stabs himself also; but in the novel he is lost in the quicksands at Kelpies-Flow, in accordance with an ancient prophecy. (Donizetti’s opera of “Lucia di Lammermoor”; Sir Walter Scott’s “Bride of Lammermoor.”)

Edge. (Anglo-Saxon, ceg.) Not to put too fine an edge upon it. Not to mince the matter: to speak plainly.

“He is, not to put too fine an edge upon it, a thorough scoundrel.”—Lovell.

To be on edge. To be very eager or impatient.

To set one’s teeth on edge. To give one the horrors; to induce a tingling oprating sensation in one's teeth, as from acids or harsh noises.

"I had rather hear a brazen canstick turned,
Or a dry wheel grate on the axle-tree;
And that would set my teeth nothing on edge,
Nothing so much as inclining poetry."

Shakespeare: 1 Henry IV, iii. 1.

Edge Away (To). To move away very gradually, as a ship moves from the edge of the shore. Often called egg.

( Anglo-Saxon, ege; an edge; egy-clif, is a sea cliff.)

Edge-bone. (See Aitch-Bone.)

Edge on. (See Egg on.)

Edge of the Sword. To fall by the edge of the sword. By a cut from the sword: in battle.

Edgewise. One cannot get in a word edgewise. The conversation is so engrossed by others] that there is no getting in a word.

Edged Tools. It is dangerous to play with edged tools. It is dangerous to tamper with mischief or anything that may bring you into trouble.

Edhlingi. The aristocratic class among the Anglo-Saxons; the second rank were termed Fridlingi; and the third the Lazi. (Anglo-Saxon, odele or odele, noble; five-long, free-born. Ricardo says of the third class, they were the "unwilling to work, the dull" —quos hodie lazie dicimus.)

Edict of Milán. Proclaimed by Constantine, after the conquest of Italy (313), to secure to Christians the restitution of their civil and religious rights.

Edict of Nantes. An edict published by Henri IV, of France, granting toleration to his Protestant subjects. It was published from Nantes in 1598, but repealed in 1685 by Louis XIV.

Edie Ochiltree. In Scott's Antiquary.

"Charles II. would be as sceptical as Edie Ochiltrees about the existence of circles and avenues, altar-stones and cromlechs." - Knight: Old England.

Edify is to build a house (Latin, edex-facio); morally, to build instruction in the mind methodically, like an architect. The Scripture word edification means the building-up of "believers" in grace and holiness. St. Paul says, "Ye are God's building," and elsewhere he carries out the figure more fully, saying—

"All the buildings [or body of Christians], fitly joined together, groweth unto a holy temple in the Lord." - Eph. ii. 21.

Edith. Roman officers who had charge of the streets, bridges, aqueducts, temples, and city buildings generally. We call our surveyors city edites sometimes. (Latin, edes, a house.)

Edith, called the Maid of Lorn (Argyleshire), was about to be married to Lord Ronald, when Robert, Edward, and Isabel Bruce, tempest-tossed, sought shelter at the castle. Edith's brother recognised the Bruce, and being in the English interest, a quarrel ensued, in the course of which the abbot arrived, but refused to marry the bridal pair amidst such discord. Edith fled, and, assuming the character of a page, passed through divers adventures. At length Robert Bruce won the battle of Bannockburn, and when peace was restored Ronald married the "Maid of Lorn." (Scott: Lord of the Isles.)

Ednam, in Roxburghshire, near the Tweed, where Thomson, the author of The Seasons, was born.

Edo'be (2 syl.). Adobe cottages are those made of sun-dried bricks, like the buildings of ancient Egypt. (W. Hepworth Dixon: New America, i. 16.)

"The present and proper form of this word is Adobe (Spanish, adobes, plaster)."

"They make adobes, or sun-dried bricks, by mixing ashes and earth with water, which is then moulded into large blocks and dried in the sun." - Bancroft: Nature Races, vol. i. p. 335.

Edward. Edward the Confessor's sword. Curta'na (the cutter), a blunt sword of state, emblematical of mercy.

Edwidge. Wife of William Tell. (Rossini's opera of Guglielmo Tell.)

Edwin. The hero of Beattie's Minstrel.

"And yet poor Edwin was no vulgar boy; Deep thought oft seemed to fix his infant eye, Duties he heeded not, nor saved, nor toyed. Save one short pipe of rustic minstrelye, Silent when glad; affectionate, though sly. And now his look was most dunciely sad; And now he laugh'd aloud, yet none knew why. The neighbours stared and sighed, yet bless'd the lad; Some deemed him wondrous wise, and some believed him mad." - Canto i. 16.

Edyn. Son of Nudd; called the "Sparrowhawk." He ousted the Earl... of Yn’iol from his earldom, and tried to win Eadid, the earl’s daughter, but failing in this, became the evil genius of the gentle earl. Being overthrown in a tournament by Prince Geraint, he was sent to the court of King Arthur, where his whole nature was completely changed, and “subdued to that gentleness which, when it weds with manhood, makes a man.” (Idylls of the King; Eadid.)

Bel. A nickname for a New Englander.

“The eels of New England and the corn-crackers of Virginia.”—Haliburton: Clockmaker.

Bel. A salt eel. A rope’s end, used for scouring. At one time eelkins were used for whips.

“With my salt eel, went down in the parter, and there got my boy and did beat him.”—Pope:
Diary (April 24th).

Bel. (Anglo-Saxon, eel.)
Holding the eel of science by the tail.
That is, to have an ephemeral smattering of a subject, which slips from the memory as an eel would wriggle out of one’s fingers if held by the tail.

“Cauda tenes annullam, in eum apte directum, quibus res ex cuir hominibus lucem Sce, perflaquam, aut qui rem fugitivam atque incertam aliquam latent, quam tibi dixit non possent.”
(Braemius: Adagia, p. 224. 1625.)

To get used to it, as a skinned eel, i.e., as an eel is used to being skinned.
It may be unpleasant at first, but habit will get the better of such annoyance.

“It ain’t always pleasant to turn out for morning chapel, is it, G. H. Lamps? But it’s just like the eels with their skinning: it goes against the grain at first, but you soon get used to it.”— (Albert Bede [Bradley]: Verandah Green, chap. vii.

To skin an eel by the tail is to do things the wrong way.

Belkhanse Tables. The celebrated calculation of Nazir’a Dian, the Persian astronomer, grandson of Zenghis Khan, brought out in the middle of the thirteenth century.

Efen’di. A Turkish title, about equal to our “squire,” given to emirs, men of learning, and the high priests of mosques.
The title is added after the name, as Ali effendi (Ali Esquire).

Effigy. To burn or hang one in effigy.
To burn or hang the representation of a person, instead of the person himself, in order to show popular hatred, dislike, or contempt. The custom comes from France, where the public executioner used to hang the effigy of the criminal when the criminal himself could not be found.

Efrontery. Out-facing, rude persistence, and overbearing impudence.
(Latin, e-frons, i.e. ex-frons, out-face.)

Egalité. Philippe, Duc d’Orléans, father of Louis-Philippe, King of the French, was so called because he sided with the revolutionary party, whose motto was “Liberty, fraternity, and equality.” Philippe Égalité was guillotined in 1793.

Egeria. The nymph who instructed Numa in his wise legislation. Numa used to meet her in a grove near Arcia.

Egg. Eggs. (Anglo-Saxon, eol.)
A bad egg. A bad speculation; a man who promises, but whose promises are pie-crust.

A duck’s egg, in cricket. (See DUCK.)
Golden eggs. Great profits. (See GOOSE.)

“I doubt the bird is flown that laid the golden eggs.”—Nutt: The Antiquary.

The unadulterated egg. The Phoenicians, and from them the Egyptians, Hindus, Japanese, and many other ancient nations, maintained that the world was hatched from an egg made by the Creator. Orpheus speaks of this egg.
Eggs of Nuremberg. (See NUREMBERGS.)
Each eggs. (See EASTER EGGS.)

The serpent’s egg of the Druids.
This wonderful egg was hatched by the joint labour of several serpents, and was buoyed into the air by their hissing.
The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed, to avoid being stung to death; but the possessor was sure to prevail in every contest or combat, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of these eggs, and that it was about as large as a moderate-sized apple.

PHRASES AND PROVERBS:
Don’t put all your eggs in one basket.
Don’t venture all you have in one speculation; don’t put all your property in one bank. The allusion is obvious.

From the egg to the apple. (Latin, “ab uno vaso ad malum.”) From first to last. The Romans began their “dinner” with eggs, and ended with fruits called “mala.”

I have eggs on the spit. I am very busy, and cannot attend to anything else. The reference is to roasting eggs on a spit. They were first boiled, then the yolk was taken out, braided up with spices, and put back again; the eggs were then drawn on a “spit,” and roasted. As this required both despatch and constant attention, the person in charge could not leave them. It must be remembered that the word “spit” had at one time a much wider meaning than it has now. Thus toasting-forks and the hooks of a Dutch oven were termed spits.

"I forget to tell you, I write short journals now; I have eggs on the spit." — So oft.

"I got eggs for my money means I gave valuable money, and received instead such worthless things as eggs. When Wolsey accused the Earl of Kildare for not taking Desmond prisoner, the Earl replied, "He is no more to blame than his brother Orsey, who (notwithstanding his high promises) is glad to take eggs for his money," i.e. is willing to be imposed on." (Campion: History of Ireland, 1633.)

Like as two eggs. Exactly alike.

"They say we are almost as like as eggs." — Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale, i. 2.

Sure as eggs is eggs. Professor de Morgan suggests that this is a corruption of the logician’s formula, “x is x.” (Notes and Queries.)

Teach your grandmother to suck eggs. Attempting to teach your elders and superiors. The French say, "The goslings want to drive the geese to pasture" (Les ossons veulent mener les oies paître).

There is reason in roasting eggs. Even the most trivial thing has a reason for being done in one way rather than in some other. When wood fires were usual, it was more common to roast eggs than to boil them, and some care was required to prevent their being ill-roasted, all on one side," as Touchstone says (As You Like It, iii, 2).

"One likes the pleasant’s wing, and the one the leg; The vulgar boil, the trained roast an egg." — Pope: Epistles, ii.

To tread upon eggs. To walk gingerly, as if walking over eggs, which are easily broken.

"Will you take eggs for your money?" "Will you allow yourself to be imposed upon? Will you take kicks for half-pence?" This saying was in vogue when eggs were plentiful as blackberries.

"My honest friend, will you take eggs for money?" — Shakespeare: Winter’s Tale, i. 2.

Egg Feast. In Oxford the Saturday preceding Shrove Tuesday is so called; it is also called Egg-Saturday, because pasch eggs are provided for the students on that day.

Egg-flip, Egg-hot, Egg-nog. Drinks composed of warm spiced ale, with sugar, spirit and eggs; or eggs beaten up with wine, sweetened and flavoured, etc.

Egg-on or Edge-on. A corruption of the Saxon eggian (to incite). The Anglo-Saxon egg, and Scandinavian ęg, means a "sharp point"—hence edgehog (hedgehog), a hog with sharp points, called in Danish ping-svin (thorny swine), and in French porc-épic, where épic is the Latin spicula (spikes).

Egg Saturday (See above, Egg-Feast.)

Egg-trot. A cautious, jog-trot pace, like that of a good housewife riding to market with eggs in her panniers.

Egill. Brother of Weland, the Vulcan of Northern mythology. Egill was a great archer, and a tale is told of him the exact counterpart of the famous story about William Tell: One day King Nidung commanded Egill to shoot an apple off the head of his son. Egill took two well-selected arrows from his quiver, and when asked by the king why he took two, replied (as the Swiss peasant to Gessler), "To shoot thee, O tyrant, with the second, if I fail."

Egis. (See Egos.)

Eglantine (3 syl.). Daughter of King Pepin, and bride of her cousin Valentine, the brother of Orson. She soon died. (Valentine and Orson.)

Madame Eglantine. The prioress in Chaucer’s Canterbury Tales. Good-natured, wholly ignorant of the world, vain of her courtly manners, and noted for her partiality to lap-dogs, her delicate oath, "by seint Eloy, her entuning the service sweetly in her nose," and her speaking French "after the scone of Stratford atte Bowe."

Ego and Non-Ego. "Ego" means myself; "Non-ego" means the objective world. They are terms used by Fichte (1702-1814) to explain his Idealism. According to this philosopher, the Ego posits or embraces the Non-ego. Take an example: A tree is an object out of my personality, and therefore a part of the Non-ego. I see a tree; the tree of my brain is a subjective tree, the tree itself is an objective tree. Before I can see it, the objective tree and the subjective tree must be like the two clocks of a telegraphic apparatus; the sender and reader must be in connection, the reader must "posit," or take in the message sent. The message, or non-ego, must be engraved into the ego. Applying this rule generally, all objects known, seen, heard, etc., by me become part of me, or the ego posits the non-ego by subjective objectivity.
Egoism. The theory in Ethics which places man's sumnum bonum in self. The correlative of altruism, or the theory which places our own greatest happiness in making others happy. Egoism is selfishness pure, altruism is selfish benevolence. "Egoist," a disciple of egoism.

"To say that each individual shall reap the benefits brought to him by his own powers... is to equate egoism as an ultimate principle of conduct." —Spencer Data of Ethics, p. 189.

Egotism. The too frequent use of the word I; the habit of talking about oneself, or of parading one's own doings. "Egotist," one addicted to egotism.

Egypt, in Dryden's satire of Abasium and Achitophel, means France. "Egypt and Tyre (Holland) intercept your trade, And Jehovah (Papists) your sacred rites invade."

Part I. 76-8.

Egyptian Crown (The). That of Upper Egypt was a high conical white cap, terminating in a knob. That of Lower Egypt was res. If a king governed both countries he wore both crowns (that of Lower Egypt outside the other). This double crown was called a pechent.

Egyptian Days. The last Monday in April, the second Monday of August, and the third Monday of December. So called because Egyptian astrologers marked them out.

"Three days there are in the year which we call Egyptian Days." —Sarvon MS. (British Museum).

Egyptian Festivals (The). The six great festivals of the ancient Egyptians were:

1. That of Bubastis (= Dianna, or the moon);
2. That of Busiris, in honour of Isis;
3. That of Sais (= Minerva, Hermes, or Wisdom);
4. That of Heliodolis, in honour of the sun;
5. That of Butis, or Buto, the goddess of night; and
6. That of Papremis (= Mars or Arès, the god of War).

El Dorado down. The down of the elder duck. This duck is common in Greenland, Iceland, and the Islands north and west of Scotland. It is about the size of a goose, and receives its distinctive name from the river Elider, in Denmark.

Elken Besa'tike [Portraiture of the King]. A book attributed to Charles I., but claimed by John Gauden, Bishop of Exeter. "The Elken is wholly and only my invention." (Gauden: Letter to the Lord Chancellor.)

Elisell. Wormwood wine. Hamlet says to Laertes, *Would not drink up elisell—i.e. drink wormwood wine to show your love to the dead Ophelia? In the Troy Book of Ludgate we have the line "Of bitter eyesell and of eager [sour] wine."

And in Shakespeare's sonnets:

"I will drink Poisons of eyesell at my strong infection; No bitterness that I will bitter think, Nor double penance to correct correction."

Sonnet xxxi.

Eisteddfod. The meetings of the Welsh bards and others, now held annually, for the encouragement of Welsh literature and music. (Welsh, "a session," from eistedd, to sit.)

Eithec. (Greek, hektar; Irish, ceachtar; Saxon, aguth or Cnach, our "each," and agther, our "either").

Ejusdem Farnae (Latin). Of the same kidney; of the same sort.

"Lord Hartington, Lord Derby, Mr. Childers, and others ejusdem farnae." —Newspaper paragraph, November, 1860.

El Dora'do. Golden illusion: a land or means of unbounded wealth. Oreliana, lieutenant of Pizarro, pretended he had discovered a land of gold (el dorado) between the rivers Orino/co and Am'azon, in South America. Sir Walter Raleigh twice visited Guiana as the spot indicated, and published a highly-coloured account of its enormous wealth. Figuratively, a source of wit, wealth, or abundance of any kind.

The real "land of gold" is California, and not Guiana. (See BALINDARE.)

"The whole comedy is a sort of El Dorado of wit." —T. Moore.

"El Dorado" (masculine), "the gilt one," can hardly refer to a country; it seems more likely to refer to some prince; and we are told of a prince in South America who was every day powdered with gold dust blown through a reed. If this is admitted, no wonder those who sought a golden country were disappointed.

El Infante de Antequera is the Regent Fernando, who took the city of Antequera from the Moors in 1419.

El Islam. The religion of the Moslems. The words mean "the resigning one's self to God."

El Khidr. One of the good angels, according to the Koran.

Elagabalus. A Syro-Phoenician sun-god, represented under the form of a huge conical stone. The Roman emperor, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, was so called because in childhood he was priest of the Sun-god. Of all the Roman emperors none exceeded him in debauchery and sin. He reigned about four years (c. 218-222), and died at the age of eighteen.

This madman invited the principal men of Rome to a banquet, and smothered them in a shower of roses.

Ela'mina (2 syl.). The "lily maid of Astolat" (Guildford, in Surrey), who loved Sir Lancelot "with that love which was her doom." Sir Lancelot, being sworn to celibacy, could not have married her, even if he had been willing; and, unhappily, what little love he had was bestowed on the queen. Elaina felt that her love was a vain thing, and died. According to her last request, the bed on which she died was placed on a barge, and on it was laid her dead body, arrayed in white, a lily in her right hand, and a letter avowing her love in the left. An old dumb servitor steered and rowed the barge up the river, and when it stopped at the palace staith, King Arthur ordered the body to be brought in. The letter being read, Arthur directed that the maiden should be buried like a queen, with her sad story blazoned on her tomb. The tale is taken from Sir T. Malory's History of Prince Arthur, part iii. Tennyson turned it into blank verse. (Idyll of the King; Elaine.)

Elas'motherium (Greek, the metal-plate beast). An extinct animal, between the horse and the rhinoceros.

Elberich. The most famous dwarf of German romance. He aided the Emperor Omit (who ruled over Lombardy) to gain for wife the Soldier's doughter. (The Heldenbuch.)

Elbow. (Anglo-Saxon, el-boga; el = an e1, boga = a bow.) A knight of the elbow. A gambler.
At one's elbow. Close at hand.
To elbow one's way in. To push one's way through a crowd; to get a place by hook or crook.
To elbow out; to be elbowed out. To supersede; to be ousted by a rival.
Up to one's elbow [in work]. Very busy, or full of work. Work piled up to one's elbows.

Elbow Grease. Perspiration excited by hard manual labour. They say "Elbow grease is the best furniture oil."

Elbow Room. Sufficient space for the work in hand.

Elbows. Out at elbows. Shabbily dressed (applied to men only); metaphorically, short of money; hackneyed; stale; thus, we say of a play which has been acted too often that it is worn out at elbows. It is like a coat which is no longer presentable, being out at the elbows.

Elden Hole. Elden Hole needs filling. A reproof given to great braggers. Elden Hole is a deep pit in Derbyshire Peak, said to be fathomless. (See Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, ch. iii.)

Elder Brethren. (See TRINITY HOUSE.)

Elder-tree. Sir John Maundeville, speaking of the Pool of Sil'oe, says, "Past by is the elder-tree on which Judas hanged himself: . . . when he sold and betrayed our Lord." Shakespeare, in Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2, says, "Judas was hanged on an elder." (See FIG-TREE.)

"Judas he japed
With Jewish miller,
And sitten on an elder tree
Hanged himself."

Piers Plowman: Vision.

Eleanor Crosses. (See CHARING CROSS.)

Eleatic Philosophy. Founded by Xenoph'anes of El'ea about b.c. 530. The Ionic school believed there was but one element; the Eleatics said there were four or six, as heat and cold, moisture and dryness, and even, from the antagonisms of which visible objects sprang: Thus, Fire is heat acting on dryness; Air is heat acting on moisture; Water is cold acting on moisture; and Earth is cold acting on dryness. (See below.)

The New Eleatic School was founded by Leucippus of El'ea, a disciple of Zeno. He wholly discarded the phantasmagoric theory, and confined his attention to the physical properties of the visible world. He was the father of the Atomic System, in which the agency of chance was again revived.

Elecampane and Amrida. Sweetmeats which confer immortality (Latin, helieinum campana or inula campana). Pliny tells us the plant so called sprang from Helen's tears. The sweetmeat so called is a coarse sugar-candy. There was also an electuary so called, said to cure wounds given in fight.

"Here, take this essence of elecampane, Rise up, Sir George, and fight again."

Miracle Play of St. George.

Elector. A prince who had a vote in the election of the Emperor of Germany. Napoleon broke up the old German empire, and the college of electors fell asunder.
Electricity

The Great Elector. Frederick William of Brandenburg (1620-1688).

Electricity (from the Greek elektron, amber). Thales (B.C. 600) observed that amber when rubbed attracted light substances, and this observation followed out has led to the present science of electricity.

"Bright amber shines on his electric throne."

Negative and positive electricity. Two opposite conditions of the electric state of bodies. At one time electricity was considered a fluid, as heat was thought to be caloric. Everybody was thought to have a certain quantity. If a body contained more than its normal quantity it was said to be positive; if less, it was said to be negative in this respect. Another theory was that there were two different electric fluids, which neutralized each other when they came in contact. Electricity is now supposed to be a mere condition, like heat and motion; but its energy is set in action by some molecular disturbance, such as friction, rupture, and chemical action. The old terms are still retained.

Electro-Biology. The science of electricity as it is connected with the phenomena of living beings. Also the effect of "animal magnetism" on living creatures, said to produce sleep, stupor, anesthesia, etc.

Electro-Chemistry. That branch of chemistry which treats of electricity as an energy affecting chemical changes.

Electuary. Something to be licked up; a medicine made "thick and slab," which cannot be imbibed like a liquid nor bolted like a pill, but which must be licked up like honey. (Greek, ek-leicho.)

Eleemosynam. Eleemosynam sepulcri patris tui (Alms on your father's grave). (See MEAT.)

Elegant Extracts. The 85th Foot, remodelled in 1813, after the numerous court-martials which then occurred. The officers of the regiment were removed, and officers drafted from other regiments were substituted in their places. The 85th is now called the "Second Battalion of the Shropshire Light Infantry." The first battalion is the old 23rd.

At the University of Cambridge, in the good old times, some few men were too good to be plucked and not good enough for the poll: a line was drawn below the poll-list, and these lucky unfortunates, allowed to pass, were nicknamed the Elegant Extracts. There was a similar limbo in the honour-list, called the Gulf, in allusion to a Scripture passage well known and thus parodied, "Between them [in the poll] and us [in the honour-lists] there is a great gulf fixed," etc.

Elephas. (See HEXAMETERS and PENTAMETERS.)

Elements, according to Aristotle. Aristotle maintained that there are four elements—fire, air, water, and earth; and this assertion has been the subject of very unwise ridicule. Modern chemists maintain the same fact, but have selected four new words for the four old ones, and instead of the term "element," use "material forms." We say that matter exists under four forms: the imponderable (caloric), the gaseous (air), the liquid (water), and the solid (earth), and this is all the ancient philosophers meant by their four elements or elemental forms. It was Empedocles of Sicily who first maintained that fire, air, earth, and water are the four elements; but he called them Zeus, Hera, Gaea, and Poseidon. (Latin, eleo for olo. Vossius says: ab ant. eleo pro olo, i.e. cresco, quod omnia crescent ac nascetur.)

Tell why these simple elements are four:
Why just so many: why not less or more?
Blackmore: Creation, 1.

\". . . . The first of these forms—viz.\" Caloric, or the imponderable matter of heat, is now attributed to a mere condition of matter, like motion.

Elephant. The elephant which supports the world is called "Muha-pudma," and the the tortoise which supports the elephant is called "Chukwa." In some of the Eastern mythologies we are told that the world stands on the backs of eight elephants, called "Achetaquadjums."

Elephant (Thr). Symbol of temperance, eternity, and sovereignty. (See WHITE ELEPHANT.)

\"L'eternité est dessinée sur une médaille de l'empereur Philippe, par un éléphant sur lequel est monté un petit arc sous les flèches.\" — Real Dictionnaire de la Fable, vol. 1, p. 506.

Elephant. (See WHITE ELEPHANT.)

Only an elephant can bear an elephant's load. An Indian proverb: Only a great man can do the work of a great man; also, the burden is more than I can bear; it is a load fit for an elephant. — Elephant Paper. A large-sized drawing-paper, measuring 20 inches by 23. There is also a "double elephant paper," measuring 40 inches by 26½.

Elephant and Castle. A public-house sign at Newington, said to derive its name from the skeleton of an elephant dug up near Battle Bridge in 1714. A flint-headed spear lay by the remains, whence it is conjectured that the creature was killed by the British in a fight with the Romans. (The Times.)

There is another public-house with the same sign in St. Pancras, probably intended to represent an elephant with a howdah.

Elephant's, in Bombay, is so called from a stone elephant, which carried a tiger on its back, and formerly stood near the landing-place on the south side of the island. It has now nearly disappeared. The natives call it Gahnpoorooe (cave town), from its cave, 130 feet long. (Choic-choic.)

Elephantine (4 syl.). Heavy and ungainly, like an elephant. In Rome, the registers of the senate, magistrates, generals, and emperors were called elephantine books, because they were made of ivory. In geology, the elephantine period was that noted for its numerous large thick-skinned animals. The disease called elephantiasis is when the limbs swell and look like those of an elephant more than those of a human being.

Eleusinian Mysteries. The religious rites in honour of Demeter or Ceres, performed at Eleusis, in Attica.

Elevation of the Host (Thir). The celebrant lifting up the "consecrated wafers" above his head, that the people may see the paten and adore "the Host," while his back is turned to the congregation.

Eleven (Anglo-Saxon, andlēfne, and = ain, lefen = left, left). One left or one more after counting ten (the fingers of the two hands). Twelve is Twa lef (two left); all the other teens up to 20 represent 3, 4, 5, etc., plus ten. It would seem that at one time persons did not count higher than twelve, but in a more advanced state they required higher numbers, and introduced the "teen" series, omitting eleven and twelve, which would be enteen and twteen.

Eleven Thousand Virgin. Ursula being asked in marriage by a pagan prince, fled towards Rome with her eleven thousand virgins. At Cologne they were all massacred by a party of Huns, and even to the present hour "their bones" are exhibited to visitors through windows in the wall. Maury says that Ursula's handmaid was named Undecimella, and that the legend of her eleven thousand virgins rose out of this name. (Legends of Rimes.)

Eleventh Hour (At the). Just in time (Matt. xx. 1).

Elf (plural, Elves, Anglo-Saxon, elf). Properly, a mountain fay, but more loosely applied to those airy creatures that dance on the grass or sit in the leaves of trees and delight in the full moon. They have fair golden hair, sweet musical voices, and magic harps. They have a king and queen, marry and are given in marriage. They impersonate the shimmering of the air, the felt but indefinable melody of Nature, and all the little prettinesses which a lover of the country sees, or thinks he sees, in hill and dale, copse and meadow, grass and tree, river and moonlight. Spenser says that Prometheus called the man he made "Elfe," who found a maid in the garden of Ado'mis, whom he called "Fay," of whom all Fayres spring."

"Of these a mighty people shortly grew,
And pleasant kinnes, which all the world warred,
And to themselves all nations did submit."

Fairie Queene, b. 9, stanza 70, etc.

Elf and Goblin, as derived from Guelf and Ghibelline, is mentioned in Johnson (article Goblins), though the words existed long before those factions arose. Heylin (in his Cosmography, p. 130) tells us that some supported that opinion in 1670. Skinner gives the same etymology.

Red Elf. In Iceland, a person gaily dressed is called a red elf (rønd elf), in allusion to a superstition that dwarfs wear scarlet or red clothes. (Nial's Saga.) Black elves are evil spirits; white elves, good ones.

Elf-arrows. Arrow-heads of the neolithic period. The shafts of these arrows were reeds, and the heads were pieces of flint, carefully sharpened, and so adjusted as to detach themselves from the shaft and remain in the wounded body. At one time they were supposed to be shot by elves at people and cattle out of malice or revenge.

"These every herd by and experience knows."

How, winged with fate, their elf-shot arrows fly.

When the sick saw her summer food forgoes,

Or stretched on earth the heart-smit before.

Collins: Popular Superstitions.
Elf-fire. The ignis fatuus. The name of this elf is Will o' the Wisp, Jack o'lanthorn, Peg-a-lanter, or Kit o' the cansticke (candlestick).

Elf-land. The realm ruled over by Oberon, King of Fairy. King James says: "I think it is like Virgil's Campi Elpis, nor anything that ought to be believed by Christians." (De monologia, iii. 5.)

Elf-locks. Tangled hair. It is said that one of the favourite amusements of Queen Mab is to tie people's hair in knots. When Edgar impersonates a madman, "he elfs all his hair in knots." (Lea, ii. 3.)

"This is that very Mab That plays the mane of horses in the night, And makes [7 cakes] the elf-locks in foul sluttish hair."--Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, i. 4.

Elf-marked. Those born with a natural defect, according to the ancient Scottish superstition, are marked by the elves for mischief. Queen Margaret called Richard III.

"Thou elfish-marked, abortive rooting hog!"--Shakespeare: Richard III, i. 3.

Elf-shot. Afflicted with some unknown disease, and supposed to have been wounded by an elfin arrow. The tenderest would, in the Middle Ages, have been ascribed to elf-shots. (See ELF-ARROWS.)

Elfin. The first fairy king. He ruled over India and America. (Middle Age Romancer.)

Elf-in Marbles. A collection of ancient bas-reliefs and statues made by Lord Elgin, and sent to England in 1812. They are chiefly fragments of the Parthenon at Athens, and were purchased by the British Government for £35,000, to be placed in the British Museum (1816). (Elgin pronounced 'gin,' as in begin.)

Elia. A nom de plume adopted by Charles Lamb. (Essays of Elia.)

"The adoption of this signature was purely accidental. Lamb's first contribution to the London Magazine was a description of the old Southsea House, where he had passed a few months' novitiate as a clock, and remembering the name of a cat in the heart of fancy, who fluttered their wings at the time, substituted his name for his own."--Talpier.

El'lab, in the satire of Abalosom and Achiophil, by Dryden and Tate, is meant for Henry Bennet, Earl of Arlington. Eliaab was one of the chiefs of the Gadites who joined David at Ziklag. (1 Chron. xii. 3.)

El'lab, under the task to do Eliaab right; Long with the royal task [charles 11] he roved, And firm in all the turns of fortune proved."--Abalosom and Achiophil, part ii. 986-5.

El'akim. Jehoiakim, King of Judah. (b.c. 635, 610-598.)

El'idur (3 syl.). A legendary king of Britain, advanced to the throne in place of his elder brother, Arthgallo, supposed by him to be dead. Arthgallo, after a long exile, returned to his country, and Elidur resigned him the throne. Wordsworth has a poem on the subject.

Eligibles and Detriments. Sons which are socially good and bad parties, to be introduced to daughters with a view of matrimony.

"The County Families of the United Kingdom is useful to all who are concerned with questions of precedence, and especially useful to mothers who desire to distinguish between 'eligibles' and 'detrimentals.'"--Notes and Queries, February Ist, 1863, p. 119.

El'jah's Melons. Certain stones on Mount Carmel are so called. (See Stanley, Sinai and Palestine.)

Two similar formations are those called "The Virgin Mary's Peas" (q.v.). Compare also the Bible story of Lot's wife.

The story is that the owner of the land refused to supply the wants of the prophet, and consequently his melons were transformed into stones.

Eliminate (1 syl.). To turn out of doors; to turn out of an equation everything not essential to its conditions. (Latin, a eliminare, out of doors.)

Ello. (George). A nom de plume of Marian Evans (Mrs. Cross), author of Adam Bede, etc. (1820-1890).

Elliot's Tailors. The 16th Hussars, now the 16th [King's] Hussars, previously called the 15th, or king's own royal light dragoon guards. In 1799 Lieutenant-Colonel Elliot enlisted a large number of tailors on strike into a cavalry regiment modelled after the Prussian hussars. This regiment so highly distinguished themselves, that George III. granted them the honour of being called "the king's royal."

Elissa. Dido, Queen of Carthage. A Phoenician name signifying heroic, brave.

"Nec me meminisse pietas Elissa."--Virgil: Aeneid, iv. 333.

"Dido was the niece of the Bible Jezebel. Ithobal I., king of Tyre (1 Kings xvi. 13), had for children Belus, Margenwus, and Jezabel. Of these Belus was the father of Pygmalion and Dido. Hence Jezabel was Dido's aunt.

Eliss'a (deficiency or parsimony: Greek, elliptai). Step-sister of Med'ma and Fer'ssa, but they could never agree upon any subject. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv.)
Eliväger (4 syl.). A cold venomous stream which issued from Nifheim, and in the abyss called the Ginnunga Gap, hardening into layer upon layer of ice. (Scandinavian mythology.)

Elixir of Life. A ruby, supposed by the alchemists to prolong life indefinitely. The tincture for transmuting metals was also called an elixir. (Arabic, ēl or al iskeir, the iskeir (? coction).) (See AMRITA.)

"He that has once the Flower of the Sun, The perfect ruby which we call Elixir... Can confer honour, love, respect, long life, Give safety, valour, yes, and Victory, To whom he will. In eight and twenty days I'll make an old man of fourscore a child!"

Ben Jonson: The Alchemist, I. I.

Elizabeth had pet names for all her favourite courtiers; e.g.,
The mother of Sir John Norris she called "My own Crow."
Borough was her "Spirit."
Mountjoy she termed her "Kitchenmaid in Ireland."

Elizabeth has given more variants than any other Christian name: Eliza, Isi, Isabel, Lizzy, Elizabeth, Elizabetha, Betty, Bettina, Bess, Besy, etc.

Elizabeth of Hungary (St.). Patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. (1207-1231.)

Elizabethan. After the style of things in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. Elizabethan architecture is a mixture of Gothic and Italian, prevalent in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I.

Eil (Anglo-Saxon ēl, an ell). It is said that the English ell was the length of Henry I's hammer, but the ordinary length of a man's arm is about a yard.

Give him an inch, and he'll take an ell. Give him a little licence, and he will take great liberties, or make great encroachments. The ell was no definite length. The English ell was 46 inches, the Scotch ell only 37 inches, while the Flemish ell was three-quarters of a yard and a French ell a yard and a half. This indefinite measure expresses the uncertainty of the length to which persons will go to whom you give the inch of liberty. Some will go the French ell; while others of more modesty or more limited desires will be satisfied with the shorter measures.

Elíwānd (The King's). The group of stars called "Orion's Belt."

"The King's Eliwand, now foolishly termed the 'Belt of Orion.'"—Hoggs: Tales, etc.

Elia, or Allia. King of Northumberland, who married Cunstance. (Chaucer: Man of Lawes Tale.) (See CUNSTANCE.)

Eloïton. The souls of the ancient Druids, which, being too good for hell, and not good enough for heaven, are permitted to wander upon earth till the judgment day, when they will be admitted to a higher state of being. (Welsh mythology.)

Elmo's Fire (St.). Conflagrants, or electric lights occasionally seen on the masts of ships before and after a storm: so called by the Spaniards because St. Elmo is with them the patron saint of sailors. (See CASTOR AND POLLUX.)

"Sudden, breaking on their captured sight, Appeared the splendour of St. Elmo's light."—Hoole: Orlando Furioso, book ix.

Elohim. The genus of which ghosts, Chemosh, Dagob, Baal, Jahweh, etc., were species. The ghost or spectre which appeared to Saul (I Sam. xxviii. 14-20) is called Elohim. "I see Elohim coming up out of the earth," said the witch; and Saul asked, "What is HE like?" (Huxley: Nineteenth Century, March, 1886.)

"The word Elohim is often applied in the Bible to the gods of the heathen."—Schuyler: Beginnings of History, chap. vii.

In theology, Elohim (the plural of Eloah) means the "Lord of Hosts," or Lord of all power and might. Jehovah signifies rather the God of mercy and forgiveness. Hence, Elohim is used to express the God of creation, but Jehovah the God of the covenant of mercy.

"Elohim designates the fulness of Divine power."—Religious Encyclopedia.

Elohistic and Jehovistic Scriptures. The Pentatuch is supposed by Bishop Colenso and many others to have been written at two widely different periods, because God is invariably called Elohim in some paragraphs, while in others He is no less invariably called Jehovah. The Elohistic paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, are said to be the older; while the Jehovistic paragraphs indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are altogether of a more elaborate character. Those who maintain this theory think that some late transcriber has compiled the two Scriptures and combined them into one, much the same as if the four Gospels were collated and welded together into a single one. To give one or two examples:—Gen. i. 27, it is said, "So God ( Elohim) created man in His own image, (both) male and female"; whereas, in the next chapter (21-24), it is said that God (Jehovah) caused a deep sleep to fall on Adam, and that He then took from the sleeping man a rib and made it a woman: and therefore (says the writer) a man shall cleave unto his wife, and the two be considered one flesh. Again (Gen. vi. 19) Elohim tells Noah, "Two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, a male and a female"; and (vii. 9) "There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God ( Elohim) commanded Noah." In Gen. vii. 2 Jehovah tells Noah he is to make a distinction between clean and unclean beasts, and that he is to admit the former by sevens and the latter by twos. In the first example, the priestly character is indicated by the moral, and in the latter by the distinction made between clean and unclean animals. We pass no opinion on this theory, but state it as fairly as we can in a few lines.
Eloi

Eloi (St.). Patron saint of artists and smiths. He was a famous worker in gold and silver, and was made Bishop of Noyon in the reign of Dag'obert. Probably the St. Eloi of Chancr's Prioress was St. Louis (St. Loy).

"There was a man named, a prince..."

"That of pure blood was full sample and joy."

"And by them(" here lost by Scynt Loy.

Chancr: Canterbury Tales, Pro. 10-19.

: We find reference to "Scynt Loy" again in verse 7143.

Eloquent. The old man eloquent. Isocrates, the Greek orator. When he heard that Grecian liberty was extinguished by the battle of Charonea, he died of grief.

"That dishonored victor..."

At Charonea, fatal to liberty.

Killed with regret that old man eloquent."

Milton: Sonnets (To Lady Margaret Loy).

The eloquent doctor. Peter Aureolus, Archbishop of Aix, a schoolman.

Eshander or Cannie Eshlie. The Black Dwarf, alias Sir Edward Manley, alias the Reclus, alias the Wise Wight of Muckstein Moor. (Sir Walter Scott: The Black Dwarf.)

Elsie. The daughter of Gottlieb, a farm tenant of Prince Henry of Holneck. The prince was suffering severely from some malady, and was told that he would be cured if any maiden would give her life as a substitute. Elsie vowed to do so, and accompanied the prince from Germany to Salerno. Here Elsie surrendered herself to Lucifer, but was rescued by the prince, who married her. His health was perfectly re-established by the pilgrimage. (Tennyson: The Golden Legend.)

Elves. (See under Enf.)

Elvidna. The hall of the goddess Hel (q.c.).

Elvino. A rich farmer, in love with Ami'na, the somnambulist. The fact of Ami'na being found in the bed of Count Rodolpho the day before the wedding, induces Elvino to reject her hand and promise marriage to Liza; but he is soon undeceived:—Ami'na is proved to be innocent, and Liza to have been the paramour of another: so Ami'na and Elvino are wedded under the happiest auspices. (Bellini's opera, La Sonnambula. (See Liza.)

Elvira (Donna). A lady deceived by Don Giovanni, who诱ded her into a liaison with his valet, Leporello. (Mozart's opera, Don Giovanni.)

Elvira. A lady who loved Erna'ni, the robber-captain, and head of a league against Don Carlos, afterwards Charles V. of Spain. She was betrothed to Don Ruy Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detested, and Erna'ni resolved to rescue her; but it so happened that the king himself fell in love with her, and tried to win her. When Silva learned this, he joined the league; but the king, overhearing the plot in concealment, arrested the conspirators. Elvira interceded for them, and the king granted them a free pardon. When Erna'ni was on the point of wedding Elvira, Erna'ni, being summoned to death by Silva, stabbed himself. (Verdi's opera of Erna'ni.)

Elvish or Elfin. Irritable, peevish, spiteful; full of little mischievous ways, like the elves. Our superstitious forefathers thought such persons were actually "possessed" by elves; and elvish-marked is marked by elves or fairies.

"Thou elvish-marked, abhorrive, roaming hog."

"O'er which were shadowy cast Elysian gloams."

Thomson: Castle of Indolence, i. 44.

"Would take the prisoned soul, and lay it in Elysium."

Milton: Comus, 201-2.
Elzevir. An edition of a classic author, published and printed by the family of Elzevir, and said to be immaculate. Virgil, one of the masterpieces, is certainly incorrect in some places. (1582-1626.)

Em. The unit of measure in printing. The standard is a pica M; and the width of a line is measured by the number of such M's that would stand side by side in the "stick." This dictionary is in double columns; each column equals 11 pica M's in width, and one M is allowed for the space between. Some work is made up to 10½, 20½, etc., ems; and for the half-em printers employ the letter N, which is in width half a letter M. As no letter is wider than the M, and all narrower letters are fractions of it, this letter forms a very convenient standard for printing purposes.

Embargo. To lay an embargo on him or it is to impose certain conditions before you give your consent. It is a Portuguese and Spanish word, meaning an order issued by authority to prevent ships leaving port for a fixed period.

Embarras de Richesse. More matter than can be used; overcrowded with facts or material. A publisher or editor who is overwhelmed with MSS., or contributions; an author who has more incidents or illustrations in support of his theory than he can produce, etc., have an embarras de richesse.

Ember Days are the Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of Ember Weeks (q.v.).

Ember Weeks. A corruption of quatuor tempora, through the Dutch quatemper and German quadratember. The four times are after Quadragesima Sunday, Whit Sunday, Holyrood Day (September), and St. Lucia's Day (December). The supposition that persons sat in embers (or ashes) on these days is without foundation.

Emblem is a picture with a hidden meaning; the meaning is "cast into" or "inserted in" the visible device. Thus, a balance is an emblem of justice, white of purity, a sceptre of sovereignty. (Greek, en-ballo, which gives the Greek episyme.) (See Apostles, Patron Saints.)

Some of the most common and simple emblems of the Christian Church are—

A chalice. The eucharist.

The circle inscribed in an equilateral triangle. To denote the co-equality and co-eternity of the Trinity.

A cross. The Christian's life and conflict; the death of Christ for man's redemption.

A crown. The reward of the perseverance of the saints.

A dove. The Holy Ghost.

A hand from the clouds. To denote God the Father.

A lamb, fish, pelican, etc., etc. The Lord Jesus Christ.

A phœnix. The resurrection.

Emblems of the Jewish Temple. (See Exod. xxv. 30-32; Rev. i. 12-20.)

Golden candlestick. The Church, its seven lights, the seven spirits of God. (Rev. iv. 6.)

The show-bread. The twelve loaves the twelve tribes of Israel, represented in the Gospel by the twelve apostles.

The incense of sweet spices. Prayer, which rises to heaven as incense. (Rev. viii. 3, 4.)

The Holy of Holies. The name of the Jews God's peculiar people. When the veil which separated it from the temple was "rent in twain," it is supposed that thenceforth Jews and Gentiles all formed one people of God.

Embryo means that which swells inside something (Greek, en-brito, which gives the Greek embrunon); hence the child in the womb; the rudiment in a plant before it shows itself in a bud; an idea not developed, etc.

Em'leye. The sister-in-law of "Duke Theseus," beloved by the two knights, Pal'amon and Ar'cyte, the former of whom had her to wife. It is of this lady the poet says, "Up rose the sun, and up rose Emelye" (v. 2275).

"This passenger by yeer and day and day,
Till it fell unter in a morn of May,
Thynk Emelye, that fairest to remem
Thyn that line on hire sake so green
And fresher then the May with flowers new,
For it was she, as sche was wont to do,
Sche was afraught." Chancre: Canterbury Tales (The Knight's Tale).

Emerald Isle. Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. Divennau (1764-1820), in the poem called Erin. Of course, it refers to the bright green verdure of the island.

"Noe one feeling of vengeance presume to deifie

Emeralds. According to tradition, if a serpent fixes its eyes upon an emerald it becomes blind. (Ahmed ben Abd alazz: Treatise on Jewels.)

Emergency. A sudden emergency is something which starts suddenly into view, or which rises suddenly out of the current of events. (Latin, e-mergo, to rise out of "the water.""

Emergency Man (An). One engaged for some special service, as in Irish evictions.
Emiete (French). A seditious rising or small riot. Literally, a moving-out. (Latin, e-movĕre.)

Emile (2 syl.). The French form of Emiliius. The hero of Jean Jacques Rousseau’s novel of the same name, and his ideal of a perfectly educated young man.

Emilia (in Shakespeare’s Othello). Wife of Iago. She is induced by her husband to purloin Desdemona’s handkerchief, which Iago conveys to Cassio’s chamber, and tells the Moor that Desdemona had given it to the lieutenant as a love-token. At the death of Desdemona, Emilia (who, till then, never suspected the real state of the case) reveals the fact, and Iago kills her.

Emile (The divine), to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Madame Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey for ten years.

Emmet contracted into Ant: thus, Emn’t, ent, ant (Anglo-Saxon, enmet). “A bracelet made of emmet’s eye.” Drayton: Court of Fairies.

Emo. Your emme Christen (Bosworth), i.e. your even or fellow Christian. Shakespeare (Hamlet, v. 1) has “your even Christian.” (Anglo-Saxon, even-cristen, fellow-Christian.)

Emolument. Literally, that which comes out of the mill. (Latin, e-molium.) It originally meant toll on what was ground. (See Gruer.)

Emotion. Literally, the movement of the mind brought out by something which affects it. The idea is this: The mind, like electricity, is passive till something occurs to affect it, when it becomes roused; the active state thus produced is its emotion, and the result thereof is passion or affection. (Latin, e-movere.)

Empanel or Impanel is to write the names of a jury on a panel, or piece of parchment. (French, panneau, i.e. pan de peau, piece of skin.)

Empannel. To put the pack-saddle on a beast of burden.

“Saddle Rosinante, and empannel thine ass.”—Don Quixote, ii. 23.

Empedocles (4 syl.) of Sicily. A disciple of Pythagoras. According to Lucian, he threw himself into the crater of Etna, that persons who might suppose he was returned to the gods; but Etna threw out his sandal, and destroyed the illusion. (Horace: Ars Poetica, 404.) (See Cleombrotus.)

“Do who, to be deemed
A god, leaped fondly into Etna’s flames,
Empedocles.”—Milton: Paradise Lost, ii. 471.

Emperor. Emperor, not for myself, but for my people. The maxim of Hadrian, the Roman emperor (118-138).

Emperor of Believers. Omar I., father-in-law of Mahomet, and second caliph of the Mussulmans (681-694).

Emperor of the Mountains, king of the woods, and lord of the highways from Florence to Naples. A title assumed by Peter the Calabrian, a famous bandit-chief (1812).

Empire City (Th.). New York, the great commercial city of the United States.

Empire of Reason; the Empire of Truth, etc., i.e. reason or truth as the governing principle. Empire is the Latin imperium, a jurisdiction, and an emperor is one who holds command.

Empirics. Quacks. A school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria, who contended that it is not necessary to obtain a knowledge of the nature and functions of the body in order to treat diseases, but that experience is the surest and best guide. They were opposed to the Dogmatists (q.v.). (Greek, peirao, to try, which gives the Greek emperia, experience.)

“... We must not
So stain our judgment, or corrupt our hope,
To prostitute our, sax-curne madny
To empirics.”—Shakespeare: All’s Well That Ends Well, ii. 1.

Emploë (French). One in our employ: such as clerks, shopmen, servants, etc. Employed, a female employed by a master. Employee, either sex.

“... In Italy, all railroad employees are subjected to rigorous examination.”—Barlow: Epenphat, i. 64.

“... All these employees should be axmen of character.”—Macmillan’s Magazine (July, 1892, p. 257.

Empson. The favourite flageloet-player of Charles II., introduced into Scott’s Peter of the Peak.

“Julian could only bow obedience, and follow
Empson, who was the same person that played so rarely on the flageloet.”—Chap. xx.

Empty as Air. (Ang-Sax, emtig.) “Dead men’s eyes to fill the empty air.”—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., v. 2.

Empty Champagne Bottles. Fellow-commoners at Cambridge used to be so called, their academical dress being a gaudy purple and silver gown, resembling the silver foil round the neck of a champagne bottle. Very few of these wealthy magnates took honours.

The nobleman's gown was silk.

Empty Chance. A chance not worth calculating on. The ace of dice was, by the Greeks and Romans, left empty, because the number of dice was equal to the number of aces thrown. As ace is the lowest chance, the empty chance was the least likely to win.

Empyrean. According to Ptolemus, there are five heavens, the last of which is pure clemency fire and the seat of deity; this fifth heaven is called the empyrean (from the Greek en-py, in fire). (See HEAVEN.)

"Now bad the Almighty Father from above,
From the pure empyrean where He sits
High throned above all height; bent down his eye.
Milton: Paradise Lost, iii. 600.

And again, book vi. 833:
"The steadfast empyrean shone without."

En Evidence (French). To the fore.

"Mr. has been much en evidence of late in the lobby; but, as he has no seat, his chance of being in the ministry is very problematical."—Newspaper paragraph, February, 1881.

En Garçon. As a bachelor, "To take me en garçon," without ceremony, as a bachelor fares in ordinary life.

En Masse. The whole lot just as it stands; the whole.

En Rapport. In harmony with; in sympathetic lines with.

En Route. On the way; on the road or journey.

Enàlio-saurians (Greek, ena-lizards). A group of fossil saurians, including the Ichthyosaurus, Pleiosaurus, Sauropteryg, etc., etc.

Encaladeas. The most powerful of the giants that conspired against Zeus (Jupiter). The king of gods and men cast him down, and threw Mount Etna over him. The poets say that the flames of this volcano arise from the breath of this giant. The battle-field of his contest was Phlegrean, in Macedonia.

"So fierce Encalades in Phlegrean stood.
Holes: Jerusalem Delivered.
"I tell you, younglings, not Encalades,
With all his threatening band of Typhon's brood.
Shall seize this prey out of his father's hands."
Shakespeare: Titus Andronicus, iv. 2.

Enchanted Castles. De Saint Foix says that women and girls were subject to violence whenever they passed by an abbey quite as much as when they approached a feudal castle. When these victims were sought for and demanded back, the monks would sustain a siege rather than relinquish them; and, if close pressed, would bring to the walls some sacred relic, which so awed the assailants that they would desert rather than incur the risk of violating such holy articles. This, he says, is the origin of enchanters, enchantments, and enchanted castles. (Historical Essays.)

Enchanter is one who sings incantations. (Latin, in-cauto, to sing over or against some one.)

Enoëmmus. The Greek ἐνοημίω is a revel in honour of [Bacchus], in which the procession marches from ἐνόημι to ἐνόημι; i.e. village to village. ἐν-οëmmion is the hymn sung in these processions in honour of Bacchus; hence, praise, eulogy.

Encore (French). Our use of this word is unknown to the French, who use the words pas (twice) if they wish a thing to be repeated. The French, however, say encore un bi (another cup), encore une foi (still once more). It is strange how we have perverted almost every French word that we have naturalised. (See English French.)

Encratites (4 syl.). A sect of the second century, who condemned marriage, forbade eating flesh or drinking wine, and rejected all the luxuries and comforts of life as "things sinful." The sect was founded by Tatian, a heretic of the third century, who compiled from four other books what he called a Diatessaron—an heretical gospel. (See Euripides, book iv. chap. xxix.) (Greek, oprates, self-mastery.)

This heretic must not be confounded with Tatian the philosopher, a disciple of Justin Martyr, who lived in the second century.

Encroach means literally to put on a hook, or to hook on. Those who hook on a little here and a little there. (French, en croc, on a hook.)

End. (Ang.-Sax. end, verb endian.) At my wit's end. At a standstill how to proceed further; at a non-plus.
He is no end of a fellow. A capital chap; a most agreeable companion; an A1 [A one] (q.v.). He is an "all round" man, and therefore has no end.
To be [one's] end. The cause or agent of [his] death.

"This apoplexy will be his end."
Shakespeare: ? Henry IV, iv. 4.

To begin at the wrong end. To attempt to do something unmethodically. This is often done in education, where children are taught grammar before they are taught words. No one on earth would teach his child to talk in such a manner. First talk anyhow, and when words are familiar, teach the grammar of sentences. The allusion may be to thread wound on a card or bobbin; if anyone attempts to unwind it at the wrong end, he will entangle the thread and be unable to unwind it.

To come to the end of one’s tether. To do all that one has ability or liberty to do. The allusion is to an animal tied to a rope; he can graze only so far as his tether can be carried out.

To have it at my finger’s end. To be perfectly au fait; to remember perfectly, and with ease; tanguam nugas scrie. The allusion is to work done with the fingers (such as knitting), which needs no thought after it has become familiar.

To have it on [or at] the tip of my tongue. (See Tip of My Tongue.)

A rope’s end. A short length of rope bound at the end with thread, and used for punishing the refractory.

A shoemaker’s end. A length of thread pointed with a bristle, and used by shoemakers.

My latter end. At the close of life.

“At the latter end, towards the close. ‘At the latter end of a dinner.’

Shakespeare: All’s Well, etc., ii. 5.

On end. Erect.

To put an end to. To terminate or cause to terminate.

West end, East end, etc. The quarter or part of a town east or west of the central or middle part.

End-irons. Two movable iron cheeks or plates, still used in cooking-stoves to enlarge or contract the grate at pleasure. The term explains itself, but must not be mistaken for androns or ‘dogs.’

End of the World (The). According to rabbinical mythology, the world is to last six thousand years. The reasons assigned are (1) because the name Jehovah contains six letters; (2) because the Hebrew letter m occurs six times in the book of Genesis; (3) because the patriarch Enoch, who was taken to heaven without dying, was the sixth generation from Adam (Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahala-leel, Jared, Enoch); (4) because God created the world in six days; (5) because six contains three binaries—the first 2000 years were for the law of nature, the next 2000 years the written law, and the last 2000 the law of grace.

Seven would suit this fancy quite as well: there are seven days in a week; Jehovah contains seven letters; and Enoch was the seventh generation of the race of man; and the first two binaries were not equal periods.

Ends. To burn the candle at both ends. To be like a man on double business bound, who both neglects. Of course, no candle could burn at both ends, unless held horizontally, as the lower end would be extinguished by the melted wax or tallow.

To make two or both ends meet. To make one’s income cover expenses; to keep out of debt. The allusion is to a belt somewhat too tight. The French say joindre les deux bouts.

Endemic. Pertaining to a locality. An endemic disease is one common to a particular district, from which it shows no tendency to spread. Thus intermittent fevers are endemic in marshy places.

Endorse. I endorse that statement. I accept it; I fully accord with it. The allusion is to the commercial practice of writing your name on the back of a bill of exchange or promissory note if you choose to make yourself responsible for it. (Latin, in-dormo, on the back.)

Endymion, in Greek mythology, is the setting sun with which the moon is in love. Endymion was condemned to endless sleep and everlasting youth, and Selene kisses him every night on the Latmian hills.

“The moon sleeps with Endymion,
And would not be awaked.”

Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

Enemy. How goes the enemy? or What says the enemy? What o’clock is it? Time is the enemy of man, especially of those who are behind time.

Enfant Terrible (Au) [lit., a terrible child]. A moral or social nuisance.

Enfield Rife. So called from the factory at Enfield where it is made.

Enflade (French) means literally to spin out; to put thread in [a needle], as enfler une aiguille; to string beads by putting them on a thread, as enfler des perles. Soldiers being compared to thread, we get the following metaphors: to go through a place as thread through a needle—to string artillery by placing it in a line and directing it against an enemy; hence, to scour or rake with shot.

England. Verstegan quaintly says that Egbert was “chiefly moved” to call his kingdom England “in respect of England Expects. 420

England Expects that Every Man will do his Duty. The parole signalled by Horatio Nelson to his fleet before the battle of Trafalgar.

England's Darling. Here are the Wake, in the time of William the Conqueror. The "Camp of Refuge" was established in the Isle of Ely, and the Earl of Morcar joined it in 1071. It was blockaded for three months by William, and Hereward (3 syl.) with some of his followers escaped.

Englentyne (3 syl.). The Nonne or Prioress of Chaucer's pilgrims. An admirable character sketch. (Canterbury Tales; Prologue, 118-104.) (See ELOR.)

English French. A kind of perspicuity seems to pervade many of the words which we have borrowed from the French. Thus curate (French vicaire); Vicar (French curé). Encore (French bis). Epergne (French surtou); Surtout (French paravene). Screw (French vis), whereas the French évre we call a nut; and our vice is étain in French.

Some still say à l'outrance (French à outrance).

We say double entendre, the French à doux entente.

The reader will easily call to mind other examples.

Englishman. The national nickname of an Englishman is "a John Bull." The nation, taken in the aggregate, is nicknamed "John Bull." The French nickname for an Englishman is "Godum." (See BULL.)

Englishman's Castle. His house is so called, because so long as a man shuts himself up in his own house, no bailiff can break through the door to arrest him or seize his goods. It is not so in Scotland.

Eniđ. The daughter and only child of Yu̱i̱o̱l, and wife of Prince Geraint, one of the Knights of the Round Table. Ladies called her "Enid the Fair," but the people named her "Enid the Good." (Idyls of the King; Geraint and Enid.)

Enlightened Doctor (Th). Raymond Lully, Bishop of Palma, one of the most distinguished men of the thirteenth century. (1234-1315.)

Enniskillens. The 6th Dragoons; instituted 1689, on account of their brave defence of the town of Enniskillen, in favour of William III.

This cavalry regiment must not be confounded with the Inniskillings or Old 27th Foot, now called the 1st battalion of the Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers, which is a foot regiment.

Ennius. The Chaucer or father of Roman poets. (B.C. 239-169.)

The English Ennius. Layamon, who wrote a translation in Saxon of Wace's Brute.

The French Ennius. Guillaume de Lorris (1235-85), author of the Romance of the Rose, called the Îleâd of France. Sometimes Jehan de Meung (1260-1320), who wrote the continuation of the same romance, is so called.

The Spanish Ennius. Juan de Mena, born at Cor'dova. (1412-56.)

Enough. (Anglo-Saxon, genō or genog.) Enough! Stop now; you have said all that is needful.

Enough is as good as a feast.

Latin: "Ille satius est, quod satis est."

French: "On est assez riche, quand on a le nécessaire."

At one time Eno was used for numbers reckoned by tale, as: There are chairs enow, nails enow, men enow, etc.; but now enough does duty for both words, and enow is archaic.

Enascom'oe (2 syl.). To hide; to put under cover. Literally, to cover with a scowe, or fort. (German, schanze, a fort; Danish, schaus; Swedish, skans; Latin, abscondo, to hide.)

Ensemble. The tout ensemble. The general effect; the effect when the whole is regarded. (French.)

Ensign. (French, ensigner.) Of ancient Athens, an owl. America. The Stars and Stripes. The British Navy. The Union Jack (g.r.). The white ensign (Royal Navy) is the banner of St. George with the Jack cantoned in the first quarter. The red ensign is that of the merchant service.
Enter a House right Foot foremost (Petronius). It was thought unlucky to enter a house or to leave one's chamber left foot foremost. Augustus was very superstitious on this point. Pythagoras taught that it is necessary to put the shoe on the right foot first. "When stretching forth your feet to have your sandals put on, first extend your right foot" (Protreptics of Iamblichus, symbol XII). Iamblichus tells us this symbolized that man's first duty is reverence to the gods.

Entering Short. When bills are paid into a banker's hands to receive the amount when due, it is called "entering them short." In this case, if the banker fails, the assignees must give them up. Bills in the hands of factors may be so entered.

Enthusiast is one who believes that he himself is in God, or that God is in him (Greek, en theos). Our word inspired is very similar, being the Latin in spiritu (in the spirit).

Entire. Ale, in contradistinction to "cooper," which is half ale and half porter. As Calvert's entire, etc.

Entre Nous (French). Between you and me; in confidence.

N.B.—One of the most common vulgarisms of the better class is "Between you and I."

Entrée (To have the). To be eligible for invitations to State balls and concerts.

Entremets (en-trem-may). Sweet foods or kickshaws served at table between the main dishes, courses, or removes; literally, entrâ-mets (French), things put between. We now use two words, entrée and entremets, the former being subordinate animal foods handed round between the main dishes, and the latter being sweet made dishes.

Eolian. An Eolian harp. A box fitted with strings, like a fiddle. The strings, however, are not sounded by a bow, but by a current of air or wind passing over them. "Awake, Eolian harp, awake, And give to rapture all thy trembling strings." Gray: Progress of Poetry, lines 1, 2.

Eolus. God of the winds. (Roman mythology.)

Epact. The excess of the solar year over the lunar year, the former consisting of 365 days, and the latter of 354, or eleven days fewer. The epact of any year is the number of days from the last new moon of the old year to the Ist of the following: January. (Greek, epactos, feminine epactis, adjectitious.)

Epetgne (2 syl.). A large ornamental stand placed in the middle of a dining-table. It is generally said to be a French word, but the French call such an ornamental stand a sourt ou, strangely adopted by us to signify a frock-coat, which the French call a pardessus. The nearest French word is épargne, saving, as cause d'épargne, a savings bank; verb épargner, to spare or save. (See English French.)

Ephes'i. Youths between the age of eighteen and twenty were so called at Athens. (Greek, arrived at puberty.)

Ephes'ian. A jovial companion; a thief; a roysterer. A pun on the verb to ephes—A-ephesian—Thesee is to flatter.

"It is thine heat, thin Ephesian, call".

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windser, iv. 5.

Ephesian Letters. Magic characters. The Ephesians were greatly addicted to magic. Magic characters were marked on the crown, cinchure, and feet of Diana; and, at the preaching of Paul, many which used curious [magical] books burnt them. (Acts xix. 19.)

The Ephesian poet. Hippo'max, born at Ephesus in the sixth century B.C.

Ephial'tes (4 syl.). A giant who was deprived of his left eye by Apollo, and of his right eye by Hercules.

Ephial'tes (4 syl.). The nightmare. (Greek, ephial'tes, an incubus; from ephial'lo, to leap upon.)

"Feverish symptoms all, with which those who are haunted by the night-bug, whom the learned call Anthrac, but we but too well know, are possessed."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. 2.

Eph'ari or Epher. Spartan magistrates, five in number, annually elected from the ruling caste. They exercised control even over the kings and satraps.

Ep'ic. Father of epic poetry. Homer (about 950 B.C.), author of the Iliad and Odyssey.

"Celestial epics are the Iliad, Odyssey, Encid, Paradin Lost."

The great Puritan epic. Milton's Paradise Lost.

"Speaking of M. Doré's performances as an illustrator of the great Puritan epic."—The Times.

Ep'icure (3 syl.). A sensualist; one addicted to good eating and drinking. So called from Epicurus (q.v.).

Sir Epicure. A worldly sensualist in The Alchemist, by Ben Jonson. His surname is "Mammon."

Ep'icure'an. Carnal; sensual; pertaining to good eating and drinking. (See Epicuro's.)

T. Moore has a prose romance entitled The Epicurean.

"Epicurean cooks.Sharpen with cloves a piece his appetite,"

Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.

Epicu'ros. (Latin form, Epicurius.) The Greek philosopher who founded the Epicure'an school. His axiom was that "happiness or enjoyment is the summum bonum of life." His disciples corrupted his doctrine into "Good living is the object we should all seek," or, according to the drinking song, "Who leads a good life is sure to live well."

"Best be the day I escaped the wrangling crew,
From Pyrrho's [q.v.] maze and Epicurus' sly; Eudeme: Mindful.

The Epicurus of China. Tao-tse, who commenced the search for the "elixir of life." Several of the Chinese emperors lost their lives by drinking his "potion of immortality" (B.C. 540).

Ep'i-dem'ics is from the two Greek words epi-de'mos (upon the people), a disease that attacks a number of people at once, either from bad air, bad drainage, or other similar cause.

Epigram. A short pointed or anti-theatrical poem; or any short composition happily or anti-theatrically expressed.

Epi'lepsy was called by the Romans the Comitial or Congress sickness (morbus comitia'lis), because the polling for the comitia centuria'ta was null and void if any voter was seized with epilepsy while the votes were being taken.

Epimen'id'es (5 syl.). A philosopher of Crete, who fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake again for fifty-seven years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom. (Pliny: Natural History.) (See Rip Van Winkle.)

"Like Epimenides, I have been sleeping in a cave; and, waking, see those whom I left children are bearded men."—Halcyon Lytton (Lord Lytton).

Epiph'any. The time of appearance, meaning the period when the star appeared to the wise men of the East. The 6th January is the Feast of the Epiphany. The word is not special to Christianity. One of the names of Zeus was Epiphanes (the manifest one), and festivals in his honour were called "Epiphanies." (Greek, epi-phainwos, to shine upon, to be manifest [in creation].)

Epi'som'on, in Greek numerals, is a sign standing for a numeral. Thus, επισομόν βαβ, generally called Pan.
Episode

Episemon, stands for 6, and iota-episemon for 16. There are two other symbols—viz. kappa for 90, and sampi [sun-pi] for 900. The reason is this: The Greek letters were used for numerals, and were ranged in three columns of nine figures each; but 24 letters will not divide by 9, so the 3 symbols, episemon, kappa, and sampi were added to make up 3 x 9. Col. 1, from 1 to 20; col. 2, from 20 to 100; col. 3, from 100 to 1,000.

Bau and Fan are identical, the B or F being the dilemma. Thus óμεν (omne) was pronounced óµν, in Latin Omnium.

A dash under a letter multiplied it a hundredfold. Thus, α = 1, but αα = 1000. For intermediate figures between full tons a mark was made above the unit. Thus: (iova) = 10; but αα = 10 + 1 = 11, ββ = 10 + 2 = 12; γγ = 10 + 3 = 13, and so on.

Episemon (3 syl.) is the Greek episemon, episemon-odos (coming in besides—i.e. adventitious), meaning an adventitious tale introduced into the main story.

In music, an intermediate passage in a fugue, whereby the subject is suspended.

"In ordinary fugues . . . it is usual to allow a certain number of bars to intervene from time to time, after which the subject is resumed. The intervening bars . . . are called Episoden."—Owley: Counterpoint, xxiii. 110.

Epistle is a somnus; it is sent to another. A letter sent by messenger or post. (Greek, epist. stella.)

Epistate is epistate (upon the herds and flocks). Zoology is used to signify a treatise on animals, but we generally except man; so episate is used, demon (man) not being included.

Epoch means that which bounds in or holds in hand. The starting-point of a sequence of events harnessed together like a team of horses; also the whole period of time from one epoch to another. Our present epoch is the Birth of Christ: previous to this epoch it was the Creation of the World. In this latter sense the word is synonymous with era. (Greek, epis-echo.)

"The incarnation of Christ is the greatest moral epoch in the universe of God."—St. Thomas: Parables Unfolded (The Lost Sheep), p. 104.

Epode (2 syl.). In the Greek epode the chorus returned to their places and remained stationary. It followed the strophe (2 syl.).

Father of choral epode. Stesichorus of Sicily (n.c. 632-552).

Epseon Races. Horse races held in May, and lasting four days. They are held on Epsom Downs, and were instituted by Charles I. The second day (Wednesday) is the great Derby day, as called from Lord Derby, who instituted the stakes in 1780. The fourth day (Friday) is called the Oaks, so called from "Lambert's Oaks." The "Oaks Estate" passed into the Derby family, and the twelfth Earl of Derby established the stakes.

* The Derby, the Oaks, and the St. Leger (held at Doncaster) are called the Three Classic Races. N.B.—There are other races held at Epsom besides the great four-day races mentioned above—for instance, the City Suburban and the Great Metropolitan (both handicap races).

Epseon Salts. A salt formerly obtained by boiling down the mineral water in the vicinity of Epsom, but now chemically prepared. It is the sulphate of magnesia.

Equal-to, in mathematics. The symbol (=), two little parallel lines, was invented by Robert Recorde, who died 1558.

"As he said, nothing is more equal than parallel lines."

Equation of Time. The difference between mean and apparent time—i.e. the difference between the time as shown by a good clock and that indicated by a sundial. The greatest difference is in November, at the beginning of which month the sun is somewhat more than sixteen minutes too slow. There are days in December, April, June, and September when the sun and the clocks agree.

Eques Auratus. A knight bachelor, called auratus because he was allowed to gird his armour—a privilege confined to knights.

Equipage (3 syl.). Tea equipage. A complete tea-service. To equip means to arm or furnish, and equipage is the furniture of a military man or body of troops. Hence camp equipage (all things necessary for an encampment); field equipage (all things necessary for the field of battle); a prince's equipage, and so on.

Equity. (See Aetrea.)

Era. A series of years beginning from some epoch or starting-point, as:

Hadès. "A valley of the shadow of death."

"Not Erebus itself were dim enough
To hide thee from prevention."

_Eretrian_. The Eretrian bull. _Menademos_ of Eretria, in Euboea; a Greek philosopher of the fourth century B.C., and founder of the Eretrian school, which was a branch of the Socratics. He was called a "bull" from the bull-like gravity of his face.

_Eri'gona_. John Scottus, called "Scottus the Wise," who died 886. He must not be confounded with Duns Scottus the schoolman, who lived some four centuries after him (1265-1308).

_Erin_. Ireland (q.v.).

_Erin'ny's_ or Erin'ys. The goddess of vengeance, one of the Furies. (Greek mythology.)

_Eriph'ila_. The personification of avarice, who guards the path that leads to pleasure, in _Orlando Furioso_, vi. 61.

_Erix_. son of Goliath (sic) and grandson of Atlas. He invented legerdemain. (Duches: _Ouevres de Rabelais_; 1711.)

_Eri'king_. King of the elves, who prepares mischief for children, and even deceives men with his seductions. He is said to haunt the Black Forest.

_Erm'eline_ (Dame). Reynard's wife, in the tale of _Reynard the Fox._

_Ermio'nes_ (4 syll.). A renegade Christian, whose name was Clement. He was entrusted with the command of the caliph's "regal host," and was slain by Godfrey. (Tasso: _Jerusalem Delivered._)

_Erm'ine_ or _Hermine_. Littré derives the word from Armenia, and says it is the "Pontic rat" mentioned by Pliny; if so, the better spelling would be "Armine." Prof. Skeat derives the word from the French _hermine_, through _harma_, the ermine, stoa, or weasel. The ermine is technically called the _Mustela erminaca._

_Er'mine Street_. One of the four great public ways made in England by the Romans. The other three are _Walling Street_, _Ikenild Street_, and the _Fossa_. Germanicus derives Ermin from _Hermes_, whence _Erminum_ (a column of Mercury), because Mercury presided over public roads. This is not correct; Erminsul, or rather Ermonsul, is the Scandinavian Odin, not a "Column of Mercury" at all; and Erming Street really means Odin's Street.

1. Yar wyesen man on ther ben in England,
   But you must not so use it in England, at all; or your son shall be hanged.

2. From the south into the north takt Erming-street.

3. From the east into the west south Thames-street.

4. From the south-east (east) to North-west (that is sum del gret).

5. From Dover (Dover) into Chestre goth Watling-
   street.

6. The fort is most of all tills from Totneners.

7. From the end one of Cornwall anon to Catenays [Caithness].

8. From the south to North-west into Englandes end fores men callith thinke vox.

Robert of Gloucester.

Erminia. The heroine of Jerusalem Delivered. When her father, the King of Antioch, was slain at the siege of Antioch, and Erminia fell captive into the crusader's hands, Tancred gave her her liberty, and restored to her all her father's treasures. This generous conduct quite captivated her heart, and she fell in love with the Christian prince.
A'adine, King of Jerusalem, took charge of her. When the Christian army besieged Jerusalem, she dressed herself in Florinda's armour to go to Tancred, but, being discovered, fled, and lived awhile with some shepherds on the banks of the Jordan. Meeting with Valerio, sent as a secret spy by the crusaders, she re-vended to him the design against the life of Godfrey, and, returning with him to the Christian camp, found Tancred wounded. She cured his wounds, so that he was able to take part in the last great day of the siege. We are not told the ultimate fate of this fair Syrian.

Ernani. The bandit-captain, Duke of Segor'bia and Carlo'na, Lord of Aragon, and Count of Ernani, in love with Elvira, who is betrothed to Don Ruy
Gomez de Silva, an old Spanish grandee, whom she detests. Charles V. of Spain also loves her, and tries to win her.
Silva, finding that the king has been tampering with his betrothed, joins the league of Ernani against the king. The king, in concealment overthrows the plotters, and, at a given signal, they are arrested by his guards, but, at the intercession of Elvira, are pardoned and set free. Ernani is on the point of marrying Elvira, when a horn is heard. This horn Ernani had given to Silva when he joined the league, saying, "Sound but this horn, and at that moment Ernani will cease to live." Silva insists on the fulfilment of the compact, and Ernani stabs himself. (Verdi's opera of Ernani.)

Ernst (Duke). A poetical romance by Henry of Veldig (Waldeck), contemporary with Frederick Barbarossa.

Duke Ernest is son-in-law of Kaiser Konrad II. Having murdered his feudal lord, he went on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land to expiate his crime, and the poem describes his adventures on the way.
It is a mixture of Homeric and Oriental myths, and the tales of crusaders. Duke Ernest fulfilled his pilgrimage, returned to Germany, and received absolution.

Eros, the Greek equivalent to Cupid.

Ero's-tratus. The man who set fire to the temple of Diana in Ephesus, on the day Alexander the Great was born.
This he did to make his name immortal.
In order to defeat his vainglory, the Ephesians forbade his name to be mentioned, but such a prohibition would be sure to defeat its object.

Erra-Pater. An almanack. William Lilly, the almanack-maker and astrologer, is so called by Butler. It is said to have been the "name" of an eminent Jewish astrologer. (Halliwell: Archæo Dictionary.)

"In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater."— Butler: Hudibras, 1. 1.

Erse (1 syl.). The native language of the West Highlanders of Scotland, who are of Irish origin. It is a variant of Irish. Applied by the Scotch Low-landers to the Highland dialect of Gaelic. In the eighteenth century Scotch was often called Erse, without distinction of Highland and Lowland; and Irish was spoken of as Irish Gaelic. The practice now is to limit the word Erse to Irish, and Gaelic to Scotch Highlanders.

Erudito. Most erudito of the Romans.
Marcus Terentius Varro, a man of vast and varied erudition in almost every department of literature. (b.c. 116-27.)

Erythroc'os. (See Horse.)

Erythynus. Have no doings with the Erythynus. This is the thirty-third Symbol of the Protrepticus of Iamblichus.
The Erythynus is a fish called by Pliny (ix. 77) erythrina, a red fish with a white belly. Pythagoras used this fish as a symbol of a braegadocio, which has a lily liver. Have no doings with those who are tongue-doughty, but have white stomachs (where stomach means true courage).

Escape'de (3 syl.). French. Means literally an escape [from restraint]; therefore a spree, lark, or prank. (Spanish, escapar, escapada.)

"His second escape was made for the purpose of visiting the field of Buillon Green."—Scott:
Guy Mannering, xxxvi.
Escandrea. An event which gives rise to scandal. "By the famous Bouandré.""

"Since the last 'escandrea' he had held little or no communication with her." — Lady Herbert: Irish, 18.

Escou'age (3 syl.) means "shield service," and is applied to that obligation which bound a vassal to follow his lord to war at his own private charge. (French, escou, escu, a shield.)

Escou'plos (Latin, Esculapius). A disciple of Esculapius means a medical student. Esculapian, medical. Esculaplos, in Homer, is a "blameless physician," whose sons were the medical attendants of the Greek army. Subsequently, he was held to be the "god of the medical art."

Escou'rial. The palace of the Spanish sovereigns, about fifteen miles northwest of Madrid. It is one of the most superb structures in Europe, but is built among rocks, as the name signifies.

Escutcheon of Pretence (Au). That of a wife, either heiress or co-heiress, placed in the centre of her husband's shield.

Es'tinga. A title given to the kings of Kent, from Es, their first king, sometimes called Ochta.

Es'mond (Henry). A chivalrous cavalier in the reign of Queen Anne. The hero of Thackeray's novel entitled Esmond.

Exster'io (Greek, those within). Exoteric, those without. The term originated with Pythagoras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his exoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoteric.

Aristotle adopted the same terms, though he did not lecture behind a curtain. He called those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, his exoterics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Espielet (Ex-pe-e). Nephew of Oriande le Fès. A dwarf, not more than three feet high, with yellow hair as fine as gold, and though above a hundred years old, a seeming child of seven. He was one of the falsest knaves in the world, and knew every kind of enchantment. (Romance of Maugis d'Aigremont et de Vivianon frère.)

Esplan'dian. Son of Am'idia and Oria'na. He is the hero of Montalvo's continuation of Amadis, called The Fifth Book.

Esprit de Corps. Fellow-feeling for the society with which you are associated. A military term—every soldier will stand up for his own corps.

Esprit Follet. A bogle which delights in misleading and tormenting mortals.

Esquire. One who carried the escou or shield of a knight. (Latin, scutiger, a shield-bearer.)

Copy of a letter from C. H. Athill, Esq., "Richmond Herald": —

"Herald's College, E.C., January 26th, 1893.

"The following persons are legally 'Esquires':—

"The sons of peers, the sons of baronets, the sons of knights, the eldest sons of the younger sons of peers, and in their eldest son in perpetuity, the eldest son of the eldest son of a knight, and his eldest son in perpetuity, the kings of arms, the heralds of arms, officers of the Army or Navy of the rank of captain and upwards, sheriffs of counties for life, J.P.'s of counties whilst in commission, serjeants-at-law, queen's counsel, serjeants-at-arms, companions of the Orders of Knighthood, certain principal officers in the Queen's household, deputy lieutenants, commissioners of the Court of Bankruptcy, masters of the Supreme Court, those whom the Queen, in any commission or warrant, styles esquire, and any person who, in virtue of his office, takes precedence of esquires."

? Add to these, graduates of the universities not in holy orders.

Essays. Lord Bacon's essays were the first in English that bore the name.

"To write just treatises requir's leisure in the writer and leisure in the reader... which is the cause which hath made me choose to write certain brief notes which I have called essays." — Dedication to Prince Henry.

Esso'nos (2 syl.). A sect among the Jews in the time of our Saviour. They were communists who abjured every sort of fleshly indulgence. They ate no animal food, and drank only water. Their sacrifices to God were only fruits of the earth. They kept the Sabbath so strictly that they would not even wash a plate or rinse a cup on that day. They always dressed in white, took no part in public matters, but devoted themselves to contemplative studies. They held the Jewish Scriptures in great reverence, but interpreted them allegorically.

Essex. East seisô (the territory of the East Saxons).

Essex Lions. Calves, for which the county is famous. Valiant as an Essex lion (ironical).

Essex Stile. A ditch. As Essex is very marshy, it abounds in ditches, and has very few stiles.
Est-il-possible. A nickname of Prince George of Denmark, given him by James II. The story goes that James, speaking of those who had deserted his standard, concluded the catalogue with these words, "And who do you think besides? Why, little Est-il-possible, my worthy son-in-law." James applied this cognomen to the prince because, when George was told of his father-in-law's abdication, all he did was to exclaim, "Est-il-possible?" and when told, further, of the several noblemen who had fallen away from him, "Est-il-possible?" exhausted his indignation.

Estafette (French; Spanish, estafeta). Military couriers sent express. Their duty is to deliver the dispatches consigned to them to the postillions appointed to receive them.

Estates. Estates of the realm. The powers that have the administration of affairs in their hands. The three estates of our own realm are the Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons; popularly speaking, the public press is termed the fourth estate. It is a great mistake to call the three estates of England the Sovereign, the Lords, and the Commons, as many do. The word means that on which the realm stands. (Latin, esto, to stand.) (See Fourth Estate.)

"Here... made a supper to his... chief estates."—Mark vi. 21.

"The king and the three estates of the realm assembled in parliament."—Calct for Roz. 5.

Estate. The house of Este had for their armorial bearing a white eagle on an azure shield. Rinaldo, in Jerusalem Delivered, adopted this device; and Ariosto, in his Orlando Furioso, gives it both to Mandricarillo and Rogerio, adding that it was borne by Trojan Hector. As the Dukes of Brunswick are a branch of the house of Este, our Queen is a descendant of the same noble family.

D'Este was the surname adopted by the children of the Duke of Sussex and Lady Augusta Murray.

Estotiland. An imaginary tract of land near the Arctic Circle in North America, said to have been discovered by John Scalvi, a Pole.

"The snow
From cold Estotiland"
Milton: Paradise Lost, 1. 705.

Estramagon (French). A blow or cut with a sword, hence also "estramagoner," to play at backsword. Sir Walter Scott uses the word in the sense of a feint or pretended cut. Hence Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf, says:—

"I tripped a hastily morris... upon the dining-table, now offering my sword (to the Duke of Buckingham), and now recovering it, I made... a sort of estramagon at his nose, the externity of which consists in coming mightily near to the object without touching it."—Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxxiv.

Estrich Wool is the soft down of the ostrich, called in French, duret d'antichre. It lies immediately under the feathers of the ostrich.

Estrildis or Estrild. Daughter of a German king, and handmaid to the mythical King Humber. When Humber was drowned in the river that bears his name, King Locrin fell in love with Estrildis, and would have married her, had he not been betrothed already to Guendola; however, he kept Estrildis for seven years in a palace underground, and had by her a daughter named Sabrina. After the death of Locrin, Guendola threw both Estrildis and Sabrina into the Severn. (Geoffrey: British History, li. ch. ii. v.)

Estuary. Literally, the boiling place; the mouth of a river is so called because the water there seems to seethe and boil. (Latin, estua, to boil.)

Eternal City (The). Rome. Virgil makes Jupiter tell Venus he would give to the Romans imperium sine fine (an eternal empire). (Aeneid, i. 79.)

Eternal Fitness of Things. The congruity between an action and the agent.

"Can any man have a higher notion of the rule of right, and the eternal fitness of things?"—Fielding: Tom Jones, book vi. chap. iv.

Eternal Tables. A white pearl, extending from cast to west, and from heaven to earth, on which, according to Mahomet, God has recorded every event, past, present, and to come.

Etesian Wind (An). "Etesia fabra Aquilinum," says Lucretius (v. 741). A wind which rises annually about the dog-days, and blows forty days together in the same direction. It is a gentle and mild wind. (Greek, etinous, annual.)

"Deem not, good Porteus, that in this my song
I mean to borrow up thy humble mind,
And say that voice in London known so long:
For calm and softness, an Etesian wind."—Peter Pindar: Nihil Admirari.

Ethnic Plot. The Popish plot. In Dryden's satire of Abasolom and Achito-phil, Charles II. is called David, the royalists are called the Jews, and the Papists Gentiles or Ethni, whence “Ethnophrones” means the Gentile or Popish plot.

“Saw with disdain an Ethnophrone begin...A ancient form and order they their power employ, Nothing to build, and all things to destroy.”

Part I. 518, 523-3.

Ethnophrones (4 syl.). A sect of heretics of the seventeenth century, who practised the observances of the ancient Pagans. (Greek, ethnos-philēn, heathen-minded.)

E'thon. The eagle or vulture that gnawed the liver of Prometheus.

Et'quette (3 syl.). The usages of polite society. The word means a ticket or card, and refers to the ancient custom of delivering a card of directions and regulations to be observed by all those who attended court. The original use was a soldier’s billet. (French, etiquette; Spanish, etiqueta, a book of court ceremonies.)

“Etiquette...had its original application to those ceremonial and formal observances practised at Court...” — Burke, Works, vol. viii. p. 320.

Etna. Virgil ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of Enceladus, a hundred-headed giant, who lies buried under the mountain. (Aen. iii. 578, etc.) In Etna the Greek and Latin poets place the forges of Vulcan and the smithy of the Cyclops.

Etrus'can (2 syl.). New-year’s gifts are so called in France. Etrusca, the Roman goddess, had the superintendence of new-year’s gifts, which the Romans called servus. Taritus entered Rome on New-year’s Day, and received from some augurs palms cut from the sacred grove, dedicated to the goddess Steria. Having succeeded, he ordained that the 1st of January should be celebrated by gifts to be called servus, consisting of figs, dates, and honey; and that no word of ill omen should be uttered on that day.

Etrick Shepherd. James Hogg, the Scotch poet, who was born in the forest of Etrick, Selkirkshire. (1772-1835.)

“THe Etrick Shepherd was my guide.” —Wordsworth.

E'tzel—I.e. Attila. King of the Huns, a monarch ruling over three kingdoms and more than thirty principalities; being a widower, he married Kriemhild, the widow of Siegfried. In the Nibelungen-Lied, where he is introduced (part ii.), he is made very insignificant, and sees his liegemen, and even his son and heir, struck down without any effort to save them, or avenge their destruction. He is as unlike the Attila of history as possible.

Eucharis, in Fénelon’s Théâtre, is meant to represent Mlle. de Fontanges.

Eucharist literally means a thank-offering. Our Lord said, “Do this in remembrance of me”—i.e. out of gratitude to me. The elements of bread and wine in the Lord’s supper. (Greek, eu-charistia.)

Eud'bia. A penurious old hunk in one of the comedies of Plautus (Aulularia).

Eur'ätēs (3 syl.). More shifts than Eur'ätēs. Eurätes, the miller, was one of the archons of Athens, noted for his shifts and excuses for neglecting the duties of the office.

Eudox'ians. Heretics, whose founder was Eudoxius, patriarch of Antioch in the fourth century. They maintained that the Son had a will independent of the Father, and that sometimes their wills were at variance.

Eugenius. This was John Hall Stephenson, author of Crazy Tales, a relative of Sterne. In Sterne’s Tristram Shandy, Eugenius is made the friend and wise counsellor of Yorick.

Eulgüb'ine Tables. Seven bronze tablets found near Eugubium (Gubbio) in Italy, in 1444. Of the inscriptions, five are Umbrian and Etruscan, and two are Latin.

“The Umbrian, the tongue of north-eastern Italy, is yet more fully represented to us by the Eulgübine tablets...supposed to be as old as the third and fourth centuries before our era.”—W. D. Whitney: Study of Languages, Lecture vi. p. 330.

Eul'al'le (St.). Eul'alle is one of the names of Apollo; but in the calendar there is a virgin martyr called Eul'alie, born at Merida, in Estramadura. When she was only twelve years old, the great persecution of Diocletian was set on foot, whereupon the young girl left her maternal home, and, in the presence of the Roman judge, cast down the idols he had set up. She was martyred by torture, February 12th, 308.

Longfellow calls Evangeline the “Sunshine of St. Eulalie.”

Eul'en-spiegel (Thyl) or Tyll Orl'glass. The hero of a German tale, which relates the pranks and drolleries, the ups and downs, the freaks and fun of a wandering cottager of Brunswick. The Eustathians

A denomination so called from Eustathius, a monk of the fourth century, excommunicated by the council of Gangra.

...votive crown, but suspecting that the workman had alloyed the gold with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test the crown. The philosopher went to bathe, and, in stopping into the bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed, and putting his idea to the test, found his surmise to be correct. Now then, for the crown. Silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound-weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound-weight of gold, and being of greater bulk will remove more water. Vitruvius says: "When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming, ‘Heureka! heureka!’ and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment.” Dryden has mistaken the quantity in the lines—

"The delph thinks he stands on firmer ground, Cures ‘Heureka!’ the mighty secret’s found.”

But Byron has preserved the right quantity—

"Now we clap Our hands and cry, ‘Eureka! Yet Ovid confirms this etymology: “Vires capitis Eurus ab ortu.” Brennan says it is a corruption of lupus.

"..."Oh take the husk’d or return the w’to.”

Eurus (2 syl.). The east wind. So called, says Buttman, from εὔρος, the east. Probably it is cos vero, drawn from the east. Ovid confirms this etymology: “Vires capitis Eurus ab ortu.” Brennan says it is a corruption of lupus.

"..."While southern gales or western ocean roll, And Eurus steals his re-wind’s from the pole.”

Eurydice (4 syl.). Wife of Orpheus, killed by a serpent on her wedding night. Orpheus went down to the infernal regions to seek her, and was promised she should return on condition that he looked not back till he reached the upper world. When the bard got to the confines of his journey, he turned his head to see if Eurydice were following, and she was instantly caught back again into Hades.

"..."Erectus, erectus Eurydice to life; Oh, take the husk’d or return the w’to.”

Boswell’s Essay, p. 46, 50.

"His Satanic majesty; “light-fingered gent’ry; “a gentleman on his travels” (one transported); “she has met with an accident” (has had a child before marriage); “help” or “employ” (a servant); “not quite correct” (a falsehood); “an obliquity of vision” (is squint); “an innocent” (a fool); “beldam” (an ugly woman); and hundreds of others.

Heureka, or rather Heureka (I have found it out). The exclamation of Archimédès, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero’s crown. The tale is, that Hiero delivered a certain weight of gold to a workman, to be made into a...
Enthusians. Heretics of the fifth century, violently opposed to the Naz-torians. They maintained that Jesus Christ was entirely God previous to the incarnation, and entirely man during His sojourn on earth. The founder was Enthusi, an abbot of Constantinople, excommunicated in 448.

Enyx Sea (The)—i.e. the hospitaable sea. It was formerly called Aene (inhospitable). So the “Cape of Good Hope” was called the Cape of Despair.
Beneventum” was originally called Malaventum, and “Dyrrhachium” was called Epidamnus, which the Romans thought was too much like damnum to be lucky.

Evangelic Doctor (The). John Wycliffe, “the morning star of the Reformation.” (1324-1384.)

Evangelina. (4 syl.). The heroine of Longfellow’s poem so called. The subject of the tale is the expulsion of the inhabitants of Acida (Nova Scotia) from their homes by order of George II.

Evangelist, in Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s
Progress, represents the effectual preacher of the Gospel, who opens the gate of life to Christian. (See Wyoming.)

Evangelists. Symbols of the four:

Matthew. A man with a pen in his hand, and a scroll before him, looking over his left shoulder at an angel. This Gospel was the first, and the angel represents the Being who dictated it.

Matthew a man, because he begins his gospel with the descent of Jesus from the man David.

Mark. A man seated writing, and by his side a couchant winged lion. Mark begins his gospel with the sojourn of Jesus in the wilderness, amidst wild beasts, and the temptation of Satan,
“the roaring lion.” (See Lion.)

Luke. A man with a pen, looking in deep thought over a scroll, and near him a cow or ox chewing the cud. The latter part refers to the ecletic character of John. A young man of great delicacy, with an eagle in the background to denote sublimity.

The more ancient symbols were—for Matthew, a man’s face; for Mark, a lion; for Luke, an ox; and for John, a flying eagle; in allusion to the four living creatures before the throne of God, described in the Book of Revelation: “The first . . . . was like a lion, and the second . . . . like a calf, and the third . . . . had a face as a man, and the fourth . . . . was like a flying eagle” (iv. 7). Ireneus says: “The lion signifies the royalty of Christ; the calf His sacrificial office; the man’s face His incarnation; and the eagle the grace of the Holy Ghost.”

Evans (Sir Hugh). A pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of wondrous simplicity and shrewdness. (Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Evans (William). The giant porter of Charles I., who carried about in his pocket Sir Geo. Hudson, the king’s dwarf. He was nearly eight feet high.
(Died 1632.) Fuller speaks of him in his Worthies, and Sir Walter Scott introduces him in Peveril of the Peak.

“As tall a man as is in London, alway excepting the king’s porter, Master Evans, that carried you about in his pocket, Sir Geo. Hudson, as all the world has heard tell.”—Clap. xxxiii.

Evaporate (4 syl.). Be off; vanish into thin air.

“Boh and Jonathan, with rabbit meekness, took their leave and evaporated.”—Dickens: Our Mutual Friend, part i. 5.

Events. At all events. In any case; be the issue what it may; “necumque occidet.”

In the event, as “In the event of his being elected,” means in case, or provided he is elected; if the result is that he is elected.

Ever and Anon. From time to time. (See Anon.)

Ever-sworded (The). The 29th
Regiment of Foot, now called the “Worcestershire Regiment.” In 1746
a part of this regiment, then at St.
John’s Island, was surprised by the French and massacred, when a command was issued that henceforth every officer, even at meals, should wear his sword.
In 1842-1856 the regiment was in the East Indies, and the order was relaxed, requiring only the captain and subaltern of the day to dine with their swords on.

Ever-Victorious Army (The).
Ward’s army, raised in 1861, and placed under the charge of General Gordon.
By 1864 it had stamp’d out the Taiping rebellion, which broke out in 1851. (See Chinese Gordon.)

Everlasting Staircase (The). The treadmill.

Every Man Jack of Them. Everyone. The older form of everyone was everichon, often divided into every chone, corrupted first into every-john, their Evidence (In). Before the eyes of the people; to the front; actually present (Latin). Evidence, meaning testimony to proof of something, has a large number of varieties, as—

Circumstantial evidence. That based on corroborative incidents.

Demonstrative evidence. That which can be proved without laws and a doubt.

Direct evidence. That of an eye-witness.

External evidence. That derived from history or tradition.

Internal evidence. That derived from conformity with what is known.

Material evidence. That which is essential in order to carry proof.

Moral evidence. That which accords with general experience.

Presumptive evidence. That which is highly probable.

Prima facie evidence. That which seems likely, unless it can be explained away.

Queen's or King's evidence. That of an accessory against his accomplices, under the promise of pardon.

Secondary evidence. Such as is produced when primary evidence is to be obtained.

Self evidence. That derived from the senses; manifest and indubitable.

Evil Communications, etc. He who touches pitch must expect to be defiled. A rotten apple will injure its companions. One scabby sheep will infect a whole flock.

French: Il ne faut qu'une bœuf brébis galeuse pour gâter tout un troupeau.

To the same effect is the locution, "C'est une bœuf galeuse," and the idea implied is, he must be separated from the flock, or else he will contaminate others.

Evil Eye. It was anciently believed that the eyes of some persons darted noxious rays on objects which they glared upon. The first morning glance of such eyes was certain destruction to man or beast, but the destruction was not unfrequently the result of emaciation. Virgil speaks of an evil eye making cattle lean. (See Mascotte, Jettator.)

"Nec'trio quis ten'nero or'val su'l' Maria'in ag'os."

Evil May Day (1517). So called because of the riots made on that day by the London apprentices, who fell on the French residents. The ringleaders, with fifteen others, were hanged; and four hundred more of the rioters were carried to Westminster with halters round their necks, but were pardoned by "Bluff Harry the King." The Constable of the Tower discharged his cannon on the mob assembled in tumult in Cheapside Way.

Evil Principle. (See AHRIMAN, ARMANCES, ASALOR.)

Evils. "Of two evils, I have chosen the least" (Prior).

Evolution (Darwinian). Darwin's theory is that different forms of animal and vegetable life are due to small variations, and that natural selection is a main agent in bringing them about. If favourable, these variations are perpetuated, if not they die off.

Spencer's theory is that the present multitude of objects have all sprung from separate atoms originally homogeneous.

"Evolution is the integration of matter and concomitant dissipation of motion, during which the matter passes from an immediate, incoherent homogeneity to a definite coherent heterogeneity; and during which the retained motion undergoes a parallel transformation."—Spencer: First Principles, part ii. chap. xvii. p. 366.

Evolution, its process, according to biologists.

Part i.

Assuming the existence of some element, call it protex (2945), in time we get matter, and motion.

From matter and motion proceed cohesion and regulation, and from cohesion and regulation we get crystals.

Next comes chemical action into play, from which springs protoplasm, or the protoplasmic clot of purely chemical origin.

By further development the microscopic cell is formed, with its power to assimilate, and this will account for air, water, and minerals.

By parasitic next comes the proto-incilium or fungus, living on the green cells.

And then will follow the prototype, the first example of animal life.

Part ii.

(1) The Animal is the lowest of known animals, a mollusca, with the sole power of locomotion.

(2) The Nymphaea is multicellular, with an organism adapted for sensation, digestion, and the power of reproduction.

(3) Then will come the foraminifera, an organised being, with an external mouth.

(4) Next the Hydra or Polya, which has localised sense-organs and instincts.

(5) Then the Medusa, with nerves, muscles, and nerve functions.

(6) Next come worms, which have special sense-organs; and so on.

(7) Then the Hymenidae, or Sack-worm, which has a rudimentary spinal cord.

Part iii. From the Sack-worm to Man.

(1) The larva of Acridians.

(2) Lowly-organised fish, like the Lanceolat.

(3) The Lepidostoma, and other fish.

(4) The Amphibians.

(5) Birds and Reptiles.

(6) Monotremata, which connect reptiles with mammals.

(7) Mammalia.

(8) Placentals. (Fables Mammals.)

(9) The Lemuridae.

(10) The Eunoidea.

(11) The Monkey Tribe, consisting of the New World monkey (called Pithecius), and the Old World monkey (called Catarrhines, 2.14.).

(12) The Missing Link between the catarrhine monkey and man. The Ailu is thought by some to occupy this link. It is one of the monkey tribes which approaches nearer to the human species than any other yet discovered.

This is no place to criticise the theory of evolution, but merely to state it as briefly and plainly as possible.

Ewe-lamb (A). A single possession greatly prized. (2 Sam. xxiii. 1-14.)

Ex Cathedra (Latin). With authority. The Pope, speaking ex cathedra, is said to speak with an infallible voice—to speak as the successor and representative of St. Peter, and in his pontifical character. The words are Latin, and mean "from the chair"—i.e. the throne of the pontiff. The phrase is applied to all dicta uttered by authority, and ironically to self-sufficient, dogmatical assertions.

Ex Hypothesi, according to what is supposed or assumed.

"The justification of the charge [i.e., the tax for posterity] lies ex hypothesi in an enhanced value of the property in the betterment area."—The Property Protection Objection against section 37 of the Betterment clause of the Tower Bridge Southern Approach Bill (1894).

Ex Luce Lucellum. To make a gain out of light; to make a cheese-flavoured from lucifer-matches. When Robert Lowe proposed to tax lucifer-matches, he suggested that the boxes should be labelled ex luce lucellum. (Parliamentary Reports, 1871.)

"Lucifer aggrediens ex luce haurit lucellum Insidet in tentoribus; lex nova finamus exst."

Ex Officio (Latin, by virtue of his office). As the Lord Mayor for the time being shall be ex officio one of the trustees.

Ex Parte (Latin, proceeding only from one of the parties). An ex parte statement is a one-sided statement, a partial statement, a statement made by one of the litigants without being modified by the counter-statement.

Ex Pod'e Herculem. From this sample you can judge of the whole. Plutarch says that Pythagoras ingeniously calculated the height of Hercules by comparing the length of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules' stadium at Olympia was much longer. Now, says the philosopher, as the stadium of Olympia is longer than an ordinary stadium, so the foot of Hercules was longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. (Varia Scripta.)

Ex Post Facto (Latin). An ex post facto law. A law made to meet and punish a crime after the offence has been committed.

Ex Professo (Latin). Avowedly; expressly.

"I have never written ex professo on the subject."—Gladstone: Nineteenth Century, Nov., 1885.

Ex Uno Omnes means from the one instance deduced you may infer the nature of the rest. A general inference from a particular example. If one oak-tree bears acorns, all other oak-trees will grow similar fruit.

Exaltation. In old astrology, a planet was said to be in its "exaltation" when it was in that sign of the zodiac in which it was supposed to exercise its strongest influence. Thus the exaltation of Venus is in Pisces, and her "dejection" in Virgo.

"And thus, God wot, Merc'ry's desolate In Places, where Venus is exalted"—Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, 0.275.

In chemistry, the refining or subliming of bodies, or of their qualities, virtues, or strength.

Exaltation of the Cross. A feast held in the Roman Catholic Church, on September 14th, to commemorate the restoration of the cross to Calvary in 628. It had been carried away by Khasroes the Persian.

Examination. Examen is Latin for the needle indicator of a balance. To examine is to watch the indicator, so as to adjust the balance.

Examiners (Public). The examiners at the universities, and the examinations for the military, naval, and civil services, etc.

Excellibur (Ex cal [cal] liber [atua]). Liberated from the stone. The sword which Arthur drew out of the stone, whereby he proved himself to be the king. (Sir Sword.

"No sword on earth, were it the Excellibur of King Arthur, can cut that which opposes no steady resistance to the blow."—Sir Walter Scott.

Excellency (Hes). A title given to colonial and provincial governors, ambassadors, and the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. (Compare Luke i. 3.)

Excell'sitor. Aim at higher things still. It is the motto of the United States, and has been made popular by Longfellow's poem so named. Used also as the synonym of super-excellent.
Exception. To take exception. To feel offended; to find fault with.

"Her manner was so . . . respectful, that I could not take exception to this reproof."—Farjeon.

Exceptions prove the Rule. They prove there is a rule, or there could be no exceptions; the very fact of exceptions proves there must be a rule.

"Exceptio prolat regulam."—Columella.

Exchequer. Court of Exchequer. In the subdivision of the court in the reign of Edward I., the Exchequer acquired a separate and independent position. Its special duty was to order the revenues of the Crown and recover the king's debts. It was denominated Secancaium, from seaccum (a chess-board), and was so called because a chequered cloth was laid on the table of the court. (Madox: History of the Exchequer.)

"Foss, in his Lives of the Judges, gives a slightly different explanation. He says; "All round the table was a standing ledge four fingers broad, covered with a cloth bought in the Easter Term, and this cloth was 'black rowed with strokes about a span, like a chess-board. On the spaces of this cloth counters were arranged, marked for checking computations.'"

Excul'se (2 syl.) means literally, a coupon, or piece cut off (Latin, excuddo). It is a toll or duty levied on articles of home consumption—a slice cut off from these things for the national purse.

"Taxes on commodities are either on production within the country, or an importation into it, or on conveyance or sale within it; and are charged respectively as excise, customs, or tolls."—Mill: Political Economy, book v, chap. iii., p. 362.

Exclusion. Bill of Exclusion. A bill to exclude the Duke of York from the throne, on account of his being a Papist. Passed by the Commons, but rejected by the Lords, in 1679; revived in 1681.

Excommunica'tion. (1) The greater is exclusion of an individual from the seven sacraments, from every legitimate act, and from all intercourse with the faithful. (2) The lesser excommunication is sequestration from the services of the Church only. The first Napoleon was excommunicated by Pope Pius VII.; and the kings of Italy were placed under an anathema by Pius IX. for adding the Papal dominions to the United Kingdom of Italy.

"The person excommunicated: os, orare, vare, communio, numerum, praesidum. (The person excommunicated is to be boycotted by the faithful in os (conversation), orare (prayer), communio (communion), numerum (attendance).)—Prescott: F. Gurry: Roman Moral Theology (3rd ed., 1902).

---

Excommunication by Bell, Book, and Candle. (See CURSING, etc.) Excommunication by the ancient Jews. This was of three sorts: (1) Nidvui (separation), called in the New Testament "casting out of the synagogue" (John ix. 22); (2) Chereb, called by St. Paul "delivering over to Satan" (1 Cor. xvi. 22); (3) Anathema Maranaatha (1 Cor. xvi. 22), delivered over to the Lord, who is at hand, to take vengeance. The Bad- duses had an anathema called Tetragram'metron, which was cursing the offender by Yeho'vah, by the Decalogue, by the inferior courts, and with all the curses of the superior courts.

Excoriate (4 syl.). To give one as much pain as crucifying him would do. (Latin, ex cru'r, where ex is intensive.)

Excuse. "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse," or "Tel s'excuse qui s'accuse."

Exeat (Latin, he may go out). Permission granted by a bishop to a priest to leave his diocese. In the universities, it is permission to a student to leave college before end of term. Sometimes permission is granted to leave college after the gates are closed.

Exercate (3 syl.). To many Roman laws this tag was appended, "If any one breaks this law, saecer reto," i.e. let his body, his family, and his goods be consecrated to the gods. When a man was declared saecer, anyone might kill him with impunity. Anyone who hurt a tribune was held a saec'er to the goddess Ceris. Ex in this word is intensive.

"If anyone hurts a tribune in word or deed, he was held accursed [sacer], and his goods were confiscated."—Livy, iii. 55; also Dionysius, v. 50, and vili. 17.

Exequatur. An official recognition of a person in the character of counsel or commercial agent, authorising him to exercise his power. The word is Latin, and means, "he may exercise" [the function to which he has been appointed].

"The Northern Patriotic League (Oporto) has decided to petition the Government to withdraw the Exequatur from the British Consul here."—Reuter's Telegram, Tuesday, Feb. 11th, 1900.

Exercises. Weak-day sermons were so called by the Puritans. Hence the title of Morning Exercises, weak-day sermons preached in the morning.

Exe'ter. The Duke of Exeter's daugh'ter was a sort of rack invented by the Duke of Exeter during the reign of Henry VI. (Blackstone.)

"I was the last that would not confess one word...

Exeter Controversy. A controversy raised upon a tract entitled Plain Truth, by the Rev. John Agate, of Exeter, an Episcopalian; replied to by several dissenting ministers, as Withers, Trosse, Pierce, etc. (1707-1715.)

Exeter Domeday. A record containing a description of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall; published by Sir Henry Ellis (in 1816) as a Supplement to the Great Domeday Book (q.t.c.). Called "Exon," either because it was at one time kept among the muniments of the Dean and Chapter of Exeter, or because the Bishop of Exeter was commissioned to make the survey.

Exhibition. My son has got an exhibition at Oxford. An allowance of meat and drink; a benefit for maintenance. (Latin, exhibitio, an allowance of food and other necessaries, "alimentis exhibère aliquem").

"They have founded six exhibitions of £25 each per annum, to continue for two years and a half."—Taylor: History of the University of Dublin, chap. v. p. 196.

I crave this disposition for my wife. Due reference of place, and exhibition."—Shakespeare: Othello, i. 3.

Exhibition (The Great) was held in Hyde Park, London, and lasted from May 1 to October 15, 1851.

Exies or Acres. "Hysteries; ague fits; any paroxysm."

"Jenny Rutherford has taken the exies, and done nothing but laugh and weep... for two days successively."—Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxx.

Exile. The Neapolitan Exile. Baron Poc'rio. One of the kings of Naples promised the people a constitution, but broke his word; whereupon a revolution broke out, and the baron, with many others, was imprisoned for many years in a dreadful dungeon near Naples. He was at length liberated and exiled to America, but compelled the captain to steer for Ireland, and landed at Cork, where he was well received.

Exit (Latin, he goes out). A theatrical term placed at the point when an actor is to leave the stage. We also say of an actor, Exit So-and-so—that is, So-and-so leaves the stage at this point of the drama. He made his exit. He left, or died: as, "He made his exit of this life in peace with all the world." Except in the drama, we say, "made or makes his exit." (See above.)

All the world's a stage.

And all the men and women merely players;

They have their exits and their entrances."

Shakespeare: As You Like It, ii. 7.

Exodus. The Exodus of Israel. The departure of the Israelites from Egypt under the guidance of Moses. We now speak of the Exodus of Ireland—i.e. the departure of the Irish in large numbers for America; the Exodus of the Acadians—i.e. the expulsion of these colonists from Nova Scotia in the reign of George II.; etc. (Greek, ex odos, a journey out.)

Exon, Exon of the Guards. Any one of the three certain officers of the day in command of the yeomen of the royal guard; the acting officer who resides at the court; an exempt, Capitaines exempts des garde du corps. (French, exone, ex omen, exempt from duty or care.)

Exorbitant means literally out of the rut (Latin, ex orbita, out of the wheel-rut); out of the track; extravagant (extra-vagant).

Exoteric. (See Esoteric.)

Expectation Week. Between the Ascension and Whit Sunday, when the apostles continued praying "in earnest expectation of the Comforter."

Experimental Philosophy. Science founded on experiments or data, in contradistinction to moral and mathematical sciences. Experimental philosophy is also called natural philosophy, and by the French physique.

Experimentum Crucis (Latin). A decisive experiment. (See Crucial.)

Exporto Crede. Believe one who has had experience in the matter.

Explosion means literally, driven out by clapping the hands (Latin, expludere—i.e. ex-pludo); hence the noise made by clapping the hands, a report made by ignited gunpowder, etc.

Exponent. One who explains or sets forth the views of another. Thus, a clergyman should be the exponent of the Bible and Thirty-nine Articles. (Latin, ex pondo, to expose or set forth.)

Exposé (French). An exposing of something which should have been kept out of sight. Thus we say a man made Express Train

"a dreadful expost—i.e. told or did something which should have been kept concealed.

Express Train. A fast train between two large towns, with few or no stoppages at intermediate stations.

Expressed Oils are those which are obtained by pressure. Unlike animal and essential oils, they are pressed out of the bodies which contain them.

Expression. A geographical expression. A term applied to a tract of country with no recognised nationality.

"This territory is at a very great extent occupied by one race...and yet to the present day Germany is little more than a geographical expression."—Daily Telegraph (before 1871).

Exquisite (3 syl). One sought out; a coxcomb, a dandy, one who thinks himself superlatively well dressed, and of most unquestionable deportment.

"Exquisites are out of place in the pulpit: they should be set up in a tailor's window."—Spurgeon: Lectures to my Students. (Lecture viii.)

Extensive (3 syl). Rather extensive, that. Rather fast. A slang synonym for a swallow.

Exter. That's Exter, as the old woman said when she saw Kerton. This is a Devonshire saying, meaning, I thought my work was done, but I find much still remains before it is completed. "Exter" is the popular pronunciation of Exeter, and "Kerton" is Credington. The tradition is that the woman in question was going for the first time to Exeter, and seeing the grand old church of Kerton (Credington), supposed it to be Exeter Cathedral. "That's Exter," she said, "and my journey is over;" but alas! she had still eight miles to walk before she reached her destination.

Extinct Species [since the time of man]. The dodo, great auk, quagga, sea-cow, and white rhinoceros.

Getting very rare: the hison, the Carolina parakeet, the giraffe, and the passenger pigeon once common enough.

Extravagantés Constitutionés, or Extravagants. The papal constitutions of John XXII, and some few of his successors, supplemental to the "Corpus Juris Canonici." So called because they were not ranked in order with the other papal constitutions, but were left "outer wanderers" from the general code.

Extreme Unction. One of the seven sacraments of the Catholic Church, founded on St. James v. 14, "Is any sick among you? let him call for the elders of the Church: and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord."

Extremes Meet. In French: "Les extrêmes se touchent."

Extracts. Latin, ex, out of, and tract, fetters. "Tracts" are the hairs, etc., tied round the feet of birds to prevent their wandering. To extricate is to "get out of these tracts or meshes."

Exult (Latin). To leap out. Thus we say, "I am ready to leap out of my skin;" to jump for joy.

Eye. Latin, ocŭlis; Italian, occhio; Spanish, ojo; Russian, oko; Dutch, oog; Saxon, eige (where g is pronounced like y); French, œil.

In my mind's eye. In my perceptive thought. The eye sees in two ways: (1) from without; and (2) from within. When we look at anything without, the object is reflected on the retina as on a mirror; but in deep contemplation the inward thought "informs the eye." It was thus Macbeth saw the dagger; and Hamlet tells Horatio that he saw his deceased father "in his mind's eye."

In the wind's eye. Directly opposed to the wind.

In the twinkling of an eye. Immediately, very soon. "Au moindre clin d'œil." Similar phrases are: "In a brace of shakes." "In the twinkling of a bed-post." (See Bed-post.)

My eye! or Ok, my eye! an exclamation of astonishment. (See All My Eye.) The might see that with half an eye.

Easily; at a mere glance.

The king's eyes. His chief officers. An Eastern expression.

"One of the seven
Who in God's presence, nearest to the throne
Stand ready at command, and are his eyes
That run thru all the heavens, or down to earth, Bear his swift errands."

Milton: Paradiso Lost, ili. 342.

To have an eye on. To keep strict watch on the person or thing referred to.

To have an eye to the main chance. To keep constantly in view the profit to arise; to act from motives of policy. (See Main Chance.)

To see eye to eye. To be of precisely the same opinion; to think both alike.

Eye-service. Superficial service.

"Servir qu'on vend sous les yeux du maître."

"Servants, be obedient to them that are your masters...not with eye-service, as men pleasers; but as the servants of Christ."—Eph. vi. 5, 6.

Eye-sore. Something that is offensive to the sight. Sore is the Anglo-Saxon Eye-tooth

Eye-teeth. The canine teeth are so called because their fangs extend upwards nearly to the orbits of the eyes.

To draw one's eye-teeth. To take the conceit out of a person; to fleece one without mercy; to make one suffer loss without seeing the manoeuvre by which it was effected.

"I guess these Yanks will get their eye-teeth drawn if they don't look sharp."—W. Hepworth Dixon: New American, vol. 1.

Eye of a Needle. Lady Duff Gordon, writing from Cairo, says: "Yesterday I saw a camel go through the eye of a needle—i.e. a low arched door of an enclosure. He must kneel and bow his head to go through, and thus the rich man must humble himself." (Wood: Bible Animals, p. 243). Lord Nugent, in his Travels, informs us that when at Hebron he was directed to go out by the Needle's Eye, or small gate of the city.

Eye of Greece (Th.). Athens.

Eye of the Baltic (Th.). Gotland, in the Baltic.

Eye of the Storm. An opening between the storm clouds. (See Bull's Eye.)

Eyes.

_The Almond Eyes._ The Chinese.

"He will not receive a very warm welcome from the Almond Eyes."—F. Millar: On the Central Mound's Root (1849).

Eyes to the blind. A staff. So called in allusion to the staff given to Tiresias by Athena, to serve him for the eyes of which she had deprived him. (See Tiresias.)

To cast sheep's eyes at one. To look askant with shyness or diffidence.

To make eyes at one. To look wantonly at a person; to look lovingly at another.

To rent the eyes with paint (Jer. iv. 30). The ladies of the East tinge the edge of their eyelids with the powder of leadore. They dip into the powder a small wooden bodkin, which they draw "through the eyelids over the ball of the eye." Jezebel is said "to have adjusted her eyes with kohol" (a powder of leadore), 2 Kings ix. 30. N.B.—The word "face" in our translation should in both these cases be rendered "eyes." (Shaw: Travels.)

Eye.

Your eyes are bigger than your stomach. You fancied you could eat more, but found your appetite satisfied with less than you expected. "Oculi plus devorabunt quam capit venter."

Eyed.

One-eyed people. (See Arimaspians, Cyclops.)

Eyre. Justices in Eyre. A corruption of "Justice in itinerere." At first they made the circuit of the kingdom every seven years, but Magna Charta provided that it should be done annually.

Eyre (Jane). The heroine of Charlotte Brontë's novel so-called. Jane Eyre is a governess, who stoically copes with adverse circumstances, and ultimately wins the love of a man of fortune. ('Eyre' pronounced air."

Ezour Veda or Yajur Veda. The second of the sacred books of the Hindus. The four are:—

1. The Rig Veda (prayers and hymns in verse);
2. The Ezour Veda (prayers in prose);
3. The Sama (prayers to be chanted): and
4. The Atharvan Veda (formulas of consecration, imprecation, expiation, etc.).

Ezzelin (3 syll.). Sir Ezzelin recognised count Lara at the table of Lord Otho, and charged him with being Conrad the corsair. A duel was arranged, and Ezzelin was never heard of more. A serf used to tell how one evening he saw a horseman cast a dead body into the river which divided the lands of Otho and Lara, and that there was a star of knighthood on the breast of the dead body. (Byron: Lara.) (See Conrad.)

---

F

F is written on his face. "Rogue" is written on his face. The letter F used to be branded near the nose, on the left cheek of felons, on their being admitted to "benefit of clergy." The same was used for brawling in church. The custom was not abolished by law till 1822.

F Sharp. A flea. The pun is F, the initial letter, and sharp because the bite is acute. (See B Flats.)

F. A corrupt way of making a capital F in Old English, and used as low down.
as 1750; as France for France, Harrington for Harrington, etc.

F. E. R. T. The letters of the Sardinian motto.

Either _Fortitudo Ejus Rhodium Teruit_, in allusion to the succour rendered to Rhodes by the house of Savoy, 1310;

Or, _Fatare et Religionem Tenent_, on the gold doublou of Victor Amadeus I.;

Or, _Fortitudo Ejus Rempublicam Tenet._

F. O. B. Free on board; meaning that the shipper, from the time of shipment, is free from all risk.

F. (Scotch). To get; to get a share of; to lay a claim to.

"Where is the lord or belted knight
That best deserves to F. that?"

_ Errors: Whom Will Ye Send, stanza i._

Fabian Society. An association of socialists.

"The Fabian Society aims at the recognition of society by the emanicipation of hand and industrial capital from individual and class ownership; and the vesting of them in the community for the general benefit."—H. G. Wells: _Fabian Essays on Socialism_, June, 1901, p. 91.

? The name of the society is derived from Quintus Fabius, the Roman general, who won his way against Hannibal by wariness, not by violence, by caution, not by defiance.

"Fabian tactics lie in stealing inches, not in grasping leagues."—Liberty Review, May 14th, 1891, p. 357, col. 4.

Fabian Soldiers. A complimentary phrase for Roman soldiers, the bravest of the brave.

_Quam [that of trained soldiers] quidem sic omnibus disciplinae militaris [disciplinæ] sunt, ut qu'amandum tum quodam Fabiis mulieris Romana appellat urit, quos 'hurturias' aut 'hurturias' quidem Graecis in unam haude feraunt._—_Enos: Iphocrates_.

Fabian Tactics or Policy—i.e. delay. "Win like Fabius, by delay." The Roman general Fabius warei out Hannibal by marches, counter-marches, ambuscades, and skirmishes, without ever coming to an open engagement. Fabius died B.C. 203.

"Met by the Fabian tactics, which proved fatal to its predecessor."—_The Tewkes._

Fabianism. The system called Collectivism. (See Collectivists.)

"It must be evident that the Fabian Society has a really gigantic task before it; the difficulties of which will not be lightened when the working classes come to understand that small ownership . . . and small savings . . . are just as strongly condemned by Collectivists as large estates and colonial fortunes."—_Nineteenth Century_ (November, 1890, p. 906).

Fablia's sad Fate. The king Don Fabila was a man of very obstinate purpose and fond of the chase. One day he encountered a bear, and commanded those who rode with him to remain quiet and not interfere; but the bear overthrew him and killed him. (Chronica Antiqua de Espafia, p. 121.)

Fabius. The American Fabius, Washington (1732-1799), whose military policy was similar to that of Fabius. He wearied out the English troops by harassing them, without coming to a pitched battle. Duguesclin pursued the same policy in France, by the advice of Charles V.; whereby all the conquests of Edward and the Black Prince were retrieved.

Fabius of the French. Anue, Duc de Montmorency, grand constable of France; so called from his success in almost annihilating the imperial army which had invaded Provence, by laying the country waste and prolonging the campaign. (1493-1567.)

Fables. The most famous writers of fables are—Pilpay, among the Hindus, Lokman, among the Arabs, Æsop and Babrius, among the Greeks, Phaedrus and Aria'nus, among the Romans. Faure, Abst'mius, and Casti, among the Italians. The last wrote The Talking Animals.

La Fontaine and Florian, among the French. John Gay and Edward Moore, among our own countrymen. The former is sometimes called "The English Æsop." Lessing and Hoffel, among the Germans. Krilof, among the Russians. (See Æsop.)

Fabliaux. The metrical fables of the Trouvères, or early poets north of the Loire, in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The word _fabliau_, in this case, is used very widely, for it includes not only such tales as Reynard the Fox, but all sorts of familiar incidents of knavery and intrigue, all sorts of legends and family traditions. The fabliau of _Arvernia and Nicaollet_ is full of interesting incidents, and contains much true pathos and beautiful poetry.

Fabricius. A Roman hero, representative of inflexible purity and honesty. The ancient writers love to tell of the frugal way in which he lived on his hereditary farm; how he refused the rich presents offered him by the Samnite ambassadors; and how at death Fabulius. The god who taught Roman children to utter their first word. It was the god Vagitan-us (g.e.) who taught them to utter their first cry. From fari, to speak (Varro).

Fabulous Isles. (See under Islands.)

Face. (Latin, facies.)
A brazen face. A bold, defiant look. A brazen-faced person means one with an impudent, audacious look, especially in a bad cause. Brass metaphorically is generally used in a bad or disrespectful sense, as “You have plenty of brass” [impudence], “I admire your brass.”
A rebec face (French, visage de rebec). An ugly, grotesque face, like that which used to be cut on the upper part of a rebec or three-stringed fiddle.

“Dead is the noble Badebec,
Who had a face like a rebec.”
Badebec: Pustagruel, book i. 4.

* Badebec was the mother of Gargantuas, and died in childbirth.
A very face. The features drawn awry, expressive of disgust.
To draw a long face. To look dissatisfied or sorrowful, in which case the mouth is drawn down at the corners, the eyes are dejected, and the face elongated.

“Of course, it is all right; if you had not drawn such a long face I should never have doubted.”
Dr. Copid.

To fly in the face of. . . . To oppose violently and unreasonably: to set at defiance rashly.
To put a good face on the matter. To make the best of a bad matter; to bear up under something disagreeable: “nullum malum assumptum;” “in adversis cultum secundae fortune gerere.”
To set one’s face against [something]. To oppose it; to resist its being done. The expression of the face shows the state of the inclination of a person’s mind.

Face to Face. In the immediate presence of each other; two or more persons facing each other. To accuse another “face to face” means not “behind his back” or in his absence, but while present.

Faces.
To keep two faces under one hood. To be double-faced; to pretend to be very religious, and yet live an evil life.

“...we never troubled the Church. . . . We knew we were doing what we ought not to do, and scorned to look plaus, and keep two faces under one hood.”—Boldwood: Robbery Under Arms, chap. ii.

To make faces. To make grimaces with the face.

Face. To face it out. To persist in an assertion which is not true. To maintain without changing colour or hanging down the head.
To face down. To withstand with boldness and effrontery.

Faced. With a facing, lining of the cuffs, etc.: also the prerogite of the verb “to face.”

Faced.
Bare-faced. Impudence unconcealed. A “bare-faced lie” is a lie told shamelessly and without prevarication.
Shame-faced. Having shame expressed in the face.
Faced with [silk, etc.]. An inferior article bearring the surface of a superior one, as when cotton-velvet has a silk surface; the “facings” (as the lining of coat-cuffs, etc.) made of silk, etc.

Face-card or Faced-card. A court card, a card with a face on it.

Facile Princeps. By far the best; admittedly first.
“...but the facile princeps of all geologists is Professor Pott, of Balle.”—Chambers’s Cyclopaedia.

Facings. To put one through his facings. To examine; to ascertain if what appears on the surface is superficial only.
“The Greek books were again laid out, and Greece . . . . was put through his facings.”—A Trenton.

Façon de Parler. Idiomatic or usual form of speech, not meant to be offensive. I once told a waiter in Norway that the meat he brought me for breakfast was not sufficiently cooked, and he bluntly told me it was not true (det er ikke sandt), but he did not intend to be rude. It was the Norwegian “fason de parler.”

Fac’tion. The Romans divided the combatant in the circus into classes, called factions, each class being distinguished by its special colour, like the crews of a boat-race. The four original factions were the leek-green (prauna), the sea-blue (ren’eta), the white (alba), and the rose-red (ros’ca). Two other factions were added by Domitian, the colours being golden-yellow (aur’a’ta) and purple. As these combatants strove against each other, and entertained a strong esprit de corps, the word was easily applied to political partisans.

7 In the faction riots of Constantinople, A.D. 532, above 30,000 persons were killed. (Latin, factio.)

Factotum. An agent; a substitute in mercantile affairs; a commission merchant. (Latin, fictus, to do, whence the French fauteur, one who does something for an employer.)

Thomas Pitt, ancestor of the Earl of Chatham, was appointed by Queen Anne Governor of Fort St. George, in the East Indies, and in 1702 purchased there, for £20,400, a diamond weighing 127 carats, which he sold to the King of France. This gem is still called the Pitt diamond. Pope insinuates that Pitt stole the diamond. This is not exactly true. He obtained it for a price much below its value, and threatened the thief with exposure if he made a fuss about the matter.

Factotum. One who does for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johnnie or Factotum. Our "Jack-of-all-trades" does not mean a factotum, but one who does odd jobs for anyone who will pay him. (Latin, faeceret totum, to do everything required.)

Fad (4). A hobby, a temporary fancy, a whim. A contraction of faddling in "fiddle-faddle."

"Among the fads that Charles had taken up for a time... was that of collecting old prints." — Bunyan, Pilgrim's Progress, chap. iv.

Fada. A fice or kobold of the south of France, sometimes called "Hada." These house-spirits, of which, strictly speaking, there are but three, bring speaking good in their right hand and ill luck in their left.

Fadda. Mahomet's white mule.

Fadge (1 syl.). To suit or fit together, as, It won't fadge; we cannot judge together, he does not fadge with me. (Anglo-Saxon, segen, to suit together; Welsh, faff, what tends to unite.)

"How will this fadge?" — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, u. 2.

Fadge. A farthing. A corrupt contraction of fardingale, i.e. farthingale. (See Chivy.)

Fadh (Ab). Mahomet's silver caurass, confiscated from the Jews on their expulsion from Medinah.

Faddie-deen. The great Nazir', or chamberlain of Aurangzeb's harem, in Lalla Rookh. The criticism of this self-conceited courtier upon the several tales which make up the romance are very racy and full of humour; and his crest-fallen conceit when he finds out that the poet was the Prince in disguise is well conceived.

"He was a judge of everything—from the pen-ciling of a Grecian's eyes, the secret questions of science and literature; from the mixture of a conserve of rose-leaves to the composition of an epic poem... all the rocks and parts of Delhi stood in awe of him." — Moore.

Faerie or Faerie. The land of the fays or faeries. The chief fay realms are Avalon, an island somewhere in the ocean; O'beron's dominions, situated "in wilderness among the hoistis hairy;" and a realm somewhere in the middle of the earth, where was Fari Banou's palace.

"For learned Colin [Spenser] lay a his pipes to grace, And is to Faery gone a pilgrimage." — Drayton, Eclogue, iii.

Faerie Queene. A metrical romance in six books, by Edmund Spenser (incomplete). It details the adventures of various knights, who impersonate different virtues, and belong to the court of Gloriana, Queen of faerie land.

The first book contains the legend of the Red Cross Knight (the spirit of Christianity), and is by far the best. The chief subject is the victory of Holiness over Error. It contains twelve cantos.

The second book is the legend of Sir Guyon (the golden mean), in twelve cantos.

The third book is the legend of Britomartis (love without lust), in twelve cantos. Britomartis is Diana, or Queen Elizabeth the Britoness.

The fourth book is the legend of Cambel and Triamound (fidelity), in twelve cantos.

The fifth book is the legend of Artegal (justicer), in twelve cantos.

The sixth book is the legend of Sir Calidore (courtesy), in twelve cantos.

There are parts of a seventh book—viz. cantos 6 and 7, and two stanzas of canto three. The subject is Mutability.

The plan of the Faerie Queene is borrowed from the Orlando Furioso, but the creative power of Spenser is more original, and his imagery more striking, than Ariosto's. Thomson says of him—

"[He] like a copious river, poured his song Over all the frames of enchanting ground." — The Seasons (Summer), 1674-5.

Fag. One who does, and perseveres in doing. In public schools, it means a little boy who waits upon a bigger one. Probably a contracted form of factor, factiotum; Latin, fac-ti-er, to do.

Fag. Servant of Captain Absolute, who aspires his master in all things. (Sheridan: The Rivals.)

"Even the mendacious Mr. Fag assures us, though he never scruples to tell a lie at his master's command, yet it hurts his conscience to be found out."—Sir Walter Scott.

Fag-end (A.). The selvedge or coarse end of a piece of cloth. This also is from facio, factum, meaning the part added after the piece is finished. The fag-end of a session means the last few days before dissolution.

Fagged Out. Wornied with hard work. Fatigued contracted into fa'g'ed.

Fagin. An infamous Jew, who teaches boys and girls to rob with dexterity. (Dickens: Oliver Twist.)

Fagot. A bundle worn in mediavals times by those who had recanted their "heretical" opinions. It was designed to show what they merited, but had narrowly escaped. (See Fagots.)

Il y a fagots et fagots. There are divers sorts of fagots; every alike is not the same. The expression is in Molière's Le Médicin malgré lui, where Sganarelle wants to show that his fagots are better than those of other persons; "Ay, but those fagots are not so good as my fagots." (Welsh, fag, that which unites; Anglo-Saxon, scegan, to unite.)

Sentire les fagots. To be heretical; to smack of the fagots. In allusion to the custom of burning heretics by surrounding them with blazing fagots.

Fagot Votes. Votes obtained by the nominal transfer of property to a person whose income was not otherwise sufficient to qualify him for being a voter.

The "fagot" was a bundle of property divided into small lots for the purpose stated above. Abolished.

"The object was to prevent the creation of fagot votes."—The Times.

Fagots. Cakes made of the "insides" of pigs, with thyme, scrups of pork, sages, onions, and other herbs, fried together in grease, and eaten with potatoes. (Greek, phago, to eat.)

Fah'tah. One of the rivers of Paradise in Mahometan mythology.

Faids. The second class of Druids.

Fai'ence (2 syl.). Majolica. So called from Faen'za, where, in 1299, it was first manufactured. It is termed majolica because the first specimens the Italians saw came from Majorca. In France it now means a fine ware not equal to porcelain.

Fain'sant. Les Rois Fainéants (the cipher or puppet kings). Clovis II. and his ten successors were the puppet kings of the Palace Mayors. Louis V. (last of the Carlovingian dynasty) received the same designation.

"My signet you shall command with all my heart, madam," said Earl Philip. "I am, you know, a complete Roy Fainéant, and never once interfered with my Maire du Palais in her proceedings."—Sir Walter Scott: Ivernel of the Peak, chap. xiv.

Faint. Faint heart ne'er won fair lady.

"The bold a way will find or make."—King: Orpheus and Eurydice.

Faint Hearted. Easily discouraged; afraid to venture.

Fair as Lady Done. A great Cheshire family that has long occupied a mansion at Utkinton. (Cheshire expression.)

Fair Geraldine. (See GERALDINE.)

Fair Rosamond. (See ROSAMOND.)

To bid fair, as "he bids fair to be a good . . ." To give good promise of being . . . ; to indicate future success or excellence; one de quo bene speravi livet.

Fair as a lily. (See SIMILES.)

Fair. (Latin, feriae, holidays.)

A day after the fair. Too late for the fun. "Serio sapient Phryges." The Phrygians were noted for their obstinacy; hence, Phryx verberatus melior. They were thrice conquered: by Hercules, the Greeks, and the Latins, and were wise "after the events."

Fair (Slor). (See SIOE-FAIR.)

Fair (Statute). (See MOR.)

Fair City, Perth; so called from the beauty of its situation.

Fair Game. A worthy subject of banter; one who exposes himself to ridicule.

"Bourrienne is fair game; but the whole of his statements are not worthless."—The Spectator, Feb. 18th, 1883.

Fair Maid (The).

Fair Maid of Anjou. Lady Edith Plantagenet, who married David, Prince Royal of Scotland.
Fair Maid of February. The snow-drop, which blossoms in February.

Fair Maid of Kent. Joan, Countess of Salisbury, wife of the Black Prince, and only daughter of Edmond Plantagenet, Earl of Kent. She had been twice married ere she gave her hand to the prince.

Fair Maid of Norway. Margaret, daughter of Eric II. of Norway, and granddaughter of Alexander III. of Scotland. Being recognised by the states of Scotland as successor to the throne, she set out for her new kingdom, but died on her passage from seasickness. (1290.)

Fair Maid of Perth. Katie Glover, the most beautiful young woman of Perth. Heroine of Scott's novel of the same name.

Fair-star. The Princess Fair-star, in love with Prince Chery, whom she sets to obtain for her "the dancing waters," "the singing apple," and the "green bird" (q.v.). This tale is borrowed from the fairy tales of Straparola the Milanese. (1550.) Chery and Fair-star, by the Countess d'Anney.

Fair Trade. Smuggling. Neither Dirk Hatterrak nor any of his sailors, all well-known names in the fair trade, were aware upon that coast."—Sir Walter Scott: Guy Mannering, chap. 1.

Lately the phrase has been introduced into politics to signify the necessity of protection or free-trade. That is, free-trade to those nations that grant free-trade to us, and vice versa.

Fair Way. In a fair way. On the right tack. The "fair way" is the proper track through a channel.

Fair and Square. Honestly, justly, with straightforwardness.

Fair fall you. Good bethall you.

Fair Play is a Jewel. As a jewel is an ornament of beauty and value, so fair play is an honourable thing and a "jewel in the crown" of the player.

Fairies, good and bad.

Fall of the Drop (The), in theatrical parlance, means the fall of the drop-curtain at the end of the act or play.

Fall Out of (To). To tumble or slip from, as, "The weapons fell out of my hands." This is a Latin phrase, "De manibus meis arma cadèrent."

Fall Short of (To). To be deficient of a supply. This is the Latin crede, to fail. To fall short of the mark is a figure taken from archery, quoits, etc., where the missile falls to the ground before reaching the mark.

Fall Together by the Ears (To). To fight and scratch each other; to contend in strife. "To fall together by the ears" is "intere se certare;" but "to set together by the ears" is "discordium concurrere."

Fall Upon One's Feet (To). To escape a threatened injury; to light upon one's feet.

Falling Bands. Neck-bands which fall on the chest, common in the seventeenth century.

Falling Sickness. Epilepsy, in which the patient falls suddenly to the ground.

"Bratus.—He [i.e. Caesar] hath the falling-sickness.
Caesars.—No, Caesar hath it not: but you, and I, And honest Caesar, we have the falling-sickness."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, 1. 2.

Falling Stars are said by Mahometans to be firebrands flung by good angels against evil spirits when they approach too near the gates of heaven.

Fallow Land. Land ploughed, but not sown; so called from its brown or tawny colour. (German, fahl, tawny; Anglo-Saxon, fahel or feaho, pale-red; hence, fallow deer, red deer.)

"Break up the fallow land."—Jer. iv. 3.

False (The Rule of). A method of solving certain mathematical questions generally done by equations. Suppose the question is this: "What number is that whose half exceeds its third by 12?"
False Ceiling. The space between the garret-ceiling and the roof.

False Staff. A fat, sensual, boastful, and mendacious knight; full of wit and humour; he was the boon companion of Henry, Prince of Wales. (1 and 2 Henry IV., and Merry Wives of Windsor.)

Falutin (High). Oratorical bombast; affected pomposity; "Ereclus voit." (See HIFALUTEN.)

None of your high falutin airs with me. None of your swell ways with me. (Dutch, verloeten.)

Famil'lar. A cat, dog, raven, or other dumb creature, petted by a "witch," and supposed to be her demon in disguise. (See below.)

Familiar Spirits. Spirit slaves. From the Latin, fam'illus (an attendant).

"Away with him; he has a familiar under his tongue."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., v. 7.

Familiarity. Too much familiarity breeds contempt.

Latin: Nenia familiaritas contemptum parit.

French: La familiarité engendre le mépris.

Italian: La famigliarità fà disprezzamento.

Eritis optimis rebus tene res sine omnium: c. veritate audium: c familiaritate contempsum: c fede et liberam."—Plutarch (translated).

Familiarists. Members of the "Family of Love," a fanatical sect founded by David George, of Delft, in 1556. They maintained that all men are of one family, and should love each other as brothers and sisters. Their system is called Famulism.

"Family will take a person anywhere."—Warner: Little Journey in the World, chap. iv.

Fan. I could brook him with his lady's fan (1 Henry IV., ii. 3)—i.e. knock his brains out with a fan handle. The ancient fans had long handles, so that ladies used their fans for walking-sticks, and it was by no means unusual for very testy dames to chastise unruly children by beating them with their fannstcks.

"Wert not better Your head were broken with the handle of a fan!"—Beaumont and Fletcher: Wit at Several Wages, v.

Fan-light (A), placed over a door, is a semicircular window with radiating bars, like the ribs of an open fan.

Fanatic's. Those transported with religious or temple madness. Among the Romans there were certain persons who attended the temples and fell into strange fits, in which they pretended to see spectres, and uttered what were termed predictions. (Latin, f'atAmy, a temple.)

"That wild energy which leads The enthusiasm to fanatist deeds."—Burns: Tales of the Secret Tribunal.

Fancy. Love—i.e. the passion of the fantasy or imagination. A fancy-man is a man (not your husband) whom you fancy or select for chaperon.

"Tell me where is fancy bred, Or in the brain, or in the head."—Shakespeare: Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

The fancy. Fuglistis. So called because boxing is the chief of sports, and fancy means sports, pets, or fancies. Hence "dog-fanciers," "pigeon-fanciers," etc.

Fancy-free. Not in love.

"In madman meditation fancy-free."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Fancy Man (A). A cavalier servant or courtier; one selected by a married lady to escort her to theatre, etc., to ride about with her, and to amuse her. The man she "fancies" or likes.

Fancy-sick. Love-sick.

"All fancy-sick she is, and pale of cheer."—Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

Fane'lls. A Scandinavian tribe far north, whose ears were so long that they would cover their whole body. (Fyng.)

Fanfar' on. A swaggering bully; a cowardly boaster who blows his own trumpet. Sir Walter Scott uses the word for finery, especially for the gold chains worn by military men, common in Spain amongst the conquerors of the New World. (Spanish, fanfar' on, a bully; French, fanfare, a flourish of trumpets, or short piece of military music performed by brass instruments and kettle-drums.)

"Marry being there, with thy fanfarons about thy neck! and the squire."—Scott: The Abbot, cxxv.

Fanfar' onade (4 syl.). Swaggering; vain boasting; ostentatious display. (See above.)

"The bishop copied this proceeding from the fanfaronade of M. Boulliers."—Swift.
Fang. A sheriff’s officer in Shakespeare’s 2 Henry IV.

Fanga. I fell into his fanga. Into his power, his clutches. (Anglo-Saxon, fang, a grasp.)

Traitors, that vice-like fang the hand to lick.”

Fangled. A new-fangled notion is one just started or entertained. (Saxon, fangan, to begin.)

Fanny Fern. A nom de plume of Mrs. Sarah Payson Parton, sister of Mr. N. P. Willis, the American poet. (Born 1811, died 1872.)

Fanti’gue (2 syl.). A function; a fussy anxiety; that restless, nervous commotion which persons have who are phantom-struck.

Fantocci’ni [fanto-ché’ny]. A dramatic performance by puppets. (Italian, fantoccio, a puppet.)

Fantom-corn. The mere ghost of corn, having been bewitched. (French, fantôme, a ghost.)

Fantom-fellow. A person who is light-headed, and under the ban of some hobgoblin. (See above.)

Fantom-flush. Flesh that hangs loose and flabby—supposed to be under the evil influence of some spectre. (See above.)

Far and Away. “Nullus proximus aut secundus;” as, “far and away the best;” some person or thing beyond all comparison or rivalry.

Far Cry from. It is a far cry from . . . to . . . ; as, it is a far cry from Moses to Moses Montefiore, and from David to Diasraeli, but they all were Jews; and had certain features in common. Sir Walter Scott several times uses the phrase “It’s a far cry to Lochow [Lochawe].” It is a far cry from O’Connell to Kossuth.

Far fetched. Not closely connected; a remote conceit; as, “a far-fetched simile,” a “far-fetched allusion.” Also, obtained from a foreign or distant country. 1. quad varum est, varum est.”

Far Gone. Deeply affected: as, “far gone in love.”

Far Niente (3 syl.). Italian phrase. The Latin otium. Dulce far niente is the sweet enjoyment of having nothing to do, i.e. of a holiday. (See Dolce.)

Farce (1 syl.). Stuffing. Dramatic pieces of no solid worth, but stuffed full of ludicrous incidents and expressions. They bear the same analogy to the regular drama as force-meat does to a solid joint. (French, farce; Latin, farcio, to stuff.)

Farceur (The). One who writes or acts farces.

Farcy or Farcin (Latin, farcinum, a sausage, any stuffed meat). A disease in horses, which consists of a swelling of the gangious and lymphatic vessels. It shows itself in little knots; glanders.

Fare, meaning the expense of a journey or passage across water, is the Anglo-Saxon fære or free, a journey; verb, faran, to travel. (Archaic, feria, the fare for crossing a ferry.)

Fare Well (To). You cannot fare well but you must cry out roost meat. Don’t blazon your good fortune on the house-top. “Sorez suo petit loco,” Terence has the same idea: “Ejusmet meo indicio miser, quasi soror, hodie perii.” (Ennucius, v. 7, 23.)

Farina’, Fyndem furina’. Other rubbish of the same sort. Literally, “Other leaves of the same batch.” Our more usual expressions are, “Others of the same kidney,” “others of the same feather;” “others tarred with the same brush.”

Farinata or Farianata Dologi Uberti. A nobleman of Florence, chief of the Ghibelline faction, placed by Dante, in his Inferno, in a red-hot coffin, the lid of which is suspended over him till the day of judgment. He is represented as faithless and an epicure. (Thirteenth century.)

Farley or Farley. A duty of 6d. paid to the lord of the manor of West Slapton, in Devonshire. (Bailey.) Money given by a tenant instead of his best beast (heriot).

Farm means food; so called because anciently the tenant was required to provide the landlord with food by way of rent. (Anglo-Saxon, feornu, food.)

To farm taxes is the French affervir (to let or lease), from fermar, a letting for the supply of food.

Farmer George. George III.; so called from his farmer-like manners, taste, dress, and amusements. (1738, 1760-1820.)

“A better farmer never brushed dew from lawn.”

Byron: Vision of Judgment.
Farmers. A farmer ought to make four rents in order to live: one for rent, one for labour, one for stock, and one for himself.

Farnese Bull [Far-nəz-ə]. A name given to a colossal group attributed to Apollo’sius and Taurusc of Trajan, in Asia Minor. They belonged to the Rhodian school, and lived about B.C. 300. The group represents Dirce bound to the horns of a bull by Zethus and Amphion, for ill-using their mother. It was restored by Bianchi in 1546, and placed in the Farnese palace, in Italy.

Farnese Hercules [Far-nəz-ə Her-cu-ləs]. A name given to Glykon’s copy of the famous statue of Lysippus, the Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander the Great. It represents the hero leaning on his club, with one hand on his back, as if he had just got possession of the apple of the Hesperides. Farnese is the name of a celebrated family in Italy, which became extinct in 1731.

"It grieves me that an iconoclasm is to a wooden vessel what the Farnese Hercules is to the Apollo Belvidere. The Hercules is not without a beauty of its own."—The Times (Paris correspondent).

Faroese (3 syl.). Belonging to the Faroe Islands; a native of the islands.

Farrago. A farrago of nonsense. A confused heap of nonsense. Farrago is properly a mixture of far (meal) with other ingredients for the use of cattle.

"Anquetil was desired . . . for having suffered a farrago of nonsense to be palmed off upon him by his Parsi teachers as the works of the sage Zoroaster."—Whitney: Oriental Studies (Avesta), chap. vi, p. 184.

Farringdon Ward (London). The aldermanry, etc., granted by John le Fevre to William Farnington, citizen and goldsmith of London, in consideration of twenty marks given beforehand as a gersum to the said John le Fevre. (1279.)

Farthing. A fourth part. Penny pieces used to be divided into four parts, thus, 1. One of these quarters was a farthing, and two a halfpenny. (Anglo-Saxon, fourthing.)

I don’t care for it a brass farthing. James II. debased all the coinage, and issued, amongst other worthless coins, brass pence, halfpence, and farthings.

The farthing was the fourth part of other coins. Thus, we read in the Grayfriars’ Chronicle—

"This yere the king made a newe quyne, as the nobylée, halv-moij lie, and far dýng-n-ny lie."

Farthingale (3 syl). A sort of crinoline petticoat. The word means a "guard for modesty." (French, vertige, corrupted into verdingade, and then into farthingale.)

Faryndon Inn. Serjeants’ Inn, Chancery Lane, used to be so called.

Fascination means "slain or overcome by the eyes." The allusion is to the ancient notion of bewitching by the power of the eye. (Greek, basilasko, i.e. phakti kaino, to kill with the eyes. See Valpy: Etymology of Greek Words, p. 23, col. 1; Latin, fascino.) (See Evil Eye.) "None of the affection have been noted to fascinate and bewitch, but love and envy."—Linnæus.

Fashion [fash-ən]. In a fashion or after a fashion. "In a sort of a way;" as, "he spoke French in a fashion" (i.e. very badly). ("French of Stafford atte Bowe.")

Fashion of Speech (A). "Facon de parler" (q.v.); "Ratio logundi!"

Fast Girl or Young Lady (A) is one who talks slang, assumes the airs of a knowing one, and has no respect for female delicacy and retirement. She is the apo of the fast young man.

Fast Man (A) is one who lives a continual round of "pleasure" so fast that he wears himself out.

Fast and Loose (To play). To run with the hare and hold with the hounds; to blow both hot and cold; to say one thing and do another. The allusion is to a cheating game practised at fairs. A belt is folded, and the player is asked to prick it with a skewer, so as to pin it fast to the table; having so done, the adversary takes the two ends, and looses it or draws it away, showing that it has not been pierced at all.

"He forced his neck into a noise, To show his play at fast and loose; And when he chanced to win, must look, For art and sudden, his luck."—Butler: Hudibras, ill. 2

Fasti. Working days; when, in Rome, the law-courts were open. Holy days (diea non), when the law-courts were not open, were, by the Romans, called ex-fasti.

Fasting. The most ingenious method of fasting I know of is that recorded in the Mappemonde Papiistique, p. 82. A Venetian saint had certain boxes made like mass-books, and these book-boxes were filled, some with Malmsay wine, and some with the fleshiest parts of capons and partridges. These were supposed to be books of devotion, and the saint lived long and grew fat on them.
Fastrade (2 syl.). Daughter of the Saxon count Rodolph and Luigarde the German. One of the nine wives of Charlemagne.

"These same soft bells at eventide
Bang in the ears of Charlemagne,
As, seated by Fastrade’s side
At Ingelheim, in all his pride.
He heard their sound with secret pain.
Longfellow: Golden Legend, iv.

Fat. All the fat is in the fire. The allusion is to the process of frying. If the grease is split into the fire, the coals smoke and blaze so as to spoil the fire. The proverb signifies that something has been let out inadvertently which will cause a "regular flare up."

The Fat:—
Alfonso II. of Portugal, (1211-1223.)
Charles II. of France, le Gros. (832, 881-888.)
Louis VI. of France, le Gros. (1078, 1108-1137.)

Fat Men.
Edward Bright, of Essex, weighed 44 stone, or 616 pounds, at death. He was 5 feet 9 inches high, 5 feet round the chest, and 6 feet 11 inches round the paunch. He died 1750, aged thirty.

Daniel Lambert, born at St. Margarets’ Leicester, weighed 739 pounds. He was 3 yards 4 inches round the waist, 1 yard 1 inch round the leg. (1770-1800.)

Fat as a Porpoise. The skin of the porpoise is nearly an inch thick, and under it is a layer of fat somewhat thicker, and yielding oil of the finest quality.

Fata. Women introduced in mediæval romance not unlike witches, and under the sway of Demogorgon. In Orlando Innamorato we meet with the "Fata Morgana:; in Bolognese, with the "Fata Silvanella." The Fates Nerl and Bianca, the protectress of Guido’ne and Aquilante; the "Fata della Fonti," from whom Mauricardo obtains the arms of Hector; and "Alcina," sister of Morgana, who carries off Astolfo. In Tasso we have the three daughters of Morgana, whose names are Morganeet, Nivetta, and Carvilia; we have also Dragonte, Montanna, Argea (called the queen of the Fates), protectress of Floridante, Filide (sister of Argea), and several others. In the Adone of Maria we have the Fata named "Falsirena."

Fata Morgana. A sort of mirage occasionally seen in the Straits of Messina. Fata is Italian for a "fairy," and the fairy Morgana was the sister of Arthur and pupil of Merlin. She lived at the bottom of a lake, and dispensed her treasures to whom she liked. She is first introduced in the Orlando Innamorato as "Lady Fortune," but subsequently assumes her witch-like attributes. In Tasso her three daughters are introduced.

Fatal Gifts. Collar of Arsinoe, collar and veil of Eryphyle, gold of the Nibelungen, gold of Tolosa, necklace of Cadmos, Harmonia’s necklace and robe, opal of Alphonsus XII., the Trojan horse, the shirt of Nessus, etc. (See these subjects.)

Fato = something destined or suitable, is not the Latin fatum, but the French fatal = share, one’s own, that which suits one; as "voila mon fatal," that is the man for me.

"Pour moi, ma sœur, a dit la cadette, j’aimais le solite, je veux un homme riche et le gros don Bianco sera mon fatal."—Le Sage: Biade Boilece.

Fates (1 syl.). The cruel fates. The Greeks and Romans supposed there were three Parcae or Fates, who arbitrarily controlled the birth, events, and death of every man. They are called cruel because they pay no regard to the wishes and requirements of anyone.

The three Fates were Clotho (who held the distaff), Lachesis (who spun the thread of life), and Atropos (who cut it off when life was ended).

Father. A friar in holy orders. (See Brother.)

A father suckled by his daughter. Euphrasia, the Grecian daughter, so preserved the life of Evander, her aged father.

Xantippe so preserved the life of her father Cimon in prison. The guard, marvelling the old man held out so long, set a watch and discovered the fact. Byron alludes to these stories in his Childe Harold.

"There is a dungeon, in whose dim, drear light
What do I gaze on? . . .
An old man, and a female young and fair,
Fresh as a nursing mother, in whose vein
The blood is nectar. . . .
Here 3 only offers to old age the food,
The milk of his own gift:—it is her sire
To whom she renders back the debt of blood....
Drink, drink and live, old man! here’s a realm holds no such tude."

Byron: Childe Harold, iv. st. 184, 185.

Without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life—i.e. Melchisedec (Heb. vii. 3). He was not the son of a priest, either on his father’s or mother’s side; his pedigree could not be traced in the priestly line, like that of the ordinary high priests, which can be traced to Aaron; nor did he serve in Father Mathew

Courses like the Levites, who begin and end their official duties at stated times. "Jesus was a "priest after the order of Melchisedec." Neither his reputed father, Joseph, nor his mother, Mary, was of the priestly line. As priest, therefore, he was "without father, without mother," without genealogy. And, like Melchisedec, he is a "priest for ever."

His father it on me. He impuotes it to me; he says it is my bantling.

Father Mathew. (See Mathew.)

Father Neptune. The ocean.

Father Norbert. Pierre Parisot, the French missionary (1007-1769).

Father Paul. Pietro Sarpi, father of the order of Servites, who moved his Christian name when he assumed the religious habit. (1652-1623.)

Father Pratt. Francis Mahoney, a humorist writer in Francis's Magazine and the Globe newspaper. (1605-1666.)

Father Thames, or Old Father Thames. The Thames, as far as it belongs to London.

But Father Thames, for thou hast seen Pilgrims of a sprightly race
Departing on the margin green,
The paths of pleasure trim.

Gray: Distant Prospect of London.

The epithet is not uncommonly applied to other great rivers, especially those on which cities are built. The river is the father of the city, or the reason why the site was selected by the first settlers there.

O, Tiber, Father Tiber,
To whom the Romans pray.
Middle Way of Horatius.

Father Thoughtful. Nicholas Ca't-inat, a marshal of France; so called by his soldiers for his cautious and thoughtful policy. (1637-1712.)

Father of Waters. The Irrawaddy, in Burma, and the Mississippi, in North America. The Nile is so called by Dr. Johnson in his Rasselas. (See Father Thames.)

Father of his Country.

Cicero was so entitled by the Roman senate. They offered the same title to Marcus, but he refused to accept it. Several of the Caesars were so entitled—Julius, after quelling the insurrection of Spain; Augustus, etc.

Cosimo de' Medici (1389-1611).

G. Washington, the defender and paternal counsellor of the American States. (1782-1799.)

Andrea D’orea (1488-1660). Inscribed on the base of his statue by his countrymen of Genoa.

Andronikus Paleologus II. assumed the title (1260-1322).

(See also I Chron. iv. 14.)

Father of the People.

Louis XII. of France (1462, 1498-1515). Henri IV. was also termed "the father and friend of the people" (1553, 1589-1610).

Christian III. of Denmark (1502, 1534-1559).

Gabriel du Pincau, the French lawyer (1578-1644).

Fathers of the Church. The early advocates of Christianity, who may be thus classified:

1. Five apostolic fathers, who were contemporaneous with the apostles—viz. Clement of Rome, Bar’nas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

2. The primitive fathers. Those advocates of Christianity who lived in the first centuries. They consisted of the five apostolic fathers (q.v.), together with the following:—Justin, Theophilus of Antioch, Ireneus, Clement of Alexandria, Cyprian of Carthage, Origen, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Dionysius of Alexandria, and Tertullian.

3. The fathers, or those of the fourth and fifth centuries, who were of two groups, those of the Greek and those of the Latin Church. (See below.)

Fathers of the Greek Church.

Euseb’ius, Athanas’ius, Basil the Great, Gregory Nazianzen’us, Gregory of Nyssa, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Epiphanius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Ephraim, deacon of Edessa.

Fathers of the Latin Church.

The last of the fathers. St. Bernard (1091-1153). The schoolmen who followed treated their subjects systematically.

Founder of the fathers of Christian doctrine. Caesar de Bus (1541-1607).

Fathom (Count). A villain in Smollet’s novel so called. After robbing his benefactors, and fleecing all who trusted him, he is at last forgiven.

Fatima. The last of Bluebeard’s wives, who was saved from death by the timely arrival of her brother with a party of friends. Mahomet’s favourite daughter was called Fatima.
Fatted Calf. To kill the fatted calf. To welcome with the best of everything. The phrase is taken from the parable in the third gospel of the prodigal son. (Luke xv. 30.)

Fatau Mutter. A law term for a courtesan. Fatusus with jurisconsults means one not in a right mind, incorrigibly foolish.

Fault. At fault. Not on the right track; doubtful whether right or wrong. Hounds are at fault when the scent is broken because the fox has jumped upon a wall, crossed a river, cut through a flock of sheep, or doubled like a hare.

In Geology, the break or displacement of a stratum of rock is called a fault.

Fault. (French, faute, Latin, fallio, to fail.)

For fault of a better (Shakespeare: Merry Wives, i. 4). Having no better. "I am the youngest of that name, for fault of a worse."—Shakespeare: Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

In fault. To blame. "Is Antony or we in fault for this?"—Shakespeare: Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 12. To a fault. In excess; as, kind to a fault. Excess of every good is more or less evil.

To find fault. To blame; to express disapprobation.

Faults. No one is without his faults, i.e. is faultless. "Viliss nemo sinu naturalit," Fauна (2 syll.). The animals of a country at any given geological period; so called from the mythological fauns, who were the patrons of wild animals.

"Nor lose the place of curious plant he knows—He both his Flora and his Faun shows."—Crotty: Berewalk.

Faust (1 syll.). The grandest of all Goethe’s dramas. Faust makes a compact with Mephistophelés, who on one occasion provides him with a cloak, by means of which he is wafted through the air whistlesover he chooses. "All that is weird, mysterious, and magical groups round this story." An English dramatic version has been made by Bayle Bernard.

Dr. Faustus, a tragedy by Marlow: Faust and Marguerite, by Bouicault; Faust e Margherito, an opera by Gounod, etc.

Faux-jour (French). A false or contrary light; meaning that a picture is hung so that the light falls on it in the opposite direction to what it ought. The artist has made his light fall in one direction, but it is so hung that the light falls the other way.

Faux Pas. A "false step"; a breach of manners or moral conduct. (French.)

Faveo’nisus. The zephyr or west wind. It means the wind favourable to vegetation.

Favour. Ribbons made into a bow; so called from being the favour bestowed by ladies on the successful champions of tournaments. (See True Love Knot: Curzy Faviour.)

"Here, Phyllis; wear thou this favour for me, and stick it in thy cap."—Shakespeare: Henry V, iv, 7.

Favourite. One to whom a lady gives a "favour" or token. The horse which betting men suppose is most likely to come off the winner of a particular race.

Favourites. False curls on the temples; a curl of hair on the temples plastered with some cosmetic; whiskers made to meet the mouth.

"Yet tell me, sire, don’t you as nice appear With your false curls, ladish, and favours here?"—Mrs. Centlivre.

Fay. (See Fairy.)

Faye (1 syll.). The way to Faye (French, "Faise-la-vineuse"). A winding or zigzag manner, like "Crooked Lane at Eastcheap." A person who tries to do something indirectly goes by the pathway to Faye. Faye is a little village in France, built on an eminence so steep that there is no getting to it except by a very zigzag path.

"They go in to Paradise... as the way is to Faye."—Babelon: Gargantua and Pantagruel, book i. 27.

Fazio. A native of Florence, who first tried to make his fortune by alchemy; but being present when Bartoldo, an old miser, died, he buried the body secretly, and stole his money—bags. Being now rich, he became acquainted with the Marchioness Aldabella, with whom he passed his time in licentious pleasure. His wife Bianca, out of jealousy, accused him to the duke of being privy to the death of Bartoldo; and Fazio was condemned to death for murder. Bianca now tried to undo the mischief she had done, but it was too late; she went mad with grief, and died of a broken heart. (Dean Milman: Fazio.)

Fear Fortress. An hypothetical castle in a forest near Saragossa. It represents that terrible obstacle which fear conjures up, but which vanishes into thin air as it is approached by a Feathers: An oil feather. Kindness of manner and speech. An oil feather will do more to ease a stubborn lank than great force. (See Power's Tract called The Oiled Feather.)

Birds of a feather flock together.

Latin: Similes similibus gaudent.

Pares cum paribus facile congregantur. Cicero says, "Deo novimus omnium et vestitu."

French: Qui se ressemble, s'assemble.

In full feather. Flush of money. In allusion to birds not on the moult.

In grand feather. Dressed to the nines.

In high feather. In exuberant spirits, joyous. When birds are molting they mope about, but as soon as they regain their feathers their spirits revive.

Tickled with a feather. Easilly moved to laughter. "Pleased with a feather, tickled with a straw," is more usual; livre de la moindre bagatelle.

Also annoyed by trifles, worried by little annoyances.

"From day to day some silly things Upset you altogether; There's nothing so soon conversion brings As tickling with a feather.

'Gainst minor evils let him pray Where justice's favour curvets; For one that big misfortunes slay Ten die of little worries."

Some: Ballads of Babylon (Little Worries).

Cut a feather. A ship going fast is said to cut a feather, in allusion to the ripple which she throws off from her bows. Metaphorically, "to cut a dash."

"Jack could never cut a feather."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, xxiv.

To show a white feather. (See WHITE . . .)

Feather in Your Cap. That's a feather in your cap. An honour to you. The allusion is to the very general custom, in Asia and among the American Indians of adding a new feather to their head-gear for every new enemy slain. The Cahuil of Cabul stick a feather in their turban for every Musulman slain by them. The Incas and Cauques, the Moenitarios and Mandans (of America), the Abyssinians and Turcomans, etc., etc., follow the same custom. So did the ancient Lycians, and many others. In Scotland and Wales it is still customary for the sportsman who kills the first woodcock to pluck out a feather and stick it in his cap. In fact, the custom, in one form or another, seems to be almost universal.

† When "Chinese" Gordon quelled the Taiping rebellion he was honoured by the Chinese Government with the "yellow jacket and peacock's feather."
In Hungary, at one time, none might wear a feather but he who had slain a Turk. (Landsdowne MS. 775, folio 149.)

Feather One's Nest.

He has feathered his nest well. He has made lots of money; has married a rich woman. The allusion is to birds, which line their nests with feathers to make them soft and warm.

Feather One's Oar (To).

To feather an oar is to turn the blade parallel with the surface of the water as the hands are moved forward for a fresh stroke. (The Greek πτερόω means both "an oar" and "a feather," and the verb πτεροῦν, to "furnish with oars" or "with feathers.") The oar throws off the water in a feathery spray.

"He feathered his oars with such skill and dexterity.

Feather Stone. A federal stone or stone table at which the ancient courts baron were held in the open air, and at which covenants were made. (Latin, fœdus, a treaty.)

Feathers (The). A public-house sign in compliment to Henry VI., whose cognizance it was.

Fine feathers make fine birds. (Latin, "Vestis virum fact, dress makes the man."). The French proverb is "La belle plume fait le bel oiseau."

The Prince of Wales' feathers. The tradition is, that the Black Prince, having slain John of Luxemburg, King of Bohemia, in the Battle of Crewey, assumed his crest and motto. The crest consisted of three ostrich feathers, and the motto was "Ich dien" (I serve). John of Arden discovered a contemporary MS., in which it is expressly said that this was the case; but much controversy has arisen on the question. Dr. Bell affirms that the crest is a rebus of Queen Philippa's hereditary title—viz. Countess of Ostrevaunt (ostrich-feather). Randall Holmes claims an old British origin; and the Rev. H. Longueville asserts that the arms of Roderick Mawe, prior to the division of Wales into principalities, was thus blazoned:—"Argent, three lions passant regardant, with their tails passing between their legs and curling over their backs in a feathery form."

Feature means the "make." Spenser speaks of God's "secret understanding of our feature"—i.e. make or structure. It now means that part which is most conspicuous or important. Thus we speak of the chief features of a painting, a garden, a book, etc., etc. (Norman, faire; Latin, factura.)

February. The month of purification amongst the ancient Romans (Latin, februus, to purify by sacrifice.)

The 2nd of February (Candlemas Day). It is said, if the weather is fine and frosty at the close of January and beginning of February, we may look for more winter to come than we have seen up to that time.

"If Candlemas Day be dry and fair, The half o' winter's gone and nair; If Candlemas Day be wet and foul, The half o' winter's gone at full.

Scotch Proverb.

"The badger peeps out of his hole on Candlemas Day, and, if he finds snow, walks abroad; but if he sees the sun shining he draws back into his hole."—German Proverb.

Fecit (Latin, he did it). A word inscribed after the name of an artist, sculptor, etc., as David fecit, Goujon fecit; i.e. David painted it, Goujon sculptured it, etc.

Feco'sa means sediment. Starch is a fœcusa, being the sediment of flour steeped in water. (Latin, fæces, dregs.)

Federal States. In the late American war the Unionists were so called—i.e. those northern states which combined to resist the eleven southern or Confederate states (q.v.).

Fee. Anglo-Saxon feoh, cattle, goods, money. So in Latin, pecuris, from pecus, cattle. Capital is capita, heads [of cattle], and chattels is a mere variant.

Fee-farm- rent is where an estate is granted, subject to a rent in fee of at least one-fourth its value. It is rent paid on lands let to farm, and not let in recompense of service at a greatly reduced value.

Fee-penny. A fine for money overdue. Sir Thomas Gresham often wrote for money "in order to save the fee-penny."

Fee Simple. An estate free from condition or limitation. If restricted by conditions, the inheritance is called a 'Conditional Fee.'

Fee-tail (f.4). An estate limited to a person and his lawful heirs.

Feeble. Most feeble. Feeble. A writer whose language is very "loud," but whose ideas are very jejune. Feeble is a "woman's tailor," brought to Sir John Falstaff as a recruit. He tells Sir John "he will do his good will," and the Feed of Corn. A quartern of oats, the quantity given a horse on a journey when the ostler is told to give him a feed.

Femm-evert. A married woman. This does not mean a woman covert by her husband, but a woman whose head is covered, not usual with maidens or unmarried women. In Rome unmarried women wore on their heads only a corolla (i.e., a wreath of flowers). In Greece they wore an anædæma, or fillet. The Hungarian spinster is called hujadon (bare-headed). Married women, as a general rule, have always covered their head with a cap, turban, or something of the same sort, the head being covered as a badge of subjection. Hence Rebekah (Gen. xxiv. 65), being told that the man she saw was her espoused husband, took a veil and covered her head. Servants wear caps, and private soldiers in the presence of their officers cover their heads for the same reason. (See Eph. v. 22, 23.)

Femme-sole. A single woman. Femme-sole merchant. A woman who carries on a trade on her own account.

Femme de Chambre. (French.) A chambermaid.

Fen Nightingale. A frog, which sings at night in the fens, as nightingales sing in the groves. (See ARCADIAN NIGHTINGALE.)

Fence Month. The close time of deer, from fifteen days before Midsummer to fifteen days after it. This being fawning time, deer-hunting is forbidden.

Fenchurch Street (London). The church in the fens or marshy ground by the "Langbourne" side.

Fenrable Regiments. A kind of militia raised in 1759, again in 1778-9, and again in 1794, when a force of 15,000 was raised. The force was disbanded in 1802.

Fennellia. A pretended deaf and dumb sylph-like attendant on the Countess of Derby, in Scott's Per'evil of the Peak.
Fenians. An anti-British association of disaffected Irishmen, called the Fenian Brotherhood, after the ancient Fenians of Ireland; formed in New York, in 1857, to overthrow the domination of England in Ireland, and make Ireland a republic. The word means a hunter—Gaelic, fionn, from freadhach (pronounced fer-agh), a hunt. Before the Germanic invasion, a Celtic race so called occupied not only parts of Ireland and Scotland, but also the north of Germany and the Scandinavian shores. Oisin (Ossian) refers to them, and one passage is thus rendered in The Antiquary: "Do you compare your psalms to the tales of the bare-armed Fenians?" Oisin was the grandson of Fionn, the "fair-haired right (chief) of the Fenians," and all the high officers of this volunteer association were men of rank. It appears that the Fenians of Ireland (Erris), Scotland (Alba), Englund (Scoring), and Scandinavia, had a great civil battle at Gabhail, in Ireland, and extirpated each other. Oisin alone escaped, and he had slain "twice fifty men with his own hand." In the great Fenian outbreak of Ireland in 1865, etc., the leaders were termed "head centres," and their subordinates "centres." (See CLAN-NA-GAEL.)

Fennel. Said to restore lost vision and to give courage.

"Above the lowly plants it towers,
The fennel with its yellow flowers,
And in an earlier age than ours,
Widowed with the wondrous powers
Lost vision to restore;
It gave new strength and fearless mood,
And gladiators fierce and rude
Mingled it in their daily food;
And who batted and subdued
The breath of fennel wore.

Fenrir or Fenris. The wolf of sin [i.e., of Loki], meaning the goading of a guilty conscience. The "wolf" was the brother of Hel (q.v.). When he gapes, one jaw touches earth and the other heaven. In the Ragnarok he swallows the sun and conquers Odin; but being conquered by Vidar, he was cast into Nifhheim, where Loki was confined.

Fenton. One who seeks to mend his fortune by marriage. He is the suitor of Anne Page. Her father objects to him, he says, because "I am too great of birth;

And that, my state being small'd with my expense,
I seek to heal it only by his wealth."
Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, III. 4.

Fero Nature. Applied in law to animals living in a wild state, as distinguished from animals which are domesticated.

Ferdinand. Son of the King of Naples, and suitor of Miranda, daughter of Prospero, the banished Duke of Milan. (Shakespeare: Tempest.) In Love's Labour's Lost, the same name is given to the King of Navarre.

Ferdinand. A brave soldier who obtained a complete victory over the King of Morocco and Grenada, near Tarija, in 1340. Being in love with Leonora da Guzman, Alfonso X., whose life he had saved in the battle, created him Count of Zamora and Marquis of Montreal, and gave him the hand of Leonora in marriage. No sooner was this done, than Ferdinand discovered that Leonora was the king's mistress; so he restored his ranks and honours to the king, repudiated his bride, and retired to the monastery of St. James of Compostella. Leonora entered the same monastery as a novice, obtained the forgiveness of Ferdinand, and died. (Donizetti's opera of La Favorita.)

Ferdosí. A Persian poet, famous for the copious flow of his diction. He wrote in verse the Shah-Nâmeh, or history of the Persian kings, which took thirty years, and contains 120,000 verses.

Ferguson. It's all very fine, Ferguson; but you don't lodge here. Capt. Ferguson was the companion of the Marquis of Waterford, when that young nobleman made himself notorious for his practical jokes in the middle of the nineteenth century. In one of their sprees the two companions got separated, and the marquis found his way home to the house of his uncle, the Archbishop of Armagh, Charles Street, St. James's Square. The marquis had gone to bed, when a thundering knock came at the door. The marquis, suspecting who it was that knocked, threw up the window and said, "It is all very fine, Ferguson, but you don't lodge here;" and for many years the saying was popular. (See Notes and Queries, Jan. 16, 1866, p. 46.)

Fern. (See FANNY FERN.)
Fern Seed. We have the receipt of fern seed, we walk invisible (1 Henry IV., act iv. 4.). The seed of certain species of fern is so small as to be invisible to the naked eye, and hence the plant was believed to confer invisibility on those who carried it about their person. It was at one time believed that plants have the power of imparting their own speciality to their wearer. Thus, the herb-dragon was said to cure the poison of serpents; the yellow calamine the jaundice; wood-sorrel, which has a heart-shaped leaf, to cheer the heart; liverwort to be good for the liver, and so on.

"Why did you think that you had got his ring? Or the herb that gives invisibility?"
Bennett and Fletcher: Fair Maid of the Tan. i. 1.

"The seeds of fern, which, by proficient heat,
Cheered and multiplied, form a plant so great,
Are less a thousand times than what the eye
Can unassisted by the tube discern."
Blackmore: Creation.

Fernando Florestano. A state prisoner of Soville, married to Leonora, who, in man’s disguise, and under the name of Fidelio, became the servant of Rocco, the jailor. Pizarro, governor of the prison, conceived a hatred to Fernando, and resolved to murder him. Rocco and Leonora were sent to dig his grave, and when Pizarro entered the dungeon, Leonora intercepted his purpose. At this juncture the minister of State arrived, and ordered the prisoner’s release. (Beethoven: Fidelio.)

Ferney. The patriarch of Ferney. Voltaire; so called because he retired to Ferney, a small sequestered village near Geneva, from which obscure retreat he poured forth his invectives against the French Government, the Church, nobles, nuns, priests, and indeed all classes.

"There are in Paris five or six statues of the patriarch of Ferney."
—The Times.

Ferothers. The guardian angels of Persian mythology. They are countless in number, and their chief tasks are for the well-being of man.

Ferrante [sharp iron]. A giant in Turpin’s Chroniques de Charlemagne. He had the strength of forty men, and was thirty-six feet high. Though no lance could pierce his hide, Orlando slew him by divine interposition. (See FERRAU.)

Ferragus. The giant of Portugal, who took Belissard under his care after she had been divorced by Alexander, Emperor of Constantinople. (Valentine and Orson.)

The great “Bronze Head,” that told those who consulted it whatever they required to know, was kept in the castle of this giant. (Valentine and Orson.) (See FERRAU.)

Ferrara. An Andrew Ferrara. A broadsword or claymore of the best quality, bearing the name of Andrew Ferrara, one of the Italian family whose swords were famous in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. Genuine “Andrea Ferraras” have a crown marked on the blade.

"My father had an Andrea Ferrara, which had been in the family about a century. It had a basket-hilt, and the name was distinctly stamped on the blade."

"We’ll put in bail, boy; old Andrew Ferrara shall lodge his security."
—Scott: Waverley, chap. 1.

Ferrau (in Orlando Furioso). Ferrau, Ferracutio, or Ferragus, a Saracen, son of Lanfu’s. He dropped his helmet in the river, and vowed he would never wear another till he had won that worn by Orlando. Orlando slew him with a wound in the navel, his only vulnerable part.

Ferrax and Porrex. Two sons of Gorbaduc, a mythical British king. Porrex drove his brother from Britain, and when Ferrex returned with an army he was slain, but Porrex was shortly after put to death by his mother. One of the first, if not the very first, historical play in the English language was Ferrex and Porrex, by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville.

Ferumbras. (See FERRABRAS.)

Fessonne Verses. Lampoons; so called from Fessonnia in Tuscany, where performers at merry-making used to extemporise scurrilous jests of a personal nature to amuse the audience.

Fess (Latin, fascia, a band or covering for the thighs). In heraldry, the fess is a band drawn horizontally across the shield, of which it occupies one-third. It represents the band which was worn by knights low down across the hips.

Fest. A pledge. Festing-man, a surety to another. Festing-penny, a penny given in earnest to secure a bargain. (Anglo-Saxon, festing, an act of confidence, an entrusting.)

Fetch. A wraith—the disembodied ghost of a living person. (See FETCHE.)

"Fetches . . . most commonly appear to distant friends and relations, at the very instant preceding the death of those they represent."
Brand: Popular Antiquities (Death Omnibus).
Fetches. Excuses, tricks, artifices.
(Saxon.)
"Deny to speak with me? They are sick? they are weak? They have travelled all the night? More fetches."
Shakespeare: King Lear, II. 4.

Fetiche or Fetish. The African idol, the same as the American Man'itou. The worship of this idol is called Feticism or Fetishism. (Portuguese, fetiso, magician, fairy, oracle.)

"Almost anything will serve for a fetiche: a fly, a bird, a lion, a fish, a serpent, a stone, a tree struck by lightning, a bit of metal, a shell; but the most potent of all fetiches is the rock Tabro.

The fetiche or fetish of the bottle. The imp drunkenness, or drunkenness itself.

Fetter Lane is probably fentener-lane. A fetterer is a keeper of dogs, and the lane has always been famous for dog-fanciers. Howel, with less probability, says it is Fecutor Lane, i.e. the lane of fencers or worthless fellows who were for ever loitering about the lane on their way to the gardens. Faitour is an archaic word for a worthless fellow, a lazy vagabond, from the Norman-French.

Feettle, as a verb, means to repair; to smoothe; as an adjective, it means well-knit, all right and tight. It is connected with our word feat, the French faire, the Latin facere.

Feetled ale, in Lancashire, means ale warmed and spiced.

Feu de Joie (French). A running fire of guns on an occasion of rejoicing.

Feud, meaning "hatred," is the Saxon faeth (hatred); but feud, a "fist," is the Teutonic fer-odh (trust-land). (See below.)

Feudal or Freodal (2 syl.). In Gothic odh means "property," hence odh-all (entire property); Flemish, ndal. By transposition we get all-odh, whence our alodiius (absolute property claimed by the holders of fiefs); and by combining the words for and odh we get feod, feeth, or food (property given by way of fee for services conferred). (Pontoppidan.)

Feudal System (The). A system founded on the tenure of feuds or fiefs, given in compensation for military service to the lord of the tenants.

Feuillants. A reformed Cistercian order instituted by Jean de la Barrière in 1686. So called from the convent of Feuillants, in Languedoc, where they were established in 1677.

The club of the Feuillants, in the French Revolution, composed of moderate Jacobins. So called because the convent of the Feuillants, near the Tuileries, was their original club-room (1791-2).

Feuilleton [fay-yel-ten]. A fly-sheet. Applied to the bottom part of French newspapers, generally devoted to a tale or some other light literature.

"The daily [French] newspapers all had feuilletons with continued stories in them."—Hale: Times One, chap. viii. p. 125.

Feu-lur'dan or Fever-lurgan. A fit of idleness. Lurden means a block-head. (French, lowrd, heavy, dull, thick-headed; lourdaud, a blockhead.)

Fever-lurk. A corruption of Feverburg, as "Fever-lurgan" is of Feverlurden. The disease of laziness.

"Fever-lurk, Neither play nor work."

Fey. Predestined to early death. When a person suddenly changes his wonted manner of life, as when a miser becomes liberal, or a churl good-humoured, he is said in Scotch to be fey, and near the point of death.

"She must be fey (said Trepidomen), and in that case has not long to live."—Sir W. Scott: The Pirate, chap. i.

Fo'zon. Daughter of Savary, Duke of Aquitaine, demanded in marriage by a pagan, called the Green Knight; but Orson, having overthrown the pagan, was accepted by the lady instead. (Valentine and Orson.)

Fl or Fie! An exclamation indicating that what is reproved is dirty or indecent. The dung of many animals, as the boar, wolf, fox, marten, and badger, is called fings, and the "orificium anale" is called a fi, a word still used in Lincolnshire. (Anglo-Norman, fiy, to clean out; Saxon, afylan, to foul: our defile or file, to make foul; filth, etc.)

The old words, fic-corn (dross corn), fi-lands (unclosed lands), fi-mushings (the dung of any wild beast), etc., are compounds of the same word.

"I had another process against the dung-farmer, Master Full."—Relates: Pentagruel, book ii. 11.

Fl. Fa. A contraction of the two Latin words, fi'ti facias (cause it to be done). A judicial writ for one who has recovered damages in the Queen’s courts, being a command to the sheriff to see the judgment of the court duly carried out.

Fiacre. A French cab or hackney coach. So called from the Hotel de St. Fiacre, Paris, where the first station of these coaches was established by M. Sauvage, about 1650.

According to Albani Butler, Fiacre was the son of an Irish king, born in 000, to whose tomb pilgrimages were made in the month of August. His day is August 30th. (Lives of the Saints, vol. ii. p. 378.)

Fian (John), a schoolmaster at Salt-pans, near Edinburgh, tortured to death and then burnt at the stake on the Castle Hill of Edinburgh, Saturday, January, 1591, because he refused to acknowledge that he had raised a storm at sea, to wreck James I. on his voyage to Denmark to visit his future queen. First, his head was crushed in upon his brain by means of a rope twisted tighter and tighter; then his two legs were jammed to a jelly in the wooden boots; then his nails were pulled out and pins inserted in the raw finger tips; as he still remained silent, he was strangled, and his dead body burnt to ashes.

Fiars. Striking the flars. Taking the average price of corn. Fiars is a Gothic word, still current in Ireland. (Scotch law.)

Fiasco. A failure, a null. In Italy they cry Old, old, fiasco! to an unpopular singer. This word, common in France and Germany, is employed as the opposite of furore.

The history of the word is as follows:—In making Venetian glass, if the slightest flaw is detected, the glassblower turns the article into a fiasco—that is, a common flask.

A gentleman from North America (G. Fox, "Pioneers in the West") furnished me with the following anecdote: "There was once a clever harlequin of Florence named Dominic Biancoletti, noted for his comic baragunies. He was wont to improvise upon whatever article he held in his hand. One night he appeared holding a flask (fiasco); but failing to extenuate any humour whatsoever from his subject, he said, 'It is thy fault, fiasco,' and dashed the flask on the ground. After that a failure was commonly called in Florence a fiasco." To me it appears incredible that a clever improvisator could draw no matter from an empty bottle, apparently a subject ripe with matter.

Fiat. I give my fiat to that proposal. I consent to it. A fiat in law is an order of the court directing that something stated be done. (Latin, fiat, let it be done.)

Fib. An attendant on Queen Mab in Drayton's Nymphidia. Fib, meaning a falsehood, is the Latin fabula, a fable.

Fico. (See Fig.)

"Fico for the phrase."

Shakespeare: Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 2.

"I see contempt marching forth, giving me the chin with his thumb in his mouth." — Wit's Miserie (1580).

Fiddle (Latin, fidis or fitis). He was first fiddle. Chief man, the most distinguished of the company.

To play second fiddle. To take a subordinate part. The allusion is to the leader of concerts, who leads with a fiddle.

The Scotch fiddle or Caledonian Cremona. The itch. As fiddlers scratch with a bow the strings of a fiddle, so persons suffering from skin-irritation keep scratching the part irritated.

Fiddle About (To). To fiddle about a thing means to "play" business. To fiddle with one's fingers is to move them about as a fiddler moves his fingers up and down the fiddle-strings.

"More trifling, or unprofitable fiddling about nothing"—Barrow: Sermons, vol. i. sermon 7.

Fiddle-de-dee! An exclamation signifying what you say is nonsense or moonshine. Fiddle-de-dee is meant to express the sound of a fiddle-string vocalised. Hence "sound signifying nothing."

Fiddle-faddle. It is all fiddle-faddle. Rubbishy nonsense; talk not worth attention. A ricocot, word of which we have a vast number, as "film-flam," "helter-skelter," "wissy-wissy," etc. To fiddle is to waste time in playing on the fiddle, and hence fiddle means a trifle, and fiddle-faddle is silly trifle or silly nonsense.

"Platul fool that l was to stand fiddle-faddling in that way."

Clough: Amours de Voyage, canto iv. stanza 3.

Fiddlebook. The name of Oliver Goldsmith's poor unfortunate pony, on which he made his country excursions.

Fiddler. Drunk as a fiddler. Fiddlers at wakes and fairs were allowed meat and drink to their heart's content, and seldom left a merry-making sober.

Oliver's Fiddler. Sir Roger L'Estrange (1616-1704). So called because he, at one time, was playing a fiddle or viole with others in the house of John Huntington when Cromwell was one of the guests.

"Fiddler" is a slang word for sixpence.

Fiddler's Fare or Fiddler's Pay. Meat, drink, and money.

Fiddler's Green. The land of the leal or "Dixie Land" of sailors: where there is perpetual mirth, a fiddle that never ceases to untiring dancers, plenty of grog, and unlimited tobacco.

Fiddler's Money. A silver penny. The fee given to a fiddler at a wake by each dancer.
Fiddler's News. Stale news carried about by wandering fiddlers.

Fiddlestick. In the Great German epic called The Nibelungen-Lied, this word is used six or eight times as a byword.

"His fiddlestick he grasped, 'twas massy, broad, and long,
As sharp as any razor."
Stanza 1,41.

"My fiddlestick's no feather; on whom I let it fall,
If he has friends that love him, 'twill set them weeping all."
Stanza 1,60.

"His fiddlestick, sharp-cutting, can hardest steel divide,
And at a stroke can shatter the monarch's heavy pride."
Stanza 2,76.

Fiddlesticks! An exclamation signifying what you say is not worth attention. To fiddle about is to waste time, fiddling. A fiddlestick is the instrument used in fiddling, hence the fiddlestick is even less than the fiddle.

Fide (3 syll.) The name assumed by Imogen in Shakespeare's Cymbeline. Collins has a beautiful eulogy on Fidele.

Fidelis. Beethoven's only opera. (See Leonora.)

Fides. The goddess of Faith, etc.

Fides (2 syll.) Mother of John of Leyden. Not knowing that her son was the "prophet" and ruler of Westphalia, but thinking that the prophet had caused his death, she went to Munster to curse the new-crowned monarch. The moment she saw him she recognised him, but the "prophet-king," surrounded by his courtiers, pretended not to know her. Fides, to save her son annoyance, declared she had made a mistake, and was confined in the dungeon of the palace at Munster, where John visited her and was forgiven. When her son set fire to his palace, Fides rushed into the flames and perished with him. (Meyerbeer's opera of Le Prophète.)

Fides Carbonarii. Blind faith, faith of a child. A carbonaro being asked what he believed, replied, "What the Church believes;" and, being asked again what the Church believes, made answer, "What I believe." (See Carbonari.) (Roux: Dictionnaire Comique.)

Field. (Anglo-Saxon, feld.)

In agricultural parlance, a field is a portion of land belonging to a farm.

In huntman's language, it means all the riders.

In heraldry, it means the entire surface of the shield.

In military language, it means a battle; the place where a battle is fought, or is about to be fought; a campaign.

In sportsmen's language it means all the horses of any one race.

Against the field. In horse-racing, to bet against the field means to back a particular horse against all the rest entered for the race.

In the field. A competitor for a prize. A term in horse-races, as, so-and-so was in the field. Also in war, as, the French were in the field already.

Master of the field. In military parlance, means the conqueror in a battle.

To keep back the field, is to keep back the riders.

To take the field. To move the army preparatory to battle.

To win the field. To win the battle.

Field-day. Day of business. Thus, a clergyman jocosely calls a "kept festival" his field-day. A military term, meaning a day when a regiment is taken to the fields for practice.

Field Marshal. A general officer of the highest rank, who commands an army, or, at any rate, more than one corps.

Field Officer. Any officer between captain and a general officer. A major or a lieutenant-colonel may be a field officer, being qualified to command whole battalions, or a "field."

Field Pieces. Small cannon carried into the field with an army.

Field Works. Works thrown up by an army in besieging or defending a fortress, or in strengthening its position.

"Earth-forts, and especially field works, will hereafter play an important part in war."—W. T. Sherman: Memoirs, Vol. II. Chap. XXIV. p. 386.

Field of Blood. Aced'dama, the piece of land bought by the chief priests with the money which Judas threw down in the temple; so called because it was bought with blood-money. (Matt. xxvii, 5; Acts i. 19.)

"The battle-field of Cannae (a.c. 216) is so called because it was especially sanguinary.

Field of Ice. A large body of floating ice.

Field of Vision or Field of View. The space in a telescope, microscope, stereoscope, etc., within which the object is visible. If the object is not distinctly visible, it must be brought into the field by adjustment.

Field of the Cloth of Gold. The plain, near Guines, where Henry VIII. had his interview with François I. in 1520; so called from the splendour and magnificence displayed there on the occasion.

Field of the Forty Footsteps.
At the back of the British Museum, now called Southampton Fields. The tradition is that two brothers, in the Duke of Monmouth’s rebellion, took different sides and engaged each other in fight. Both were killed, and forty impressions of their feet remained on the field for many years, where no grass would grow. The encounter took place at the extreme north-east of Upper Montague Street. The Misses Porter wrote a novel on the subject, and the Messrs. Mayhew a melodrama.

Fielding. The Fielding of the drama.
George Farquhar, author of the Jesus’
Strategem, etc. (1678-1707.)

Pierabrus (Sir), of Alexandria, son of Balan, King of Spain. The greatest giant that ever walked the earth. For height of stature, breadth of shoulder, and hardness of muscle he never had an equal. He possessed all Babylon, even to the Red Sea; was seigneur of Russia, Lord of Cologne, master of Jerusalem, even of the Holy Sepulchre. He carried away the crown of thorns, and the balsam which embalmed the body of Our Lord, one drop of which would cure any sickness, or heal any wound in a moment. One of his chief exploits was to slay the “fearful huge giant that guarded the bridge Mantineus,” famous for its thirty arches of black marble.
His pride was laid low by Olivier, one of Charlemagne’s paladins. The giant then became a child of God, and ended his days in the odour of sanctity, “meek as a lamb and humble as a chidden slave.” Sir Pierabrus, or Ferunbras, figures in several medieval romances, and is an allegory of Sin overcome by the Cross. (See Balan.)

Fifteen decisive Battles (The), according to Sir E. S. Creasy, were:

1. The battle of Marathon (Sept., 490 B.C.), when Miltiades, with 10,000
Greeks, defeated 100,000 Persians under Datis and Artaphernes.
2. The naval battle at Salamis (Sep., 480 B.C.), when the Athenians under Nicias and Demosthenes were defeated with a loss of 40,000 killed and wounded, and their entire fleet.
3. The battle of Arbela (Oct., 331 B.C.), when Alexander the Great overthrew Darius Codomans for the third time.
4. The battle of Metaurus (207 B.C.), when the consuls Livius and Nero cut to pieces Hasdrubal’s army, sent to reinforce Hannibal.
5. In A.D. 9 Arminius and the Gauls utterly overthrew the Romans under Varus, and thus established the independence of Gaul.
6. The battle of Chalons (A.D. 451), when Aetius and Theodoric utterly defeated Attila, and saved Europe from devastation.
7. The battle of Tours (Oct., 732 A.D.), when Charles Martel overthrew the Suracens under Abd erahlam, and thus broke the Moslem yoke from Europe.
8. The battle of Hastings (Oct., 1066), when William of Normandy slew Harold
II., and obtained the crown of England.
9. The battle of Orleans in 1429, when Joan of Arc secured the independence of France.
10. The defeat of the Spanish Armada in 1588, which destroyed the hopes of the Pope respecting England.
11. The battle of Blenheim (13 Aug., 1704), when Marlborough and Prince Eugene defeated Tallard, and thus prevented Louis XIV. from carrying out his schemes.
12. The battle of Pultowa (July,
1709), when Czar Peter utterly defeated
Charles XII. of Sweden, and thus established the Muscovite power.
13. The battle of Saratoga (Oct., 1777), when General Gates defeated the British under General Burgoyne, and thus secured for the United States the alliance of France.
14. The battle of Valmy (Sep., 1792), when the French Marshal Kellerman defeated the Duke of Brunswick, and thus established for a time the French republic.
15. The battle of Waterloo (18 June, 1815), when Napoleon the Great was defeated by the Duke of Wellington, and Europe was restored to its normal condition.

The battle of Gettysburg in Pennsylvania (3 July, 1863), when the Confederates, under the command of General Lee, were defeated by the Northern army, was certainly one of the most important, if not the most important, of the American Civil War.

The battle of Souda (Sep., 1870), when Napoleon gave up his sword to William, King of Prussia, which put an end to the empire of France.

Fifth-Monarchy Men. A sect of English fanatics in the days of the Purtans, who maintained that Jesus Christ was about to come a second time to the earth, and establish the fifth universal monarchy. The four preceding monarchies were the Assyrian, the Persian, the Macedonian, and the Roman. In politics, the Fifth-Monarchy Men were arrant Radicals and levellers.

Fig. Full fig. Full dress. A corruption of the Italian in faccia (in gala costume). It was derived from the tassels with which horses were ornamented in state processions. Thus we read in Miss Knight's Autobiography, "The Pope's throne was set out for mass, and the whole building was in perfect ficchi" (in full fig). Another etymology has been suggested by a correspondent in Notes and Queries, that it is taken from the word full fig. (figure) in fashion books.

"The Speaker sits at one end all in full fig, with a clerk at the table below."—Volpone: Wit Judies, chap. ix. p. 101.

Fig or Figo. I don't care a fig for you; not worth a fig. Anything at all. Here fig is fero—a fillip or snap of the fingers. Thus we say, "I don't care that for you," snapping the fingers at the same time. (Italian, fave la figua; German, diefiggen weisen; Dutch, de vyge setten, etc.) (See Fico.)

"A fig for Peter."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry VI., ii. 9.
"The fig for thy friendship."—Shakespeare: Henry V., iii. 4.

Fig Sunday. Palm Sunday is so called from the custom of cutting figs on that day. The practice arose from the Bible story of Zacchaeus, who climbed up into a fig-tree to see Jesus. Many other festivals have their special foods; as, Michaelmas goose. Christmas, plum-pudding, Shrove Tuesday, pancake day; Ash Wednesday, salt cod; Good Friday, hot cross buns; pasch-eggs, roast-chestnuts, etc., have their special days.

Fig-tree. It is said that Judas hanged himself on a fig-tree. (See Elm-Tree.)

"Queret aliquis qui ex arbori Judas se suspenderit? Arbor ficus fausse dicitur."—Barlaeus.

Figs. I shan't buy my Attic figs in future, but grow them. Don't count your chickens before they are hatched. It was Xerxes who boasted that he did not intend any longer to buy his figs, because he meant to conquer Attica and add it to his own empire; but Xerxes met a signal defeat at Salamis, and "never loosened his sandal till he reached Abydena."

"In the name of the Prophet, Figs!" A burlesque of the solemn language employed in eastern countries in the common business of life. The line occurs in the imitation of Dr. Johnson's pompous style, in Rejected Addresses, by James and Horace Smith.

Figged out. (See Fro, Full Fig.)

Fig'aro. A type of cunning dexterity, and intrigue. The character is in the Barbier de Séville and Mariage de Figaro, by Beaumarchais. In the former he is a barber, and in the latter a valet; but in both he outwits every one. There are several operas founded on these dramas, as Mozart's Nozze di Figaro, Paisiello's Il Barbier de Siviglia, and Rossini's Il Barbier di Siviglia.

Fight. (See Hudibras, Pt. iii. c. 3.)

"Bo that figs and runs away
May live to fight another day;
But he that is in battle slain
Can never rise to fight again."

Sir John Mowmes: Mazarum Delecta. (1598.)

Demos-thénès, being reproached for running away from Philip of Macedon, at Chæronea, replied, "A man that runs away may fight again ('Akr anedó idiojov kai páλi μαχησται)."

(See Aulus Gellius, xvii. 21.)

Fight Shy (Th). To avoid. A shy person is unwilling to come forward, and to fight is to resist, to struggle in a contest. To "fight shy," therefore, is to resist being brought into contest or conflict.

Fighting-cooks. To live like fighting-cooks. To have a profusion of the best food. Fighting-cooks used to be high fed in order to aggravate their pugnacity and increase their powers of endurance.

Fighting Fifth (Tc). The 5th Foot. This sobriquet was given to the regiment during the Peninsular War. The "Old and Bold Fifth," the Duke of Wellington's Body-guard, is now called the "Northumberland Fusiliers." What a terrible vexation must the abolition of the time-honoured names of our old regiments have been to our army!

Fighting Kings [Chen-ku]. Certain feudatories of China incessantly contending for mastery over each other. (B.C. 770-320.)

Fighting Prelate. Henry Spencer, Bishop of Norwich, who greatly distinguished himself in the rebellion of Wat Tyler. He met the rebels in the field, with the temporal sword, then absolved them, and sent them to the gibbet.

"The Bishop of Norwich, the famous 'fighting prelate,' had led an army into Flanders."—Lords Campbell.
Fighting the Tiger. Gaming is so called in the United States of America.

"After seeing 'fighting the tiger,' as gaming is styled in the United States, I have arrived at the conclusion that gaming is more fairly carried on in the Monte Carlo casino than in any American gaming-house." — The Nineteenth Century, Feb., 1897, p. 249.

Fighting with Gloves on. Sparring without showing animosity; fighting with weapons or words with coloured friendliness. Fighting, like boxers, with boxing gloves. Tories and Whigs in the two Houses of Parliament fight with gloves on, so long as they preserve all the outward amenities of debate, and conceal their hostility to each other by seeming friendliness.

Figure. To cut a figure. This phrase seems applicable more especially to dress and outward bearing. To make a figure is rather to make a name or reputation, but the distinction is not sharply observed.

To make a figure. To be a notability.

Faire quelque figure dans le monde. "He makes no figure at court;" Il ne fait aucune figure à la cour.

Figure. What's the figure? The price; what am I to pay; what "figure" or sum does my debt amount to?

Figures. A corruption of fingers, that is, "digits" (Latin, digiti, fingers). So called from the primitive method of marking the monadis by the fingers. Thus the first four were simply i, ii, iii, iii; five was the outline of the hand simplified into a v; the next four figures were the two combined, thus vi, vii, viii, viii; and ten was a double v, thus, x. At a later period iii and viii were expressed by one less than five (i-v) and one less than ten (i-x). Nineteen was ten-plus-nine (x + ix), etc.—a most clumsy and unphilosophical device.

Fillah. To steal or purloin. A fillah is a staff with a hook at the end, for plucking clothes from hedges and abstracting articles from shop windows. Probably it is a corruption of pilfer. (Welsh, yspoilio and yspoiliwr; Spanish, pellizcar; French, piller and piler. Fillah and pilfer are variants of the same word.

"With cunning hast thou filled my daughter's heart." Shakespeare: Midsummer Night's Dream, i. 2.

File. To cheat. The allusion is to filing money for the sake of the dust which can be used or sold. A file is a cheat. Hence "a jolly file," etc.

"Sorful becometh that false file." Curzon Mundy MS.

In single file. Single row; one behind another. (French, file, a row.)

Rank and file. Common soldiers. Thus we say, "Ten officers and three hundred rank and file fell in the action." Rank refers to men standing abreast, file to men standing behind each other.

"It was only on the faith of some grand expedition that the credential rank and file of the Brotherhood subscribed their dollars." — The Times.

Filis Dolores. The Duchesse d'Angoulème, daughter of Louis XVI., also called the modern Antigone. (1778-1851.)

Filibuster. A piratical adventurer. The most notorious was William Walker, who was shot in 1855. (French, abuser, a corruption of our "freebooter;" German, freibüter; Spanish, filibusteros; Dutch, vrijbuchter.) (See Buccanneer.)

Filioque Controversy (The) long disturbed the Eastern and Western Churches. The point was this: Did the Holy Ghost proceed from the Father and the Son (Filioque), or from the Father only? The Western Church maintained the former, and the Eastern Church the latter dogma. The filioque was added in the Council of Toledo 589. Amongst others, Pope Leo III. was averse to the change. (Migne Oecod.)

The gist of the argument is this: If the Son is one with the Father, whatever proceeds from the Father must proceed from the Son also. This is technically called "The Procession of the Holy Ghost."

Fill-dyke. The month of February, when the rain and melted snow fills the ditches to overflowing.

Fillet. A narrow band round the head for binding the hair, or simply for ornament. Aurelian was the first Roman emperor that wore a royal fillet or diadem in public. In the time of Constantine the fillet was adorned with precious stones.

Filomena. Longfellow calls Florence Nightingale St. Filomena, not only because Filomena resembles the Latin word for a nightingale, but also because this.
saint, in Sabatelli's picture, is represented as hovering over a group of sick and maimed, healed by her intercession. (See THAUMATURGUS.)

Filter. To run through felt, as jelly is strained through flannel. The Romans strained the juice of their grapes through felt into the wine-vat, after which it was put into the casks. (Latin, filtrum, felt, filtrum, a strainer.)

Fin. The hand. A contraction of finger. Thus we say, "Give us your fin"—i.e., shake hands. The derivation from a fish's fin is good only for a joke.

Finality John. Earl Russell, who maintained that the Reform Bill of 1832 was a finality, yet in 1854, 1860, and 1866 brought forth other Reform Bills.

Finance (French). Revenue derived from fines or subsidies. In feudal times finance was money paid to a lord for a privilege. In the plural we use the word to signify available money resources. Thus we say, "My finances are exhausted," meaning I have no more funds or available money.

Finch Lane (London). So called from a family of consideration by the name of Finch or Finke. There was once a church in the lane called St. Benet Finke. There is an Irish saint named Finc, in Latin Fincanus, whose day is October 13th.

Find. You know what you leave behind, but not what you will find. And this it is that "makes us rather bear the ills we have, than fly to others that we know not of."

F'ndon Haddocks. Haddocks smoked with green wood. (See Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, xxvi.) F'ndon or F'mon is a village some six miles south of Aberdeen, where haddocks are cured.

Findy. Plump, full. (Saxon, findig.) "A cold May and a windy Make fame fat and findy." Old Proverb.

Fine Arts. Those arts which chiefly depend on a delicate or fine imagination, as music, painting, poetry, and sculpture.

Fine as Fivepence. The ancient Saxon shilling was a coin worth 5d. "To dress fine as fivepence" is to dress very smartly. The Saxon shilling was a far better coin than those made of tin, lead, and other inferior metals.

Fine-air. One of Fortu'nio's servants, who could hear the grass grow and the mole work underground. (Grimm's Goblins: Fortunio.)

Fin'etor. A necromancer, father of the Enchantress-Damsel, in Ariadne of Gaul.

Fingal—i.e. Fin-mac-Coul. (See Sir W. Scott: The Antiquary, chap. xxii.)

Fingal's Cave. The basaltic cavern of Staffa. So called from from Fion na Gael (Fingal), the great Gaelic hero, whose achievements have been made familiar by the Fingal of Macpherson.

Finger. (Anglo-Saxon, finger.)

The ear finger, digitus auricularis—i.e., the little finger. The four fingers are the index finger, the middle finger, the ring finger, and the ear finger. In French, le doigt auriculaire. The little finger is so called because it can, from its diminutive size, be most easily introduced into the conduit of the ear.

"Le doigt auriculaire est le petit doigt, s'il n'ennui personne qui en a cause de sa petite, il peut faire quelque chose introduit dans le conduit annulaire externe."—Dict. des Sciences, etc.

The index finger. The first finger; so called because it is used as a pointer.

The medical finger. The ring finger (q.v.).

"At last he put on her medical finger a pretty, handsome gold ring, whereunto was enclasp’d a precious touchstone of Beaucaire."—Labélin: Pant phantom. ii. 17.

The ring finger. The finger between the long and little finger was used by the Romans as a ring-finger, from the belief that a nerve ran through it to the heart. Hence the Greeks and Romans used to call it the medical finger, and used it for stirring mixtures, under the notion that nothing noxious could touch it without its giving instant warning to the heart. It is still a very general notion in England that it is bad to rub on salve or scratch the skin with any but the ring finger. The fact that there was no such intimacy between the finger and the heart was not discovered till after the notion was deeply rooted. Pliny calls this digitus annularis.

With a wet finger. Easily. (See Wet Finger.)

My little finger told me that. The same as "A little bird told me that," meaning, I know it, though you did not expect it. The former expression is from Molière’s Malade Imaginaire. (See Rim.)

"By the pricking of my thumbs,
Something wicked this way comes."—Shakespeare: Macbeth. iv. 1.

O, cry, baby, cry; put your finger in your eye, etc. This nursery rhyme seems to be referred to by Shakespeare in his Comedy of Errors, ii. 2:—

"No longer will I be fool,
To put the finger in the eye and weep."

To hold up a finger (in an auction room) by way of a bid, was a Roman custom, "digitum tollere" ( Cicero: In Verres, Acto i. 54). Horace confirms this.

To turn up the little finger. (See Turn.)

Finger and Glove. To be finger and glove with another means to be most intimate.

Finger in the Pie. To have a finger in the pie. To assist or mix oneself officiously in any matter. Esse vei pa-ticeps. In French, Mettre la main à la pâte.

Finger Benediction. In the Greek and Roman Church the thumb and first two fingers represent the Trinity. The thumb, being strong, represents the Father; the long or second finger, Jesus Christ; and the first finger, the Holy Ghost, which proceedeth from the Father and the Son. (See Blessing.)

Some bishops of the Anglican Church use this gesture while pronouncing the benediction.

Finger-stall. A hutkin, a cover for a sore finger. The Germans call a thimble a finger-hut, where hurt is evidently the word hurt or hurt (a tending, keeping, or guarding), from the verb huten (to keep watch over). Our hutkin is simply a little cap for guarding a sore finger. Stall is the Saxo-Stiel (a place), whence our stall, a place for horses.

Fingers. The old names for the fingers are:

Thumb (Anglo-Saxon thunm).
Toocher (the finger that touches), fore-mans, or pointer. This was called by the Anglo-Saxons the seda-finger, i.e.
the shooting finger.

Long-man or long finger.
Leech-man or ring-finger. The former means "medical finger," and the latter is a Roman expression, "digitos mun-laris." Called by the Anglo-Saxons the gold-finger.

Little-man or little finger. Called by the Anglo-Saxons the car-finger.

Fingers, Ben Jonson says—

"The thumb, in cheerlessness, we give to Venus:
The fore-finger to Jove, the might to Saturn:
The ring to Sol; the least to Mercury."
Alchemist, i. 2.

His fingers are all thumbs. Said of a person awkward in the use of his hands.

Ce sont les deux doigts de la main.

Fingers before Forks.

"This Vulcan was a smith, they tell us,
That first invented tongs and bellows:
For breath and fingers did their works.
(We'd fingers long before we'd forks.)

King: Art of Love.

Fingers' Ends. I have it at my fingers' ends. I am quite familiar with it and can do it readily. It is a Latin proverb (Seci tunctam unques digito), where the allusion is to the stationary, who knows every item of his subject by the touch. (See Unguess.)

"Content: Go to; thou hast it ad dumnill, at the fingers' ends, as they say.

Holophrasus: O, I smell false Latin: dumnill for unguess."—Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost, vi. 1.

Fingered.
The light-fingered gentiny. Piggins, qui unques kramatos et unnes habeunt.

Finglo-fangle (A). A ricochet word meaning a fanciful trifilo. A "new fangle" is a novel contrivance. "New fangled," etc.

Finished to the Finger-nail, or
"ad unguem," in allusion to statuaries running their finger-tips over a statue to detect if any roughness or imperfection of surface remains.

Finnis Tribe. Fish; so called because they are furnished with fins.

Finsbury (London). A corruption of Fens-bury, the town in the fens.

Fion, son of Connal, an enormous giant, who could place his feet on two mountains, and then stoop and drink from a stream in the valley between.
(Gaelic legend.)

Fire-cone on the Thryssus. The juice of the fir-cone (turpentine) used to be mixed by the Greeks with new wine to make it keep: hence it was adopted as one of the symbols of Bacchus.

Fir-tree (Th). Atys was metamorphosed into a fir-tree by Cybele, as he was about to lay violent hands on himself. (Ovid: Metamorphoses, x. table 2.)

Fire. (Anglo-Saxon, fyre; Greek, pur.)
St. Anthony's fire, Erysipelas, "Le feu St. Antoine," (See Anthony.)

St. Helen's fire, "Ignis sanctae Helenae," "Pern St. Helena." (See Castor and Pollux: and Elmo.)

Hermes' fire. Same as St. Helen's fire (q.v.).

I have myself passed through the fire:
I have smelt the smell of fire. I have had experience in trouble. The allusion is to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who were cast into the fiery furnace by Nebuchadnezzar (Dan. iii.).
Fire

If you will enjoy the fire you must put up with the smoke. (Latin, "Commotitas quavis nus fort incommoda sequim"). Every convenience has its inconvenience.

More fire in the bed-straw. More mischief brewing. Alluding to the times when straw was used for carpets and beds.

No fire without smoke. (French, "Nul feu sans fumée"). No good without its mixture of evil.

No smoke without fire. To every scandal there is some foundation.

Where there is smoke there is fire. Every effect is the result of some cause.

Fire. The Great Fire of London (1660) broke out at Master Furryner’s, the king’s baker, in Pudding Lane, and after three nights and three days was arrested at Pie Corner. St. Paul’s Cathedral, eighty-nine other churches, and 13,200 houses were burnt down.

Fire Away! Say on; say what you have to say. The allusion to firing a gun; as, you are primed up to the muzzle with something you want to say; fire away and discharge your thoughts.

"Foster, I have something I want you and Miss Carvill to understand. Fire away!" exclaimed Foster."—Watson: The Web of a Spider, chap. 31.

Fire away, Flanagan. A taunt to a boaster. A man threatening you, says he will do this, that, and the other: you reply; "Fire away, Flanagan." Cromwell marched against a castle defended by Flanagan, who threatened to open his cannon on the Parliamentarians unless they withdrew. Cromwell wrote on the corner of the missive sent to him, "Fire away, Flanagan," and the doughty champion took to his heels immediately.

Fire First. Non, Monsieur, nous ne tirons jamais les premiers. According to tradition, this was said by the Count D’Autechoches to Lord Charles Hay at the battle of Fontenoy, 30th April, 1745 (old style).

"On était de tradition dans l’armée: on laisse toujours par courtoisie, l’avantage du premier feu à l’ennemi." (See Notes and Queries, 26th October, 1892, p. 245.)

Fire-balloon. A balloon whose ascensional power is derived from hot air rising from a fire beneath its open mouth. Montgolfier used such a balloon.

Fire-brand. An incendiary; one who incites to rebellion; like a blazing brand which sets on fire all it touches.

"Our fire-brand brother, Paris, burns us all." Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, ii. 2.

Fire-drake or Fire-dragon. A fiery serpent, an ignis-fatuus of large proportions, superstitiously believed to be a flying dragon keeping guard over hid treasures.

"There is a fellow somewhat near the door, he should be a treasure by his face, for, o’ my conscience, twenty of the doleful days new reign in a nose... That fire-drake did I hit three times on the head."—Shakespeare: Henry VIII, v. 2.

Fire-eaters. Persons ready to quarrel for anything. The allusion is to the jugglers who eat flaming tow, pour melted lead down their throats, and hold red-hot metal between their teeth. Richardson, in the seventeenth century—Signor Josephine Girardelli (the original Salamander), in the early part of the nineteenth century—and Chaubert, a Frenchman, of the present century, were the most noted of these exhibitors.

"The great fire-eater lay unconscious upon the floor of the house."—Nashville Banner.

Fire-new. Spick and span new (q.v.).

"You should have accepted her; and with some excellent jests fire-new from the mint."—Shakespeare: Twelfth Night, ii. 2.

Fire-ship. A ship filled with combustibles to be sent against adverse vessels in order to set them on fire.

Fire Up (To). To become indignantly angry. The Latin, "irá exardescère," "Infiammum de colere."

Fire Worship was introduced into Persia by Pho’dima, widow of Smerdis, and wife of Gushan, governor of a province called Hystaspes (B.C. 521-485). It is not the sun that is worshipped, but God, who is supposed to reside in it; at the same time they reverence the sun, not as a deity but as the throne of deity. (See PARSES.)

Fire and Sword. Letters of fire and sword. If a criminal resisted the law and refused to answer his citation, he was accounted treason in the Scottish courts; and "letters of fire and sword" were sent to the sheriff, ordering him to use either or both these instruments to apprehend the contumacious party.

Fire and Water. I will go through fire and water to serve you. The reference is the ordeals of fire and water which might be transferred to substitutes. Paul seems to refer to substitutional death in Rom. v. 7: "Scarcely for a righteous man will one die; yet for a good man some would even dare to die."

Firm as a Rock. (See SIMILES.)

First-class Hard Labour. Under this sentence, the prisoner sleeps on a plank bed without a mattress, and spends six or eight hours a day turning a hard crank, or treading a wheel. (See SECOND-CLASS HARD LABOUR.)

First-fruits. The first profitable results of labour. In husbandry, the first corn that is cut at harvest. We also use the word in an evil sense; as, the first-fruits of sin, the first-fruits of repentance.

First Water. A diamond of the first water. (See DIAMOND.)

First Gentleman of Europe. A nickname given to George IV, who certainly was first in rank, but it would be sad indeed to think he was ever the most gentlemanly man in feeling, manners, and deportment. Louis d’Artois was so called also.

First Grenadier of France. A title given by Napoleon to Latour d’Auvergne (1743-1800).

First Stroke is Half the Battle. "Well begun is half done." "A good lather is half the shave." (Latin: "Lavantum; dimidium facti est repasse." [Abundance.] "Dimidium facti, qui corpus habet." [Abundance.])

French. Don’t begin too soon, and don’t try to cover too many things. (French: "On ne commence que le premier jour de l’année." C’est parce que le premier jour est la jolie fille.)

Fish. The French have a remarkable location respecting fish as a food:

- Après poisson, faut cuit poisson.
- Après poisson, le vin est bon.
- Après poisson, mais c’est contre-poisson.

Fish. The reason why fish are employed as card-counters is from a mis-apprehension of the French word fileh (a five-sou piece). The two points allowed for the "rub" are called in French la file de consolation. The Spanish word pez has also a double meaning—a "winning," or a "fish;" pez is the Welsh pyge, Latin pisc, English fish.

- A loose fish. One of loose or dissolute habits. Fish implying a human being is derogatory, but bird is a loving term, as my "bonny bird," etc. Beast is most reproachful, as "You are a beast."

- A pretty kettle of fish. (See Kettle.)
- A queer fish. An eccentric person. (See above, LOOIS FISHL)

- All is fish that comes to my net. "Auri bonus est odor ex re qualitatem." I am willing to deal in anything out of which I can make a profit. I turn everything to some use.

- "All is fish that comes to the net." - G. Gascon, "The Steele Missal (died 1677).

Fish. It is neither fish, flesh, nor fowl; or Neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. Not fish (food for the monk), not flesh (food for the people generally), nor yet red herring (food for paupers). Suitable to no class of people; fit for neither one thing nor another.

Fish comes first because in the Middle Ages the clergy took precedence of the laity. "She would be a betwixt-and-between . . . neither fish nor fowl." - Mrs. Lynn Linton.

Fish-day (A) [jour maigre]. A day in the Roman Catholic Church when persons, without ecclesiastical permission, are forbidden to eat meat.

Fish-wife (A). A woman who hawks fish about the streets.

Fish and Flesh. You must not make fish of one and flesh of the other. You must treat both alike. Fish is an inferior sort of animal food to flesh. The alliteration has much to do with the phrase.

Fish in Troubled Water (7b). In French, "Pêcher en eau trouble." To Fish it Out (Te). This is the Latin expression.

Fish out of Water. Out of place; without one's usual occupation; restless from lack of employment.

Fish of Souls (The great). The devil.

"I trust, young man, that neither idleness nor licentious pleasure... the chief bane with which the great Fish of souls conceals his hooks are the causes of your declining the career to which I would invite you."—Sir W. Scott: The Monastery, chap. xi.

Fisherman. The fisherman who was father of three kings. Abu Shu'jah al Bouyah was a Persian fisherman in the province of Delemin, whose three sons, Imad, Buken, and Moez, all rose to sovereign power.

Fishing. Fishing for compliments. Laying a bait for praise.

Fish (in Hildibras) was Nicholas Fish, a physician and astrologer, who used to say that a physician never deserved his bread till he had no teeth to eat it. In his old age he was almost a beggar.

Fitz (Norman). Son of: as Fitz-Herbert, Fitz-William, Fitz-Peter, etc. It is sometimes applied to illegitimate children, as Fitz-Clarence, Fitz-roy, etc.

Fitz-Fulke (Heb). "A gracious, graceful, graceless grace;" "fat, fair, and forty." (Byron: Don Juan, canto xvi.)

Fitzwilliam Museum (Cambridge University). So called from Earl Fitzwilliam, who left £100,000, with books, paintings, etc., to form the nucleus of a museum for the benefit of the university.

Five, or the pentad, the great mystic number, being the sum of 2 + 3, the first even and first odd compound. Unity is God alone, i.e., without creation. Two is diversity, and three (being 1 + 2) is the compound of unity and diversity, or the two principles in operation since creation, and representing all the powers of nature.

Five-minute Clause. A provision sometimes inserted in deeds of separation, whereby it is stipulated that the deed is null and void if the husband and wife remain together five minutes after the separation is enjoined.

Five Nations (The). The five confederated Indian tribes, viz., the Mohawks, Oneidas, Onondagas, Cayugas, and Senecas. Known as the Iroquois Confederacy.

Five Points (The). (See Calvinism.)

Five Wits. (1) Common sense, (2) imagination, (3) fantasy, (4) estimation, and (5) memory. Common sense is the outcome of the five senses; imagination is the "wit" of the mind; fantasy is imagination united with judgment; estimation estimates the absolute, such as time, space, locality, and so on; and memory is the "wit" of recalling past events. (See Seven Wits.)

"Four of his five wits went halting off." Shakespeare: Much Ado, etc., i, 1.

"These are the five wits removing inwardly: First, Common witte, and then imagination;" "Fantasy, and Estimation truly, And Memory."—Stephen Hawes: The Passe-lyme of Pleasure (1513). Notwithstanding this quotation, probably the Five Wits mean the wits of the five senses.

Fiver (4). A five-pound note. A "tenner" is a ten-pound note.

Fives. A game similar to court-tennis; the hand, however, is used instead of a racket. Said to be so called because the game is three fives (15).

"He forgot that cricket and fives are capital training for tennis."—T. Hughes: Tom Brown at Oxford, chap. ii.

A bunch of fives. The fist, in which the five fingers are bound in a bunch.

Fix. I'm in a fix. A predicament. The allusion is to machinery which will not move. The Northumberland was in a terrible fix at the launch, when it refused to leave the dock. (1866.)

Fixed Air. Carbonic dioxide gas. Dr. Black gave it this name, because carbonate of magnesia evolved by heat carbonic acid, that is, MgO. CO₂ evolved CO₂, thereby proving that CO₂ (carbonic acid) is a "fixed air."

Fixed Oils. Oils obtained by simple pressure. These oils do not readily dry or volatile, but remain fixed in their oily character.

Fixed Stars. Stars whose relative position to other stars is fixed or always the same. Planets are always shifting their relative positions.

Fixt (The). That is, the Firmament. According to the Ptolemaic System, the earth is surrounded by nine spheres. These spheres are surrounded by the Primum Mobile (or First Moved); and the to carry a flag denoting rank. Admirals carry their flag at the main, vice-admirals at the fore, and rear-admirals at the mizen (See Admiral)

Flag-ship. A ship carrying a flag officer. (See Admiral)

Flag Signals (on railroads)

White in all directions. Red is all wrong.

Flag’s Down (The). Indicative of distress. When the face is pale the "flag is down." Alluding to the ancient custom of taking down the flag of theatres during Lent, when the theatres were closed.

To hang the flag half mast high is in token of mourning or distress.

To hang out the "hate" flag. To sue for quarter, to give in.

To lower one’s flag to eat humble pie to eat the leek, to confess oneself in the wrong; to eat one's own words.

The Association after automatically opposing the views of the National Congress had to lower the flag and pass resolution in favor of a national constitution. New 16th Century (A.D. 1584) last page (70)

To strike the flag. To lower it or pull it down upon the cap in token of respect or submission. In naval warfare it means to surrender.

Flag, Flags.

Banners of State. Flags much larger than standards and not slit at the extremity.

Royal Banners contain the Royal arms. Wended as much larger and longer than standards and slit at the extremity. A standard has an armoir bearing.

Burgess. A small flag with the hook and gaff like a < Premant. A small triangular flag.

Ponson. Much smaller than standards, not slit at the extremity and charged with arms.

Banerole. A name of great width representing alliances and important.

Ponson small flags shaped like the vans on pinnacles.

Flag Lieutenant (A). An admiral’s aide-de-camp.

Flag-officer. Either an admiral, vice-admiral, rear-admiral, or commodore. These officers alone are privileged Flame. A sweet smell. "An old flame," a quenched sweet smell. In Latin, flammar is used for love, and so is fire in French, Arde, to burn like fire, is also applied to the passion of love; hence, Virgil (I. 7, 14), "Cognos ardbat Alexin;" and Horace (Epoch xiii, 9), "Arsit Anaecron Buthyllo."

Flaming

Flaming. Superb, captivating, attractive. The French flambeau. This word was originally applied to those persons who dressed themselves in rich dresses "flamming" with gold and silver thread. We now speak of a "flaming advertisement," etc.

"Le velour, trop commun en France,
Sous toy reprend son vif honneur,
Teilmens que la remontrance
Nous a fait voir la difference
Du valet et de son Seigneur,
Et du mugueux charge de son sceau
Qui a tes princes d'esgaluit,
Et riche en drape de soye, alloit
Faisant d'audace toute sa voie."

Ronsard: "Au Roy Henri I."

Flaming Swords. Swords with a wavy or flasbygent edge, generally used for state purposes. The Dukes of Burgundy carried swords of this sort, and they were worn in our country till the accession of William III.

Flamin'ian Way. The great northern road of ancient Italy, constructed by C. Flamin'ius, and beginning at the Flaminian gate of Rome, and leading to Ariminum (Rimini).

Flanders (Moll). The chief character of De Foe's novel of the same name. She runs through the whole career of female profugity, then turns religious.

Flanders' Babies. The wooden jointed dolls common in the early part of the nineteenth century, and now almost entirely superseded by "wax dolls."

Flanders' Mare (The). So Henry VIII. called Anne of Cleves. She died at Chelsea in 1537.

Flaneur (French). A lounger, gosiper. From flane, to saunter about.

Flap-dragons. Small combustible bodies blazing at one end and floating in a glass of liquor. The liquor was stirred about with a candle-end to promote combustion. A skilful toper would swallow them blazing, as we swallow the blazing raisins of snap-dragons.

"He drinks off candles' ends for flap-dragons."
—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV., ii. 4.

Flare-up. A sudden outburst of anger; a gas-jet or other ignitable body flares up when lighted with a sudden blaze.

Flare-up (A). A rumpus or row. Also a banquet or jovial treat. The first meaning is simply the substantive of the verb. The second meaning refers to dazzle and "splendour" displayed.

Flash. A mere flash in the pan. All sound and fury, signifying nothing; like the attempt to discharge a gun that ends with a flash in the lock-pan, the gun itself "hanging fire."

Flash Men and Flash Notes. Between Buxton, Leek, and Macclesfield is a wild country called the Flash, from a chapel of that name. Here used to live a set of pedlars, who hawked about buttons, ribbons, and other articles made at Leek, together with handkerchiefs and small wares from Manchester. They were known on the road as Flash-men, and frequented fairs and farmhouses. They paid, at first, ready-money; but when they had established a credit, paid in promissory notes, which were rarely honoured. They were ultimately put down by the magistracy.

Flat. One who is not sharp; a suite of rooms on one floor.

"Oh, Messers... what flats you are!"—The Times.

"He said he was going to have a flat to let on the top floor."—Douettis: "Wonders of New Fortune, vol. i, part i. p. 123.

Flat as a flounder. I knocked him down flat as a flounder. A flounder is one of the flat-fish.

Flat as a pancake. Quite flat. A pancake is a thin flat cake, fried in a pan.

Flat-fish. He is a regular flat-fish. A dull, stupid fellow, not up to anything. The play is upon flat (stupid), and such fish as plaice, dabs, and soles.

Flat Milk. Skimmed milk, that is, milk "flattered." (Anglo-Saxon, fret, cream; Latin, flatus lactis.)

Flat Race (A). A race on the flat or level ground without obstacles.

Flat Simplicity. "The flat simplicity of that reply was admirable." (Colley Cibber: "The Crooked Husband, i. 1.)

Flatterer. Vitellius, the Roman synonym of flatterer. (Tacitus, Ann. vi. 32.)

Flatterers. When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner. Flattery is so pernicious, so fills the heart with pride and conceit, so perverts the judgment and disturbs the balance of the mind, that Satan himself could do no greater mischief. He may go to dinner and leave the leaven of wickedness to operate its own mischief.

"Porteus, there is a proverb thou shouldst read; When flatterers meet, the devil goes to dinner."
—Peter Pindar: "Nil Admarari."

Play a Fox (To). To vomit.

"At the time of the paroxysm he used to play a fox by way of antidote."—Abelard: "Pasquier.
Flea. When the Princess Badoura was placed on Prince Camaralzaman’s bed, in order to compare their claims to beauty, the fairy Maumouné changed herself into a flea, and bit the prince on the neck in order to awake him. Next, the genius Danhasch changed himself into a flea and bit the princess on the lip, that she might open her eyes and see the prince. (Arabian Nights; Camaralzamen and Badoura.)

Flea as a parasite. "Bolitho clearly proves that every creature lives in a state of wars by nature, no neutrals observe a flea. Has smaller fleas that on him prey, And these have smaller still to bite ’em, And so proceed ad infinitum." —Swift: Poetry: The Rhapsoody.

Sent off with a flea in his ear. Peremptorily. A dog which has a flea in the ear is very restless, and runs off in terror and distress. In French: Mettre à quiconque par un oreille. Probably our change of word implies a pun.

Flea-bitte. It is in a mere flea-bitte. A thing of no moment. Thus, a merchant who has suffered loss by speculation or failure might say that the loss is a mere flea-bitte to him. A soldier might call a wound a mere flea-bitte. A passing inconvenience which annoys but leaves no permanent injury. Mr. D’Isarelli spoke of the national debt as a mere flea-bitte.

Flea’s Jump. Aristophanes, in the Clouds, says that Socrates and Cherephon tried to measure how many times its own length a flea jumped. They took in wax the size of a flea’s foot; then, on the principle of ex pede herculum, calculated the length of its body. Having found this, and measured the distance of the flea’s jump from the hand of Socrates to Cherephon, the knotty problem was resolved by simple multiplication.

Pleasance (2 syl.) Son of Banquo. (Shakespeare: Macbeth.)

Fléche. Faire flèche de tout bois. To turn every event into a cause of censure. To make whatever wood falls in your path an arrow to discharge at your adversary.

Fleckerne (Richard). An Irish priest, who printed a host of poems, letters, and travels. As a poet, his name, like the names of Mercurius and Buvius among the Romans, is proverbial for vileness. Dry—

"Reigned without dispute
Through all the realms of nonsense absolute." —Dryden: MacFleckerne.

Fledgeby (2 syl.). An over-reaching, cowardly sneak, who conceals his dirty bill-broking under the trade name of Fypse & Co. He is soundly thrashed by Alfred Lammle, and quietly pockets the afrront. (Dickens: Mutual Friend.)

Flee the Falcon (7b). To let fly the small cannon.

"I’ll see the falcon (so the small cannon was called) ’T’ll see the falcon ... my cursie, she’ll ruffle their feathers for them!" —Sir W. Scott: Old Mortality, chap. xx.

Fleeced (1 syl.). Cheated of one’s money; shored like a sheep.

Fleet Book Evidence. No evidence at all. The books of the Old Fleet prison are not admissible as evidence to prove a marriage. (Wharton: Law Dictionary.)

Fleet Marriages. Clandestine marriages, at one time performed without banns or licence by nosey chaplains, in Fleet Prison, London. As many as thirty marriages a day were sometimes celebrated in this disgraceful manner; and Malcolm tells us that 2,951 were registered in the four months ending with February 12th, 1706. Suppressed by the Marriage Act in 1751. (See Chapmen of the Fleet, by Besant and Rice.)

Fleet Street (London). For 200 years after the Conquest London was watered on the west by “the river of Wolls,” afterwards called “Fleet dyke, because (Stowe says) it runneth past the Fleece.” In the middle of the city and falling into the Thames was Welbooke; on the east side, Langbourne; and in the western suburbs, Oldbourne. Along the Fleece and Oldbourne “ships” used to ply with merchandise. These four, together with the Reding, the Lea, the Ravensbourne, and the Wandle, now serve as sewers to the great metropolis.

Fleet of the Desert. A caravan.

Flemish Account. A sum lost than that expected. In Antwerp accounts were kept in bruys, suls, and pens; but the bruys or pound was only 12s. In Notes and Queries we have an example of a Flemish account, where £573 Flemish becomes £213 2s. 10d. English.

Flemish School. A school of painting established by the brothers Van Eyck, in the fifteenth century. The chief early masters were Memling, Weyden, Matys, Mabus, and Moro. Of the second period, Rubens and Vandyck, Snyders, Jordans, Gasper de Crayer, and the younger Teniers.
Flesh and Blood. Human nature; as "Flesh and blood cannot stand it."

Flesh-pots. Sighing for the flesh-pots of Egypt. Hankering for good things no longer at your command. The children of Israel said they wished they had died "when they sat by the flesh-pots of Egypt" (Exodus xvi. 3)—i.e. when they sat watching the boilers which contained the meat they were to have for dinner. The expression also means abundance of appetising food.

Fleshed. He fleshed his sword. Used it for the first time. Men fleshed in cruelty—i.e. initiated or used to it. A sportsman's expression. When a sportsman wishes to encourage a young dog or hawk, he will allow it to have the first game it catches for its own eating. This "flesh" is the first it has tasted, and fleshing its tooth thus gives the creature a craving for similar food. Hence, also, to eat with avidity.

"The wild dog shall flesh his teeth on every innocent."—Shakespeare: 2 Henry IV, iv. 5.

Fleshly School (The). A class of realistic British poets, such as Swinburne, Rossetti, Morris, etc. So called by Thomas Macaulay [R. Buchanan] in the Contemporary Review.

Fle's'ta. An excellent treatise on the common law of England, written in the fourteenth century by an unknown writer while a prisoner in the Fleet.

Fleur-de-Luce. A corruption of Fleur-de-Lis. (See Flag.) In Italian the white iris is called fiordilite. Made thus.

"They may give the dozen white laces in their court."—Shakespeare: Merry Wives, i. 1.

Fleurs-de-Lys. In the reign of Louis VII. (1137-1180) the national standard was thickly charged with flowers. In 1365 the number was reduced by Charles VI. to three (the mythical church number). Gubbins, in his Display of Heraldry, 1611, says the device is "Three toads erect, saltant:"

\[\text{[Image]}\]

in allusion to which Nostradamus, in the sixteenth century, calls Frenchmen crapauds (toads). Recently it has been thought that the device is really a "beefleying," because certain ornaments resembling bees were found in the tomb of Childeric, father of Clovis, when it was opened in 1653. These bees are now generally believed to be the fleurons of horse-trappings, and quite independent of the emblem.

Fleur-de-lys or lily-flower was chosen by Flavio Gioja to mark the north point of the compass, out of compliment to the King of Naples, who was of French descent (1302).

Flibbertigibbet. One of the five fiends that possessed "poor Tom." Shakespeare got it from Bishop Harman's account of the Spanish invasion, where we are told of forty fiends which the Jesuits cast out, and among the number was Flibbertigibbet. Shakespeare says he "is the fiend of mopping and mowing, who possesses chambermaids and waiting women" (King Lear, iv. 2). And, again, that he "begins at curfew and walks till the first cock," giving men pins and needles, squint eyes, hoarse, and so on. (Shakespeare: Lear, iii. 4.)

Flic (French). A policeman or sergeant de ville. "Une allusion a l'épée des sergents de ville, ou plutôt aux flesches des archers primitifs" (Raille). Hence "flic-face," thumps and thwacks.

Flick. To strike with a quick jerk. To "flick a whip in one's face" is to strike the face with the lash and draw the whip suddenly back again. (Anglo-Saxon, fiscearian; Scotch, flicker; Danish, flikkeren, to twinkle, etc.)

Flies. (See Fly.)

Fling. I must have a fling at . . . Throw a stone at something. To attack with words, especially sarcastically. To make a haphazard venture. Allusion is to hurling stones from slings.

To have his fling. To live on the loose for a time. To fling about his time and money like "ducks and drakes."

"If he is young, he desires to have . . . his 'fling' before he is compelled to settle down."—Nineteenth Century (February, 1862, p. 288).

Fling Herself at my Head (Tb). To make desperate love to a man; to angle obviously to catch a certain individual for a husband.

"'Con-comb!' said Lance: 'why, 'twas but last night the whole family saw her . . . fling herself at my head.'—Sir W. Scott: Peveril of the Peak, chap. vii.

Flins [a stone]. An idol of the ancient Vandals settled in Lusace. It was a huge stone, draped, wearing a lion's skin over its shoulders, and designed to represent death. Mr. Lower says that the town of Flint in North Wales is named in honour of this stone deity, and gives Alwin Flint in Suffolk as another example. (Pat. Brit.)

The Welsh call Flint Flint Tyg-cingi (Flin's beautiful band or girdle).
Flint Implements. Arrow-heads, axe-heads, lance-heads, and knives, made of granite, jade, serpentine, jasper, basalt, and other hard stones. The first were discovered on the banks of the Somme, near Amiens and Abbeville, but others have been discovered in Belgium, Germany, Italy, etc. They were the rude instruments of men before the use of metal was known.

Flint Jack. Edward Simpson, an occasional servant of Dr. Young, of Whitby. So called because he used to tramp the kingdom vending spurious fossils, flint arrow-heads, stone celts, and other imitation antiquities. Professor Tennant charged him with forging these wares, and in 1867 he was sent to prison for theft.

Fliper. Tip us your fliper. Give me your hand. A fliper is the paddle of a turtle.

Flirt. A coquetto. The word is from the verb flirt, as, "to flirt a fun." The fan being used for coquetting, those who coquetted were called fan-flirts. Lady Frances Shirley, the favourite of Lord Chesterfield, introduced the word. Flirt is allied to flutter, flit, jerk, etc.

Fluttermoush. A bat. South calls the bat a flinder-mouse. (German, fliegen-maus.)

Flo (Old French). A crowd. (Latin, fluctum.)

"Puis leur tranman par huce omen Grand fio d'Anglois de fer couverz"
Guillaume Quinet, 1692.

Floated (Stock Exchange term). Brought out (said of a loan or company), as the Turkish '69 Loan was floated by the Cohens. The French 6 per cent. was floated by the Morgan's.

Floors (Stock Exchange term). Exchequer bills and other unfunded stock. (See Stock Exchange Slang.)

Flooding Academy (The). The hulks.

Flogging the Dead Horse. Trying to revive an interest in a subject out of date. Bright said that Earl Russell's "Reform Bill" was a "dead horse," and every attempt to create any enthusiasm in its favour was like "flogging the dead horse."

Flogged by Deputy. When Henri IV. of France abjured Protestantism and was received into the Catholic Church, in 1586, two ambassadors were sent to Rome who knelt in the presence of St. Peter, and sang the Misreure. At each verse a blow with a switch was given on their shoulders.

Flood. The almost universal tradition of the East respecting this catastrophe is that the waters were boiling hot. (See the Talmud, the Targums, the Koran, etc.)

Floor. I floored him. Knocked him down on the floor; hence, to overcome, beat or surpass. Thus, we say at the university, "I floored that paper," i.e., answered every question on it, as I floored that problem"—did it perfectly, or made myself master of it.

Floorer. That was a floorer. That blow knocked the man down on the floor. In the university we say, "That paper or question was a floorer;" meaning it was too hard to be mastered. (See above.)

Flora. Flowers; all the vegetable productions of a country or of a geological period, as the flora of England, the flora of the coal period. Flora was the Roman goddess of flowers.

"Another Flora there, of bolder hue,
And richer sweets beyond our garden's pride."
Thomson: Summer.

The animals of a period or country are called the Fauna; hence, the phrase the Flora and the Fauna of . . . signifies all its vegetable and animal productions.

Metropolis of Flora. Aranjuez, in Spain, is so called, from its many beautiful gardens.

Flora's Dial. A dial formed by flowers which open or close at stated hours.

I. Dial of flowers which open—
(a) The first twelve hours.

A. Open.
1. (Scandinavian Sowthistle close.)
2. Yellow Gout's-heard.
4. Hawkweed; late-flowering Dandelion; and Wild Scurvy.
5. White Water-lily; Naked-malked Poppy; and Smooth Sowthistle.
7. White Water-lily; Garden Lettuce; and African Marigold.
8. Scarlet Pimpernel; Mouse-ear Hawkweed; and Profuse Pinks.
11. Star of Bethlehem.
12. Snow. Ice Plant.
Florence (The German). Dresden.

Florentine Diamond (The). The fourth in size of cut diamonds. It weighs 139½ carats, belongs to Charles, Duke of Burgundy; was picked up by a peasant and sold for half-a-crown.

Florentius. A knight who bound himself to marry a "soul and ugly witch," if she would teach him the solution of a riddle on which his life depended. (Gower: Confessio Amantis.)

Florian (St.). Patron saint of merchents, being himself of the same craft.

Floriana. A sect of heretics of the second century who maintained that God is the author of evil, and taught the Gnostic doctrine of two principles. Florinatus was their founder.

Florid Architecture. The latter division of the perpendicular style, often called the Tudor, remarkable for its florid character or profusion of ornament.

Florida (U. S. America). In 1712 Ponce de Leon sailed from France to the West in search of "the Fountain of Youth." He first saw land on Easter Day, and on account of the richness and quantity of flowers, called the new possession "Florida."

Florimel [honey-flower]. A damsel of great beauty, but so timid that she feared the "smallest monstrous mouse that creeps on floor," and was abused by everyone. Her form was simulated by a witch out of wax, but the wax image melted, leaving nothing behind except the girdle that was round the waist. (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iii. 4, 8; iv. 11, 12.)

"Florimel loved Marinel, but Proteus cast her into a dungeon, from which, being released by the order of Neptune, she married the man of her choice."—Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv.

"St. Amand had long since in bitterness repented of a transient infatuation, had long since distinguished the true Florimel from the false."—Sir E. B. Lytton: Pilgrims of the Rhine, iii.

Florimel's Girdle gave to those who could wear it "the virtue of chastise love and wifehood true;" but if any woman not chaste and faithful put it on, it "loosed or tore asunder." It was once the cestus of Venus, made by her husband Vulcan; but when she wanted with Mars it fell off, and was left on the "Acislian mount." (Spenser: Faerie Queene, book iv. 11, 12.)

Florin. An English coin representing 2s., or the tenth of a sovereign, issued in 1849. Camden informs us that Edward III. issued gold florins worth 6s., in 1337. The word is generally supposed to be derived from Florence; but as it had a lily on one side, probably it is connected with the Latin flos, a flower. (See Graceless Florin.)

Florisanado. One of the knights in the Spanish version of Amantis of Gaul, whose exploits and adventures are recounted in the 6th and following books. This part of the romance was added by Pacz de Ribera.

Florisel of Nice'a. A knight whose exploits and adventures form a supplemental part of the Spanish version of Amantis of Gaul. This part was added by Felicia no de Silva.

Florismart. One of Charlemagne's paladins, and the bosom friend of Roland.

Florisel. Prince of Bohemia, in love with Perdita. (Shakespeare: Winter's Tale.)

Florizel. George the Fourth, when prince, corresponded under this name with Mrs. Robinson, actress and poet, generally known as Perdita, that being the character in which she first attracted the prince's attention.
Flotsam and Jetson. Waifs found in the sea or on the shore. "Flotsam," goods found floating on the sea after a wreck. "Jetson," or Jetsam, things thrown out of a ship to lighten it. ( Anglo-Saxon, flotan, to float; French, jeter, to throw out.) (See LIGAN.)

Flower Games. Fêtes held at Toulouse, Barcelona, Treviso, and other places, where the prizes given consisted of flowers.

Flower Sermon. A sermon preached on Whit Monday in St. Catherine Cree, when all the congregation wear flowers. Flower sermons are now (1894) preached very generally once a year, especially in country churches. Every person is supposed to bring a bunch of flowers to the altar, and the flowers next day are sent to some hospital.

Flower of Chivalry. A name given to several characters: e.g., William Douglas, Lord of Liddesdale, in the fourteenth century.
Sir Philip Sidney (1554-1586), Chevalier de Bayard (le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche) (1475-1524).

Flower of Kings. Arthur is so called by John of Exeter. (Sixth century.)

Flower of Paradise. The Ipomoea or Camala'ta, called by Sir W. Jones "Love's creeper." It symbolises that mythological plant which fulfils all desire.

Flower of the Levant. Zante, noted for its beauty and fertility. "Zan- te! Zante, flos di Levanti."

Flowers and Trees with Christian Traditions.
The Aspen leaf is said to tremble because the cross was made of Aspenwood.

Alt ! tremble, tremble, Aspen-tree,
We need not ask thee why thou shakest,
For if, as holy legend saith,
On thee the Saviour bled to death,
No wonder, Aspen, that thou quakes;
And, till in judgment all assuage,
The leaves occurred shall wait and tremble.

E. C. B.

The dwarf elder is called in Wales "the plant of the Blood of Man."
The wallflower is known in Palestine as the "Blood-drops of Christ."
The following are also said to owe their stained blossoms to the blood which trickled from the cross:—
The red anemone; the arum; the purple orchis; the crimson-spotted leaves of the roadside (a French tradition); the spotted persicaria, snakeweed. (See Christian Traditions.)

Flowers at Funerals. The Greeks crowned the dead body with flowers, and placed flowers on the tomb also. The Romans decked the funeral couch with leaves and flowers, and spread flowers, wreaths, and fillets on the tomb of friends. When Sulla was buried as many as 2,000 wreaths were sent in his honour. Most of our funeral customs are derived from the Romans; as dressing in black, walking in procession, carrying insignia on the bier, raising a mound over the grave, called tumulus, whence our tomb.

Flowered Robes. In ancient Greece a woman wore flowered robes..."
was to imply that she was a fille publique. Solon made it a law that virtuous women should appear in simple and modest apparel, but that harlots should always dress in flashy or flowered robes.

"As fugitive slaves are known by their stumps, so flowered garments indicate one of the demi-monde"—Clemens of Alexandria.

Flowing Philosophers. The followers of Heraclitus, referred to by Plato as ροὶ πεῖρες (Theaetetus, 181 A). Heraclitus denied the permanency of everything in nature except change. Tennyson has a poem entitled "Of πεῖρες."

Fluellen. A Welsh captain and great pedant, who, amongst other learned quiddities, attempted to draw a parallel between Henry V. and Alexander the Great; but when he had said that one was born at Monmouth and the other at Macedonia, both beginning with the same letter, and that there was a river in both cities, he had exhausted his best parallelisms. (Henry V., iv. 7.)

"His parallel is, in all essential circumstances, as incorrect as that which Fluellen drew between Macedon and Monmouth."—Lord Macaulay.

Fluke. Hap-hazard. In billiards it means playing for one thing and getting another. Hence an advantage gained by luck more than by skill or judgment. (German, glück, chance, our luck.)

"We seem to have discovered, as it were by a fluke, a most excellent rule for all future Cabinet arrangements."—The Times.

Flummery. Flattering nonsense, palaver. In Wales it is a food made of oatmeal steeped in water and kept till it has become sour. In Cheshire and Lancashire it is the prepared skin of oatmeal mixed with honey, ale, or milk; pap; blanc-mange. (Welsh, lýury, wash-brew, from lýrn, sour or sharp.)

"You came ... with your red coat and flashing buttons ... and her head got turned with your flummery."—Shakespeare: The Posthumous, chap. xiv.

Flummux (Tb). To hamboodle; to deceive; to be in a quandary. "I am regularly flummuxed"—i.e. perplexed. The first syllable is probably a variant of flum, humbug, deception, and the word seems to be compounded on the model of the word "perplex." "For the privates, the sergeants, and spectors, she flummuxed them all to a com."—Bunyan: Battlefields (Mall Jarras).

Flummuxed. The mark set on a street, gatepost, house, etc., as a warning to fellow-vagabonds not to go near, for fear of being given in charge.

Flunkey. A liver servant. (Old French, flanguer, a henchman.)

Fly. The bride of 'Cas'влажн, "for whose love the Roman Cesar first invaded Britain." (Tennyson: End.)

Flush (4), in cards, means a whole hand of one suit, as a "flush of clubs," a "flush of hearts," etc. (See below.)

Flush of Money. Full of money. Similarly a flush of water means a sudden and full flow of water. (Latin, flux-us.)

"Strut was not very flush [in the ready]."—Dr Archibald.

Flute. The Magic Flute, an opera by Mozart (Die Zauberflöte). The "flute" was bestowed by the powers of darkness and had the power of inspiring love. Unless purified the love was only lust, but, being purified by the Powers of Light, it subserved the holiest purposes. Tamino and Pamina are guided by it through all worldly dangers to the knowledge of Divine Truth.

Flutter. A very weak specimen of a top, in the Belle's Stratagem, by Mrs. Cowley.

Flutter the Dovecoots (Tb). To disturb the equanimity of a society. The phrase occurs in Coriolanus.

"The important movement in favour of a general school of law fluttered the dovecoets of the Inns of Court."—Nineteenth Century (Nov., 1861 p. 779).

Fly (plural flies). A hackney coach, a cab. A contraction of Fly-by-night, as sedan chairs on wheels used to be called in the regency. These "Fly-by-nights," patronised greatly by George, Prince of Wales, and his boon companions, during their wild night pranks at Brighton, were invented 1809 by John Butcher, a carpenter of Jew Street.

"In the morning we took a fly, an English term for an exceedingly skimpy vehicle, and drove up to the Minister's."—Hutchinson: Old Old House (Pilgrimage to Old Boston, p. 171).

Fly (plural flies). An insect. All flies shall perish except one, and that is the bee-fly. (Koran.)

A Fly has three eyes and two compound eyes, each of which has 4,000 facets.

The god of flies. In the temple of Actium the Greeks used to sacrifice annually an ox to the god of flies. Pliny tells us that at Rome sacrifice was offered to flies in the temple of Hercules Victor. The Syrians undoubtably offered sacrifice to the same tiny tormentors. It is said that no fly was ever seen in Solomon's temple.

Across, god of the Cyrenians, to whom, according to Pilay, they offered sacrifice.
FLY-BOY

Apollyon, a surname given by the Assyrians to Zeus, for delivering Hercules from Flies during marathons. Sacrifices were yearly offered to Zeus Apollus. (Greek, apo-olla, from fly.)

Belshazzar of Belshathura (Prince of Flies), was one of the principal Syrian gods, to whom sacrifice was offered on all festival occasions.

Budolphus, in Roman mythology, (Khost 31, 3.) Myrkon, the fly-chaser, one of the deities of the Arcadians and Eleans. (Pom, xxi, 3.) (Greek, mophe, a fly, apo, a taken in hunting or chasing.)

Flies in amber. (See under Amber.) To crush a fly on a wheel. Making a mountain of a molehill. Taking a wheel used for torturing criminals and heretics for killing a fly, which one might destroy with a flapper.

Fly on the coach-wheel (A). One who fancies himself of mighty importance, but who is in reality of none at all. The allusion is to the fable of a fly sitting on a chariot-wheel and saying, "See what a dust we make!"

Not a fly with him. Domitian, the Roman emperor, was fond of catching flies, and one of his slaves, being asked if the emperor was alone, wittily replied, "Not a fly with him."

To rise to the fly. To be taken in by a hoax, as a fish rises to a false fly and is caught.

"He (the professor) rose to the fly with a charming simplicity."—Grant Allen: He Mycenaean Occurrence in Piccadilly, part II.

Fly-boy. The boy in a printing-office who lifts the printed sheets off the press. He is called the fly-boy because he catches the sheets as they fly from the tympan (q.v.) immediately the frisket (q.v.) is opened. This is now generally performed by the pressmen.

Fly a kite (Tb). To send a begging letter to persons of a charitable reputation, or in any circumstances, to solicit pecuniary aid, urging poverty, losses, or sickness as an excuse. (See Kite-flying.)

Fly-by-night (F). One who defrauds his creditors by decamping at nightime. (See Fly.)

Fly in one's face (Tb). To get into a passion with a person; to insult; as a hawk, when irritated, flies in the face of its master.

Fly in the face of danger (Tb). To run in a foolhardy manner into danger, as a hen flies in the face of a dog or cat.

Fly in the face of Providence (Tb). To act rashly, and throw away good opportunities; to court danger.

Fly open (Tb). To open suddenly, as "the doors flew open," "les portes s'ouvirent," as they do sometimes by the force of the wind.

FLY OUT AT (Tb). To burst or break into a passion. The Latin, surro to..." "Poor cholera sur Ben; would it be out his coachman, his butler, in his gamekeeper, and his language...which...from any other white, would have brough a prompt resignation,"—Good Word, 1867.

FLYING COLOURS (To come off with). In triumph; with the flags unfurled and flying.

FLYING DUTCHMAN. A spectral ship, seen in stormy weather off the Cape of Good Hope, and considered ominous of ill-luck. Sir Walter Scott says she was originally a vessel laden with precious metal, but a horrible murder having been committed on board, the plague broke out among the crew, and no port would allow the vessel to enter. The ill-fated ship still wanders about like a ghost, doomed to be sea-tossed, but never more to enjoy rest. Captain Marryat has a novel called The Phantom Ship.

FLYING WITHOUT WINGS (Tb). Nothing can be done without the proper means.

"Sue penna volat, sed factae est."—Plautus.

FLYMAN'S PLOT (Tb). In theatrical language, means a list of all the articles required by the flyman in the play produced. The flyman is the scene-shifter, or the "man in the flies."

FOG-EATER. A white bow in the clouds during foggy weather is so called. Such a bow was seen in England during January, 1888. A week preceding, the weather had been clear, sunny, and genial, then followed several days of thick fog, during which the white bow appeared. The bow was followed by several days of brilliant mild weather.

FOGIE or FOGGY. An old sedge. Properly an old military pensioner. This term is derived from the old pensioners of Edinburgh Castle, whose chief occupation was to fire the guns, or assist in quelling street riots. (Allied to fogat, fogat, vogat, sogat, fogat, etc.)

"What has the world come to (said Thickerns) when two faggot-minded old fogies like us and me sit talking about love to each other?"—Trollope: W. M. Thickney, chap. 1, p. 61.

FO-HI or FO-E. One of the chief deities of the Chinese. His mother, Moyë, was walking one day along a river bank, when she became suddenly encircled by a rainbow, and at the end of twelve years was the mother of a son. During, gestation she dreamed that she was pregnant with a white elephant, and hence the honours paid to this beast. (Asiatic Researches.)

Foil. That which sets something off to advantage. The allusion is to the metallic leaf used by jewelers to set off precious stones. (French, feuille; Latin, folium; Greek, phyllon, a leaf.)

"Hector, as a foil to set him off." — Brome.

"I'll be your foil, Larces. In mine ignorance Your skill shall, like a star, the darkest night, Stuck firth off indeed." — Shakespeare: Hamlet, v. 2.

He foiled me. He outwitted me.

"If I be foiled, there is but one ashamed who never was prouder." — Shakespeare: As You Like It, i. 2.

To run a foil. To puzzle; to lead astray. The track of game is called its foil; and an animal hunted will sometimes run back over the same foil in order to mislead its pursuers.

Folio. A book of the largest size, formed by folding the paper only once, so that each sheet makes two leaves. It is from the Italian, un libro in foglio, through the French, in-folio. Fol. is the contraction for folio.

Folio (so-and-so), in mercantile books, means page so-and-so, and sometimes the two pages which lie exposed at the same time, one containing the credit and the other the debit of one and the same account. So called because ledgers, etc., are made in folio. The paging is called the folio also. Printers call a page of MS, or printed matter a folio regardless of size.

Folio. In conveyances seventy-two words, and in Parliamentary proceedings ninety words, make a folio.

Folk. Latin, vulg' (the common people); German, volk; Dutch, volck; Saxon, folk; Danish, folk. Folk and vulgar are variants of the same word.

Folk. Fairies, also called "people," "neighbours," "wights." The Germans have their kleine volk (little folk), the Swiss their hill people and earth people.

"The little folk,
So happy and so gay, amuse themselves
Sometimes with singing,
Sometimes with dancing, when they jump and spring
Like the young skipping kids in the Alp-grass." — Wynn: Idyll of Gertrude and Roeg.

"In the hinder end of harvest, at All-hallow e'en,
When our good neighbours ride, if I read right,
Some bucked on beenwang, and some on a been.
Montgomery: Flying against Foinart.

"I crouched thee from the elven, and from wights.
Chaucer: The Miller's Tale.

Folk-lore. Whatever pertains to a knowledge of the antiquities, superstitions, mythology, legends, customs, traditions, and proverbs of a people. A "folklorist" is one who is more or less acquainted with these matters.

Folk-mote [a folk meeting]. A word used in England before the Conquest for what we now call a county or even a parish meeting.

Follies. Goblins of the north of France, who live in the houses of simple rustics, and can be expelled neither by water nor exorcism. They can be heard but are never seen. In the singular number, "esprit follet."

Follow. Follow your nose, go straight on. He followed his nose—he went on and on without any discretion or thought of consequences.

He who follows truth too closely will have dirt kicked in his face. Be not too strict to pry into abuse, for "odium veritas parat," "Summum jus suprema est injuria."

Follower. A male sweetheart who follows the object of his affections. A word very common among servants, Mistresses say to female servants, "I allow no followers"—i.e. I do not allow men to come into my house to see you. Also a disciple, a partisan.

"The pretty post servant-maid had their choice of desirable followers." — E. G. Tucker: Crawford, chap. iii. p. 53.

Folly. Father of Folly (Abu Falah), an aged chief, who led a hundred horse and seven hundred camels against Mahomet and fell at the battle of Bedr. His own people called him Father of Wisdom (Abu Lahom).

Folly. A fantastic or foolishly extravagant country seat, built for amusement or vainglory. (French, folie.)

"We have in this country a word (namely Folly) which has a technical application to the case of fantastic buildings." — De Quincey: Essays on the Poets (Keats, p. 100).

Fisher's Folly. A large and beautiful house in Bishopsgate, with pleasure-gardens, bowling-green, and hot-houses, built by Jasper Fisher, one of the six clerks of Chancery and a Justice of the Peace. Queen Elizabeth lodged there.

"Kirby's castle, and Fisher's folly, Lydia's pleasure, and Meggs's glory." — Spon: Survey.

Fond. A foolish, fond parent. Here fond does not mean affectionate, but silly. Chaucer uses the word fondne for a simpleton, and the Scotch feus is to play the fool. Shakespeare has "fond desire," "fond love," "fond shakels of gold,” “fond wretch,” “fond madwoman,” etc. “Fondling” means an idiot, or one fond.
Fons et Origo

“See how simple and how fond I am.”
Shakespeare: Midsummer Night’s Dream, iii. 2.
“Fonder than ignorance.”
Shakespeare: Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

Fons et Origo (Latin). The primary cause. Faz et focus, the instigator, as Juno was the faz et focus of the Trojan war.

Font, in printing, sometimes called Fount, a complete set of type of any one size, with all the usual points and accents; a font consists of about 100,000 characters. The word is French, fonte, from fondre (to melt or cast). When a letter of a different type to the rest gets into a page it is called a “wrong font,” and is signified in the margin by the two letters uf. (See Type.)

Tuten to the font. Baptised. The font is a vessel employed for baptism.

Fontarabia. Now called Fuenterrabia (in Latin, Fonse rapi’dus), near the Gulf of Gascony. Here, according to Maria’s and other Spanish historians, Charlemagne and all his chivalry fell by the sword of the Spanish Saracen. Mezeray and the French writers say that, the rear of the king’s army being cut to pieces, Charlemagne returned and revenge their death by a complete victory.

“When Charlemagne with all his parrage fell”
By Fontarabia.

Food. Sir Walter Scott remarks that live cattle go by Saxon names, and slain meat by Norman-French, a standing evidence that the Normans were the lords who ate the meat, and the Saxons the serfs who tended the cattle. Examples:

Sheep Ox Calf Hog Pig (Saxon).
Mutton Beef Veal Bacon Pork (Norman-French).

Food of the gods. (See Ambrosia, Nectar.)

Food for Powder. Raw recruits levied in times of war.

Foods.
Sterlets from the Volga.
Rye from the River.
Grudes from Scotland.
Bustards from Sweden.
Bears’ feet from the Black Forest.
Bison from America.
Pilott of beef a la Chateaubriand.
Ortolans a la Lucullus.

Wines.
Old Madeira with the soup.
Chateaux Piblushes with the side dishes.
Johannissberg and Pichon-Longueville with the roasts.
Chateaux Lafitte ’84 with the entrées.
Sparkling Moselle with the toast.

Fools. In chess, the French call the “bishop” Fou, and used to represent the piece in a fool’s dress; hence, Hegner says, “Les fous sont aux échecs les plus proches des Rots” (14 Sat.). Fou is a corruption of the Eastern word Fol (an elephant), as Thomas Hyde remarks in his Latin Orientalibus (i. 4), and on old boards the places occupied by our “bishops” were occupied by elephants. A Tom Fool. A person who makes himself ridiculous. (See Tom.)

“The ancient and noble family of Tom Fool.”
—Quarterly Review.

Fool [a food], as gooseberry fool, raspberry fool, means gooseberries or raspberries pressed. (French, fouler; to press.)

Fool Thinks. As the fool thinks, so the bell clunks (Latin, “Quod valet ovi- dimus facile cre’dimus”). A foolish person believes what he desires.

Fool in his Sleeve. Every man hath a fool in his sleeve. No one is always wise. The allusion is to the tricks of jugglers.

The wisest fool in Christendom, James I, was so called by Henri IV., but he learnt the phrase of Sully.

Fool or Physician at Forty. Plutarch tells us that Tiberius said “Every man is a fool or his own physician at forty.” (Treatise on the Preservation of Health.)

Fools. (French, fol, Latin, follis.)
(1) The most celebrated court fools:
(a) Dug’net, jester of King Arthur; Rayère, of Henry I.; Scogfan, of Edward IV.; Thomas Killigrow, called “King Charles’s jester” (1611-1682); Archie Armstrong, jester in the court of James I. (died 1772).
(b) Thomas Derrie, jester in the court of James I.
(c) James Goddes, jester to Mary Queen of Scots. His predecessor was Jenny Colquhoun.
(d) Patch, the court fool of Elizabeth, wife of Henry VII.
(e) Will Somers, Henry VIII.’s jester. He died 1560.
(f) W. F. Wallet, jester in the court of Queen Elizabeth.
(g) Triboulet, jester of Louis XII. and Francois I. (1487-1563); Braquet, of whom Brantôme says “he never had his equal in repartee” (1512-1608); Chicot, jester of Henri III. and IV. (1553-1591); Longol, of Louis XIII.; and Angel, of Louis XIV., last of the titled fools of France.
Fool's Bolt. A fool's bolt is soon shot (Henry V., iii. 7). Simpletons cannot wait for the fit and proper time, but waste their resources in random endeavours; a fool and his money are soon parted. The allusion is to the British bowmen in battle; the good soldier shot with a purpose, but the foolish soldier at random. (See Prov. xix. 11.)

Fool's Paradise. Unlawful pleasure, illicit love, vain hopes. Thus, in Romeo and Juliet, the Nurse says to Romeo, "If ye should lead her [Juliet] into a fool's paradise, it were a gross . . . behaviour." The old schoolmen said there were three places where persons not good enough for paradise were admitted: 1. The limbus patrum, for those good men who had died before the death of the Redeemer; 2. The limbus infantum or paradise of unbaptised infants; and 3. The limbus fatuo rum or paradise of idiots and others who were non compos mentis. (See Limbo.)

Foolscap. A corruption of the Italian foglio-capo (folio-sized sheet). The error must have been very ancient, as the water-mark of this sort of paper from the thirteenth to the seventeenth century was a fool's head, with cap and bells.

Foot. (Greek, ped.; Latin, ped.; French, pied; Dutch, voet; Saxon, fot. Foot and pedal are variants of the same word.)

Best foot foremost. Use all possible dispatch. To "set on foot" is to set afoot. If you have various powers of motion, set your best foremost.

"Nay, but make haste; the better foot before." Shakespeare: King John, iv. 2.

I have not yet got my foot in. I am not yet familiar and easy with the work. The allusion is to the preliminary exercises in the great Roman foot-race. While the signal was waited for, the candidates made essays of jumping, running, and posturing, to excite a suitable warmth and make their limbs supple. This was "getting their foot in" for the race. (See HAND.)

I have the measure or length of his foot. I know the exact calibre of his mind. The allusion is to the Pythagorean measurement of Hercules by the length of his foot. (See Ex Ped.)

To light on one's feet. To escape a threatened danger. It is said that cats thrown from a height always light on their feet.

To put down your foot on [a matter]. Peremptorily to forbid it.

To show the clown foot. To betray an evil intention. The devil is represented with a clown foot.
Foot-breadth

Turn away thy foot from the Sabbath (Isa. lviii. 13). Abstain from working and doing your own pleasure on that day. The allusion is to the law which prohibited a Jew from walking on a Sabbath more than a mile. He was to turn away his foot from the road and street.

Withdraw thy foot from thy neighbour's house, lest he get weary of thee, and so hate thee. Never outstay your welcome.

With one foot in the grave. In a dying state.

You have put your foot in it nicely. You have got yourself into a pretty mess. (In French, vous avez mis le pied astane.) When porridge is burnt or meat over-roasted, we say, "The bishop hath put his foot in." (See Bishop.)

A foot. On the way, in progress. (See Game's Afoot, Matter Afoot.)

"Mischief, thou art afoot, Take thou what course thou wilt."—Shakespeare: Julius Caesar, Ill. 2.

Foot-breadth or Quern-biter. The sword of Thoralf Skollinson the Strong, a companion of Hako I. of Norway. (See Swonds.)

Foot-lights. To appear 'before the foot-lights.' On the stage, where a row of lights is placed in front along the floor to lighten it up.

Foot Monsters. In the Italian romance of Guerino Meschino Indians are spoken of with feet so large that they carry them over their heads like umbrellas.

Foot-notes. Notes placed at the bottom of a page.

"A trifling sum of misery
Now added to the foot of thy account."—Dryden

Foot-pound. The unit of result in estimating work done by machinery. Thus, if we take 1 lb. as the unit of weight and 1 foot as the unit of distance, a foot-pound would be 1 lb. weight raised 1 foot.

Foot of a Page. The bottom of it, meaning the notes at the bottom of a page.

Footing. He is on good footing with the world. He stands well with the world. This is a French phrase, Être sur un grand pied dans le monde. "Grand pied" means "large foot," and the allusion is to the time of Henry VIII., when the rank of a man was designated by the size of his shoe—the higher the rank the larger the shoe. The proverb would be more correctly rendered, "He has a large foot in society."

To pay your footing. To give money for drink when you first enter on a trade. Money for being allowed to put your foot in the premises occupied by fellow-craftsmen. This word is called foot-ale by ancient writers. (See Garnish.)

Footman's Wand (A). (See Running Footmen.)

Footmen. (See Running Footmen.)

Fopp's Alley. The passage between the tiers of benches, right and left, in the Opera-house, frequented by masques and other exquisites.

Foppington (Lord). An empty coxcomb in Vanbrugh's Relapse, of which Sheridan's Trip to Scarborough is a modified version.

"The shoemaker in the Relapse tells Lord Foppington that his lordship is mistaken in supposing that his sime plaches."—Lord Macaulay.

Forbear. Ancestors, predecessors—i.e. those born before the present generation. (Anglo-Saxon, fő-bærn.)

"My name is Greno, so phuse you.—Roland Greene, whose forbears were descended of Heathzill, in the Delicate Isle."—Sir W. Scott: The Abbot, chap. xvi.

Forbes, referred to by Thomson in his Seasons, was Duncan Forbes, of Cullo'den, lord president of the Court of Session. For many years he ruled the destinies and greatly contributed to the prosperity of Scotland. He was on friendly terms with Pope, Swift, Arbuthnot, etc. The word is now generally pronounced as a monosyllable.

"Thee, Forbes, too, whom every word attends... Thy country joys thru' her vowing airs.
Placed by thy wisdom, by thy soul informed."—Thomson: Autumn.

Forbidden Fruit (The), Mahometan doctors aver, was the banana or Indian fig, because fig-leaves were employed to cover the disobedient pair when they felt shame as the result of sin. Called "Paradisica." Metaphorically, unlawful = forbidden indulgence.

Forcible Feeble School. (See Feeble.)

Ford. Mr. and Mrs. Ford are characters in The Merry Wives of Windsor. Mrs. Ford pretends to accept Sir John Falstaff's protestations of love, in order to punish him by her devices.

Fordelis (in Orlando Furioso). Wife of Bran'dimart. Orlando's intimate friend. When Brandimart was slain, she dwelt for a time in his mausoleum in Sicily, and died broken-hearted. (Book xii.)

Fore. To the fore. In the front rank; eminent.

"To come to the fore. To stand out prominently; to distinguish oneself; to stand forth."

Fore-and-Aft. Lengthwise, in opposition to "athwart-ships" (or across the line of the keel). (Dana: Seaman's Manual, p. 96.)

Forecastle. Ancient ships had a castle, as may be seen in the tapestry of the House of Lords, representing the Spanish Armada. The term forecastle means before the castle. The Romans called the castled ships natus turrita.

"That part of the upper deck forward of the forecastle... In merchant ships, the forward part of the vessel, under the deck, where the sailors live."—Dana: Seaman's Manual, p. 96.

Foreclose. To put an end to. A legal term, meaning to close before the time specified; e.g. suppose I held the mortgage of a man called A, and A fails to fulfill his part of the agreement, I can insist upon the mortgage being cancelled, foreclosing thus our agreement.

"The embargo with Spain foreclosed the trade"—Oxford.

Fore-shortened. Not viewed laterally, but more or less obliquely. Thus, a man’s leg lying on the ground, with the sole of the foot nearer the artist than the rest of the body, would be perspective shortened.

"He forbids the fore-shortenings, because they make the parts appear little."—Hudibras.

Forfar. Do as the cow o’ Forfar did, tak’ a stannin’ drink. A cow, in passing a door in Forfar, where a tub of ale had been placed to cool, drank the whole of it. The owner of the ale prosecuted the owner of the cow, but a learned baillie, in giving his decision, said, "As the ale was drunk by the cow while standing at the door, it must be considered deuch an dornis (stirrup-cup), to make a charge for which would be to outrage Scotch hospitality." (Sir W. Scott: Waverley.)

Forget-me-nots of the Angels. The stars are so called by Longfellow. The similitude between a little light-blue flower and the yellow stars is very remote. Stars are more like buttercups than forget-me-nots.

"Silently, one by one, in the infinite meadows of heaven, Blossoms the lovely stars, the forget-me-nots of the angels."—Stevenson.

Forgive, blest Shade. This very celebrated epitaph is in Brading churchyard, Isle of Wight, and is attributed to Mrs. Anne Steele (Theodosia), daughter of a Baptist minister of Bristol, but was touched up by the Rev. John Gill, curate of Newchurch. Set to music in three parts by J. W. Calcott (1795).

Forgiveness (Ang.-Sax., forgedom.) "Forgiveness to the injured doth belong, But they never pardon who have done the wrong."

Bryden: Oxon. of Grandan, part ii. sect. i. 2.

"Proprium humilis generis, odisse quem laceris."—Tacitus.

Fork Out. Hand over; pay down; stand treat. Fingers are called forks, and this may suffice to explain the phrase; if not, we have the Anglo-Saxon verb feccan (to draw out, to take), and "fork out" would be "feit out."

Forks. The gallows. (Latin, ferra. Cicero (De Divinat. i. 20) says, "Ferae ferren dextrae set," often quoted in proof that criminals condemned to the cross were obliged to carry their own cross to the place of execution. But the ordinary meaning of ferra is a kind of yoke to which the hands of criminals were fastened. The punishment was of three degrees of severity: (1) The ferra ignominiosa; (2) the ferra pecunias; and (3) the ferra capitales. The first was for slight offences, and consisted in carrying the ferra on the shoulders, more or less weighted. The second consisted in carrying the ferra and being scourged. The third was being scourged to death. The word ferreya meant what we call a gallows-bud or vile fellow.

Forked Cap (A). A bishop’s mitre is so called by John Skelton. It is clief or forked.

Forlorn Hope. Cromwell says, "Our forlorn of horse marched within a mile of the enemy," i.e. our horse picket sent forward to reconnoitre approached within a mile of the enemy’s camp. (German, verloren.)

Forlot or Flot. The fourth part of a boll. From forian (four), hlot (part).

Forma Panperis (Latin, Under plea of poverty. To sue in forma panperie. When a person has just cause of a suit, but is so poor that he cannot raise 25, the judge will assign him lawyers and counsel without the usual fees.

Fortiter in Re (Latin). Firmness in doing what is to be done; an unfaining resolution to persevere to the Fortunate Islands. Now called the Canaries.

Fortunatus. You have found Fortunatus's purse. Are you lucky? The nursery tale of Fortunatus records that he had an inexhaustible purse. It is from the Italian fairy tales of Straparola, called Nights. Translated into French in 1585. (See Wishing Cup.)

Fortune. Fortune favours the brave. ("Fortus fortuna ad virtutem." (Terence: Phormio, i. 4.)

Fortunio. The assumed name of a damsel, youngest of three sisters, who dressed herself as a cavalier to save her aged father, who was summoned to the army. Fortunio on the way employed seven servants: Strong-back, who could carry on his back enough liquor to fill a river; Light-foot, who could traverse any distance in no time; Markman, who could hit an object at any distance; Fine-car, who could hear anything, no matter where uttered; Boisterer, who could do any amount of cudgelling; Gourmand, who could eat any amount of food; and Tippler, who could drink a river dry and thirst again. Fortunio, having rendered invaluable services to King Alforute, by the aid of her seven servants, at last married him. (Grimm's Goblin: Fortune. Countess D'Anthoy: Fairy Tales.)

Forty. A superstitious number, arising from the Scripture use. Thus Moses was forty days in the mount; Elijah was forty days fed by ravens; the rain of the flood fell forty days, and another forty days expired before Noah opened the window of the ark; forty days was the period of embalming; Nineveh had forty days to repent; our Lord fasted forty days; he was seen forty days after his resurrection; etc.

St. Swithin betokens forty days' rain or dry weather; a quarantine extends to forty days; forty days, in the Old English law, was the limit for the payment of the fine for manslaughter; the privilege of sanctuary was for forty days; the widow was allowed to remain in her husband's house for forty days after his decease; a knight enjoined forty days' service of his tenant; a stranger, at the expiration of forty days was compelled to be enrolled in some tithing; members of Parliament were protected from arrest forty days after the prorogation of the House, and forty days before the House was convened; a new-made burgess had to forfeit forty pence unless he built a house within forty days; etc., etc.

The ancient physicians ascribe many strange changes to the period of forty; the alchemists looked on forty days as the charmed period when the philosopher's stone and elixir of life were to appear.

Fool or physician at forty. (See under Fool.)

Forty Stripes save One. The Jews were forbidden by the Mosaic law to inflict more than forty stripes on an offender, and for fear of breaking the law they stopped short of the number. If the scourge contained three laches, thirteen strokes would equal "forty save one."

Forty stripes save one. The thirty-nine articles of the Anglican Church.

Forty Thieves. In the tale of Ali Baba. (Arabian Nights' Entertainments.)

Forty Winks. A short nap. Forty is an indefinite number, meaning a few. Thus, we say, "A, B, C, and forty more." Coriolanus says, "I could beat forty of them" (iii. i). (See Forty.)

"The slave had forty thousand lives." - Shakespeare. Othello, iii. 1. "I loved Ophelia; forty thousand brothers could not, with all their quantity of love, make up my sum." - Shakespeare. Hamlet, v. 1.

Forty-five. No. 45. The celebrated number of Wilkes's North Britain, in which the Cabinet Ministers are accused of putting a lie into the king's mouth.

Forwards ( Marshal). G. L. von Blicher was called Marschall Vorwärts, from his constant exhortation to his husars in the campaigns preceding the great battle of Waterloo. Vorwärts! always Vorwärts! (1742-1819.)

Fos'cari (Francesco). Doge of Venice. He occupied the office for thirty-five years, added Brescia, Bergamo, Crema, and Ravenna to the Republic, greatly improved the city, and raised Venice to the pinnacle of its glory. Of his four sons only one, named Jacopo, survived; he was thrice tortured. Before his final banishment, the old doge, then eighty-four years of age, hobbled on crutches to the gaol where his son was confined, but would not mitigate the sentence of "The Ten." His son, being banished to Candia, died, and Francis was deposed. As he descended the Giant Staircase he heard the bell toll for the election of his successor, and dropped down dead. (Byron: The Two Foscari.)
Jacopo Foscarini. Denounced by the Council of Ten for taking bribes of foreign powers. He was tried before his own father, confessed his guilt, and was banished. During his banishment a Venetian senator was murdered, and Jacopo, being suspected of complicity in the crime, was again tortured and banished. He returned to Venice, was once more brought before the council, subjected to torture, and banished to Candia, where in a few days he died.

"Nothing can sympathise with Foscarini—
Not even a Foscarini."
Byron: The Two Foscari.

Foss (Corporal). An attendant on Lieutenant Worthington. A similar character to Trim in Sterne's Tristram Shandy. (G. Colman: The Poor Gentleman.)

Foss-way. One of the four principal highways made by the Romans in England, leading from Cornwall to Lincoln. It had a foss or ditch on each side of it. (See ERMINE STREET.)

Fosse et Furca [pit and gallow]. An ancient privilege granted by the Crown to its vassals, to cast female felons into a ditch, and hang male ones on a gallows.

According to Wharton (Law Dictionary), this fosses is not the Latin word, but the Hebrew ferkah, to divide. Hence also the servile tenure called Furecam et Flagellum.

Fosils. Things dug up, animal and vegetable remains dug out of the earth. (Latin, fodio, to dig up.)

"Many other bodies, which, because we discover them by digging into the bowels of the earth are called by one common name—fossils, under which are comprehended metals and minerals." [Not now.—Locke.]

Foster Brother or Sister. One brought up by the same nurse.

A foster-child is one brought up by those who are not its real parents. (Saxon, fosstran, Danish foster, to nurse.)

Fou Drunk. "Wilibrand has fou-drunk"—i.e. is despically drunk, dead drunk. French, fou, "mad," as fourvenagé; or simply fit, i.e. "full," "intensive," as in full-oft, "full-well ye reject the commandment of God" (Mark vii. 9).

Foul Proof. A proof is a rough impression of a manuscript set up in type, or of a drawing engraved, for the author's correction. The proof with many faults is a foul proof, but the "pull," after the errors are corrected, is termed a clean proof. These impressions are called proofs because they must be approved of by author and reader before they are finally printed.

Foul-weather Jack. Commodore Byron, said to be as notorious for foul weather as Queen Victoria is for fine. (1723-1786.) Admiral Sir John Norris, who died 1746.

Fountain of Death. In Jerusalem Delivered, the hermit tells Charles and Ubald of a fountain, the sight of which excites thirst, but those who taste its water die with laughter.

Pomponius Mele age speaks of a fountain in the Fortunate Islands, "Qui potestre risum solvere in mortem." Petrarch alludes to the same.

These fountains symbolise the pleasures of sin.

Fountain of Youth. A fountain supposed to possess the power of restoring youth. It was thought to be in one of the Bahama Islands.

Four Kings. The History of the Four Kings (Livre des Quatre Rois). A pack of cards. In a French pack the four kings are Charlemagne, David, Alexander, and Cæsar, representatives of the Franco-German, Jewish or Christian, Macedonian, and Roman monarchies.

Four Letters, containing the name of God, and called by Rabbins "tetragrammaton." Thus, in Hebrew, JHVH (Jehovah); in Greek, Θεος; in Latin, Deus; in French, Dieu; in Assyrian, Adad; Dutch, God; German, Gott; Danish, Goth; Swedish, Goth; Persian, Sor; Arabic, Alla; Cabalistic, Agra; Egyptian, Θεος; Sanskrit, Deva; Spanish, Dios; Italian, Dio; Scandinavian, Odin, etc.

* This probably is a mere coincidence, but it is worthy of note.

Four Masters. Michael and Cucoirighe O'Clerighe, Maurice and Fearfesa Conry, authors of the Annals of Downgal.

Fourierism. A communistic system, so called from Charles Fourier, of Besançon. According to Fourier, all the world was to be cantoned into groups, called phalansteries, consisting each of 400 families or 1,800 individuals, who were to live in a common edifice, furnished with workshops, studios, and all sources of amusement. The several groups were at the same time to be associated together under a unitary Fourierists, French communists, so called from Charles Fourier. (See above.)

Fourteen, in its connection with Henri IV. and Louis XIV. The following are curious and strange coincidences:

Henri IV.
14 letters in the name Henri-de-Bourbon. He was the 14th king of France and Navarre on the extinction of the family of Navarre. He was born on Dec. 14, 1553, the sum of which year amounts to 14; he was assassinated on May 14, 1610; and lived 4 times 14 years, 14 weeks, and 14 days.
14 May, 1553, was born Marguerite de Valois, his first wife.
14 May, 1598, the Parisians rose in revolt against him, because he was a “heretic.”
14 March, 1600, he won the great battle of Ivry.
14 May, 1600, was organized a grand ecclesiastical and military demonstration against him, which drove him from the faubourgs of Paris.
14 Nov., 1600, the Sixteen took an oath to die rather than submit to a “heretic” king.
14 was Gregory XIV, who issued a Bull excluding Henri from the throne.
14 Nov., 1610, the Paris parliament registered the papal Bull.
14 Dec., 1610, the Duke of Savoy was reconciled to Henri IV.
14 Scul. 1616, was baptised the dauphin (afterwards Louis XIII.), son of Henri IV.
14 May, 1616, Henri was assassinated by Ravaillec. For the dates see Histoire de France, by Boutel and Chardon (1830).

Louis XIV.
14th of the name. He mounted the throne 1663, the last on which 1661, which figures equal 14. He died 1711, the sum of which figures also equals 14. He reigned 67 years, the sum of which two figures equals 14. He was born 1638, died 1715, which added together equals 3353, the sum of which figures comes to 14. Such a strange combination is probably without parallel.

Fourteen Hundred (A Stock Exchange warning). It is to give notice that a stranger has entered ‘Change. The term was in use in Defoe’s time.

Fourth Estate of the Realm (The). The daily press. The most powerful of all. Burke, referring to the Reporters’ Gallery, said, “Yonder sits the Fourth Estate, more important than them all.”

Fourth of July (The). The great national holiday of the United States of America. The Declaration of Independence was July 4, 1776.

Fowler (Henry the Fowler). Heinrich I., King of Germany, was so called, because when the deputies announced to him his election to the throne, they found him fowling with a hawk on his fist (876, 919-936). "This tradition is not mentioned by any historian before the eleventh century; but since that period numerous writers have repeated the story. He was called in Latin, Henricus Acceps."

Fox (The old). Marshal Soulé was so nicknamed, from his strategic talents and fertility of resources. (1769-1851.) (See REYNARD.)

Fox. Antipathy to foxes. Speaking of natural antipathies, Shakespeare makes Shylock say:

"Some men there he love not a gaping pig,
Some that are mad if they behold a cat."

Tycho Brahé would faint at sight of a fox, Marshal d'Albret at sight of a pig, Henri III. at sight of a cat. (See ANTIPATRY.)

A wise fox will never rob his neighbour's hen-roost, because it would soon be found out. He goes farther from home where he is not known.

Every fox must pay his skin to the furrier. The crafty shall be taken in their own williness.

"Tutte le volpi si trovano in pellicceria."—Italian Proverb.

To set a fox to keep the geese. (Latin, "Oveam lupum committere.") He entrusted his money to sharpers.

Fox (That). So our Lord called Herod Antipas, whose crafty policy was thus pointed at, "Go ye, and tell that fox, Behold, I cast out devils" (St. Luke xiii. 32). (E.C. 4—A.D. 35.)

Herod Agrippa I. (A.D. 41-44.)

Herod Agrippa II. (A.D. 62-106.)
